MILLETIERE (THEOPHILUS BRACHET SIEUR DE LA) acquired a reputation much greater than good for meddling in matters of religion, and endeavouring to reconcile the Catholics and Protestants in France. One of his antagonists described him after the following manner (a): that after he had studied the Law superficially at Heidelberg, he was admitted advocate; that he was so much in love with an attorney's daughter, that he fell dangerously sick, and that he neither would nor could be cured but by marrying her; that he hoped to find causes by means of his father-in-law, and upon this account applied himself to the bar, but being at a stand in one pleading (b) he was so disgusted with the practice of the Law, that he set up for a Divine; that he was heard to dispute about matters of religion in the court, whither he went still as a hearing advocate, and there sputtered out Hebrew; that he affected a great zeal against Arminianism; that he occasioned the conference of Cameron with Tilenus; and that by all these motions he obtained the office of an elder in the consistory of the church of Paris, and afterwards was made deputy of the province to the assembly of Rochelle; that he had the chief hand in the tumultuous resolutions of that assembly, which overturned the state of the churches; that his conduct in this deputation is very well known, and with what heat he wrote against Tilenus, his particular enemy [A], and how little the success of his journey to the States-General answered the hopes he had raised in the assembly at Rochelle; that being returned home, he sollicited the affairs of the duke of Rohan at court, and that he was suspected of being concerned in enterprizes pernicious to his country, and of holding correspondence with foreigners; that he was apprehended and sent to Toulouse where, after he had endured the torture and a long imprisonment [B], he framed the first plan of the Syncretism;

(a) Samuel Maresius, in Antichristo revelato, lib. ii, cap. ult. pag. 562, & seq.

(b) Cum obmutuisset in frequenti senatu. Id. ib.

[A] It is known . . . with what heat he wrote against Tilenus, his particular enemy.] In the beginning of the month of March, 1621 (1), there came forth, under the name of Abraham Elintus, an advertisment to the assembly of Rochelle (2), wherein the Reformed were earnestly exhorted to submit to their prince, and not to undertake to preserve to themselves by a war the possession of the edicts. Elintus was the anagram of Tilenus, who was the author of this advertisement. La Milletiere, secretary to the assembly of Rochelle, wrote an answer to this piece, and intituled it, A Discourse of the true Reasons why those of the Reformed religion in France can, and ought in conscience to, resist with force of arms the open persecution of the enemies of their religion and the State. Tilenus replied in a little book which was intituled, An Examination of a Book intituled, A Discourse of the true Reasons why those of the Reformed Religion, &c. See in the eighth volume of the French Mercury (3) the contents of these two pieces. Note, that the Chamber of the Edict, sitting at Beziers, caused the answer of La Milletiere to the advertisement of Tilenus, to be burnt by the hand of the hangman, and ordered an enquiry to be made after the name of the author; which decree was made October 6, 1626. See the twelfth volume of the French Mercury (4). For the rest Father Ange de Raconis, a Capuchin preacher, made use of several extracts out of those writings of Tilenus and La Milletiere; and he informs us (5), that Du Moulin chose among all the rest, La Milletiere, as his champion, to oppose him against Raconis (6), when the baroness de Courville was instructed. Note, that Grotius did not approve of La Milletiere's publishing a work so capable of rendring the cause of the Reformed odious to princes (7).

(1) French Mercury, Tom. vii, ad annum 1621, pag. 223.

(2) It is inserted in the French Mercury, ibid.

(3) At pag. 155, & seq. See also the History of the edict of Nantes, book viii, pag. 423.

(4) At pag. 607, & seq.

(5) Ange de Raconis Glaive de Jezabel, cap. iii, pag. 313.

(6) Nephew to the Capuchin.

(7) Grotius, Epist. 174, part i, pag. 65. See also the 715*th letter.*

[B] That he was sent to Toulouse, where after he had endured the torture, and a long imprisonment.] He himself informs us of a very peculiar circumstance in his process. I had in my hands, says he (8), the sentence of my death, drawn

(8) La Milletiere, in chap. xii of the Catholique Reformé, pag. 197, 198.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Syncretism; that having recovered his liberty by the clemency of the prince, and the interceſſion of his friends, he engaged to make all the Reformed return to the Romiſh communion, and that by this means he thought he was to ſhew his gratitude for the annual penſion of a thouſand crowns that were given him; that he printed many books about the re-union of the religions [C], and becauſe he did not pay a deference to the remonſtrances of the conſiſtory of Charenton, he was at laſt excommunicated, which did not hinder him from going to church conſtantly; that he maintained his family another way, which was by ſoliciting, as a brother-in-law, the ſuits of a famous courtezan, to whom he was indeed related in this degree of affinity, for ſhe was a baſtard of the Attorney whoſe daughter he had married (c); that no body denied, but he was grafted into honourable families, yet it was well known what trade his grandfather followed in Orleans (d) [D]. This I have taken out of a book printed in the year 1642. The reader may ſee elſewhere (e), that La Milletiere continued ſtill in the external profeſſion of the Reformed religion in the year 1645, at the time of the national ſynod of Charenton. The proceedings of the aſſembly againſt him obliged him to declare himſelf openly (f); that is, he embraced the Romiſh communion. He abjured towards the end of March 1645. He continued ſtill to write upon the controverſy, and to ſay that the re-union of the two religions was eaſy to be effected [E]. The firſt work he publiſhed after his

(c) Taceo aliud culinæ ſuæ ſubſidium ex publica ſollicitatione in Curia negotiorum famoſæ cujuſdam meretriculæ tanquam affinis ſuæ, eſt enim ſoceri ſui ſpuria. Id. ib. pag. 565.

(d) Id. ib. pag. 561.

(e) In the article AMYRAUT in the text.

(f) See letter cx, and cxiv, of Sarravius, Edit. of Utrecht, 1697.

drawn up by the hand of the firſt preſident Maſuyer, under the authority of the parliament of Toulouſe, in which I found my ſelf condemned as one accuſed and convicted of the crimes charged upon me, and this ſentence was put into the hands of the recorder, before the conſultation about it in parliament, which, by their interlocutory, was the occaſion of the delay, whereby afterwards I obtained my liberty and preſervation from the ſovereign authority.

[C] That he printed many books about the re-union of the religions.] He began with a letter which he publiſhed in French in the year 1634, and it was followed two years after by a work in Latin divided into two parts. In the firſt he examined the diſpute about St Peter's ſupremacy, about juſtification, prayers for the dead, the invocation of ſaints, and the euchariſt. In the ſecond, he treated of nature and grace, and of predeſtination. This book he ſent to the ableſt miniſters; and ſeveral anſwers were made to it: Among the reſt that of Mr du Moulin was very ſharp, to which he wrote a reply in French, which Grotius did not deſpiſe (9). In my opinion, none anſwered the ſecond book of La Milletiere better than Mr Daillé, whoſe anſwer is intituled, An Examination of the Advice of Mr de la Milletiere, about the Accommodation of differences in Religion; which he publiſhed in Latin and French in the year 1636. This examination was refuted by Mr de la Milletiere, and that refutation obliged Mr Daillé to write an apology; but he did not publiſh it (10). His adverſary publiſhed a new book after the holding of the national ſynod of Alençon in the year 1637, with this title, The means of Chriſtian Peace by the Re-union of the Catholics and Proteſtants as to the Differences of Religion (11). After this he publiſhed ſeveral other books, whoſe titles need not be ſet down. I will only add, that he became ſo captious, that he wrote an apology for the method of Peter Veron. He thought he had juſtified it by reaſons which no miniſter could anſwer: Of which he boaſts in the ninth page of his Catholique Reformé, printed at Paris in the year 1642.

Let us ſee the judgment that is given of him by the Hiſtorian of the edict of Nantes (12). ‘ La Milletiere ‘ was a raſh conceited man, who thought that none came ‘ near his great merits and capacity. Moreover, either ‘ the fear that the court, remembring what was paſſed, ‘ would give him trouble, or the hope of acquiring ‘ much honour, or making a great fortune by the ‘ ſucceſs of that enterprize, or the praiſes which the ‘ Jeſuits gave him to draw him over to their party, ‘ ſo byaſſed his mind, that he came entirely into the ‘ project of the cardinal, and drew up a plan of an ‘ accommodation exactly in the terms which that ‘ prelate deſired. He vindicated the Romiſh church ‘ almoſt in every thing; and in thoſe which he did ‘ not take the trouble to juſtify, he made uſe of ‘ the ſofteſt expreſſions, under pretence of explaining them, giving them out as queſtions, which ‘ ought not to hinder the Reformed from being reconciled.’

[D] No body denied that he was grafted into honourable families, but his grandfather's trade was well known . . . . in Orleans.] Let us relate the very words of him who affirms this. ‘ Homo male feriatus putavit non ‘ aliter quam alios contemptim deprimendo, imaginariam ſuam Nobilitatem poſſe commendari. Quaſi ‘ neſciretur quam artem avus ipſius Aureliæ exercuerit; ipſum vero à ſuis collactaneis ſemper cum riſu ‘ exceptum, quoties nobilitatis ſuæ ſermonem pro ‘ infita ſibi vanitate auſus eſt injicere; quamvis non ‘ negem eum honeſtis eſſe inſitum familiis, quas dehoneſtat quantum in ſe eſt (13). - - - - He prepoſterouſly thought, that his own imaginary nobility could not be commended, but by contemptuouſly abaſing others. As if people did not know what trade his grandfather had followed at Orleans; and that he himſelf was always laughed at by his foſter-brothers, whenever his natural vanity prompted him to talk of his nobility; though I do not deny that he is grafted on good families, which he diſgraces as much as he can.’ The abbot Marolles informs us, that La Milletiere was the ſon of Ignatius Brachet, lord of la Milletiere, and of Antoinette Faye, the daughter of Bartholomew Faye, lord of Eſpaiſſes, counſellor in the parliament, and preſident of the inqueſts in 1541 (14). By this marriage our reconciler of religions was related to ſeveral illuſtrious families, as this abbot ſhows at large.

(13) Samuel Mareſius, in Antich. revelato, lib. ii, pag. 561.

(14) Abbot de Marolles, Mémoires, pag. 322, 323.

[E] He continued ſtill to write upon the controverſy, and to ſay, that the re-union of the two religions was eaſy to be effected,] ‘ After divers admonitions which did ‘ no good, the ſynods declared, that he was no longer ‘ a member of the Reformed churches; and there ‘ was not one of them who would receive him into their communion. He became therefore a Catholic out of neceſſity, that he might be of ſome ‘ religion; and after this he conſtantly acted the ‘ part of a miſſionary, and looked out for conferences, at which he was always ſo ill treated as to daſh ‘ his boldneſs, if he had not been ſo ſelf-conceited that ‘ nothing could daunt him. Charles Drelincourt ‘ one of the colleagues of John Daillé, and the true ‘ ſcourge of ſuch as were of Milletiere's temper, quite ‘ confounded him in a conference, the acts whereof ‘ was publiſhed (15).’ Among other books he publiſhed at Paris, Le Triomphe, &c The Triumph of Truth for the Peace of the Church, to invite the King of Great Britain to embrace the Catholic Faith. Of this I ſhall ſpeak in the laſt remark.

(15) Hiſt. of the Edict of Nantes, ubi ſupra, pag. 515, 516. Add to this theſe words of book xi, pag. 578, his writings were condemned at the national ſynod of Alençon, in the year 1637, and they wrote to this reconciler, that if he did not give within ſix months an authentical declaration of his repentance to the conſiſtory of Paris, he ſhould be no longer accounted a member of the Reformed church.

Here follows a pretty curious paſſage: The firſt conference that offers, is concerning the deſign of Mr de la Milletiere, to re-unite the churches that are divided. This virtuous man thinks it eaſy to bring about the return of the Proteſtants to the Catholic church. And when I ſeveral times aſked him the grounds of his perſuaſion, ſince the great differences of opinions, which occur in certain points, were difficult to be reconciled; he anſwered me with a ſpirit of charity, which gives him as much zeal as knowledge, that this reconciliation depended only upon a good reformation on our part, and on knowing the motives of the ſeparation of thoſe who have left us; which he has ſhown in ſeveral books written to that end. One needs only read his Flambeau de l'Egliſe, and his Flambeau de la vraye Foye, to which no anſwer has been made, neither is it poſſible to make a good one, becauſe they are ſo many invincible demonſtrations; and if the adverſaries do not allow it, one needs only enquire what they ſtick at, and try to bring them to a regular conference. In the mean time Mr de la Milletiere is perſuaded, that he has demonſtrated, or that it

(9) Molinæus du expectato meſſum ad ſe librum excepit duro reſponſo, ut & priorem fecerant tum ipſe tum Rivetus Reformati: Milletierius Molinæo falle ſatis, cui ppe Gallico ſermone quo plus valet, & eundem dixit ad Molinæum pertinentia non vitæ. Grotius, Epiſt. 141, inter Epiſtol. Eccleſ. & Theolog. pag. 793, Edit. Amſt.

(10) The Life of Mr Daillé, pag. 21.

(11) Hiſt. of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. ii, lib. x, pag. 515.

(12) Id. ib. pag. 514, 515.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his abjuration was that which contained the motives of his change (g). He begun ſeveral other books afterwards, but did not finiſh them, either becauſe his firſt thoughts ceaſed to charm him, or becauſe the neceſſity of obtaining the approbation of the Doctors was a conſtraint upon him; for they did not agree to all his opinions, and he oppoſed their remonſtrances. He was ſo offended at a ſermon preached by a biſhop, who in a parallel drawn between the Virgin Mary and JESUS CHRIST ſet her in all things above, or at leaſt equalled her to, the ſon of GOD, that he declared freely, he would return to the pale of the Proteſtant church, in caſe he was obliged to hear many ſuch ſermons (b). See the Memoirs of the abbot de Marolles, who had a great eſteem for him. He never was a miniſter, although Father Jacob makes him a miniſter of Charenton (i). Neither was he a Phyſician, as Mr de Vigneul Marville, at pag. 229 of his Miſcellanies, has imagined. He would not own that one of his books had been cenſured by the Sorbonne, and yet Mr Rivet publiſhed an act which did bear the name of that Faculty [F]. I have been told that Mr de la Milletiere had a ſon who was killed in the wars

(g) Sarravius, Epiſt. 118, pag. 121.

(b) Ex eodem Sarravio Epiſt. 170, pag. 173, 174.

(i) Ludovicus Jacob à Sancto Carolo, Carmelita, Biblioth. Pontific. pag. 471.

it is not impoſſible for him to demonſtrate the infallibility of the Catholic church, whoſe primitive and abſolute authority reſides in the holy ſee, and in the perſon of the Pope, without the concurrence of a general council. . . . . I ſay he is perſuaded, that, in his book of the Euchariſt and Tranſubſtantiation, he hath clearly demonſtrated the true doctrine which we always profeſſed, according to the deciſions of the holy councils, and the pure word of GOD, which is ſo expreſs in this point, together with tradition: And therefore they muſt no longer require of us the teſtimony of the ſenſes and of reaſon, to prove that there is no other Tranſubſtantiation than that of paſſing from the knowledge of a ſenſible ſubſtance to the knowledge of an intelligible ſubſtance (16). Thus the abbot de Marolles ſpoke of him in the year 1656.

(16) Abbot de Marol. ubi ſupra, pag. 241, 242. See alſo pag. 129, 193.

[F] He would not own, that one of his books had been cenſured by the Sorbonne, and yet Mr Rivet publiſhed an act which did bear the name of that Faculty.] This miniſter anſwering a little book of Grotius (17), put in an appendix (18) twelve theſes which he extracted from a treatiſe of la Milletiere about the power of the Pope, and the cure of ſchiſms, to which he added a decree of the Sorbonne againſt the Means of Chriſtian Peace, &c. This decree bearing date the fifteenth of December 1637, ſhould have been publiſhed at Paris (19), but was not. Nevertheleſs Andrew Rivet having got a manuſcript copy of it, printed it in Holland, in 1642, in the appendix I have mentioned. La Milletiere was much vexed at it, and affirmed that this piece was ſpurious, and that it was only the particular cenſure (20) of Mr Chappellas, a native of Bourdeaux, and formerly a Jeſuit (21), who was created ſyndic of the faculty of Theology, in the month of December 1637. At the very inſtant he was confirmed, being deſirous to be talked of for ſome reputable act, worthy of the humour of his climate, and his fiery temper, he propoſed the examination of my book to the ſociety. La Milletiere adds (22), that his book was never examined, and that Chappellas, who had alledged an order from the ſovereign authority, found himſelf very much out in his reckoning. 'The reaſons 'of theſe different motions being afterwards repre- 'ſented in the place from which the ſyndic pretend- 'ed to ſupport his deſign with a ſuperior authority, 'his proceeding was found ſo impertinent, that he 'and Mr du Val, the ſub-dean, received an expreſs 'command to deſiſt from it. Nevertheleſs he uſed the 'authority that his office of ſyndic gave him, to have 'his private cenſure inſerted in the regiſter of the 'Faculty, which was dated December 15, ſigned by 'him and Mr du Val, by whoſe means he obtained 'the place of ſyndic. It is therefore the cenſure of 'Mr Chappellas, which Mr Rivet has printed, and 'not the cenſure of the faculty of the Sorbonne.' He ſhows, by ſeveral marks, that this piece did not proceed from the Faculty. Mr Rivet (23) was not able to ſhow that this account was falſe. But as to other things, he ſolidly refuted his adverſary, and promiſed to give a fuller anſwer; for he intituled his book, Prodromus ad pleniorem refutationem calumniarum, &c (24). - - - The Fore-runner to a fuller Confutation of the Calumnies, &c. La Milletiere replied in Latin, by a diſſertation, intituled, Crurifragium Prodromi - - - - The legs of the fore-runner broken. Rivet, altering his mind, did only publiſh a letter of Cuthbert Higlandius (25), which contained an advice, not to enter the liſts any more with ſuch an adverſary, and a long catalogue of the faults of the Latin which were in the Crurifragium. Yet I find in a letter of Grotius (26), the title of a French book which Rivet printed at Rouen, in the year 1642. An Anſwer to three Letters, with the Defence of the Sieur Rivet againſt the Calumnies and Forgeries of Mr la Milletiere.

(17) Notes upon the Conſultation of Caſſander.

(18) See the third volume of the works of Andrew Rivet, pag. 976, 977.

(19) Ne hujus operis condemnati quemquam lateat, cenſuram hanc typis vulgandam eſſe decrevit. Ib. pag. 978.

(20) La Millet. Cathol. Reformé, pag. 194.

(21) Id. ib. pag. 188.

(22) Ibid. pag. 193.

(23) See pag. 1037, of the third tome of his works.

(24) It is at pag. 1035, of the third volume of his works.

(25) At pag. 1114, of the ſame volume. Sorbiere is the author of this letter. See the preface of the Sorberiana.

(26) Grotius, Epiſt. 640, Part ii, pag. 949, col. 1.

Note, that in 1644, the cenſure of one of la Milletiere's books by the Sorbonne appeared at Paris. It had been ſoftened twice or thrice in favour of the approvers. The letters of Sarravius will tell you more of it (27). Grotius acquainted his brother, that the three doctors of the Sorbonne, who had approved the book of this reconciler, were ſuſpended for a year (28), and that Mr Arnaud wrote a book againſt la Milletiere out of policy. De Arnaldus ſcripſit contra Miletium ut ejus odio ſuum elueret (29). - - - Mr Arnaud wrote againſt Milletiere, that he might divert the hatred they had to him by that of the other. La Milletiere was alſo of the ſame opinion as to the motive of this doctor of the Sorbonne. Read the words of Sarravius (30): 'Arnaldus etiam, quem ſibi clam adſtipulari Bache- 'tus (31) arbitrabatur, epiſtolam edidit ad Præſules 'ſui libri Approbatores ſcriptam, in qua damnatum 'poſtea librum erroris, falſitatis, & hæreſeos accuſare 'prævertit. Hæc tamen omnia κατ' οἰκονομίαν fieri, 'jactat Henotes. Credat Judæus Apella. Sed quid 'huic homini facias? Eum ego, qui tam inſanum 'ſapit, Deo irato ſuo relinquo. - - - - Arnaudus alſo, 'whom Brachet thought had privately joined with him, 'publiſhed an epiſtle writ to the prelates, the approvers 'of his book, in which he anticipates the accuſation of the 'book that was afterwards condemned of error, falſhood, 'and hereſy. Yet the reconciler brags, all this was 'done out of policy. Let the circumciſed Jew believe it. 'But what can one do with this man? For my part, I 'leave him, ſince he is ſo like a madman, to his angry 'GOD.'

(27) Sarravius, Epiſt. 85, 86.

(28) Grotius, Epiſt. 712, part ii, pag. 969. It is dated July 2, 1644.

(29) Idem, Epiſt. 714, pag. 969. It is dated July 16, 1644.

(30) Sarravius, Epiſt. 85, pag. 85, 86.

(31) It is a fault of the Printer for Brachetus. There are many other ſuch like faults in the letters of Sarravius.

Since the printing of what you have read, I have run over the piece which is mentioned above, viz. that which was printed at Rouen in 1642. It's title is Reſponſes, &c. An Anſwer to three Letters of the Sieur de la Milletiere on his Means of a Re-union in Religion; by Andrew Rivet . . . . with the Defence of the ſaid Sieur Rivet againſt the Calumnies and Forgeries of the ſaid Sieur de la Milletiere, in his pretended Catholic Reformed, with a Letter of a learned Perſon of this time concerning the ſame Treatiſe. There is one chapter in it concerning the account which Mr de la Milletiere had given, of the pretended falſe cenſure attributed to the faculty of the Sorbonne. Mr Rivet proteſts (32), that neither Mr Chappellas, nor any one in his name, had put that cenſure into his hands, or procured it to be printed . . . . (33). He that gave him the copy of it in Holland, told him that it was ſent by Grotius. He leaves to Mr Chappellas the trouble and care of defending himſelf againſt what was objected againſt him; but he refutes two objections which la Milletiere had made to prove the nullity of the cenſure of the Sorbonne (34). 'The firſt is, That they are not uſed to 'talk at random, and without a due application and 'ſpecification of the errors contained in the writings 'they cenſure. The ſecond, That it is not their cuſtom 'to ſound an alarm againſt books which they cenſure, 'and to end with reprimands to the prelates of the church '. . . . (35). I ſhall give him two examples ſuffi- 'ciently known of the contrary to what he ſays, 'eſpecially when they condemn the book of an author 'who is out of their communion. In the year 'cIↃIↃcxI, the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, they pub- 'liſhed a cenſure againſt the book of the late Mr du 'Pleſſis, of happy memory, which was intituled, (32) Rivet, Reſponſes au trois Lettres, pag. 163.

(33) Ib. p. 164.

(34) Ib. p. 167.

(35) Ib. p. 168.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wars (k), and that one of his daughters was married to Mr Catelan ſecretary to the council, and that from this marriage came a daughter, who was married to the count of Jonſac. I muſt not forget the work which he dedicated to the king of England [G].

(k) In Germany in the year 1643. See Sarravius, Epiſt. 53, pag. 51.

'The Myſtery of Iniquity, &c. There they ſpecify nothing, but ſay in general, That being of opinion that the book bearing that abominable title, ought to be condemned, deteſted, and the reading of it wholly forbidden to Chriſtian people, as being heretical, very extravagant, and ſeditious, contrary to the divine and natural law, to the writings of the antient Fathers, &c. And a little after they add a caution in theſe words, that they adviſe good people, who are zealous for the defence of the holy church, &c. of the danger which may accrue by the reading of that book; praying, and conjuring (pray mark this) in a moſt humble manner, the prelates of the Catholic church, and the civil magiſtrates, &c. that they would endeavour with all their power, generouſly and effectually to ſtop the courſe of ſuch a dangerous and terrible peſtilence. This is a cenſure exactly agreeable in thoſe two points to what the perſon cenſured by the diligence of the Sieur Chappellas, formerly denies to be the ſtyle of the Sorbonne. Will he ſay, that this cenſure, injurious to the perſon of the author, and which does not ſpecify any ſentence or maxim of the book which it ſtrikes at, in order to qualify them by a name, which denotes the reaſon of the cenſure, did not proceed from the judgment of that ſociety? Here is another without any ſpecification, and without making any formal application, of the year cIↃ Ↄ cxxix, againſt the ſmall pieces of Peter Picherel, who died in the communion of the Romiſh church, in a little priory of the abbey of Eſſome, wherein, without any ſpecification, on the firſt of September, they condemn Picherel's book (36) as wicked and abominable, infected with the ſtinking leproſy of Calviniſm, and ſtinking like the pit of hell: and will have this cenſure to be publiſhed, leſt the houſhold of faith ſhould ſhipwreck their conſciences as it were in a ſtorm, and be circumvented by the reading of that deceitful book. It is alſo injurious to the perſon of the author, for it calls him Deſertor & Perduellis, - - deſerter and rebel; and theſe two cenſures are publiſhed, being ſigned by the ſecretary to the recorder of the Sorbonne.'

(36) See Mr Colomies, his Bibliotheque Choiſie, about this book of Picherel, pag. 21, 22, of the ſecond edition.

Mr Rivet declares, at the end of this chapter, that he had received the cenſure printed at Paris, with the Extract of the regiſters of the Faculty, on the manner of proceeding, with theſe words at the end, Excerpta ex monumentis præfatæ facultatis, &c. ſigned Philip Bouvot, firſt beadle and ſecretary of the Faculty, the firſt of July 1642. He makes afterwards (37) ſome reflexions on la Milletiere's new ſally in his 'remonſtrance to the doctors of the faculty of Divinity aſſembled in the Sorbonne, the firſt of Auguſt 1642, on the nullity of the cenſure of the Sieur Chapellas, &c.' He ſays (38), that the act of this cenſure 'put Mr de la Milletiere into a great paſſion, and made him leave no ſtone unturned to beat down the Sieur Chapellas if he could; that he accuſes him of having forged it himſelf, and cauſed it to be printed contrary to the intention of the college, by a meer ſurprize, not having declared to them for what reaſon he demanded that act, and to what purpoſe he would make uſe of it.' This informs us of two things; I. That Mr Chapellas being deſirous to refute the ſlanders of M. de la Milletiere, let the public ſee all the proceedings of the Faculty. II. That the latter continued to clamour and wrangle. Now as this may ſerve to ſhow us his bold, vain, ſtubborn, and ſhuffling humour, it was not improper to let you ſee it; and I am perſuaded in general, that theſe abſtracts which I have given of Andrew Rivet's letters, will be thought curious and inſtructive.

(37) Rivet, ibid. pag. 377.

(38) Ibid.

[G] I muſt not forget the work which he dedicated to the king of England.] The title of it is mentioned above; and tho' I have not read it, I imagine, that the character of the author, the eager deſire of making himſelf neceſſary upon ſignal occaſions, and the love of oſtentation and vain-glory, appear in it as much or more than in any book he has publiſhed. My conjectures are grounded upon ſome places of the anſwer which was made to his Epiſtle Dedicatory. This anſwer is the work of an Engliſh biſhop who was with king Charles II during his exile. It was printed at Geneva in the year 1655, in 8vo. The preface to the reader contains this, among other things, Mr de la Milletiere having once paſſed this rubicon, 'became one of our moſt cruel adverſaries, and there was not a miniſter whom he did not harraſs, and by an infinite number of little volumes, he imagined that he had drained the whole ocean of controverſies, of which ſo many great men of both religions have been tired. The greateſt part of his works were neglected, and finding but few antagoniſts that would run ſuch a career with him, it was thought, that being fully ſatisfied with the titles of honour, which his great ſufficiency had obtained for him from the liberality of the prince, he was reſolved to keep a perpetual ſilence, till Mr Aubertin having writ a learned treatiſe of the Euchariſt, according to the ſentiments of the Fathers, this book which gave an alarm into the very heart of the great city, did, as it were, with a ſudden ſurprize, awake Mr de la Milletiere, and made him put pen to paper to refute it after his manner. But that which more aſtoniſhes all the wiſe men of both religions, is to ſee him ſo far forget himſelf, as to dedicate his book to the king of Great-Britain, a prince whom he very well knew to be of a belief quite contrary to that which he eſtabliſhed in his book, and to whom he could not addreſs things of that nature, without drawing upon himſelf his juſt indignation, and fomenting unjuſt ſuſpicions in his rebellious ſubjects. His Epiſtle Dedicatory is nothing but a torrent of reproaches againſt the church which he hath forſaken, after having torn her bowels, of horrible prejudices againſt the memory of the late king of England, of flattering inſinuations to his ſucceſſor, and imaginary victories over thoſe, whom neither he, nor the heads of his party durſt fairly look in the face: and all this fine ſtuff, together with the pretended refutation of Mr Aubertin, bears the ſpecious and pompous title of, The Triumph of Truth for the peace of the church. Tho' the king of England at firſt took this dedication very ill, yet he was inclined to follow the advice of thoſe who perſuaded him to deſpiſe it, and not to ſhew any reſentment of it in public: but conſidering afterwards that this attempt gave occaſion to the inſults of his enemies, he commanded a learned biſhop, who was then near his perſon, to write an anſwer to it, without touching, except by the bye, upon that lofty book to which it was prefixed.' This is ſufficient to ſhow that la Milletiere wrote without judgment. All the world knew, that the enemies of Charles I. accuſed him of being a favourer of Popery, and that nothing was more fit to foment the averſion of the Engliſh republicans to the family of this prince, than the opinion, that he had not been a Proteſtant; and yet here is a writer who had the boldneſs to dedicate to king Charles II a book wherein he ſuppoſes, that Charles I. died an inviſible member of the Romiſh church (39). The author that wrote an anſwer to him, made a very moderate remonſtrance upon it. Many, and the wiſeſt men think, ſays he to him (40), that it was very indiſcreetly done to publiſh a treatiſe of ſuch a nature as your's is, under the protection of his majeſty, without his leave, and againſt his conſcience. Is it poſſible that you ſhould be ignorant, that ſuch inſinuations as your's, and the reports raiſed without any ground, about the deſign which the late king, his father, had to unite himſelf to the Romiſh church, made him loſe the affection of many of his ſubjects? And if you knew this, how durſt you tread in the ſame ſteps, on purpoſe to take from the ſon all hopes of ever recovering it? The anſwer he makes him in another place is a little briſker. (41) 'You have the impudence to affirm, that this prince died a true inviſible member of your church, as it is diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the Chriſtian world. This is an old pious fraud (42), and one of your Machiaveliſtical tricks, to gain credit to your religion by any means whatſoever, lawful or unlawful: but it is quite contrary to the confeſſion he made at his death, contrary to what thoſe do certainly know who aſſiſted at the murder of this pious monarch; and all this, as I imagine, upon the vain preſumption, That there is no other church but your's that is capable of begetting ſuch a child.' Note, that the author oppoſes to this maxim a very remarkable doctrine, which the biſhop of Chalcedon (43) maintained

(39) An Anſwer to the Epiſtle Dedicatory of La Milletiere, pag. 34.

(40) Ib. p. 35.

(41) Ib. p. 163.

(42) See, above, the remark [E] of the article ABULPHARAGE.

(43) Spoken of before, remark [A], of the article KNOT.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tained ‘ in two treatiſes that he publiſhed, viz. That ‘ if thoſe who live in the communion of the Proteſtant ‘ church, endeavour to learn the truth, and cannot at- ‘ tain to it by reaſon of their inſufficiency, but implicitly ‘ embrace it by preparing their hearts to receive it, which ‘ they are always ready to do, whenſoever it ſhall ‘ pleaſe GOD to reveal it to them, [which is the ‘ duty of every good Chriſtian], they cannot fail of ‘ the true church, of faith, and ſalvation (44).’ This is a maxim (45) which might afford many reflexions for a ſupplement to the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in. But this by the bye.

(44) Anſwer to la Milletiere, pag. 165.

(45) Compare what Caramuel ſays, in Nicolle's treatiſe of the Unity of the Church, pag. 71.

If la Milletiere had not been engaged in the ſtudy of controverſies above twenty five or thirty years, what we read in this paſſage of his antagoniſt, ſhould be looked upon as a greater piece of boldneſs than the firſt. ‘ You take upon you to enquire, or rather ‘ to decide, why the hand of GOD, and of the parlia- ‘ ment, was ſo heavy upon the head of the late king, and ‘ of his ſon; and particularly that of GOD; becauſe, ‘ ſay you, he had aſſumed the title of head of the church: ‘ GOD intending by this puniſhment to teach other ‘ princes who live in ſchiſm, with what ſeverity he ‘ can vindicate his glory againſt the injury done to the ‘ unity and authority of the church: and as to the ‘ hand of the parliament, becauſe this prince would ‘ not give his conſent to the abolition of Epiſcopacy, and ‘ the ſuppreſſion of the liturgy and ceremonies of the church ‘ of England (46).’ However, I think this raſhneſs is more excuſable than the other, in a man that had been ſo long accuſtomed to diſputes of religion; for it is hardly poſſible, that ſuch a man ſhould not contract a habit of attributing the proſperities of the orthodox to their zeal for the faith, and the misfortunes of Heretics to their falſe religion. It is not neceſſary to obſerve how mean, little, and vulgar, thoſe thoughts are, and yet they eaſily admit of the falſe ornaments of Rhetoric, which give them emphaſis and pomp. Let us rather take notice of the modeſty of the Engliſh prelate who anſwered la Milletiere. ‘ By applying theſe particular afflictions according to ‘ your ill-grounded fancy, what a pit have you dug ‘ for the boldneſs and liberty of other men? Who, if ‘ they would aſſume the liberty that you have taken, ‘ of judging of the misfortunes of other princes, might ‘ as well ſay, that GOD afflicts them becauſe they ‘ will not turn Proteſtant, as you ſay of the late ‘ king, that GOD puniſhed him becauſe he would not ‘ turn Papiſt (47).’ Thus you ſee what was the concluſion of the anſwer of the prelate, to this part of the indiſcreet and raſh reflexions of our Theophilus Brachet. This anſwer contains many other judicious conſiderations which I do not mention. It was ſufficient for me to take notice of that which is moſt proper to undeceive all reaſonable men; for to diſcover the falſhood of this bad common-place (48), we need only obſerve that all ſects make uſe of it, and, if I may ſo ſay, it is a ſaddle that fits all horſes. To which we may add ſtill this defect, that it may be retorted againſt thoſe who alledge it with the greateſt confidence. La Milletiere found it ſo by experience. ‘ Till you make appear the truth of what ‘ you ſay, replied the Engliſh prelate (49), give me ‘ leave to obſerve, that neither the conſtancy which ‘ queen Mary (50) ſhewed ſo much for the Roman ‘ Catholic religion, nor the change of Henry IV to ‘ the ſame religion, could exempt them from a cruel ‘ and bloody death. What reaſon then have you to ‘ impute the miſchiefs, which the king ſuffered, to ‘ the errors of his religion? Be you your own judge.’

(46) Anſwer to la Milletiere, pag. 42.

(47) Ib. pag. 45, 46.

(48) See, above, remark [O] of the article MAHOMET II, and what was ſaid in the Critique Générale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, letter xix, num. 3, pag. 351, of the third edition, as to what Maimbourg ſaid of the prince of Condé killed at Jarnac.

(49) An Anſwer to la Milletiere, pag. 166, 167.

(50) He means the queen of Scotland, mother to king James I, and grandmother to Charles I, kings of England.

But nothing ſhows more clearly the vanity of la Milletiere, and his unbounded deſire of being diſtinguiſhed, than the method he propoſes to the king of England to recover his dominions. His Tongue, if you will believe him, was ſufficient to produce this great revolution. He affirms, on the one hand, that this monarch will be reſtored to his kingdoms, provided he would turn Roman Catholic (51); and on the other hand he ſays, that if this prince would be preſent at a diſpute between ſome Catholic doctors and the miniſters of Charenton, he would quickly be converted. By this means he gives us to underſtand, that if there were ſuch a diſpute, he would be one of the chief diſputants for the Romaniſts, and conſequently the principal cauſe of a triumph, the effects of which would be wonderful. Conſider a little his chimeras, according to all the gradations to which the Engliſh author has reduced them. ‘ But now we are come to ‘ the fineſt part of your whole epiſtle; which is this ‘ ridiculous propoſal you make of a conference by the ‘ authority of your monarch, and at the requeſt of our ‘ king, before the Archbiſhop of Paris and his coadjutor, ‘ between ſome Roman Catholic doctors, and the miniſters ‘ of the church of that great city, to whom you juſtly ‘ give an ample teſtimony of their zeal and ſufficiency. ‘ You go on further, for you ſuppoſe, That thoſe mini- ‘ niſters will accept of a diſpute, or elſe by their ſhuffling, ‘ they will betray the weakneſs of their cauſe: And you ‘ conclude with a prodigious aſſurance, That theſe ſame ‘ miniſters will be convinced of the falſhood of their re- ‘ ligion, and that their converſion or conviction will give ‘ an ample occaſion to the king of Great Britain to em- ‘ brace the Romiſh Communion, and that his converſion ‘ will bring back all the Proteſtants who have yet any ‘ conſcience left, into the boſom of the church, and the ‘ obedience of the Holy See. Give me leave to ſum up ‘ theſe fine conſequences: If the king of Great Britain deſires a ſolemn conference, the king of France ‘ will order it: If he orders it, the miniſters will accept it: If they accept it, they will certainly be ‘ overcome: If they are overcome, the king of England will change his religion: If he changes his religion, all the Proteſtants will do the ſame (52).’ One may eaſily gueſs, that the anſwer from which I take this paſſage, contains a ſtrong confutation of theſe illuſions, and that it did not coſt the Engliſh prelate much pains.

(51) See the Anſwer to La Milletiere, pag. 150.

(52) Ib. pag. 132, 133.

MILTON (JOHN) a famous Apologiſt for the death of Charles I. king of England, was born at London in the year 1608 [A]. He himſelf informs us (a), that after he

(a) Defenſ. ii, pro Populo Anglic. pag. 60, & ſeq. Edit. Hagæ Comitis, 1654.

OBSERVATIONS about the ſtature and mien of Milton.

[A] He was born at London in 1608.] This we learn from an inſcription which is at the bottom of his picture in one of his books (1), for it ſays, that in 1671 he was 63 years old. He had intimated his age in too indefinite a manner, in his ſecond apology written in 1653, or in 1654, where he only ſays, that he was above forty years old (2). It will not be improper here to obſerve, why he informs the public of this circumſtance, ſince it will give us occaſion to take notice of ſome falſities. Some had upbraided him with being a little ſhort man, who had nothing but ſkin and bones, and it was a corrective added to the application that had been made to him of theſe words of Virgil.

(1) It is his Logic.

(2) Quadragenario Major. Milton, Defenſ. ii, pag. 31.

> Monſtrum horrendum, informe, ingens cui lumen ademptum (3).
>
> A frightful, ill-ſhaped, blind monſter.

(3) Quamquam nec ingens quo nihil eſt exilius, exſanguius, contractius. Epiſt. Dedicat. Clamor. Regii Sang.

To which he anſwered (4), he did not believe that ever his perſon was eſteemed ugly; that his ſtature was rather of a middle ſize than little; that he felt ſtill the courage and ſtrength which he had formerly, when he wore a ſword, and thought himſelf able to look ſuch men in the face as were much ſtronger than himſelf; that his countenance was ſo far from being pale, thin, and wrinkled, that it did him a great deal of honour, ſince at the age of above forty years, he ſeemed to be younger by almoſt ten years; that to witneſs all this he appealed to an infinite number of people, who knew him by ſight, and might juſtly ridicule him if he did not ſpeak the truth. He owned he was blind, but at the ſame time took notice that his eyes did not appear to have the leaſt defect. No body after this can doubt, but Mr Morus and Salmaſius were impoſed upon with reſpect to the ſtature and ſhape of Milton; I ſay, Salmaſius, for he has alſo told us in his reply, that he heard, his adverſary was as little as a dwarf, &c. ‘ Relatum quippe eſt mihi ab illis qui vide- ‘ runt te, eſſe ſtatura pumilionem (5). Ab ea laborioſa ‘ & anxia longaque meditatione languorem etiam videtur ‘ contraxiſſe delicatum illud & inhrmum corpuſculum ‘ tuum (6). - - - - For it was told me by thoſe who have ſeen

(4) Milton, Defenſ. ii, pag. 30.

(5) Salmaſ. Reſponſ ad Milt. pag. 3.

(6) Id. ib. pag. 15, 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he had ſtudied the languages, and a little Philoſophy in the place of his birth, he was ſent to Cambridge where he continued ſeven years, at the end of which he returned to his father's houſe [B], who then lived in the country. That having ſpent five years there in reading the beſt Greek and Latin authors, he travelled into France and Italy, in which he ſpent more than three years. That finding England at his return involved in the confuſions of a Civil-War, he thought fit to ſhut himſelf up in his cloſet, and to leave events to the care of Providence. That the authority of the biſhops being weakened, and every body ſpeaking againſt them, he hoped that this great beginning of liberty might deliver mankind from the yoke of bondage. That he thought himſelf bound to contribute to it to the utmoſt of his power. That to this purpoſe he wrote two books about the means of reforming the church of England; and after that two others againſt two biſhops who had written in favour of Epiſcopacy. That having ſeen the end of this diſpute, he conſidered, that beſides Eccleſiaſtical liberty, for which he and ſo many others had laboured ſucceſsfully, there were two others, viz. The domeſtic and civil, which were of no leſs importance. That he made uſe of his pen for the domeſtic liberty, while the magiſtrates were labouring very earneſtly for civil liberty. That having conſidered that domeſtic liberty related to three things, to marriage, the education of children, and the right of philoſophizing without reſtraint, he wrote upon divorce [C], and ſhowed that the Goſpel had not changed the laws under which the Jews

'ſeen you, that you are a dwarf in ſtature. That deli- 'cate and infirm little body of your's ſeems to have con-
'tracted a languor from your laborious, anxious, and long
'application of thought.' Mr Morus did not diſpute this, only he proteſted (7), that he never pretended to reproach Milton for being blind, ſince he did not know it but by his anſwer, and that if he had ſaid any thing that ſeemed to relate to blindneſs, he meant the blindneſs of his mind. By he owns himſelf the author of the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Clamor Regii Sanguinis - - - The cry of royal blood. Now ſince he had ſaid there, that there could be nothing more ghaſtly and lean than Milton, I believe he would have found it very difficult to reconcile his Epiſtle Dedicatory with that place of his anſwer where he ſays, he believed Milton was a handſome Man, eſpecially ſince he ſaw his picture ſo curiouſly done before his Poems. An deformitatem tibi vitio verterem, qui bellum etiam credidi maxime, poſtquam tuis præfixam poematibus comptulam icunculam illam vidi (8)? Salmaſius ſeems to boaſt of having been the cauſe that Milton loſt his good plight of body, and his eyes, by anſwering the Apology for Charles I, and is ſo far from upbraiding him with any natural deformity, that he pities him maliciouſly for having no longer that beauty, which rendered him ſo lovely during his abode in Italy. 'Inde etiam fortaſſe cerebrum tibi nimis inquies in oculis diſtillaverat 'eoſque afflixerat. Malo iſto magnam partem tuæ pul-'chritudinis deperiiſſe, pro eo ac debeo doleo. Nam 'in occulis maxime viget ac valet formæ decus. Quid 'Itali nunc dicerent ſi te viderent cum iſta fœda lip-'pitudine. Non haberent amplius quod in te lauda-'rent. Non ergo miror ſi Salmaſium iſtum odiſti, 'propter quem tantum tibi laboris & oneris impoſitum 'eſt, unde ægritudo tibi corporis & mentis hæc acci-'dit, & præterea detrimentum tantum priſtini decoris 'paſſus es (9). - - - - Perhaps too you will ſay, that was 'the cauſe that your brain diſtilled too much in your eyes 'and weakened them. I am ſorry, as I ought to be, that 'you have loſt a great part of your beauty by that ca-'lamity. For beauty chiefly exerts it's force and vi-'gour in the eyes. What would the Italians now ſay, 'were they to ſee you with thoſe frightful running eyes. 'They would find nothing more in you to commend. There-'fore, I do not wonder if you hate that Salmaſius, who 'was the cauſe of ſo much labour and trouble to you, 'which has occaſioned this diſorder of your body and mind, 'and ſo much diminiſhed your former beauty. Iſte jam 'lippulus vel cœculus potius, olim bellulus puſio (10). '- - - - - That little fellow, now blear-eyed, or rather 'half blind, but formerly a pretty minion.' He expreſſes himſelf more plainly in another place (11). I do not know what Milton anſwered to this laſt ſlander, when he had occaſion to ſpeak to his friends concerning the poſthumous reply of Salmaſius: But I have heard ſay, that when he was informed his enemy boaſted that he had made him loſe his ſight, he anſwered, and I have made him loſe his life. This ſtory is very probable, ſince we find the ground of it in theſe two writers books as you may ſee. 'Sunt, ſays Milton (12), qui 'nos etiam necis ejus (Salmaſii) reos faciunt, illoſque 'noſtros nimis acriter ſtrictos aculeos, quos dum re-'pugnando altius ſibi infixit, dum quod præ manibus 'habebat opus vidit ſpiſſius procedere, tempus reſpon-'ſionis abiiſſe, operis gratiam periiſſe, recordatione 'amiſſæ famæ, exiſtimationis, principum denique fa-'voris, ob rem regiam male defenſam erga ſe immi-'nuti, triennali tandem mœſtitia & animi magis ægri-'tudine quam morbo confectum obiiſſe. - - - - - Some 'impute his (Salmaſius's) death to me, and to thoſe ſtings 'I gave him that were too violently thruſt; which, by 'reſiſting, he fixed deeper in himſelf, whilſt he ſaw the 'work he had in hand proceed ſlowly, and the time of 'anſwering paſt, and the merit of the work gone, re-'flecting on his loſt fame and reputation, and that the 'favour of princes towards him was diminiſhed, for 'having badly defended the royal cauſe; at laſt being ſpent 'with continual grief for the ſpace of three years, he 'died by a diſtemper of the mind rather than of the 'body.'

[B] He was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge .... from whence he returned to his father's houſe.] The author of Clamor Regii Sanguinis affirms, upon a hearſay (13), that Milton being expelled the univerſity of Cambridge, for his miſdemeanors, forſook the country and retired into Italy. Milton denies all this, and gives another account, which is extreamly to his advantage. Now ſince neither Morus, in anſwering the book which contains this account, nor Salmaſius, in his reply, wherein are many defamatory ſtories againſt Milton, have ſaid nothing of this diſgraceful leaving of Cambridge, which was objected to him, we have reaſon to believe it is a fable; for certainly there muſt be, for ſuch kind of accuſations, ſome principles that cannot be denied, and which prove the falſity of the charge. And what principles are more worthy of this rank, than to ſee a man publickly accuſed of things which it is eaſy to prove, deny thoſe things publickly, while none of the adverſe party dares maintain the accuſation againſt him? Whatever evaſion men may find in metaphyſical ſubtleties to defend themſelves againſt this proof of falſhood, it muſt be granted, that, morally ſpeaking, it is a convincing one: ſeeing therefore Milton did produce ſuch a proof for himſelf, we may reckon as one of the lyes that were ſpread abroad againſt him, that which concerns his pretended expulſion from Cambridge.

[C] He wrote upon Divorce.] It appears by his ſixteenth letter written in the year 1654, that Aitzema had a mind to get that book of Milton tranſlated into Dutch, and that the author deſired rather to have it tranſlated into Latin, having experienced that the people were prejudiced againſt all opinions that were not common. He there informs us, that he had written three treatiſes upon this ſubject; whereof the firſt (14) was intituled, The Doctrine and Diſcipline of Divorce; the ſecond (15) was intituled Tetrachordon, wherein the four principal paſſages of Scripture were explained which concern this matter; the third (16) was intituled Colaſterion, wherein he refutes a certain ſcribbler. It had been objected to Milton (17) that he had called the doctrine of JESUS CHRIST concerning Divorce, diabolical, as it is explained by the Fathers, by antient and modern divines, and by all the univerſities

(7) Fid. public. pag. 31.

(8) By the anſwer which Milton wrote to theſe words, pag. 84: it appears that theſe poems were publiſhed, in 1645, and that he was not ſatisfied with his Engraver.

(9) Salmaſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 15, 16.

(10) Ib. p. 19.

(11) Tu quem olim Itali pro femina habuerunt, cuiquam audeas, quod parum vir ſit, objicere? - - - Dare you, whom the Italians formerly uſed as a woman, object to any one, that he is not a man? Ibid. pag. 23.

(12) Milt. Defenſ. II, pag. 21.

(13) Ajunt hominem Cantabrigienſi Academia ob flagitia pulſum, dedecus & patriam fugiſſe, & in Italiam commigraſſe, pag. 8.

(14) Printed at London in 1644.

(15) Printed at London in 1645.

(16) Printed in 1645.

(17) In a preface of George Crantzius, Doctor of Divinity, prefixed to the ſecond Apology of Milton, of the Dutch Edition. 1654. See alſo Clam. Reg. Sang. pag. 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Jews lived as to this matter; and that it would be in vain to cry liberty, liberty, in the public aſſemblies, if a man was a ſlave at home to that ſex which is inferiour to ours. That afterwards he wrote about the education of children, and laſtly about the liberty of the preſs; that a ſmall number of injudicious men, who moſt commonly are reſolved to ſuppreſs every thing that is not conſiſtent with popular opinions, may not determine by a final judgment, what ought, and what ought not to be printed. That after the ſentence of death was paſſed upon King Charles I, he wrote upon the general Theſis of the right of the people againſt tyrants [D], and made a collection of the opinions of ſeveral grave divines upon this ſubject, to put thoſe to ſilence who ſaid, that the doctrine of the Proteſtant churches was contrary to the late tranſactions at London. That after this, while he was writing a Hiſtory of England [E], the council of ſtate which was then eſtabliſhed by authority of parliament, having a mind to make uſe of his pen, ordered him to confute the Icon Baſilike, which went under the name of the deceaſed king. That he intituled his confutation Iconoclaſtes (b). That being appointed to refute a book which Salmaſius had publiſhed againſt the the parliament of England, he engaged in that work though he had almoſt loſt one eye (c), and the Phyſicians foretold it as a thing certain, that he would loſe the other if he engaged in it (d). This is what he tells us of himſelf: and we may add, that he became, in effect, blind about this time, and that his anſwer to Salmaſius's book made him talked of over all the world (e) [F]. He anſwered ſome time after a book intituled Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad

(b) I have the French verſion of it made from the ſecond edition in Engliſh, and printed at London in the year 1652.

(c) Defenſio, ubi ſupra, pag. 35.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) Ubi ſupra, pag. 95.

ties and churches of England, Holland, and France; and that for his own part he pretended, that Divorce ought to be allowed, even when a contrariety of humours is the only ground of it. To this he anſwers only theſe two things (18). Firſt, that the ſenſe given, by the generality of interpreters, to the words of Scripture, whereby they are made to ſignify, that after a divorce made in a caſe of neceſſity, it is not lawful to proceed to a ſecond marriage, might very well be called a diabolical doctrine. II. That it is not true, that all the Fathers, the antient and modern Divines, and all the univerſities, &c. are agreed about this matter, and that he has ſhown in his Tetrachordon, that his doctrine was the ſame with that of ſome of the Fathers, of Bucer, Fagius, Peter Martyr, and Eraſmus. See his ſecond Apology, p. 58. It is remarkable that Milton, who tells us ſo many particulars of his life, ſays nothing of his marriage. Nevertheleſs Salmaſius had heard ſome ſay that he was married, and not only ſo, but that he had divorced his wife at a year's end, becauſe ſhe was of a bad temper (19). In another place he ſuggeſts, that jealouſy, or even horns, were concerned in the matter (20). Milton therefore was not ſo diſintereſted in his pleading for Divorce and Polygamy as Lyſerus (21); his perſonal intereſt moved him to do ſo (22).

(18) Defenſio pro ſe, pag. 40, Edit. Lond. 1655, in 12mo.

(19) Uxorem ſuam poſt annum à nuptiis dicitur res ſuas ſibi habere juſſiſſe ob graves tantum mores. Salmaſ. Reſp. ad Milton. pag. 253. See alſo pag. 3.

(20) Si Eunuchi omnes fuiſſent qui domum tuam frequentabant, uxorem fortaſſe non repudiaſſes. - - - If they had been all eunuchs that frequented your houſe, perhaps you would not have divorced your wife. Ibid. pag. 23.

(21) See the Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, April 1685.

(22) See, below, the remark [L].

[D] He wrote upon the general Theſis about the right of the people againſt tyrants.] This is probably the book he mentions in his ſecond Apology (23), where he ſays, 'Id ſuſius docui in eo libri qui noſtro idiomate 'tenor five tenura regum & magiſtratuum inſcriptus 'eſt .... Illic ex Luthero, Zuinglio, Calvino, Bucero, Martyre. Paræo, citantur ipſa verbatim loca, 'ex illo denique Knoxo quem unum me Scotum ais innuere, quemque hac in re reformatos omnes præſertim 'Gallos illa ætate condemnaſſe. Atqui ille contra, quod 'ibi narratur, ſe illam doctrinam nominatim à Calvino, ſummiſque aliis ea tempeſtate Theologis, quibuſcum familiariter conſueverat, hauſiſſe affirmat. - - - 'I have ſhewn it more fully in that book, which, according to our idiom, is intituled,* The Tenure of the kings 'and magiſtrates .... There the very places are quoted 'verbatim, from Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin, Bucer, 'Martyr, Paræus, and laſtly from that Knox, whom, 'you ſay, I inſinuate to be a Scotch-man, and whom 'all the Reformed at that time, eſpecially the French, 'condemned in this matter. But he, on the other hand, 'in that place affirms, he had that doctrine particularly 'from Calvin, and other great Divines of that age, with 'whom he had been intimately acquainted.' As to what the author of Clamor Regii Sanguinis accuſes Milton of (24) his having writ to the Parliamentarians to determine them in a point about which they were in doubt, I mean the death of the king, Milton denies it, and pretends that he never wrote upon thoſe queſtions till after the death of that monarch.

(23) Pag. 101.

(24) Pag. 9.

[E] While he was writing an hiſtory of England.] He was, according to Salmaſius, (25), a little School-Maſter in London; 'Ludi trivialis magiſter Londi-'nenſis; ludimagiſter in ſchola triviali Londinenſi, de 'pedaneo magiſtro Secretarius Parlamenti rebellis factus. 'From being a petty School-Maſter in London, he was 'made Secretary to the Rebel-Parliament.' But ſince in the Clamor Regii Sanguinis, which gives a ſhort account of his adventures, it is not ſaid that he was a School-maſter, and beſides it is probable, that he durſt not have related, very particularly, the ſeveral conditions and employments of his life, without ſaying any thing of his being a School-Maſter, if he had been really ſo, it ſeems that Salmaſius was but ill ſerved by his ſpies. Nevertheleſs we muſt not altogether truſt to theſe probabilities: We ſhall ſee (26), hereafter that there was ſome ground for what he ſaid.

(25) Reſp. pag. 1, 3, 14.

(26) In the remark [K].

[F] His anſwer to .... Salmaſius, made him talked of over all the world.] I believe that all the books in proſe, which Milton publiſhed before the confutation of Salmaſius, were in Engliſh; yet it appears by this confutation, that he was very ready at the Latin tongue. It cannot be denied that his ſtile is ſmooth, lively, and florid, and that he dextrouſly and ingeniouſly defended the cauſe of the anti-royaliſts; but without offering here to give my opinion about the matter, I think it may be ſaid, that the manner in which he managed this great ſubject, appears to be very bad, becauſe he did not obſerve any decent gravity. He is every minute, I do not ſay throwing out cutting jokes againſt Salmaſius, for this would not ſpoil his work, and might ſerve very much to get the laugh on his ſide; but he every where acts the part of a droll and buffoon. This fault reigns more viſibly in his two anſwers to Mr Morus, which are ſtuffed with quibbles and over-ſtretched jeſts: and here, the character of the author appears without diſguiſe; he was one of thoſe ſatirical wits, who pleaſe themſelves very much in gathering up all the reports which are ſpread abroad to the diſadvantage of any perſon, and in inviting his enemies to write all the ſlanders they know about him; but much more do they pleaſe themſelves in inſerting theſe calumnies in the firſt book they publiſh againſt him. His anſwer to Salmaſius was burnt at Paris and at Toulouſe, by the hand of the hangman (27), which ſerved only to procure him more readers. It was not the parliament of Paris, as is affirmed in the Clamor Regii Sanguinis, which condemned his book to the fire, but the civil judge. Milton did not ſuffer this miſtake of his adverſary to paſs unobſerved (28). He boaſted that queen Chriſtina, as he pretends, ſo highly eſteemed this book of his, that ſhe even deſpiſed Salmaſius, who was then at her court (29). It is certain, that this book was read with great eagerneſs, as Mr Ziegler, who ſpeaks of it with an extreme contempt, aſſures us in the preface to his Exercitationes ad Regicidium Anglorum. The anonymous author, who publiſhed an apology, Pro rege & populo Anglicano contra Johannis Polypragmatici (alios Miltoni Angli) defenſionem deſtructivam regis & populi Anglicani (30), complains very heavily of the unequal fate of Salmaſius and Milton. It has not been poſſible, ſays he, without a thouſand difficulties, to procure an edition of Salmaſius's book; but that of Milton has been printed ſeveral times. 'Quod ornatiſſimus Salmaſius ad ruen-'dum

(27) Defenſ. II, pag. 93.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Ib. pag. 8, 52, 96.

(30) I make uſe of the edition of Antwerp 1651, in 12mo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ad Cælum, which he aſcribed to Mr Morus, although it was Peter du Moulin, the ſon, that wrote it. As this anſwer defamed Mr Morus horribly, he would not let it paſs without a reply: But Milton wrote a ſecond anſwer no leſs virulent than the former. He lived very quietly under the uſurpation of Cromwell, and by a good fortune, which was very extraordinary, he was not diſturbed nor called to an account after the reſtoration of Charles II, but was ſuffered to live peaceably at his houſe, though no writer did ever more inſult a crowned head, than he did king Charles I, and his baniſhed family. His impunity did not proceed from the good nature of Charles II, but from his not being excepted out of the general pardon. Some of his Latin letters were printed in the year 1674 at London, and ſome orations which he ſpoke in Latin when he was ſchool-boy. The Latin letters which were printed in 1676 (f), and had been written by the uſurpers of England to ſeveral princes, were drawn up by him. He loved Poetry [G], and many of his poems both in Latin and Engliſh have been publiſhed either in his life-time, or after his death. Patin has vented a great many lies [H].

(f) They were reprinted at Leipſic in 1690.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, there has been publiſhed (g) at London the life of John Milton, written in Engliſh by Mr Toland. I have cauſed ſeveral extracts of it to be done into Latin which will afford me a pretty long ſupplement to this article. Milton was born a gentleman [I], and had an education ſuitable to that rank (b). He had an inſatiable paſſion for learning, inſomuch, that from the age of twelve years, he was wont to ſit up till midnight, and neither the weakneſs of his ſight, nor the frequent pains

(g) In the year 1699, prefixed to the works of John Milton in folio, and by it ſelf in 8vo.

(b) So I am told the words in Engliſh uſed, by Mr Toland, ſignify, a gentleman by his education and family. But as Milton, who ought to know better than any body elſe the quality of his own family, only ſays, Defenſ. II, pag. m. 60, that he was deſcended genere honeſto, of an honourable family, I do not know whether the Engliſh word gentleman, has not a larger ſignification than the word gentilhomme.

'dum jus & honorem Caroli Britanniæ Monarchæ,
'Sceleratorum manibus interfecti, prudenter ſcripſerat,
'unâ tantum impreſſione, idque, magnâ cum diffi-
'cultate in lucem erupit: tanto odio hiſce ultimis
'temporibus, veritatem mundus perſequitur. Sed quod
'ſceleſtiſſimus Miltonus, ad lacerandam famam Regis
'defuncti, & ſubvertendum in ſubditos dominium hæ-
'reditarium, invidioſe elaboravit, illius tot ſunt exem-
'plaria, ut neſcio cui lectorem remitterem, ſic men-
'daciorum & convitiorum amore flagrant homines;
'volumine in decimo ſexto perditiſſimi pretii, uſus
'ſum (31). - - - - What the excellent Salmaſius had in-
'geniouſly wrote, in defence of the right and honour of
'Charles King of Great Britain, who was murdered by
'the hands of miſcreants, was printed but once, and
'that not without great difficulty; ſo much does the 'world hate truth in theſe latter times. But as to what
'the execrable Milton maliciouſly wrote to aſperſe the 'memory of the deceaſed king, and overturn his hereditary
'dominion over his ſubjects, there are ſo many 'editions of it, that I know not which of them to refer
'my reader to, ſo much are men in love with lies and
'calumnies; I have made uſe of a volume in 16mo of
'a very ſmall price.'

(31) In Monito ad Lectorem.

[G] He loved Poetry.] Salmaſius having ſaid (32), that ſome who knew Milton thoroughly, did very ſeriouſly maintain, that he underſtood not Latin, that he was not capable of writing in Latin, adds, that for his own part he is of quite another opinion, and that Milton being a Poet, might alſo be an Orator. Whereupon he ſcoffs at his Poems, in which he ſays the laws of quantity are violated; and this he proves by examples; and concludes, that although the author had not told at what age he wrote them, it had been eaſy to perceive, that they were the work of a ſchool-boy. But Milton, ſays he, is anſwerable for theſe faults of his youth, ſince he printed them a few years ago at London. By the ſecond letter of Milton it appears, that he publiſhed ſome Latin verſes in the year 1628, and by the tenth, which is dated April 21, 1647, that he lately publiſhed a collection of Engliſh and Latin Poems. That collection came out in the year 1645. This would not ſavour very much of a man who gave no credit to falſe reports concerning Milton, if Salmaſius were rigorouſly dealt with. He ſays, that in the opinion of many people Milton did not write the Apology for the people of England, and that he only lent his name to the book of a French ſchool-maſter, who taught children at London (33). All this is a fable which I am glad to relate, that authors may learn to give no credit to calumnies, wherewith people fill their heads againſt their antagoniſts. Some think to make their court by this means to a man, and occaſion his publiſhing an hundred impertinencies. I do not place in this rank the four thouſand livres per ann. which Milton got by writing for the parliament, if we may believe Salmaſius (34); for it is very probable, that Cromwell amply rewarded him. For the reſt, Milton has written two Poems in blank verſe; one upon the temptation of Eve; the other upon the temptation of JESUS CHRIST. The firſt is intituled, Paradiſe Loſt; the ſecond, Paradiſe Regained. The former paſſes for one of the beſt pieces of Poetry that ever was ſeen in Engliſh. The famous Poet Dryden made a play out of it, which was extreamly applauded. The other is not near ſo good, which made ſome wags ſay, that Milton is eaſily found in Paradiſe loſt, but not in Paradiſe regained. Theſe Poems were tranſlated into Latin verſe, and publiſhed in the year 1690, by William Hog, a Scotchman.

(32) Reſp. pag. 4, 5.

(33) Eam & multi negant illam anſtorem debere agnoſcere niſi ſolo titulo, conſcriptam enim eſſe à hujusmagiſtro quodam Gallo de trivio qui Londini pueros nihil ſapere docet, pag. 4.

(34) Ubi ſupra, pag. 16.

The ſame Dryden admiring Paradiſe Loſt, declared, that Greece, Italy, and England, have produced three Poets in different ages, Homer, Virgil, and Milton; that the firſt excelled in ſublimity of thought, and the ſecond in majeſty; and that nature not being able to advance further, framed the third by a concurrence of the perfections of the other two. This is the ſubject of an epigram of Mr Dryden (35), inſerted by Mr Toland, at p. 129 of the life of Milton.

(35) It is in Engliſh.

Three Poets, in three diſtant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England, did adorn:
The Firſt in loftineſs of thought ſurpaſs'd;
The Next in majeſty; in both the laſt.
The force of nature cou'd no further go,
To make a Third, ſhe join'd the former Two.

[H] Patin vented many lies.] 'Mr Mothe de la Vayer,
'who is juſt gone out, has brought me one of his
'books lately written, and tells me, that Milton's
'book againſt the late king of England was burnt by
'the hand of the hangman; that Milton is a pri-
'ſoner, and like to be hanged; that Milton writ this 'book only in Engliſh; and that one called Peter du 'Moulin, the ſon of Peter, miniſter of Sedan, who 'had put it in good Latin, is in danger of his life (36).'
Mind the perſon who vented this news to Guy Patin. It was not a ſorry hackney news-monger, it was the preceptor to the king's brother; it was the French Cato, a man very learned: he honeſtly believed, that Du Moulin run the hazard of his life for having tranſlated Milton's book into Latin. And yet this du Moulin was one of the confeſſors of the royal party; he wrote againſt the rebels, and his fidelity was quickly rewarded by Charles II.

(36) Patin, letter 187, Tom. II, pag. 135. It is dated July 13. 1660.

[I] He was born a gentleman.] John Milton, his father, deſcended from the family of the Miltons, which was conſiderable in Oxfordſhire, was the ſon of a Roman Catholic, and was diſinherited becauſe he turned Proteſtant. Chriſtopher Milton, his other ſon, ſtudied the law, and had no great genius. He was ſuperſtitious, and adhered to the royal party; but yet they ſuffered him to live in obſcurity after the royal family was reſtored. But king James II, intending that the judges ſhould declare him to be above the laws of the kingdom, created him a ſerjeant at law, and baron of the Exchequer, and after that judge of the Common-pleas. Theſe employments came quickly after to an end by the death of him who was poſſeſſed of them (37).

(37) Taken from the Latin Extracts of the Life of Milton, written by Mr Toland in Engliſh.

[K] He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pains in his head, were capable of abating his ſtudious inclination. He was ſent to Cambridge at fifteen years of age, and in the ſame year he paraphraſed ſome Pſalms in Engliſh verſe. He wrote at ſeventeen years of age ſeveral pieces of Poetry, ſome in his mother-tongue, and others in Latin, and all of them of ſuch a character and beauty as was much above his age. He took his degree of Maſter of Arts at Cambridge, and returned to his father's houſe. Thoſe who have ſaid, that he returned thither, having been expelled the univerſity of Cambridge for ſome crime, or at leaſt that he was full of reſentment, becauſe he could not get any preferment there, have maliciouſly wreſted ſome verſes contained in a Latin elegy which he addreſſed to his good friend Charles Diodati. Upon the ſame ground it was given out, that he ſpent his time with ladies of pleaſure at London, and went every day to a play. His journey to Italy procured him the friendſhip of the fineſt wits, and the moſt famous learned men that were in that country (i). He underſtood the Italian tongue ſo well, that he deſigned to write a Grammar of it, and made very good Italian verſes. He intended to have gone into Sicily and Greece, but being informed of the beginning of the troubles in England, he did not think fit to ſpend his time in travelling for pleaſure, while his countrymen were bearing arms in defence of their liberty. He returned therefore into his own country, and as he paſſed thro' Geneva, he contracted an acquaintance with ſome conſiderable people there, who informed him afterwards of the adventures of Alexander Morus, againſt whom he had occaſion to write. He arrived in England at the time of King Charles Iſt's ſecond expedition into Scotland, and becauſe he was entruſted to be a guardian to his own nephews (k), he reſolved to be their tutor, and taught alſo ſome other youths [K]. He married in 1643, Mary Powell, the daughter of a juſtice of peace in Oxfordſhire. It was not long before this young woman took a diſlike to him [L]: whereupon ſhe left him at a month's end, and plainly declared, ſhe would not return to him at all. Whereupon he took his meaſures accordingly, and after he had publiſhed a book about divorce, he prepared for a ſecond marriage; but ſhe thought better of it, and deſired him ſo earneſtly to take her back again, that he ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed on. After this reconciliation, within

(i) Such as Carlo Dati, Gaddi, Freſcobaldi, Francini, Bonmattei, Coltellini, Chimentelli, John Baptiſt Manſo.

(k) His ſiſter's ſons.

[K] He became tutor to his nephews, and . . . . ſome other youths.] This is the foundation of what was ſaid above (38). I thought that Salmaſius had been miſinformed by his ſpies, but now I know that he is not to be blamed, but only for giving an odious turn to what he ſaid, that Milton was a petty ſchool-maſter. Mr Toland confeſſes, that Milton being intreated to do the ſame ſervice to ſome of his friends children, as he did to his nephews, that is, to teach them the Languages, Hiſtory, Geography, &c. granted them this favour. It is true therefore, that he kept a ſchool in his houſe, and tho', properly ſpeaking, he could not be called a ſchool-maſter, as the expreſſions of his enemy inſinuate; he was in truth a tutor, and acted the part of a ſchool-maſter. But this was no juſt occaſion of inſulting him, even tho' his poverty had reduced him to that painful taſk, provided he acquitted himſelf of it faithfully, and like an able maſter. Conſult his Hiſtorian upon this.

(38) In the remark [E].

[L] It was not long before this young woman took a diſlike to him.] Several conjectures are alledged as to the cauſe of her quick return to her father's houſe. She had been educated in pomp and pleaſure, and that was probably the cauſe why ſhe could not like Milton's Philoſophical way of living. Perhaps alſo the perſon of her huſband was diſagreeable to her; or ſhe being of a royaliſt family, could not endure the republican principles of Milton: and it is not impoſſible but her father might expect ſome preferment from the king by diſſolving the knot of this marriage. However it be, his daughter returned to his houſe a month after the celebration of the marriage, upon pretence of ſpending the reſt of the ſummer in the country. Her huſband conſented to it, upon condition that ſhe ſhould return at Michaelmas; and becauſe ſhe did not return at that time, he wrote her ſeveral letters, to which ſhe did not vouchſafe to give any anſwer; but at laſt ſhe declared in plain terms, that ſhe would not return at all, and ſent back the meſſenger from Milton with contempt. At this he was ſo angry, that he reſolved never to own her more for his wife; and to ſhow the public the juſtice of this deſign, he publiſhed a book about Divorce in the year 1644. The reaſons which he there propoſes, to prove that marriages ought not to be indiſſoluble, may be ſuſpected, as coming from one intereſted in the cauſe; but his Hiſtorian obſerves, that this cannot weaken them, for otherwiſe this muſt be a prejudice againſt the apologies of the primitive Chriſtians, ſince they were written by perſons who groaned under the rigor of perſecution. He adds, that to judge right of the advantages of a temperate country, a man ſhould ſpend part of his life in climates that are either too hot or too cold; and that, in like manner, no man can ſo exactly give the reaſons which favour a good cauſe, as he that has experienced the inconveniences of a bad one. Thoſe who treat of a matter in which they are not perſonally concerned, produce nothing but the conceits of their fancy, and do nothing but amuſe themſelves at their leiſure hours, or, which is worſe, they declaim without that ſtrength and vigor which experience inſpires. From whence we muſt conclude, that thoſe who never tried the inconveniences of marriage, are infinitely leſs fit than Milton to lay down and maintain the arguments againſt the tyranny of the indiſſolubility of the marriage-bond. It might have been thought, that the treatiſes he publiſhed about Divorce were either the effect of his reſentment, or of a deſire to diſplay his wit in maintaining ſuch a paradox, rather than the effect of real perſuaſion. But to prevent any ſuch judgment of him, he reſolved to ſhow that he was in good earneſt, and to put in practice his own hypotheſis (39). To this end he courted a young woman of great wit, and very handſome. But being one day at a friend's houſe, whom he went often to ſee, all on a ſudden his wife came in and threw herſelf at his knees, and, with tears in her eyes, acknowledged her fault, and begged his pardon. He was at firſt inflexible, and one would have thought, that he would be inexorable; but this hard heartedneſs was quickly ſoftened. His natural generoſity, and the interceſſion of his friends, ſoon brought him to a reconciliation, and to forget all that was paſt. He retained no reſentment in his mind. He received into his houſe the father, mother, brothers, and ſiſters of his wife, when the royal party was falling in pieces, and protected and maintained all this kindred till they ſaw better times (40). Is there not therefore ſufficient reaſon to reckon him among good huſbands, and to make him a proof of the remark which ſo many people have made, that there is no man more kind than a huſband is to his ſpouſe who has offended, and even diſgraced him? He had upon his hands, not only the reſentment of a huſband, but alſo the intereſt of an author: he was, as I may ſay, tied up by his writings: his doctrine of Divorce ſupported by his replies, obliged him to keep to his reſolution. Add to all this, that he felt new flames for

(39) Viz. That a huſband may not only part with his wife, but alſo marry another.

(40) Taken from the Extracts of Milton's Life.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google within a year, he had a daughter by her, and after that many other children [M]. This wife dying in child-bed, he married another (l), who died after the same manner at a year's end. He continued a widower for some years, and married not again till after the restoration of Charles II and the amnesty which he obtained from that monarch. He had offended him, as by other books, so by that which is intituled Iconoclastes, which is the refutation of a book attributed to Charles I. He maintained, that this monarch was not the author of it. Time has shown that he maintained this upon good grounds [N]. He lay concealed when Charles II was called home again, and for a young lady of a charming beauty and wit; and yet two or three tears of his wife overcame him, and he consented to every thing she had a mind to. His former resolution, never to see her more, his obligation as an author, his new amours, every thing submitted to the victorious force of peccavi, spoken by a crying wife. See the margin (41).

(l) Captain Woodcock's daughter.

(41) Those who have a mind to see part of Milton's reasons for divorce, need only read the abstract of his Life in the journal of Mr de Beauval, for February 1699, pag. 81, &c.

[M] He had by her a daughter . . . . and after that many other children.] A son who died in the year 1652, and three daughters who served him as readers. He taught them to pronounce exactly Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, French, and Spanish; and as he had occasion for a book, one of them read it to him. And because they did not understand the meaning of what they read, this exercise was very unpleasant to them, he perceived it by their murmuring; and foreseeing that for the future this task would become more and more tedious to them, he excused them from it, and taught them such things as were more suitable to their condition and sex (42).

(42) Taken from the extracts of Milton's Life.

[N] He maintained that Charles I was not the author of Icon Basilike: and time has shown, that he maintained this upon good grounds.] Perhaps there never happened any thing more singular than this, in what concerns the history of books. The dispute that was raised about this matter of fact, has been very fruitful in books. The parties thinking that this point would be attended with several notable consequences, grew hot, and used all manner of industry in their discussions. This warrants me to give a particular account of this affair. I begin with the book itself, whose title is Εικὼν Βασιλικὴ. It has been translated from English into divers languages. The Sieur Porrée translated it into French, and added to it a very long preface, and dedicated his translation to the king of England, Charles II. I make use of the Paris edition by Lewis Vendosme, 1649, in 12mo. Milton, who refuted this book, supposed that some friends of Charles I, were the true authors of it, and that they published it on purpose to render the conduct of the Parliamentarians more odious. I have a French version of his answer in 12mo: and the title runs thus: 'ΕΙΚΩΝΟΚΛΑΣΤΗΣ, Ou Reponse, &c. that is, An answer to a 'book intituled, ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ: or, the 'portraicture of his sacred majesty during his solitude 'and sufferings. By Mr JOHN MILTON. 'Translated from the second English edition, enlar-'ged and revised by the author. To which are ad-'ded divers pieces mentioned in the foresaid Answer, 'for the greater convenience of the reader. At Lon-'don, by William du-Gard, a Printer to the council 'of State, in the year 1652. And are to be sold by 'Nicolas Bourne, at the south-gate of the Old-Ex-'change.' I will here set down a passage of the answer of Milton to Clamor Regii Sanguinis, which concerns the order that the king gave upon the scaffold to the bishop of London, which was to acquaint his son, that he would never have him punish the authors of his death. This bishop being pressed by the judges to declare what the king had recommended to him, confessed at last what it was. Whereupon Milton made this remark. 'O magis, regemne di-'cam pietatis, an' Episcopum rimarum plenum! qui 'rem tam secreto in pegmate suæ fidei commissam ut 'effutiret, tam facile expugnari potuit At ô taciturne! jampridem Carolus hoc idem inter alia præcepta filio mandaverat, in illa Icone Basilica, quem 'librum ideo scriptum satis apparet, ut omni cum diligentia nobis vel invitis secretum illud, qua ostentatione simulatum erat, eadem paulo post evulgare-'tur. Sed video plane decrevisse vos Carolum quem-'dam absolutissimum, si non Stuartum hunc, at saltem 'hyperboreum aliquem & fabulosum, fucatis quibus-'libet coloribus depictum, imperitis rerum obtru-'dere: ita fabellam hanc velut acroama quoddam, 'diverbiis & sententiolis pulchre distinctam, nescio 'quem ethologum imitatus, ad inescandas vulgi aures 'putide concinnasti (43). - - - - Oh! which shall I 'say, that the king was more pious, or the bishop more 'a blab! that could be so easily prevailed on to discover 'what had been entrusted to him in such a secret man-'ner upon the scaffold. But O thou silent man! Charles 'had some time before given this very order, among o-'thers, to his son, in that* Icon Basilike, which appears 'evidently to have been writ on purpose, that his secret 'might a little after be industriously divulged to us, 'even against our wills, with the same parade, as it 'had been counterfeited. But I plainly see you determi-'ned to obtrude upon the ignorant a Charles, that was 'absolutely perfect; if not this Stuart, at least some hy-'perborean and fictitious person, drawn in false colours; 'you have so affectedly forged this story like a romance, 'beautifully intermixed with quaint sayings and phrases. 'in imitation of some buffoon, with design to captivate 'the ears of the vulgar.' The opinion of this writer made no impression in foreign countries: every body there was persuaded that king Charles I. wrote the book which bears his name. Which did so much honour to his memory, and appeared so fit to make him be looked upon as a true martyr; that it was thought that Milton, endeavouring to rob him of it, did only use the trick of Lawyers, who deny every thing that is too favourable to the contrary party. Those of the Cromwellians, who remained in England, agreed to Milton's judgment: but their opinion was suspected for the reason I have just now given. All the partizans of the cause of Charles I. opposed this opinion very warmly; and because their believing that this prince was the true author of Εικὼν Βασιλικὴ, was a thing that favoured the interest of their cause, they might have been suspected as well as the others of using the artifice of Lawyers. Nevertheless their opinion prevailed in England, and could not be combated by matters of fact, till at last some things happened which have destroyed it. Here follows the beginning and progress of that affair, according to the narrative of Mr Toland.

(43) Milt. Defens. II, pag. m. 86.

In the year 1686, Mr Millington happening to sell the late lord Anglesey's library by auction, put up an Icon Basilike; and a few bidding very low for it, he had leisure to turn over the leaves, when to his great surprize he perceived written with the same noble lord's own hand the following Memorandum. King Charles II and the duke of York, did both (in the last sessions of parliament, 1675, when I shewed them in the Lord's house the written copy of this book, wherein are some corrections and alterations written with the late king Charles the first's own hand) assure me, that this was none of the said king's compiling, but made by Dr Gauden bishop of Exeter: Which I here insert for the undeceiving of others in this point, by attesting so much under my own hand.

ANGLESEY.

After this particular came to be known, there was much discourse about it, and some asked Dr Walker about this matter, because they knew he had been well acquainted with that bishop of Exeter. He owned to them what he knew of it, and being provoked and much offended by Dr Hollingworth, he published, for his own justification, a narrative relating to this book. He declared that Dr Gauden communicated to him the whole project of that affair, and some chapters of the Icon Basilike and the plan of some others: he related the evasion which this doctor made use of, when he told him he did not approve of this way of deceiving the public. He told several other facts and, particularly these three, which he said he had from Dr Gauden. I. That the bishop of Salisbury took upon him to write two chapters of that book. II. That Dr Gauden sent to the king in the isle of Wight by the marquis of Hertford, a copy of the Icon Basilike. III. That the duke of York knew very well, that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and did not ſhow himſelf till after the amneſty was proclaimed. He obtained a pardon, and was only puniſhed by being excluded from all public offices. Some have thought that this moderation proceeded rather from the king's forgetfulneſs than his clemency. But others ſay, that Milton had friends in the houſe of commons and the privy council, who interceeded for him. He did not finiſh his great Poem, Paradiſe Loſt, without many interruptions; for his poetical vein did not happily flow at all times, but only in the ſpring and autumn. He publiſhed his Hiſtory of England (m) in the year 1670. It comes down to William the conqueror, but we have it not altogether according to the author's original; for the licencers of books expunged ſeveral paſſages out of it, wherein he expoſed in a lively manner the ſuperſtition, pride, and craft, of the antient clergy,

(m) It is in Engliſh.

Dr Gauden was the author of it. He added, that the ſon of this doctor, his wife, and Mr Gifford, who tranſcribed this book, did firmly believe it had been compoſed in the place where they lived. He affirmed that it was the common opinion of the family that Dr Gauden wrote it; and that the family always ſpoke of him as the author of it, whether he were preſent or abſent, and that he never denied it. I paſs by ſeveral other proofs and circumſtances which are in the account of Dr Walker.

His narrative was ſome time after confirmed in ſuch a manner as paſt for a full demonſtration of the impoſture: which happened thus. A merchant of London, called Arthur North, a man of very good credit, and a member of the church of England, having married a ſiſter of the wife of Charles Gauden, ſon to the doctor, after the death of his brother-in-law, had the management of the widow's affairs. He found among the papers of the deceaſed a bundle, which only concerned the affair of the Icon Baſilike. The widow of Dr Gauden had left this packet with her ſon John Gauden, whom of all her children ſhe loved moſt tenderly, and he left it to his brother Charles. In this bundle there was found, I. A letter of ſecretary Nicholas, written to Dr Gauden. II. The copy of a letter which this doctor wrote to chancellor Hyde, wherein, among other ſervices he had done, he mentions one that was truly royal, and worthy of a royal reward, ſince he deſigned by it to ſtrengthen and encourage the king's friends, and to deteſt and convert his enemies. III. The copy of a letter which he wrote to the duke of York, ſtrongly repreſenting the good ſervices he had done. IV. A letter written with chancellor Hyde's own hand, dated March 13, 1661, wherein the chancellor declares, that he is ſorry for his importunity, and excuſes himſelf that he cannot as yet do him ſervice. The concluſion of this letter is remarkable, which is in theſe words: 'The particular you men-'tion has indeed been imparted to me as a ſecret; 'I am ſorry I ever knew it: and when it ceaſes to 'be a ſecret, it will pleaſe none but Mr Milton.' The ſame bundle contains, among other papers, a long narrative written by Dr Gauden's wife. This relation proves irrefragably, that her huſband was the author of Icon Baſilike: it contains a full confirmation of Dr Walker's account, and moſt of the facts above related, with ſeveral other circumſtances very curious and extraordinary. This narrative being tranſcribed from the original, in the preſence of ſome perſons of learning and integrity, was printed in a book intituled, Truth brought to light. Theſe are the means by which this impoſture was fully diſcovered. This great ſecret which had been contrived with much artifice, and which the perſons concerned to conceal it, had improved ſo dextrouſly, happened to be diſcovered by very inconſiderable and caſual incidents. If Dr Gauden had not been diſappointed of the biſhopric of Wincheſter, he had not inſiſted ſo much upon the ſervice he had done by writing this book. His widow would not have written a narrative if ſhe had been gratified with one half year's rent after her huſband's death. The two princes, the ſons of Charles I, laid open the ſecret by a caſual ſurprize, when my lord Angelſey ſhowed them ſome writing of the king their father. And if another than Millington had ſold that lord's books, the declaration which was then made by thoſe two princes had never been known. And if Dr Hollingworth had not by his indiſcreet zeal provoked Dr Walker, he had never publiſhed his account; and if he had never publiſhed it, the papers of Mr North which compleat the irrefragable proofs of this matter of fact, had never been made uſe of for the diſcovery (44).

(44) Taken from the Latin extracts of Milton's Life.

Note, that in all this, I neither ought nor can be conſidered but as a meer tranſlator of the Latin extracts which I cauſed to be made from the Engliſh book I quote. Note alſo, that this paſſage of the Life of Milton has been oppoſed; for Mr Wagſtaff publiſhed ſome obſervations to weaken the teſtimony of my lord Angleſey, the narrative of Dr Walker, and the papers of Mr North: but Mr Toland has refuted them all in his Amyntor, wherein he has further diſcuſſed all the teſtimonies that are alledged to prove that Charles I was the author of the Icon Baſilike. I have been told that as to both theſe parts of his apology (45), he has omitted nothing that was neceſſary to maintain the full evidence of his proofs, and all the ſtrength they appeared to have, before any one wrote againſt them. This is all that I can ſay, having never read any thing that was written againſt him, nor what was replied by him, and not being able to underſtand it for all thoſe books are in Engliſh.

(45) That is to ſay, the anſwer to the objections of Mr Wagſtaff, and the anſwer to the direct proofs alledged by the partizans of king Charles.

I will conclude this remark with a thing that Mr Milton made a great noiſe about, and which was renewed in the laſt diſpute about the Icon Baſilike. Which is this, that the prayer king Charles I. delivered to Dr Juxton, immediately before his death, intituled a prayer in the time of captivity, which is printed at the end of the beſt editions of his book (46), is perfectly like a prayer which is found in a romance, I mean in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia. This will appear by the parallel which Milton placed at the end of his Anſwer (47) after the following manner.

(46) Milton, in his Iconoclaſtes. pag. m. 24.

(47) That is to ſay of his Iconoclaſtes.

The prayer of king Charles, ſtiled, a prayer in time of captivity.

O powerful and eternal GOD, to whom nothing is ſo great that it may reſiſt, or ſo ſmall, that it is contemned; look upon my miſery with thine eye of mercy, and let thine infinite power vouchſafe to limit out ſome proportion of deliverance unto me, as to thee ſhall ſeem moſt convenient: Let not injury, O Lord, triumph over me, and let my faults by thy hand be corrected; and make not my unjuſt enemies the miniſters of thy juſtice. But yet, my GOD, if in thy wiſdom this be the apteſt chaſtiſement for my unexcuſable tranſgreſſions; if this ungrateful bondage be fitteſt for my over-high deſires; if the pride of my not enough humble heart be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yield unto thy will, and chearfully embrace what ſorrow thou wilt have me ſuffer; only thus much let me crave of thee (let my craving O Lord, be accepted of thee, ſince it even proceeds from thee) that by thy goodneſs, which is thy ſelf, thou wilt ſuffer ſome beam of thy

The prayer of Pamela, taken word for word from the Arcadia of the counteſs of Pembroke, p. 248.

O all-ſeeing light and eternal life of all things, to whom nothing is either ſo great that it may reſiſt, or ſmall, that it is contemned; look upon my miſery with thine eye of mercy, and let thine infinite power vouchafe to limit out ſome proportion of deliverance unto me, as to thee ſhall ſeem moſt convenient. Let not injury, O Lord, triumph over me, and let my faults by thy hand be corrected; and make not mine unjuſt enemy the miniſter of thy juſtice. But yet, my God, if in thy wiſdom this be the apteſt chaſtiſement for my unexcuſable folly; if this low bondage be fitteſt for my over high deſires; if the pride of my not enough humble heart be thus to be broken, O Lord I yield unto thy will, and joyfully embrace what ſorrow thou wilt have me ſuffer. Only thus much let me crave of thee, (let my craving, O Lord, be accepted of thee, ſince even that proceeds from thee

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google clergy, which they imagined might be applied to the modern clergy. The laſt book which he publiſhed, is a treatiſe of true Religion, Hereſy, Schiſm, Toleration, and the beſt means that may be uſed to prevent the growth of Popery. I ſhall ſet down a paſſage out of it [O]. Thoſe who ſay that poverty forced him to ſell his library, are groſsly miſtaken; for he did not ſell it upon that account, but becauſe he believed he could make more money of it than his heirs could do; and it is certain he left a conſiderable ſum behind him (n). The Gout was the diſeaſe that troubled him moſt, and he died of it without great pain in the the year 1674, being ſixty ſix years old. He was a man of an agreeable converſation, of a mild and equal temper, extraordinarily ſober, and who thy majeſty ſo to ſhine in my mind, that I, who in my greateſt afflictions acknowledge it my nobleſt title to be thy creature, may ſtill depend confidently on thee. Let calamity be the exerciſe, but not the overthrow of my virtue. O let not their prevailing power be to my deſtruction; and if it be thy will, that they more and more vex me with puniſhment, yet, O Lord, never let their wickedneſs have ſuch a hand, but that I may ſtill carry a pure mind, and ſtedfaſt reſolution ever to ſerve thee without fear or preſumption, yet with that humble confidence which may beſt pleaſe thee; ſo that at the laſt I may come to thy eternal kingdom, thro' the merits of thy ſon, our alone ſaviour, JESUS CHRIST, Amen.

(n) 1500 l. beſides other things.

thee) let me crave even by the noble title, which in my greateſt affliction I may give my ſelf, that I am thy creature, and by thy goodneſs, which is thy ſelf, that thou wilt ſuffer ſome beams of thy majeſty to ſhine into my mind, that it may ſtill depend confidently on thee. Let calamity be the exerciſe, but not the overthrow, of my virtue. Let their power prevail, but prevail not to deſtruction. Let my greatneſs be their prey. Let my pain be the ſweetneſs of their revenge: let them, (if ſo it ſeem good unto thee) vex me with more and more puniſhment; but, O Lord, let never their wickedneſs have ſuch a hand, but that I may carry a pure mind in a pure body. And paſſing a while; and O Moſt Gracious Lord, ſaid ſhe, whatever becomes of me, preſerve the virtuous Muſidorus.

[O] I ſhall ſet down a paſſage out of his book on true religion, &c.] This I do, to the end, that the principles of this writer may be known, which is as neceſſary as any other thing in the articles of of an hiſtorical dictionary concerning authors. 'It is 'a human frailty to err, ſays he, and no man is in-'fallible here on earth. But ſo long as all the Lu-'therans, Calviniſts, Anabaptiſts, Socinians, and Ar-'minians, profeſs to ſet the word of God only before 'them as the rule of faith and obedience; and uſe all 'diligence and ſincerity of heart by reading, by learn-'ing, by ſtudy, by prayer for illumination of the 'holy Spirit, to underſtand this rule and obey it, 'they have done whatever man can do: God will aſ-'ſuredly pardon them, as he did the friends of Job 'good and pious men, tho' much miſtaken (as there 'it appears) in ſome points of doctrine. But ſome 'will ſay, with Chriſtians it is otherwiſe, whom 'God has promiſed by his ſpirit to teach all things. 'True, all things abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation: but 'the hotteſt diſputes among Proteſtants, calmly and 'charitably inquired into, will be found leſs than ſuch. 'the Lutheran holds conſubſtantiation; an error indeed, 'but not mortal. The Calviniſt is taxed with pre-'deſtination, and to make God the author of ſin; 'not with any diſhonourable thoughts of GOD, but, 'it may be, over zealouſly aſſerting his abſolute pow-'er, not without plea from Scripture. The Anabap-'tiſt is accuſed of denying infants their right to bap-'tiſm; they ſay again, that they deny nothing but 'what the Scripture denies them. The Arian and 'Socinian are charged to diſpute againſt the Trinity; yet 'they affirm that they believe the FATHER, SON, 'and HOLY GHOST, according to Scripture and the 'Apoſtolic Creed. As for the terms of Trinity, Tri-unity, Conſſentiality, Tripersonality, and the like, they 'reject them as ſcholaſtic notions not to be found in 'Scripture, which, according to a general Proteſtant 'maxim, is ſufficiently clear, ſupplying the moſt 'fit and proper words for explaining the do-'ctrines it contains. The Arminian laſtly is con-'demned for ſetting up free will againſt free grace; 'but that imputation he diſclaims in all his writings, 'and grounds himſelf largely upon Scripture only. 'It cannot be denied that the authors, or late revivers, 'of all theſe ſects, or opinions, were learned, worthy, 'zealous, and religious men, as appears by their lives 'written, and the fame of their many eminent and 'learned followers, perfect and powerful in the Scrip-'tures, holy and unblamable in their lives: and it 'cannot be imagined, that GOD would deſert ſuch 'painful and zealous labourers in his church, and often 'times great ſufferers for their conſcience, to damna-'ble errors and a reprobate ſenſe, who had ſo often 'implored the aſſiſtance of his ſpirit; but rather, 'having made no man infallible, that he has pardoned 'their errors, and accepts their pious endeavours, ſin-'cerely ſearching all things according to the rule of 'Scripture, with ſuch guidance and direction as they 'can obtain of God by prayer. What Proteſtant then, 'who himſelf maintains the ſame principles, and diſ-'avows all implicit faith, would perſecute, and not 'rather charitably tolerate ſuch men as theſe, unleſs 'he means to abjure the principles of his own reli-'gion? If it be aſked how far they ſhould be tolerated? 'I anſwer, doubtleſs equally, as being all Proteſtants; 'that is, on all occaſions to be permitted to give 'an account of their faith, either by arguing, preach-'ing in their ſeveral aſſemblies, public writing, and 'the freedom of printing (48).' After this Milton ſhows, that Popery ought to be wholly deprived of the benefit of a toleration, not as it is a religion, but as it is a tyrannical faction which oppreſſes all others. He ſhows alſo, that the moſt effectual means of hindering it's increaſe in England, is to tolerate all ſorts of Proteſtants, and in general all other ſects whoſe principles neither countenance vice nor ſedition.

(48) Milton, in his treatiſe of True Religion, Hereſy, &c. as cited by Mr Toland, in his Life of Milton, pag. 144, & ſeq. in 8vo.

By this ſpecimen of Milton's doctrine, it plainly appears, that no man was more zealous for a toleration than he; for thoſe who do not exclude Popery from it, and conſequently limit it much leſs than he does, are not, as one might think, his moſt faithful followers. The latter by an exceſſive fondneſs of toleration, are not for tolerating in the leaſt the perſecuting ſects: and ſince Popery has been time out of mind the ſect which perſecutes moſt, and inceſſantly torments both the body and ſoul of other Chriſtians whereſoever it can do it, the moſt zealous advocates for toleration do chiefly deſign it's excluſion. They pretend to reaſon conſequentially, and they do not underſtand, how the edict of the emperor of China can agree with that high wiſdom for which he is commended. I mean the edict for a toleration which he has granted to the Chriſtians, of which a Jeſuit has given us a fine hiſtory (49). They think that a wiſe prince ſhould not have allowed the Pope's miſſionaries, and their new converts, liberty of conſcience, before he knew their methods of making converts and how their predeceſſors have made uſe of them. If he had inquired into them, as a good Politician would have done, he would never have allowed the miſſionaries what he granted them; for he would have known that they pretend to be the people whom JESUS CHRIST has appointed to compel to come in, that is, to baniſh, impriſon, torture, kill, and dragoon, all thoſe who refuſe to be converts to the goſpel, and to dethrone the princes who oppoſe it's progreſs. We do not ſee how the emperor of China could clear himſelf from an inexcuſable indiſcretion, if having known this, he had nevertheleſs granted ſuch an edict (50). We muſt therefore believe for his honour, that he knew nothing of it, and he is to blame for that very thing, that he did not ſufficiently inform himſelf of what he ought to have known. In all probability he will not live long enough to have ground to repent of his

WHETHER the emperor of China acted a wiſe part in granting the Roman Catholicks an edict of toleration.

(49) Father Charles le Gobien: his book was printed at Paris in the year 1698, in 12mo. I have quoted ſomething out of it before, citat. (33) of the article BRACHMANS.

(50) See the Philoſophical Commentary on the words Compel them to come in, Part i, pag. 81, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

who delighted infinitely in Muſic. The ſect which pleaſed him moſt in his youth was that of the Puritans; but in his middle age he was beſt pleaſed with the Independants and Anabaptiſts, becauſe they allowed more liberty to every private perſon, and in his opinion ſeemed to come neareſt to the primitive Chriſtians: but in the latter part of his life, he ſeparated himſelf from all communions, and did not frequent any Chriſtian aſſembly, nor made uſe of their peculiar rites in his family. As for the reſt, he expreſſed the profoundeſt reverence to God as well in deeds as words (o). Therē was an edition of all his works (p) at London in the year 1699, in three volumes in folio. The two firſt contain what he wrote in Engliſh, and the third his Latin treatiſes. You will ſee, in the remark [N], the parallel which Milton made between a prayer that is in king Charles the firſt's book, and a prayer that is found in the famous romance intituled The counteſs of Pembroke's Arcadia.

(o) Taken from the Latin extracts of Milton's Life by Mr Toland, in Engliſh. I have been told by thoſe who underſtand Engliſh, that it is well writ, and intermixed with very curious reflexions. See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, Feb. 1699, pag. 78, & ſeq.

(p) Except his poems.

his neglect: but we cannot anſwer, that his poſterity will not curſe his memory; for they may poſſibly find themſelves obliged ſooner than we think, to ſtruggle with dangerous ſeditions, excited by the followers of a new religion, and to cut their throats to ſave their own. Poſſibly they may be forced to play the ſame fly game that thoſe of Japan played before (51). Do not think the miſſionaries will fall out among themſelves, when they are to put in practice the doctrine of compelling, of rebelling, and dragooning. The Thomiſts, the Scotiſts, and the Moliniſts, will then forget all their differences, and jointly concur to execute the command, compel them to come in. All Europe at this time (52) rings with their diſputes; they accuſe one another at Rome; the congregation of cardinals, the Sorbonne, princes, and authors, are in a ferment upon that account. And it is very ſtrange, that the diviſions of the miſſionaries, their diſputes, their devouring one another, which cannot be unknown to the new Chriſtians of the Levant, ſhould ſuffer them to make the great progreſs they boaſt of (53). There would be no miſunderſtanding, if the only queſtion among them was how to oppreſs and torment the idolaters of China. But let us break off this ſubject, which diſturbs the tranquillity of a writer, and that of many a reader. They are ſufficiently vexed, that they cannot read over a Gazette without finding accounts in it of multitudes perſecuted in France, in the Palatinate, &c.

But to return to Milton, I muſt ſay, that it would be a hard matter for me to point out the reaſons why he ſeparated from all Chriſtian communions: his own Hiſtorian leaves the queſtion undecided, whether it was on account of an infinite number of diſputes among them, void of all charity; or by reaſon of a ſpirit of tyranny, and an inclination to perſecution he obſerved in them, which he looked on as a piece of Popery inſeparably annexed to all ſects; or whether from an opinion, that one may be a good man without ſubſcribing to the confeſſions of any ſect, and that all ſects had in ſome meaſure corrupted the laws of JESUS CHRIST (54).

(54) Taken from the extracts of Milton's Life, by Mr Toland.

(51) Compare what has been ſaid above, remark [E] of the article JAPAN.

(52) I write this in November 1700.

(53) See the Supplement to the Philoſophical Commentary on the ſame words, pag. 117, & ſeq.

MINUTOLI (a). The moſt famous perſons of the family Minutoli of Lucca, which removed thither from Florence about the year 1300, after having enjoyed all the dignities of the republic of Florence, are thoſe that follow, not to ſpeak of the Antianato and office of Gonfaloniere, which was common to them.

(a) Memoir concerning the houſe Minutoli. See the advertiſements on the ſecond edition.

JAMES MINUTOLI, born in the year 1434, and ſon to FRANCIS MINUTOLI Senator, and Margaret Balbani, who was alſo of a very noble family, became very learned in the Civil and Canon Law, &c. Being gone to Rome, Pope Pius II made him abbreviator of the apoſtolic letters in the year 1460; and Pope Paul II having made him one of the commiſſaries of the Papal army in the war of the holy ſee againſt Robert Malateſta, lord of Rimini, he behaved himſelf ſo prudently and courageouſly in that office, that he brought all Umbria into ſubjection, and eſpecially Spoleto and Citta di Caſtello: which gave occaſion to the learned Antonius Campanus to ſpeak of him thus, in one of his letters to Gentil of Urbino, 'Audio Minutulum 'noſtrum cooptatum eſſe Collegio tuorum: id ſi eſt, pugnacem Collegam accepiſti, '& qui jampridem didicit tueri communem dignitatem, nam picena illa fuga non 'pugna fuit, & ipſe inter primipilos dimicans eâ die virum ſe præbuit. ——— I hear 'our friend Minutoli is taken into your college; if it be ſo, you have got a ſtout colleague, 'and who learned long ſince to defend the common dignity; for that affair of Ancona was a 'flight and not a fight, and he himſelf ſhewed he was a man of courage that day, fighting 'amongſt the firſt captains.'

Sed quò poſt pugnam victricia moverit arma!
Quâ victis pacem conditione dedit
Anne Faventinis etiam nunc finibus inſtat?
Aut fractis illis altera bella parat?

But whither mov'd he his victorious arms!
What terms of peace did he the conquer'd give?
Faenza's frontiers does he now approach?
Or them ſubdu'd, another war prepare?

After the war of Rimini he was made ſecretary of the apoſtolic penitentiary, and count of the ſacred palace of St John de Lateran by Paul II.

The emperour Frederic III, careſſed him much, and honoured him with the title of count Palatine, which at that time was a conſiderable dignity.

In the pontificate of Sixtus IV, he was made governor of Spoleto; and having done ſeveral ſervices to the holy ſee, Sixtus thought that he ought to recompenſe him for it by giving him the biſhopric of Nocera in Umbria, and in a little time after he ſent him

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with the cardinal legate, John la Balue, to Lewis XI king of France, who had ſuch an eſteem for him that he made him his agent with the Popes, and got him to be tranſlated from the biſhopric of Nocera to that of Agde in Languedoc: and in the ſame year, 1481, he was ſent, with the king's ambaſſadors, to perſuade the ſenate of Venice to join in the pacification of Italy, which had been juſt reſolved upon at Rome. The king mereover rewarded him for it by giving him a rich abbey in Poitiers, and by allowing him to enjoy the archbiſhopric of Cambray. He died in France very much regretted. There are ſeveral of his Latin letters in the collection of thoſe of the cardinal of Pavia James Amannati Picolomini, to whom he gave an account by way of journal of the ſucceſs of the war of Rimini, becauſe this cardinal had deſired memoirs for the Hiſtory of his own time, which he had begun to write. The brothers Sammarthani mention him in their Gallia Chriſtiana; but they have not ſpelt his name right in the catalogue of the biſhops of Agde, where he is called Jacobus de Munitolis Lucenſis, inſtead of de Minutolis.

FRANCIS MINUTOLI, nephew to this biſhop, did ſuch ſignal ſervices to the republic of Piſa, that he was admitted into the number of it's noble families in the year 1496.

JOHN BAPTIST MINUTOLI, ſon to this Francis and Angela Micheli, wrote ſeveral letters in Latin, which are to be found in a collection made by John Michael Brutus, under the title of Epiſtolæ Clarorum Virorum. There are ſome in it written by Dennis Lambinus, Angelus Bargæus, and others, and one in particular by John Michael Brutus, which is an elogy on and apology for commerce, in order to convince the ſaid John Baptiſt, that it would be no diſparagement to his nobility, if he ſhould overcome his repugnance to trade, to which they would have perſuaded him, after the example of the Bonviſi, Arnolfini, Micheli, and ſeveral others, who were not reckoned the leſs noblemen for carrying on a great trade: and this learned letter might deſerve a place in the Code of Merchants, as proper to do them a great deal of honour.

PAULINUS MINUTOLI, ſon of Paul and Angela Poggi, become an eccleſiaſtic among the canons of St John de Lateran, and obtained by degrees all the dignities of his order, whereof Pope Alexander VII made him at laſt abbot-general. It was he that left the fine library at Lucca in the monaſtery of St Fredian, where his memory has been honoured with a buſt of marble and the following inſcription; it gives him the name of Jerom, which he took when he entered into the order.

DOMINO HIERONYMO MINUTOLO
NOBILI LUCENSI.

Ob eximias dotes ad cuncta Lateranenſis
Congregationis munera evecto
Iiſdemque ſtrenuè perfuncto, Denique
Alexandri VII Pontif. Max.
Providentiâ Abbati Generali,
Quòd Domus hujus ſplendori
Alumnorum utilitati conſulens
Ipſe univerſalis literaturæ
Vivens promptuarium
Bibliothecam erexerit annuiſque
Reditibus communierit,
Domino Joanne Santino Præſide,
P. P. P. P.
Vixit annos 63. Obiit totius
Urbis mœrore 1667.

NICHOLAS MINUTOLI, brother of the former, embraced likewiſe a religious life in the congregation of the Olivetani, of the order of St Benedict, where he took the name of Dominicus. He became abbot of St Pontianus of Lucca, and afterwards general of his order, in the viſitation of which he received diverſe honours throughout Italy, and principally at Naples, where the noblemen that had titles of honour and were of the name Minutoli in that kingdom, owning him for their kinſman, got the chief of the nobility and people to go and meet him in a body. The elogium on his adminiſtration during his generalſhip you will find at large in the IVth Tome of Italia Regnante by Sieur Leti, with this title.

Reverendiſſimi Patris D. Dominici Minutoli Lucenſis Congregationis Olivetanæ Abbatis Generalis Illuſtris in benedictione Memoria.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A pretty remarkable paſſage is related there upon the ſubject of his works: before his generalſhip, one of his predeceſſors having appointed him to write ſomething upon the bull In Cœna Domini, the commentary he compoſed upon it made a large book in folio, which was printed, not under the name of the author, but that of the abbot who had ordered him to write: ſo that when the author made a preſent of one of the copies to his brother, to put it in his library of St Fredian, the brother refuſed to accept it, unleſs the true author would make himſelf known; which he did by writing extempore theſe ſix verſes on the back ſide of the firſt page.

Hunc ego conſcripſi librum, tulit alter honores,
Veſte mihi tantùm & nomine conſimilis:
Nam mihi Luca eſt Patria, Frater ſum illius à quo
Nobilis erecta hæc Bibliotheca fuit.
Ipſe dedi librum, retulit pro munere Frater
Quod placuit libris adnumerare ſuis.

This book I wrote, another reap'd the fame
Like me in habit only and in name.
For Lucca is my native place, and he
Who did erect this noble library
My brother is: by adding to his own
This book I gave, his gratitude is ſhown.

Two volumes only appeared under his name, printed at Venice and intituled: Affetti di devotione che devono ſentir li ſacerdoti avanti e doppo la celebratione, cavati dalli Evangelii correnti; but he left ſeveral manuſcripts which would be well worth the publiſhing.

JOHN PHILIP MINUTOLI, brother of the two forgoing, having followed the profeſſion of a ſoldier, was made general of the Militia of Ranucius II, duke of Parma, who committed to his charge his fortreſs of Placenza, where, after he had commanded ſeveral years, he died in the year 1675 much lamented by the duke, who made one that was a prince of Parma his ſucceſſor.

FRANCIS MINUTOLI, ſon to that John Baptiſt of whom we have ſpoken, married Anne Antelminelli, the laſt heireſs of the famous houſe of the Antelminelli, of which was Caſtrucius Caſtracani, who became chief of the Gibelines and prince of Lucca.

ANTHONY III MINUTOLI, was a Phyſician of note, to whom Reinerus Solenander, Phyſician to the dukes of Cleves, wrote ſome letters, which we find in his works intituled Conſilia Medica.

JAMES V MINUTOLI, after he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the practice of Phyſic, turned Jeſuit and became confeſſor to Pope Gregory XV, who placed an entire confidence in him, and left upon his account a rich legacy to the ſociety.

BONAVENTURE II MINUTOLI, ſon of MARC ANTHONY II and Catherine del Portico, was treaſurer-general to Ranucius I duke of Parma.

BERNARDINUS IV MINUTOLI, ſon to FRANCIS IV and Mary Bottini, being Apoſtolic Protonotary and prior of St Paulinus and St Donatus at Lucca, died twenty years ago in great reputation for his ſanctity, having contracted the diſtemper whereof he died, at the ſame time as a couſin-german of his of the houſe of Spada and knight of Malta did, from the ſtench of the ſick perſons whom they daily viſited and ſerved in the hoſpitals and priſons, employing all their income to relieve them.

CHARLES MINUTOLI, brother of the ſaid Bernardinus, and who has been ſeveral times already Gonfaloniere, is ſtill alive, father of ten ſons ſome of which are already Monks.

VINCENT II MINUTOLI, ſon to PAULINUS III and Laura Cenami, coming to Geneva in the year 1594, and there embracing the Proteſtant religion, ſoon after married Suſanna daughter of Michael Burlamachi and Clara Calandrini, which produced the branch of the Minutoli that is now ſettled at Geneva, of which is

VINCENT III MINUTOLI, ſon of PAUL II and Magdalen des Perrot of Paris.

The Minutoli of Lucca made likewiſe a branch three hundred years ago at Meſſina, the chief of which is now Don JOHN MINUTOLI Baron of Calari. This branch has produced ſeveral prelates, and ſeveral knights of Malta. It wears the ſame arms as thoſe of Lucca, which are partly, 1, Or, charged with an half eagle ſable, crowned, armed, and becquée Or, and 2, Argent charged with three ſtakes gules, and for the creſt an unicorn naiſſant, pattée, and membrée Or: whereas the Minutoli of Naples wear gules, a lion rampant, Or, vairé azure and argent, and charged with a ducal coronet.

Their origin is ſo ancient that it is not known. Some derive it from the family Capece, which, having incurred the diſpleaſure of the houſe of Anjou for their fidelity to the kings of the Suabian branch and particularly to Conradin, were obliged to depart the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

kingdom, after the defeat of the latter, to avoid the reſentment of king Charles I, who had vowed their utter deſtruction: ſo that they ſpread themſelves in ſeveral parts of Italy, where, it is pretended, they changed their name and arms, ſome calling themſelves Aprani, others Sconditi, others Guindazzi, others Zurli, others Piſcicelli, others Galeoti, others Minutoli, &c; after which the Pope, not being able to bear the diſperſion and deſolation of ſuch a family, reconciled them with the houſe of Anjou. But ſeveral maintain that thoſe names exiſted at Naples, not only before the coming of the Angevins, but alſo in the time of the Suabians, Normans, and even the Greek emperors, and eſpecially the name of the Minutoli, as they prove by authentic acts both in the archives and ſeveral monaſteries, of Naples. Now, whether they were only ſirnames of the houſe Capece, or families independent of it, it is certain the Minutoli were in ſuch a flouriſhing ſtate in the reign of Charles I, of Anjou, that we find he knighted twenty eight lords of that name, and he particularly loved CONSTANTIN and ROGER Minutoli, making the former general of his croſs-bow men, and giving him the barony of Urſimarſo in Calabria, and allowing the latter to put a coronet of Gold in his coat of arms.

To ſee how fruitful this family has been in illuſtrious perſons, both in the church and in the army, one need only go to their chapel called the chapel ſo St Anaſtaſia, which is in the cathedral on the right hand as you go in where one may ſee paintings in freſco, ſtatues, and relievos, of forty remarkable perſons, with the enſigns of their great employments Eccleſiaſtical and Military, from the year 1062 to the year 1466: the reſt of the family, who died ſince and could not be placed there, having been put in other chapels and churches founded by their anceſtors, and of which they had the right of patronage.

The Eccleſiaſtics are

JOHN MINUTULUS, cardinalis Stæ. Mariæ Tranſtiberinæ anno 1062.

PHILIPPUS MINUTULUS, archbiſhop of Salerno 1273. He died in the year 1303, and this epitaph was made on him:

Magnanimus, ſapiens, prudens, famaque ſerenus
Philippus Præſul morum dulcedine plenus
Minutulus Patriæ decus & flos alta propago
Hîc filet, hîc tegitur, jacet hîc probitatis imago.

The prelate, Philip Minutol by name,
His country's glory, and of ſpotleſs fame,
Brave, wiſe and prudent, affable and juſt,
Here lies at reſt, and covered with the duſt.

URSUS MINUTULUS, archbiſhop of Salerno, who died in the year 1327 with this inſcription on his tomb:

Hoc jacet in tumulo Dominus Minutulus Urſus
Pontificalis apex quem profert linea rurſus
Virtutum Vitis Philippi vera propago,
Pontificum gemma & cuncta probitatis imago,
Parthenope natum, Salernum Pontificatum
Flentque tale datum, Moritur ſuper omnia gratum.
Parthenopéque tibi Salernum Praeſulis hujus
Commendat corpus animam Deus accipe cujus.

Urſus Minutol lies within this ſhrine
Glory of biſhops, ſprung from virtue's line,
True branch of Philip, that moſt noble vine
At Naples born, he to Salerno went
To be archbiſhop; now they both lament.
Parthenope to thee, Salerno, ſends
His body, and to GOD his ſoul commends.

HENRICUS MINUTULUS, archbiſhop of Trani, then of Naples, and afterwards cardinal biſhop of Tuſculum and after that Sabinum. He died at Bologna the ſeventeenth of June in the year 1412, and his body was carried to Naples. It was he who built the beautiful portal of the cathedral church adorned with ſo many fine relievo's, and where people ſo much admire that the two principal pillars and the architrave of porphyry conſiſt only of three pieces. It is before this portal we ſee the cardinal in marble kneeling, and in the architrave this inſcription is cut.

Nullius

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nullius in longum & ſine Schemate tempus honoris
Porta fui rutilans nunc janua plena decoris
Me meus & Sacrae quondam Minutulus Aulae
Excoluit propriis Henricus ſumptibus hujus
Praeſul, Apoſtolicae nunc conſtans cardo columnae.
Cui precor incolumem vitam poſt fata perennem.
Hoc opus exactum mille currentibus annis
Quo quater & centum ſeptem Verbum caro factum eſt;

Which ſhews it was built in the year 1407.

PETRUS MINUTULUS, biſhop of Rapallo, in the year 1470.

PETRUS MINUTULUS, biſhop of Abruzzo, and prince of Teramo, 1478.

There is moreover a great number of laymen, who were very famous both at court and in the army. Campanile reckons up thirty of them, who had been viceroys or governors of provinces.

By the chappel before mentioned, there is a marble tomb of John Baptiſt Minutoli with his ſtatue and this epitaph:

Joanni Baptiſtæ Capyccio Minutolo Equiti pietate & magnanimitate inſigni qui quòd in ſe videret Henrici Capyccii Minutuli Cardinalis Ampliſſimi lineam deſinere, legatis raro Charitatis exemplo vicies mille Ducatis ad reliquæ Familiæ perpetuam utilitatem & decus inſtitutoque ſuorum bonorum hærede Hoſpitali D. Mariae Annuntiatæ, in crucis tandem ſe humili Sacello, condi voluit. Beatrix Torella Mater infelix ſuperſtes, Julia Caracciola viro Incomparabili amoris monumentum P. Obiit anno Domini 1586 ætatis ſuæ LV. —— Beatrice Torella, the unfortunate ſurviving mother, and Julia Caracciola as a monument of her love to her incomparable huſband erected this to John Baptiſt Capyccius Minutoli knight, famous for his piety and magnanimity, who ſeeing the line of his eminency the cardinal Henry Capyccius Minutoli to end in himſelf, and having bequeathed twenty thouſand ducats, a rare inſtance of charity for the perpetual uſe of the remaining family, and appointed the Hoſpital of the Annunciation heir to his eſtate, ordered that he ſhould be buried in the mean chapel of the croſs. He died in the year 1586, in the fifty fifth year of his age.

In the church of St Demetrius, where of the family Minutoli has the patronage, is to be ſeen the following inſcription:

Ædicula Nobiliſſimæ Gentis Minutulæ ante annos C D extructa, dotata Divis'que Simeoni & Demetrio dicata. Demum cum in anno M. & D. ad ſucceſſores Scipionis Andreæ filii perveniſſet ad prolatandum Templum hoc areamque diruta P. P. Congregationis Oratorii grati animi ergo ſacellum intra Templum eidem familiæ conceſſerunt Horatius Minutulus Hieroſolymitani Ordinis jus vetuſtate exoletum, ac ferè amiſſum reſtituit & monumentum hoc gentilitiæ pietatis P. C. Anno MDCXIV. —— The chapel of the moſt noble family Minutoli, built above four hundred years, endowed and dedicated to St Simeon and St Demetrius. At length, in the year one thouſand five hundred, when it came to the ſucceſſors of Scipio the ſon of Andrew, being pulled down in order to enlarge this church and porch, the fathers of the congregation of the Oratory, out of gratitude, granted to the ſame family a chapel within the church. Horace Minutoli of the order of Jeruſalem reſtored the right, through length of time forgotten and almoſt loſt, and erected this monument of hereditary piety in the year MDCXIV.

They were always with their kings in councils and expeditions. They have poſſeſſed and do ſtill poſſeſs great eſtates and great fiefs. They are allied to all the beſt families of the kingdom, as among others to thoſe of Sanſeverino, Aquino, Caſtriote, Brancace, of Capua, Loffredo, Filanghieri, Filomarini, Pignatelli, Rota, Revertera, del Tufo, Caraffo, Caraccioli, there having been twenty reciprocal marriages of the two laſt with the houſe Minutoli.

LIVIA MINUTOLI, daughter to ANDREW and Lucretia de Vulcano, was married to Don Lewis de Silva of the dukes of Paſtrano, knight of the order of St James and commander of the caſtle of Capuana. When ſhe became a widow, the emperor Charles V choſe her upon the account of her virtue and good ſenſe for the education of Margaret of Auſtria his daughter; and by her prudent conduct ſhe got into great favour with his Imperial Majeſty. We find her epitaph at Naples in the chapel belonging to the family of Silva, which ſhe had cauſed to be added to the ſee of Capuana, to which belongs that of the Minutoli.

Livia Minutula Conjux Loyſii Alphonſi Sylvæ Luſitani & Chriſti Equitis, Arciſque Capuanæ Præfecti hanc ſibi & ſuis elegit ſepulturam, anno Salutis 1536.

In the cathedral, behind the great altar, there is a marble monument of Mariella Minutoli married to Giles Safirera Viceroy of Naples for king Alphonſus:

Hic jacet Corpus Mariellæ Minutulæ uxoris Domini Ægidii Safireræ Viceregis Sereniſſimi Domini Domini Alphonſi Dei gratiâ Aragonum & Siciliæ Regis &c, in regno Neapolitano, quæ obiit die 3 Menſis Novembris anno Domini 1430.

Thoſe who would deſire a fuller account of the poſts and actions of the perſons of this family, of which there are ſtill at Naples three branches, viz. that of DON ANTONY MINUTOLI, that of FRANCIS MARIA MINUTOLI duke of Valentino, huſband to Diana Caraffa, and that of the princes of Ruoid,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

may read what has been lately written of them by the count Biaggio Aldimari in his Hiſtory of the noble families of Naples, wherein he has followed, digeſted, and enlarged what had been writ of them by Philibert Campanile.

MYRRHA, the mother of Adonis, and daughter of Cinyras [A] king of Cyprus or of Aſſyria, fell in love with her father, and never reſted till ſhe had lain with him. Her nurſe, whom ſhe had made her confident, contrived the means of ſatisfying her paſſion; ſhe took her opportunity during the feaſt of Ceres, while the queen was for nine days to abſtain from her huſband's bed [B], and made this prince believe that a beautiful young maid longed to grant him the laſt favour, without being ſeen. The propoſal was accepted; the young Myrrha was introduced by night to her father's chamber. When the ſport was pretty well over, he had a deſire to ſee the maid he had enjoyed ſo long; he cauſed a light to be brought, and found he had lain with his own daughter (a). Cinyras, took his ſword to kill her. Myrrha ran away, and eſcaped into the country of the Sabeans, where ſhe was transformed into a tree which yields myrrh. The child ſhe had conceived grew nevertheleſs, and came out of the trunk of this tree [C] when her time of delivery came. The Naiades took care of it; it was the moſt beautiful boy in the world: in a word, it was Adonis, of whom I have ſpoken in his proper place (b). Some authors ſay, that Myrrha did not conceive this paſſion of herſelf; but that the misfortune proceeded from a higher cauſe, to wit, the wrath of ſome offended deity [D]. Thus you ſee how the Pagans repreſented their gods, under the idea of beings which puniſhes one crime, by inducing the offender to commit another. Ovid has not followed theſe authors in this particular caſe of Myrrha; on the contrary he declares that Cupid cleared himſelf of it (c), and lays all the blame on the infernal furies. They who think that Myrrha was the wife of Cham, the ſon of Noah [E], take the ſtory a little too high.

(a) Cum tandem Cinyras avidus cognoſcere amantem,
Poſt tot concubitus illato lumine vidit
Et ſcelus & natam. Ovid. Metam. lib. X, ver. 472.

(b) Ex Ovidio Metam. lib. X. See alſo Plutarch in his Parallels, pag. m. 310. citing the Metamorphoſes of Theodorus. Servius, in Eclog. X, Virg.

(c) See the remark [D].

[A] The daughter of Cinyras.] Antoninus Liberalis (1) calls her Smyrna, and ſays ſhe was the daughter of Theias and the nymph Orithya and born upon mount Libanus: but, according to others, ſhe was the daughof Cinyras and Cenchreis. Ovid was of this opinion, and I wonder Meziriac (2) ſhould deny it as to Cenchreis. This Poet obſerves, I. that the mother of Myrrha was the wife of Cinyras, when Myrrha was in love with her father:

(1) Cap. xxxiv.

(2) Comment. on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 397.

- - - Conataque ſæpe fateri,
Sæpe tenet vocem, pudibundaque veſtibus ora
Texit, & O, dixit felicem CONJUGE MATREM!

- - - And would have oft confeſs'd,
As oft by ſhame with-held, ſhe hid her head,
And cried, O mother, happy in thy bed.

SEWELL.

II. That the nurſe of Myrrha took her opportunity when Cinyras lay alone, his wife Cenchreis being buſied with other women in the myſteries of Ceres:

- - - Turba Cenchreis in illa
Regis abeſt conjux, arcanaque ſacra frequentat.
Ergo legitima vacuus dum conjuge lectus.

The queen among the reſt her lord forſakes,
And one in this enjoin'd devotion makes.

SEWELL.

Is not this to ſay, that Cenchreis was the mother of Myrrha?

[B] The queen was for nine days to abſtain from her huſband's bed.] What prodigious difference between thoſe times and ours! for ſince the nurſe took this critical opportunity, it is an argument, that the king lay with his wife all other nights in the year, as regularly as the meaneſt citizen. In our days any month in the year would be as proper a time for this nurſe, had ſhe ſuch a trick to play.

[C] The child however . . . . . came out of the trunk of this tree,] Some (3) ſay, that the daughter of Cinyras was changed into a tree while her father purſued her with ſword in hand in order to kill her. They add, that the cut he gave that tree made it bring forth Adonis. Others (4) ſay that Myrrha was delivered of the fruit of her womb, after her inceſt had been detected; and that Jupiter afterwards changed her into a tree, on her earneſt prayer, that ſhe might not have a being among the living or the dead.

(3) Hygin. cap. citato. Fulgent. Mythol. lib. iii, cap. viii.

(4) Anton. Liberal. cap. xxxiv.

[D] Several authors ſay that this misfortune proceeded from the wrath of ſome offended deity.] Some (5) ſay, that the anger of the Sun was the cauſe of this inceſtuous paſſion. Others (6) have recourſe to Venus who was incenſed, that Cenchreis the mother of Myrrha, ſhould prefer the beauty of her daughter to that of this goddeſs; or at Myrrha's ſaying as ſhe combed her head, that her hair was finer than that of Venus (7). All theſe accounts are full of impiety; it was playing with the Divine Nature, and taking a greater freedom than an honeſt Hiſtorian would do with the reputation of the worſt men, unleſs he had convincing proofs. See the margin (8), and take notice that Ovid has cleared Cupid, and lays all the fault of Myrrha on the Furies:

(5) Servius in Eclog. X. Virg.

(6) Hygin. cap. xviii.

(7) Schol. Theocriti in Eidyll. I.

(8) Compare the article ALCINOE, and the article EGIALEA, at the remark [C].

Ipſe negat nocuiſſe tibi ſua tela Cupido
Myrrha, faceſque ſuas à crimine vindicat iſto.
Stipite te ſtygio tumidiſque adflavit Echidnis
E tribus una ſoror (9).

(9) Ovid. Metam. lib. X, ver. 311.

Myrrha, thy wound the god of love diſclaims,
And from ſuch horrors vindicates his flames.
A brand from Hell ſtirr'd up thy lawleſs pains,
And furies ſwell'd with viper's blood thy veins.

SEWELL.

[E] Some think that Myrrha was the wife of Cham, the ſon of Noah.] They ſuppoſe (10), that the wife of Cham accompanied by Adonis the youngeſt of her family, was the firſt who ſaw the nakedneſs of Noah, and that ſhe ſpoke of it to Cham, who told it again to his brothers. Now ſince in the ſtile of the Hebrews, to ſee or diſcover the nakedneſs of any one (11), ſignifies two things, either the ſimple ſight or the enjoyment, it happened that Myrrha, who only ſaw her father's nakedneſs, came under the ſcandal of having proceeded to the laſt act. This explication is confirmed (12) by a paſſage, wherein we read, that the nurſe of Myrrha found Cinyras drunk.

(10) See the Bibliotheque Univerſ. Tom. iii, pag. 8.

(11) Ibid. pag. 21.

(12) Ibid. pag. 20.

Nacta gravem vino Cinyram male ſedula nutrix (13).

(13) Ovid. Metam. lib. X, ver. 438.

Robb'd of his conſort and with wine oppreſs'd,
To Cinyras th' officious beldame preſs'd.

SEWELL.

But ſince ſome authors ſay Myrrha made her father drunk, that ſhe might lie with him, it would ſeem more proper to take her for one of the daughters of Lot, than for one of the daughters-in-law of Noah, if the other circumſtances could be reconciled with this conjecture.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MODREVIUS (ANDREAS FRICIUS) secretary to Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, gained great esteem by his learning and his writings. He reliſhed betimes what they called the new opinions (a), and tho' he carried himſelf diſcreetly, yet he was ſuſpected by the Catholics, and at laſt detected ſo far, that they looked upon him as an apoſtate [A]. By a letter (b) he had writ to John Laſki in the year 1536, it appears that he was no enemy to the Lutherans. His treatiſe de Eccleſia, deſigned to be the fourth book of his work de Republica emendanda, which he ſent to be printed at Cracow in the year 1551, met with cenſors who put a ſtop to the impreſſion for two or three years (c). He publiſhed it afterwards with an apology explaining thoſe points at which ſome took offence. He was to go to Trent with the ambaſſadors of Poland, but this nomination was changed (d). The Anti-Trinitarians of Poland have placed him in the catalogue of their authors. We ſhall ſee below the titles of his principal books [B], with

(a) Staniſlas Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reformat. Polon. lib. i, cap. v, pag. 18.

(b) It is the ixth, of the firſt century in the collection of letters publiſhed by Simon Abbes Gabbema.

(c) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory, and the preface to the fourth book de Republica emendanda.

(d) Modrevius, Præfat. lib. iv, de Repub. emendanda, pag. 193. Edit. Baſil. 1554, in fol.

[A] The Catholics looked on him as an apoſtate.] See after what manner Simon Starovolſcius ſpeaks of him: 'Regius Secretarius, ſeu mavis lutulenti illius ſubulci 'Lutheri, cujus nefariis dogmatibus imbutus, infeſta-'bat eccleſiæ portas, dicendo quæ non oportuit, ſcri-'bendo quæ non licuit, & agendo quæ non decuit '(1). The king's ſecretary, or if you will, of that dirty 'ſwine-herd Luther, with whoſe impious doctrines he 'was tainted, infeſted the gates of the church, by ſpeak-'ing what he ought not, by writing what was not 'lawful, and acting what was not becoming.' It appears from a Preface of Modrevius, that Pius V ordered him to be puniſhed; for thus he complains to this Pope: 'Non abs re mihi facere viſus 'ſum, ſi ipſe ad te has controverſias deferrem, tibi-'que hunc librum dicarem, qui occaſionem præberet 'tibi eas dijudicandi: ſimulque ſtudia mea exilia tibi 'commendaret. De quibus tu videris ſiniſtram opi-'nionem concepiſſe: ac propter ea iis, penes quos 'eſt poteſtas, edixiſſe, ut me de poſſeſſiunculis 'meis dejicerent: fortunis everterent: ac extorrem 'facerent domo, foro, penatibus, congreſſu hominum. 'Hoccine eſt præmium bene meritorum? Hoccine hu-'manum factum ſanctiſſime Pater (2). - - - - - I think 'it will not be improper to bring theſe controverſies before 'you, and dedicate this book to you, which may give you 'an opportunity to judge of them, and at the ſame time 'recommend to you my poor ſtudies. About which you 'ſeem to have conceived an ill opinion: and therefore 'have ordered thoſe, in whoſe power it is, to turn me 'out of my ſmall poſſeſſions, to ſeize on my goods, to 'drive me from my country, my houſe, and the ſociety of 'men. Is this agreeable to humanity, moſt holy father?' Pope Paul IV, adds he, had diſpatched the like orders to the Biſhop of Vladiſlaw, but recalled them when he heard my reaſons. 'Non ſum oblitus, à Paulo 'Papa ejus nominis quarto ſimile edictum in me ſcrip-'tum fuiſſe ad Joannem Droievium Epiſcopum Wla-'diſlaviæ. Cui quidem Papæ reſcripſi ego libro illi 'dicato de ordinibus eccleſiæ. In quo rationem illi 'reddidi vitæ, & actionum mearum: ſimulque cauſas 'oſtendi quamobrem in me non debuerit eſſe immitis '& adeo ferox. Aſſenſus eſt ille orationi noſtræ non 'obſcure, nec ullam deinceps perniciem nobis machi-'natus eſt. Droievius quoque nihil in me cogitavit, 'quam quod virum bonum & optimum principem 'deceret (3). - - - - - I have not forgot that the like or-'der againſt me, was ſent by Pope Paul the IVth, to 'John Droievius, biſhop of Vladiſlaw. To which Pope 'I wrote again, in the book dedicated to him concern-'ing the orders of the church. In this book I gave him 'an account of my life and practice, and at the ſame 'time ſhewed him ſome reaſons why he ought not to be 'unmerciful and ſo cruel to me. He granted my re-'queſt, and never afterwards intended any miſchief 'againſt me. Droievius alſo did nothing but what 'became a good man and an excellent prince.' I am perſuaded, that neither this Preface of Modrevius, nor the treatiſe which follows it, would have moved Pius V, to recal his order, and that the condition of the author was no better after he wrote this book, than while he was compoſing it. He informs us that he wrote it in the midſt of a thouſand troubles, often forced to change his lodgings, and diſtracted with the apprehenſions of loſing all he had. 'Par-'tim labores domeſtici, partim cura liberorum, par-'tim negotia civilia, maxime autem frequens curſitatio 'domicilii quærendi cauſa me ſibi vendicarunt (4). 'Hæc ſcripſi ſolicitus de bonis meis patriis avitiſque, 'de quibus periclitor authoritatis tuæ prætextu quæ 'abs te tanquam fulmen quoddam vulnificum vibrata 'eſt (5). Partly domeſtic troubles, partly the care of 'my children, partly my affairs, but eſpecially the fre-'quent changing of my lodgings, take up my whole time. 'Theſe things I have writ, being apprehenſive of loſing 'my paternal eſtate, under the pretence of your authority, 'which, like a fatal thunderbolt, is thrown out againſt 'me.'

(1) Simon Starovolſcius, in centum Polonorum Elogiis, pag. 81.

(2) Modrevius, in Præfat. Sylvæ tertiæ, pag. 152, 153.

(3) Id. ib. pag. 154, 155.

(4) Id. in 2 Præfat. Sylvæ III, pag. 157.

(5) Id. in fine Sylvæ III, pag. 216.

[B] We ſhall ſee . . . . the titles of his principal books.] His five books de Republica emendanda, whereof the firſt treats de Moribus, the ſecond de Legibus, the third de Bello, the fourth de Eccleſia, and the fifth de Scbola, were printed at Cracow in the year 1551, if we believe the abridger of Geſner (6), but we muſt not rely on him (7). They were reprinted at Baſil by Oporin in 8vo, and in fol. in the year 1554, with two dialogues of the ſame author, de utraque ſpecie Euchariſtiæ à Laicis ſumenda, and an explication of the words of St Paul (8). It is good for a man not to touch a woman. There was publiſhed at Baſil in 1562, in 4to, another collection of his pieces, which contains three book, De peccato originis, de libero arbitrio, de providentia & prædeſtinatione; three books, De Mediatore, quibus acceſſit narratio ſimplex rei novæ & ejuſdem peſſimi exempli: ſimul & querela de injuriis, & expoſtulatio cum Staniſlao Orichovio Roxolano (9). He wrote another book by order of the king, his maſter, to compoſe the differences which reigned in Poland concerning the Trinity. It is divided into four Sylvæ. The firſt is dated in December 1565, and treats de tribus Perſonis & una Eſſentia Dei. The ſecond is of the ſame date, and treats de neceſſitate conventus habendi ad ſedandas religionis controverſias. The third is dated in June 1568, and treats de Jeſu Chriſto filio Dei, & hominis eodemque Deo & Domino noſtro. The fourth is dated in June 1569, and treats de Humouſio & de iis quæ huc pertinent. Theſe four Sylvæ, together with an Appendix upon the queſtion, Quomodo unio divinæ & humanæ naturæ Chriſti facta ſit in perſona non in natura, cum tamen eadem prorſus res ſint natura & perſona in Domino noſtro, were printed at Racovia in 1590 (10). The abridger of Geſner mentions this laſt work in the year 1583, as a book not printed, and which contained only three Sylvæ, whereof the laſt treated of Infant Baptiſm (11). The firſt of theſe three facts is true, the two others are falſe. Note, that Modrevius had ſent his Sylvæ to be printed by Oporin at Baſil, who was to ſend copies of them to the Catholic, Lutheran, and Calviniſt, univerſities (12). But Trecius having a mind to hinder the publication of this book, deſired Oporin to ſhow him the manuſcript, and having once got it into his hands would never reſtore it (13). The author complained of this to the Palatine of Cracow, and earneſtly ſollicited that the Plagiary ſhould be obliged to reſtore it. This he could not obtain, and ſo was obliged to compoſe the work over again. Tandem potentiæ Palatini Trecio patrocinantis cedere: poſtremo ſcrinia ſua excutere & rejecta omnia mora, opus illud ex adverſariis & chartis fere rejectaneis denuo moliri, & abſolvere, antequam mors eum occuparet. Atque ita tandem præſtantiſſimum illud, licet mole perexiguum Sylvarum opus, ab interitu vindicatum habemus (14). The author of this Latin ſuppoſes, that Trecius ſerved him thus, becauſe Modrevius gave more force to the arguments of the Anti-Trinitarians, than to thoſe of the Trinitarians. Ille prædam petitam in caſſes ſuos nactus & inibi argumenta veritatis reſponſionibus, exceptionibus & objectionibus Trinitariorum longe fortiora animadvertens, Baſilea protinus exceſſit, evaſit, erupit, & librum Fricianum bona fide ſibi commodatum abſtulit & ſic editionem libri ſufflaminavit (15). Zanchius had ſeen the firſt of theſe four Sylvæ in manuſcript, and finding it dangerous, anſwered it in his book de tribus Elohim. He does not point out the author, but by the

(6) Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, pag. m. 43.

(7) There were only the three firſt printed at that time. See the preface of the fourth.

(8) 1 Epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. vii.

(9) Epit. Geſn. ibid.

(10) Bibl. Antitrinit. pag. 56.

(11) Epitome Geſn. ubi ſupra.

(12) Modrev. Præf. Sylvæ IV.

(13) Staniſl. Lubieniecius, Hiſtor. Reform. Polonicæ, lib. iii, cap. ix, pag. 221.

(14) Id. ib. pag. 222. See alſo Biblioth. Antitrin. pag. 38.

(15) Id. ib. pag. 221.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with some particulars concerning them. Grotius reckons him among the reconcilers of religions (e)

(e) Grotius, in Consultat. Cassandri.

the name of Mediator, and he has an esteem for him, as appears by his epistle dedicatory to Edmund Grindal (16). The sceptical manner of Modrevius's examining the mysteries, displeased both Catholics and Protestants. However, it is true, that he was obliged to use this method in obedience to the command he had received from the king of Poland. He had been charged with the drawing up a state of the case, as mediator of the argeement (17). It behoved him faithfully to represent the arguments on both sides, and divest himself of all prejudice. He had heard Dudithius say one thing, which to him appeared very solid, that a man who had espoused either side, for or against the Trinity, was not fit for an arbiter or judge between those who deny, and those who believe it. ' Is negabat eum qui alterutri seu de Trinitate seu de quavis re alia sententiæ adhæresceat, medium se inter ' partes ipsas inferre, controversiamque dirimere atque ' sedare posse. Neutri parti addictum esse oportere ' qui vel partes ipsas in concordiam reducere vellet ' æqualitate decernendi, vel secundum partem alteram ' decernere quod justum & legibus consonum esse judicaret. Qui ad eum modum neuter non esset, eum ' partes judicem capere non solere, & ab alio datum ' ejurare consuesse: nimirum quem ex opinione imbibita pendentem verisimile esset vel tacita reprehensione contrarium sentientes condemnasse. Nam ut ' pius esset & eruditus qui & dissereret & judicaret, ' fieri tamen posse ut opinione præjudicata nitens falsum ' judicaret (18).------ He denied that he who adhered to either opinion, whether about the Trinity or ' any thing else, could be a mediator between the contending parties, or decide and settle the controversy. He ' said, he ought to espouse neither side, who would ' bring the parties to an agreement by an impartial ' judgment, or determine on one side, what he thought ' just and agreeable to the laws. That parties were not ' wont to take him for a judge, who was not thus neutral, ' and commonly rejected him if appointed by another: because it is likely, his imbibed opinion would byass him ' tacitly to condemn those of a contrary sentiment. For ' though he were both pious and learned, yet possibly ' he might judge wrong by relying on his prejudiced opinion.' This notion of Dudithius is very consonant to custom, for where is the man who would chuse for arbitrators or judges of his differences, those he knows are persuaded he is in the wrong? It is even true, that such men are scarce capable of pronouncing an equitable sentence. It is a misfortune, that such a rule as this cannot take place in the disputes of religion; but the state of things is such, that these disputes must necessarily be determined in the very church where they grow, which inevitably makes the same persons judges and parties. It would be to no purpose to murmur at this, for necessity has no law. Note, by the way, one of the reasons which frustrates the endeavours of all mediators in religion, and renders them odious. If they are believed to be perfectly neuters, they are detested as irreligious men; if they are thought to incline more to one side, they are suspected and odious to one of the parties, and do not fully satisfy the other: They will have all or nothing.

(16) See the preface of the publisher of the four Sylvæ.

(17) See the Epistle Dedicatory of his first Sylva.

(18) Modrevius, Præfat. Sylvæ I.

As for the rest, his books de Republica emendanda are much esteemed: They have given the author a rank amongst the most judicious writers upon Politics. ' Gravioribus politicis haud dubie annumerandus est, ' egregie enim disputat, magnaque libertate in vulgares errores politicos invehiter (19).----- He is undoubtedly to be reckoned amongst the most considerable Po- ' liticians, for he reasons excellently, and with great ' freedom inveighs against popular errors in Politics.' I add to this a passage of the oration Cunæus made to shew that the university of Leyden had reason to punish a scholar with death, who had killed a townsman. The prince Janutius Radziwil, who studied then at Leyden, had declaimed sharply against the judges: ' Novit illustrissimus Princeps Razevilius, it ' is Cunæus speaks (20), noverunt omnes qui ejus studiis præsunt quam sint pulcra & luculenta ea quæ de ' cede cujuscunque hominis in regno Poloniæ ultimo ' supplicio punienda scripsit vir amplissimus & rerum ' civilium ac Reipublicæ regundæ gnarissimus Andreas ' Fricius Modrevius ad Sigismundum secundum Polo- ' niæ regem.----- The most illustrious Prince Radzi- ' wil, and all who have the direction of his studies ' know, how finely and excellently that great man and ' skillful Politician, Andreas Fricius Modrevius, wrote to ' Sigismund the second, king of Poland, about punishing ' with death the murder of any person in the kingdom of ' Poland.' Modrevius, in the Epistle Dedicatory to his Book de Republica emendanda, makes mention of a book, in which he largely explains the necessity of punishing murderers with death. This tract is intituled Lacisius, and consists of four orations, which have been added to the volume de Republica emendanda, in the Basil edition 1559.

(19) Joh. Andreas Bosius, Dissertat. Hagogica de comparanda Prudentia civili, pag. m. 361.

(20) Cunæus, Orat. XVII, pag. 341, Edit. Lipf. 1693. This oration was delivered the eleventh of February 1632.

I desire I may be permitted not to blot out a thing I had written before I could consult the book de Republica emendanda. It is this; ' It was doubtless for ' this book, that Modrevius received the praises contained in the Bibliotheque of the Anti-Trinitarians (21). ' This doubtless was that book of his which was translated into French, High-Dutch, and Spanish. I ' could speak more positively, if I had the preface in ' my hands, a piece of which is recited in that Bibliotheque. Sandius, who cites it, is inexcusable ' for leaving us in suspence. He ought to have used ' a parenthesis to fix the indeterminate meaning of ' these words of Modrevius, est qui laudando librum ' meum dicat, &c. I am persuaded they are very clear ' in the original: What goes before them, does, no ' doubt, explain which is the book in question. But ' when they are cut off from the context, they become obscure. It was Sandius's duty to have remedied it, and this is a good caution to those who cite ' authors, and an answer to such as pretend, that I ' make too long citations. I only do it, that what I ' cite may be clearly understood.' They who know how to judge of things will own that I might have left this in the state I found it, after I had seen, by reading Modrevius, that the Book in question is that de Republica emendanda.

(21) At the 27th pag ex Præfatione Sylvæ tertiæ Modrevii.

MOLIERE, a famous Comedian. See POQUELIN.

MOLIONIDES; thus they call two brothers who have a good share in the fabulous History. They were the sons of Actor and Molione [A], the name of one was Eurytus, and that of the other Creatus. Some pretend, that Actor was only the supposed, and Neptune their real father (a). Others will have it quite contrary that, Actor was the real and Neptune the supposed father (b). We may see under the word Actor, that he whom I here speak of reigned in Elis jointly with Augias. The Molionides were the bravest men of their time; it was to them Augias gave the command of his troops, when he understood that Hercules was coming to attack him. A distemper having seized Hercules in the beginning of the expedition, he was glad to make peace with the Molionides; but they being afterwards informed of his indisposition, made use of the opportunity; surprized his army, and killed a great number of his men. Some time after Hercules played them a trick; he laid an ambush for them at Cleone, when they were deputed by the Eleans to assist at the general sacrifices of Greece, during the celebration of the Isthmian Games, and slew them. This we learn from Apollodorus (c). Pausanias ascribes this heroe's bad

(a) Scholiast. Homeri in Iliad. lib. xi, ver. 749, 750.

(b) Apollod. Bibl. lib. ii.

(c) Ibid. See also Pind. Olymp. Od. X.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

bad ſucceſs neither to his diſtemper, nor to the treachery of the Molionides, but to their valour alone (d), and the neceſſity which forced him to deliver himſelf from ſuch enemies by ſo baſe a way. He cauſed them, as I ſaid, to be killed at Cleone, when they were going to aſſiſt at the Iſthmian Games. Molione, their mother, laboured ſo induſtriouſly to diſcover the authors of the murther, that ſhe found them out; but the Argians would not deliver up Hercules (e) to the Eleans. The latter deſired the Corinthians to exclude the Argians for the future from the Iſthmian Games, as infractors of the ſacred laws obſerved in them: but they could not obtain it. Whereupon Molione imprecated a curſe on all the Eleans, who ſhould be preſent at this ſight; which made ſuch an impreſſion on them, that even in Pauſanias's time the champions of this nation never appeared at the Iſthmian games. The Molionides had married the two daughters of Dexamenus king of Olene (f). Each left a ſon; that of Eurytus was called Talpius, and that of Cteatus, Amphimachus. They reigned after Augias's death jointly with his ſon Agaſthenes. Furthermore, the fables ſay, that the Molionides were two coachmen, who had two heads, four hands, and four feet, and only one body betwixt them; one held the reins, and the other the whip; they kept up a prefect good underſtanding, ſo that Hercules could never conquer them but by artifice. This emblem was probably deſigned to repreſent the power of concord (g). Some have ſaid, that theſe two brothers came into the world in a ſilver egg [B]. I do not know whether Suidas's two Molons were taken from the Molionides [C].

(d) Ἀτε γὰρ καὶ τολμῃ καὶ ταῖς ἡλικίαις τοῦ Ἄκτορος τῶν παίδων ἀνδρὶ ζόντων, ἐτρέπετο ὑπ' αὐτῶν ἀεὶ τὸ συμμαχικὸν τοῦ Ἡρακλέους. Herculis enim auxilia ab Actoris filiis audacia & ætate vigentibus facile rejiciebantur. - - - - For the auxiliaries of Hercules were eaſily routed by the ſons of Actor, who were young and courageous. Pauſan. lib. v, pag. m. 148.

(e) He lived then at Tirynthus.

(f) Idem, pag. 149.

(g) See Plutarch at the beginning of his Treatiſe of brotherly love, & Adr. Junius, Adag. xxxi, cent. v.

[A] They were the ſons of Actor and Molione.] It is commonly believed, with Pauſanias, that they were called Molionides from their mother (1). Homer's ſcholiaſt does not think, that they were called Μολίονε for this reaſon in the 749th verſe of the eleventh book of the Iliad, but ἀπὸ τῆς κατὰ τὴν μάχην μολύνσεως. He goes upon a principle which Euſtathius enforces on another occaſion; to wit, that Homer deſcribes no body by names borrowed from the mothers.

(1) Καλεμένων ἀπὸ Μολίονης τῆς μητέρος. Pauſan. in Arcad. pag. 248.

[B] Some have ſaid, that theſe two brothers came into the world in a ſilver egg.] See the verſes of Ibicus cited by Athenæus (2), but take notice that Dalechamp's tranſlation is neither free from faults of omiſſion, nor commiſſion. It does not expreſs the τέκνα Μολίονας of the original, and it tranſlates κ]ανόν]α by interfecerunt, inſtead of interfectorem.

(2) Athen. lib. ii, cap. xvi.

[C] I do not know whether Suidas's two Molons were taken from the Molionides.] This author having ſaid, that Molon is a proper name, cites a paſſage of Ariſtophanes (3), which ſhews there was an old ſaying, by way of proverb, As little as Molon. This might be ſaid by the rule of contraries, or by an irony, as when country people ſay, As nimble as a cow: but Suidas takes the thing literally; he ſays theſe words were applied to men of a low ſtature, and that there were two Molons who were jugglers and robbers. Eraſmus (4) has followed Suidas's explication; but he makes him ſay, that one of theſe two Molons was a juggler, and the other a robber. Suidas does not ſay ſo, ; he makes not that diſtinction ; and far from favouring Eraſmus's conjecture, which is, that theſe two Molons were of a dwarfiſh ſtature, known to every body, he oppugns it in ſome ſort by the word λωποδύται, which ſignifies thoſe who rob upon the high-way ; thoſe who riſle and ſtrip people, which little fellows dare hardly venture on ; it is rather the buſineſs of a huge thundring villain. Adrian Junius (5), who underſtood Greek very well, has taken Ariſtophanes's proverb in an ironical ſenſe ; ſo that Molon, according to him, is a man of a gigantic ſtature. I believe he has more reaſon on his ſide than Suidas. Mr Hofman (6) ſays, that according to Didymus, there were two Molons, one a juggler of an exceſſive ſtature, the other a pilferer of cloths, fur veſtiarius, and a very little fellow.

(3) In Ranis, Act. I, Sc. II.

(4) Adag. lvii, Chil. iii, cent. v.

(5) Adag. xxxi, cent. v.

(6) In the firſt volume, pag. 1047.

MOLSA (FRANCIS MARIA) one of the good Poets of the XVIth century, was of Modena. His Latin and Italian verſes brought him into ſuch reputation, that if it had been ever ſo little ſeconded by a prudent conduct, he might have riſen to a great fortune; but he behaved himſelf ſo ill, that the patrons of wit could never advance him, how much ſoever diſpoſed in his favour (a). He was ſo debauched, that he ſlighted thoſe precautions which are abſolutely neceſſary, in order to avoid the utmoſt contempt [A]. He added vileneſs and impudence to his debaucheries, ſo that we need not wonder he died of the Pox (b). He had one favourable opportunity of ſhewing he was a good Orator, and that his Proſe was equal to his Poetry. Seeing the Roman people full of indignation againſt Lorenzo de Medicis, who had cut off the heads of ſeveral ancient ſtatues; he charged him with this outrageous act, and thereupon made an oration ſo ſtrong that it filled him with confuſion and deſpair [B]. He did not die in the year 1548

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) Ab illa (Venere) meritum pudendo contactu miſerabilis morbi quo periret venenum hauſit. Paul. Jovius, Elog. cap. xiv, pag. m. 244.

[A] He was ſo debauched that he ſlighted thoſe precautions which are abſolutely neceſſary, in order to avoid the utmoſt contempt.] The prodigious corruption reigning in the world does not hinder people even of little virtue from conceiving a contempt and averſion, for ſuch as obſerve no decency in the purſuit of unlawful pleaſures. Hence Molſa loſt his reputation, and ſtopped the current of his fortune; which would not have happened, if his debaucheries had been managed with more diſcretion. Let us hear Paul Jovius. ‘ Latinis Elegiis, & Etruſcis rythmis pari gratia ludendo ‘ Muſas exercuit : tanta quidem omnium commendatione, ut per triginta annos, qui Romæ Mecœnatis ‘ nomen tulêre, inſigni liberalitate, ſtudioque adjutum ‘ adipiſcendis honoribus efferre contenderint : præ‘ gravante ſemper ejus Genio, quum redivivis toties ‘ amoribus occupatus, par ingenio ſubſtra‘ heret, neque habitu, vel inceſſu, ullove nobili com‘ mercio carminum famam tueretur ; fœde prodigus, ‘ honeſtique neſcius pudoris, neglectum rerum omnium ‘ ad innoxiæ libertatis nomen revocabat uſque adeo ‘ ſupine, ut ſummæ laudis, & clarioris fortunæ cer‘ tiſſimam ſpem facile corruperit (1). - - - He exerciſed ‘ his muſe with equal grace in Latin elegies and Italian ‘ verſes, and indeed with ſuch applauſe from every ‘ body, that the patrons of wit at Rome for thirty ‘ years endeavoured, by their great liberality and intereſt, to get him advanced. But being always ſwayed ‘ by his natural inclination, he gave himſelf up to un‘ lawful pleaſures, and neglected thoſe ſtudies that were ‘ ſuitable to his genius, and did not maintain the repu‘ tation of his poems, either by his habit, gait, or ‘ any creditable company. He was ſhamefully, prodigal ‘ and impudent, and ſo unconcerned about the character ‘ of innocence and decency, that he effectually fruſtated ‘ the certain hopes of a great name and illuſtrious for‘ tune.’

(1) Paul. Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. civ, p. m. 243.

[B] He made a ſpeech of ſuch energy againſt L. de Medicis, that he filled him with confuſion and deſpair.] It was believed that Lorenzo de Medicis, was ſo ſtruck

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1548 (c), as Thuanus affirms, but in February 1544 [C], and left a ſon who was father of ſtruck at the infamy with which that oration branded him, that to efface it, he reſolved to reſtore the city of Florence to it's liberty, by the aſſaſſination of Alexander de Medicis, his near relation (2). Sempiternam ingenii laudem retulit (Molſa) non à jucundo tantum carmine, quo laſciviſſe videtur, ſed pedeſtri etiam gravique facundia, qua Laurentium Medicem, neſaria libidine antiquis ſtatuis noctu illuſtria capita detrahentem, apud Romanos ab ea injuria dolore percitos accuſavit. Ea enim perſcripta oratione, Laurentium uſque adeo pudore, & metu perennis probri conſternatum ferunt, ut atroci animo, quo inuſtam ignominiæ notam novitate facinoris obſcuraret, interficiendi Principis, amicique ſingularis immane conſilium ſuſceperit; ſcilicet ut Diis invitis patriæ libertas pararetur (3).

(c) Thuan. lib. 4, circa finem.

(2) He committed it in the year 1537.

(3) Jovius, tibi ſupra, pag. 244.

[C] He did not die in the year 1548, as Thuanus affirms, but in February 1544.] I had for ever, perhaps, been ignorant of this error of Thuanus, if I had not by chance light upon the volume of Luke Contile's letters. In which I met with one to Bernardo Spina, dated from Modena the 14th of February, 1543 (4). Contile there tells him he had ſeen Molſa that morning, and found him ſeized with an incurable diſtemper. It was a dropſy, which had not only ſwelled his legs, as uſual, but his very head. Trifon kept always by his bed-ſide, and diverted the patient the beſt he could. Sta ſempre al capezzal del letto il buon Trifone, & burla, & giamba co'l Molza, & io me ne piglio ſpaſſo, & perche in ſomma lo tengon per morto, voglio verderne il fine, perche io, come mi rallegrai della ſua vita, voglio dolermi della ſua morte (5). Theſe Italian words give us to underſtand, that Contile had a mind to ſee his end, which every body judged to be near at hand. Nor were they miſtaken; for we learn by a letter he wrote from Milan the twenty firſt of February, 1543, to Claudio Tolomei, that he had aſſiſted at Molſa's funeral: Havrete ſaputa la morte dell' unico Molza. io gionſi à tempo di vederlo vivo & mi fu lecito d' accompagnarlo al ſepolcro morto (6). I did not doubt on reading theſe particulars, that Thuanus had been miſtaken, nevertheleſs I was willing to have good evidence, and therefore addreſſed myſelf to Mr de la Monnoie, who was pleaſed to write me ſeveral particulars concerning Molſa; it will be a ſatisfaction to my reader to ſee them in this place (7), 'Molza did 'not die in 1548, but in 1544. This is proved by 'three letters of Annibal Caro, his intimate friend; 'the firſt written from Rome to Molza ſick at Modena, 'is of the ſecond of January 1544, the ſecond of the 'eleventh of February the ſame year, being an 'anſwer to that which it appears Molza had written 'to him, and the third of the ſixth of March following, in which he ſends an account to Varchi of 'the death of Molza as a thing that had lately happened: Con le lagrime à gli occhi, theſe are the 'words he begins with, vi dico che'l noſtro da ben 'Molza è morto, è per lo graviſſimo dolore ch'io ne 'ſento, non ne poſſo dir altro - - - - - - With tears 'in my eyes I acquaint you with the death of our good 'friend Molza, and becauſe of the exceſſive ſorrow I 'feel on that account, I can ſay no more. . . . . This 'Molza was a man of good natural parts, which he 'perfected by ſtudy. He added learning to politeneſs, 'the knowledge of Greek, and as Lilius Gyraldus 'ſays, of Hebrew too, to that of Latin, and his 'own tongue. He ſucceeded in proſe, in verſe, in 'the grave and comic ſtile: ſo that going far beyond the judgment his country-man Sadolet had 'made of him, that he might excel in any kind of 'compoſition, which he would apply himſelf entirely to, he excelled in all, without confining himſelf to any one. Father Rapin looks upon him as 'a pattern of Latin elegy among the Moderns. His 'character was that of Tibullus, upon which you 'may ſee Bartholomew Riccius de imitatione. His 'pieces would, perhaps, have been more correct, if 'death had not prevented him. . . . It is hard to excuſe 'him with reſpect to his licentious life, without admitting that corrupt morality, upon the principles 'whereof he perſuaded himſelf, that provided he abſtained from great crimes, ſuch as atheiſm, theft, murder, and all kinds of violence, he might, with an innocent liberty, taſte ſenſual pleaſures. Taking the 'matter thus, he was purer than ſnow, and no life 'was more irreproachable than his. He flatters himſelf, 'that ſome hereafter, taking a thorow view of it, 'would propoſe it for an example, and that this will 'be the ſubject of his panegyric:

Tum faciles memoret mores, & puriter acta
Percurrat vitæ tempora quæque meæ,

'ſays he, in that fine elegy he made a few days before his death. His prediction met with a ſpeedy 'accompliſhment. Paul Panſa, a good Latin Poet, 'preceptor to the famous John Lewis de Fieſque, 'gave him ſuch praiſes as he deſired.

Hoc-ne meret probitas? hoc-ne meret pietas?
Is this the reward of probity?
Is this the reward of piety?

'ſays he; and four verſes after,

Quid prodeſt vixiſſe pium, aut odiſſe profanum
Vulgus, & à ſævis abſtinuiſſe malis?
What, tho' he pious liv'd, tho' he diſdain'd
Th' ignorant mob, and violence refrain'd.

'What is more, Schraderus and Swertius mention a 'glorious inſcription conſecrated to his memory in 'the cathedral of Modena in theſe words: Si animarum auctio fieret, Franciſcum Molzam licitarentur Virtutes, Patria, & Catharina ejus uxor, 'quæ illi & ſibi vivens hoc poſuit - - - - - - Were 'there to be an auction of ſouls, the price of Francis 'Molza would be enhanſed by virtue, his country, and 'Catharine his wife, who in her life-time erected 'this monument for him and herſelf. . . . . Guidiccione, 'afterwards biſhop of Foſſombrona, has ſpoken no leſs 'honourably of Molza's virtue. Datemi novelle del 'Molza, ſays he in a letter to Tolomei, ch'io lo deſidero fuor di miſura, cioè ſe egli vuol fare povero 'il mondo, e ricchi i cieli con la ſua anima, perche 'intendo che egli è infermo d' una acuta febre. - - - - Send me ſome news about Molza; I deſire extremely to 'know, whether he will make the world poor, and 'Heaven rich with his ſoul, for I hear he is ill of an 'acute fever. Paul Jovius, who after all blamed him 'only for not preſerving a decorum, ſhould not have 'been ignorant, that he, whoſe conduct he cenſured, 'had been parallelled even for his morals with himſelf, and a great many worthy gentlemen his co-'temporaries, by Longolius in his ſecond defence. 'Quid hic Paulum Jovium commemorem? Angelum 'Colotium, Antonium Maroſticum? Quid Marium 'Molzam, Hieronymum Nigrum, M. Antonium 'Flaminium, Georgium Sauromanum, viros tum 'ab omni elegantiore doctrina inſtructiſſimos, tum 'ingenua animorum probitate optimos, atque totius 'vitæ innocentia integerrimos? - - - Why ſhould I mention here Paul Jovius? Angelus Colotius, Antonius 'Maroſticus? Or Marius Molza, Hieronymus Niger, 'M. Antonius Flaminius, and Georgius Sauromanus, 'men endued with excellent learning, great uprightneſs 'of heart, and innocence of life? Yet Molza was then 'in the height of his debauchery. He had a miſtreſs 'named Furnia, whom he paſſionately loved, even 'to the calling himſelf Furnius, and perhaps it was 'from her he took the diſeaſe he died of. We have 'a letter of the ſame Longolius to Furnius Marius 'Molza, wherein are theſe curious words: Cujus 'quidem rei me primum ſuis literis certiorem fecit 'Flavius Chryſolinus, deinde Q. Lælius Maximus, 'quem Quinti prænomen ſecutum eſſe arbitror, quod 'Quintiæ alicujus, ut tu Furniæ, conſuetudine iſtic 'teneatur. - - - - Whereof Flavius Chryſolinus firſt informed me by his letters, and afterwards Q. Lælius 'Maximus, which name of Quintus I ſuppoſe he took, 'becauſe he had a miſtreſs called Quintia, as you have 'one called Furnia. She quickly after turned com-'mon proſtitute. This is another particular we learn from 'Longolius. Nam de agreſti illâ, ſays he, book iv, writing to Flaminius, in quam ſe abſtruſurum eſſe Furnius 'Molſa affimaret, ſpeluncâ, factus ſum à Briſſone noſtro 'certior. Ac de Furnio quidem non valde ſum miratus, vult enim Furniam ſuam imitari, quam ſeſe in 'recentem iſtum luparum furnum jam abdidiſſe intelligo. - - - - For as to that wild cave, in which Furnius 'Molza ſaid he would ſhut himſelf up, I have been informed

(4) Obſerve, that both here, and in the paſſage of cent. (6), it muſt be 1544, and not 1543: I ſhall take notice below, that perhaps Contile followed the date of thoſe who do not begin the year with the month of January. It may be too, that the date of the year was not in the original of this letter, and that having been added when it was printed they put 1543, inſtead of 1544.

(5) Luca Contile, Lettere, lib. i, fol. 85, Edit. of Pavia 1564, in 8vo.

(6) Id. ib. fol. 86.

(7) La Monnoie, MS letter.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

other things, that he died so much like a Christian, that it could not be douted but his soul went directly to Heaven [F].

‘ sotti confessi di non haverne tocco anchor fundo,
‘ si vede pure, che s'è distese piu a dentro, che ‘ nessun' altro (25). - - - - But to shew what a competent ‘ judge he is in this cause (as the Lawyers say) I shall ‘ only tell you, that besides being a great Poet, he was ‘ a very great Natural Philosopher, and spent more time
‘ in searching out secrets of the nature of figs, than En- ‘ dymion in observing the motions of the moon. And if
‘ the latter was therefore looked upon by the moon to be ‘ a lover: the former was called by the world father,
‘ as if every one had been his son. And as Albertus
‘ was named Magnus, for having discovered the secrets
‘ of the women, he was called divino and perfecto, for ‘ having revealed the secrets of figs: and it must be ‘ confessed that he has gone further than any body else.’

(25) Ibid.

I mention these particulars only to shew what judgment was made of Molza. We may further infer from them that there reigned a great licentiousnes among the Italian Poets of that age. They vyed with one another in exercising their wits on subjects which bore a double meaning; Mr Menage might have added the famous Bembo to the examples he has cited (26), who chose an herb for his subject, the very name of which discovered the drift and design of his poem. I will explain my self in the words of another writer. There was one Petrus Matthæus, a doctor of both laws, who, in the year 1587, made a collection of several Latin poems of the Italian Poets . . . . Amongst these finest pieces were the most obscene; Bembo's Priapus, where he exercises all his wit, speaking of the herb which is called in Latin Mentha (mint) upon the affinity between this word and the Latin Mentula; and also the Siphilis of Fracastor, in which he describes the origine and progress of the pox, &c (27).

(26) Above, citation (22).

(27) Pasquier, Catechism of the Jesuites, lib. iii, cap. ix, pag. m. 378.

[F] It was said . . . . it could not be doubted but that his soul went directly to Heaven.] Contile makes use of this among other reasons, to comfort those who were afflicted at the death of this fine wit. He had first alledged the reasons, why they ought to lament him, and afterwards turns the tables thus: ‘ Debbano adunque i suoi parenti e amici piangerlo con
‘ dolore intenso. Non debbano poi dolersene, perche hanno conosciuto, che quella era la sua hora ‘ nella quale mostro tanto zelo christiano, che dicono à ‘ viva voce esser lui salito in cielo. era la sua hora
‘ parimenti inquanto alla età, la quale stanca di questa vita, hà mostro il suo determinato fine, fuggendo il pericolo delle morti subbitane, le quali succedono quasi sempre à quella età. So che voi in prima fronte vi dorrete di quello honorato amico, dipoi non vi dorrete, ma restarete contento di quel ‘ fine, che certifica la salute di quell' anima, che in ‘ questa vita valse tanto (28). - - - His relations and ‘ friends ought therefore to lament him with great sorrow.
‘ They ought not afterwards to be grieved at it, because ‘ they knew what his latter end was, in which he shewed so much Christian zeal, that they say he went directly to Heaven. His last hour was suitable to his age,
‘ which being weary of this world shewed his end to ‘ be determined, shunning the danger of sudden deaths,
‘ which commonly succeed that age. Tho' at first you
‘ will lament this honoured friend, afterwards you will ‘ not lament, but remain satisfied with that end, which ‘ certifies the salvation of his soul, which was of such ‘ value in this life.’ To consider this man's morals, one would think he needed several years stay in Purgatory, notwithstanding the good dispositions he shewed at his death.

(28) Luca Contile, Lettere, lib. i, fol. 26 verso.

MOLSA (TARQUINIA) grand-daughter to the preceding, was one of the most eminent ladies of her age. Her wit and learning, joined to the gracefulness of her person, were supported by an uncommon virtue [A]. Having lost her husband, without having had any children (a), she never would marry a second, tho' she was still very young. The sorrow she expressed for him did justly found a parallel between her and Artemisia [B]. Her father finding that she was born with a talent for the sciences, caused her to be instructed by the best masters that could be found [C]. She was in great

(a) Hilarion de Coste, Elog. des Dames illustres, Tom. ii, pag. 800. He translates the Elogy of this lady composed by Peter Paul de Ribera.

[A] Her wit and learning, joined to the gracefulness of her person, were supported by an uncommon virtue.] Francis Patricius, one of the learnedest persons of that time, is my authority; here is what he says in one of his letters to her, after having specified the things she understood. ‘ His tot tantisque ingenii ornamentis comites sese addiderunt nobilitas generis, pulchritudo eximia, mores animi insignes, pudicitia
‘ singularis (1). - - - - Besides so many and so great ornaments of the mind, she was of an antient family,
‘ of singular beauty, of an excellent temper, and uncommon virtue.’ A canon of Lateran has drawn out this elogy to a greater length. She was naturally agreeable, says he (2), and exceeding beautiful, so that when she was somewhat advanced in years, her face, her genteel manner, and graceful behaviour, confirmed the saying of Euripides, that not only the spring, but also the autumn of true beauties is agreeable: and yet the perfections of her mind did very much surpass those of her body, having equalled the most eminent persons in virtue and learning. Nor has she come behind any of her sex in chastity and modesty, virtues she always made profession of, with so much the more glory and advantage, as she was honoured with the visits of the most accomplished persons of several countries (3), who bearing of her rare virtues and endowments, had a mind to satisfy their curiosity, and came from far to see and discourse her, as the wonder of her age. This kind of vanity, which so easily intoxicates the minds of the female sex, had never been able to affect her's; on the contrary, she shunned, with great prudence and modesty, all occasions which might betray her into a reliss of it, preferring a retired life to the condition her extraordinary qualities might have raised her to; the temper she had happily found, savoured neither of confidence of her self, nor contempt of others. These are the words of the Minime Hilarion de Coste, translated from the Italian of a canon of Lateran. Add to them a citation which I am just going to give from the same Monk.

(1) Franciscus Patricius, in Epist. Dedicat. tertii Tomi Discussionum Peripateticarum.

(2) Peter Paul de Ribera, ubi infra, citat. (7), according to the version of Hilarion de Coste, Elog. des Dames Illustres, Tom. ii, pag. 800.

(3) Let us confirm this by the words of Francis Patricius, ubi supra. Elegantes ac docti viri quique non cives tantum tui, sed quotquot Italia, quotquot Europa protulit, Mutinam visunt, ut te Mutinæ visant, ut mirentur, ut colant, cerebrum Jovis pene supremi alteram Minervam. - - - - Polite and learned men, not only of your own country, but throughout all Italy and Europe, come to Modena to see you, to admire and adore another Minerva the offspring of Jupiter's brain.

[B] She deserved to be compared with Artemisia.] This I say of her upon the authority of a great Philosopher: ‘ Proh dolor! says he (4), postquam maritus tuus Paulus Porrinus, virorum optimus ad superos migravit, Musas omnis ac Gratias, luctu ac
‘ tenebris obduxisti. Artemisiam alteram te factam
‘ dolemus. Fuit quidem ille tibi maritus incomparabilis. Sed & tu uxor illi incomparibilis & admiranda. Da locum prudentiæ, ac fortitudini tuæ, da ‘ finem lachrymis - - - - - Alas! when your husband,
‘ Paulus Porrinus, the best of men, departed this life, you overwhelmed all the Muses and Graces with sorrow
‘ and darkness. We lament you, as another Artemisia.
‘ He indeed was an incomparable husband to you. But ‘ you was likewise an admirable and incomparable wife
‘ to him. Give place to your prudence and fortitude, and ‘ put an end to your tears.’ The Epistle Dedicatory from whence I have taken these words has no date; but the book, in which it is found, was printed at Basil, in the year 1581.

(4) Francis Patricius, ibid.

[C] Her father . . . . caused her to be instructed by the best masters that could be found.] ‘ (5) Camillus Molza,
‘ Knight of the order of St James of Spain, and son
‘ to the great Francis Maria Molza of Modena, an ‘ Orator, and an excellent Latin and Italian Poet . . . .
‘ observing from her youth the force and excellency
‘ of her genius sent her with her brothers to learn the ‘ rudiments of Grammar. John Politiano, a native
‘ of Modena, admirably skilled in all the sciences, a ‘ man of great virtue and piety, was her master. She ‘ learned the Belles Lettres, as also to write well, and ‘ compose correctly, under the care of Lazaro Labadini, a famous Grammarian of those times, which ‘ she elegantly reduced to practice in her compositions
‘ in prose, and Latin verse. She acquired great knowledge in Aristotles Rhetoric, under Camillo Corcapani.

(5) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 799, 800, & seq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

great eſteem at the court of the duke of Ferrara: In a word, her merit was ſo illuſtrious, that the city of Rome preſented her with a privilege, of which there never had been a precedent, to wit, that of the freedom of the city of Rome [D]. You will find theſe things in the remarks.

'The Mathematician Antony Guarini, taught her the 'doctrine of the Sphere. She learnt the art of Poetry 'under Francis Patricio a famous Philoſopher; Logic, 'and all the parts of Philoſophy, under P. Latoni, as 'alſo the entire and perfect knowlege of the Greek 'tongue. Rabbi Abraham taught her the principles 'of the Hebrew tongue: this Rabbi's grandfather 'had been a Hebrew maſter to her grandfather, the 'Great Molza, ſo that by her own induſtry, and the 'inclination to ſtudy, which theſe great men obſerved 'in her, ſhe made ſo extraordinary a progreſs, that the 'ſubtleſt queſtions in Divinity were no difficulty at 'all to her. John Maria Barbier, a man of great 'learning and judgment, perfected her in the purity of 'the Tuſcan tongue; ſhe compoſed not only ſeveral 'fluent and elegant Poems in it, but alſo ſeveral let-'ters, and other works eſteemed by the politeſt and 'and moſt learned men of Italy. She has mixed a-'bundance of tranſlations from books, Greek and 'Latin, with her own productions, and has ſo hap-'pily and ſo properly expreſſed the thoughts of her 'authors, that her readers have doubted whether ſhe 'had not a more perfect knowledge of thoſe tongues 'than of her own. She began to learn Muſic to en-'tertain and unbend her mind from her more ſerious 'ſtudies; ſo that ſhe excelled by far all the ladies, who 'had ſung with the greateſt applauſe, and raviſhed all 'their hearers. The way of managing her voice, which 'ſhe had acquired by the true rules of good books and 'of the beſt maſters, many of which had the lauda-'ble ambition to ſhow her ſomething curious in that 'art, was admirable. Amongſt others of theſe maſters 'were Giaches d'Uuerto, Luſaſco Luſachi, and Horatio 'called of the Violin, on which inſtrument, as well as 'on the Lute, Tarquinia uſed to play a part, joining 'another with her own voice, and that with ſo much 'art and ſkill, that nothing ſeemed to be wanting, ſo 'ſo that Alphonſo II, duke of Ferrara (6), a moſt 'judicious prince, and who had an extreme paſſion 'for all fine and good accompliſhments, was raviſhed 'with admiration, finding more perfections in this 'lady, than had been reported of her. A little after 'ſhe inſtituted that famous Concert of Ladies which has 'done her ſo much honour, and who after her huſ-'band's death, always invited her to their company, 'that by her preſence ſhe might perfect the choir of 'Muſic, which ſhe had ſo happily begun.' Theſe words of Hilarian de Coſte, are tranſlated from the Italian of a regular Canon of St John of Lateran (7). He does not clearly enough ſignify what Patricius taught this lady: and therefore I rectify his narration by the words of Patricius himſelf, who tells us he taught her the Greek tongue, and read Plato to her. All he has ſaid in praiſe of Tarquinia, with reſpect to her learning is worth relating, and may ſerve for a Supplement to Ribera's narration. 'Non tu, ſays he (8), 'ut aliæ ſolent, ſummis labris libros attigiſti. Tu non 'modo Hetruſcam politiſſimam linguam, ſed Latinam, 'ſed Græcam, optime calles. Tu in hac non modo 'Hiſtoricos atque oratores, ſed & Philoſophos, ſed & 'Platonem ipſum, Jovis eloquium æmulantem, ſed & 'Poetas quoſlibet, ſed & Pindarum, ſine hæſitatione 'ulla & legis & intelligis. Hanc tu, quod omnium 'hominum admirationem vincat, in Platone, tribus 'mentibus me prælegente edidiciſti. Tu in Latina 'omnium generum carmina pangis, in Hetruſca poema-'ta condis, quam ſalita, Jupiter, atque arguta! Tu 'logicas omnes ſpinas demetiſti. Tu moralem Philo-'ſophiam, Plutarchicam, Ariſtotelicam, Platonicamque 'ebibiſti. Tu magnos profectus in Phyſiologia feceiſti. 'Tu Theologiam catholicam, toto pectore hauſiſti. 'Quid Muſicen omnis generis referam? In qua te om-'nis non modo Muſicorum, ſed & Muſaram chorus & 'admiratur, & ſtupet. Te ne virorum quidem ullus in 'muſica præſtantiſſimorum, non modo non ſuperat, ſed 'nec adæquat. Cum ad hendecachordum canis cum 'acutam gravemque eodem utramque tempore, alteram 'ad lyram pulſas, alteram cantas, Gratiæ te omnes or-'nant, circumſtant, ſtupeſcuntque. Quas utinam poſſem 'ita exprimere, ut qui hæc legeret, te audire putaret. 'Sed Dii boni, quæ eloquentia? quæ argutiæ? qui ſales? 'quæ jucunditas in converſando? quæ humanitas? quæ 'urbanitas? Longe meritò judicioſiſſimus Benedictus 'Manzolius civis tuus, & Epiſcopus Regienſis te, non 'ſolum patri tuo Camillo viro eloquentiſſimo, ſed 'etiam avo tuo, viro uſquequaque magno Franciſco 'Mario Molziæ audet præferra. - - - - - You have not 'ſuperficially read books as other ladies uſe to do. You 'have not only a perfect knowlege of the Tuſcan tongue in 'its greateſt purity, but likewiſe of the Latin and Greek. 'In the laſt of which you can read and underſtand not only 'Hiſtorians and Orators, but alſo Philoſophers and Plato 'himſelf, Jove's rival in eloquence, and likewiſe the 'Poets of any kind, even Pindar, and that without any 'difficulty. And what ſurpaſſes the admiration of all, 'you learned this language by my reading Plato to you, 'in three months time. In Latin you compoſe verſes of 'all ſorts, and in Tuſcan you write Poems, good God! 'how full of wit and ingenuity! You can ſolve all the 'difficulties in Logic. You are a perfect miſtreſs of the 'Ethics of Plutarch, Ariſtotle, and Plato. You have made 'vaſt proficiency in Phyſics, and have wholly exhauſted 'Catholic Divinity. What need I mention Muſic of 'every kind? In regard to which, the whole band, not 'only of Muſicians but likewiſe of the Muſes, look on you 'with admiration and aſtoniſhment. The moſt skillful 'man in Muſick is ſo far from excelling, that he does 'not ſo much as equal you. When you ſing to the Lute, 'when you perform Baſs and Tenor at the ſame time, 'the one on the Lyre and the other with your voice; 'all the Graces adorn, ſurround, and admire you. Which 'I wiſh I were able ſo to expreſs, that thoſe who read 'this might imagine they heard you. But, Lord! 'what wit, what ſpirit, what agreeableneſs in conver-'ſation, what ſweetneſs of temper, what politeneſs of 'behaviour? The moſt judicious Benedictus Manzolus 'your countryman, and Biſhop of Reggio, very juſtly pre-'fers you, not only to your moſt eloquent father Camillus, 'but alſo to your grandfather Francis Marius Molza, a 'great man in every reſpect.'

[D] The city of Rome preſented her . . . . . with the Roman freedom.] '(9) All the world has given 'an univerſal applauſe to her merit, but particularly 'the ſenate and people of Rome, by an authentic 'teſtimonial and acknowledgment, having in a de-'cree of the ſenate, (wherein mention is made of all 'her qualities and perfections) honoured her with the 'title of Only Perſon, giving her the privilege of a 'a Roman citizen, and for her ſake to all the family 'of Molza, as you will ſee by the words of the grant 'or patent . . . . . Quod Fabius Matheus Franciſcus 'Soricius Equ. Dominicus Coccia Conſ. de Tarquinia 'Molſa Mutinenſe Camilli filia Civitate Romana do-'nanda ad Senatum retulere S. P. Q. R. de ea re ita 'fieri cenſuit. Etſi novum atque inuſitatum eſt in 'civium numerum à Senatu fœminas cooptari, quarum 'virtus, ac fama domeſticorum parietum finibus con-'tineri cum debeat, raro publicis in negotiis uſui Rei-'publicæ eſſe ſolet; tamen ſi aliqua inter eas unquam 'extiterit, quæ non ſolum ceteras ordinis, ſed viros 'etiam virtutibus pene omnibus ſupergrediatur, æquum 'eſt, ut novo exemplo, noviſque inuſitatiſque meritis, 'novi itidem honores inuſitatique perſolvantur. Cum 'itaque Tarquinia Molza Mutinæ antiquiſſima ac flo-'rentiſſimi Populi Romania Colonia, Camillo Patre in 'equitum ordinem D Jacobi ab Hiſpaniæ Regibus, in-'ſtitutum, ob merita ac nobilitatem adjecto genita, ce-'lebres illas Romanas Heroinas æmuletur, virtutibuſ-'que exprimat, ut ei nihil præter patriam Romanam 'deeſſe videatur, ne hoc unum ad abſolutam ejus glo-'riam deſiderari poſſit, Senatus Populuſque Romanus 'Civitate donandum cenſuit, &c. - - - - - As Fabius 'Matheus Franciſcus Soricius, knight, and Dominicus 'Coccia, conſul, have propoſed to the ſenate to grant the 'freedom of the city of Rome to Tarquinia Molſa, of Mo-'dena, the daughter of Camillus. The ſenate and people 'of Rome have thus decreed. Though it be new and un-'common for the ſenate to admit women into the number 'of citizens, whoſe excellencies and fame, as they ought 'to be confined to family affairs, are ſeldom of ſervice to 'the Common-wealth in public matters; yet if there be 'any among them that not only ſurpaſſes the reſt of her 'own ſex, but even men in almoſt all virtues, it is rea-'ſonable that by a new example, new and unuſual honours 'ſhould be paid to new and unuſual merit. Since there-'fore Tarquinia Molza, a native of Modena, a moſt an-'cient

(6) Confirm this by theſe words of Patricius, ubi ſupra, citat. (3). Quanti te ſereniſſimus Alphonſus Actilius II Princeps noſter? Quanti te principes mulieres Lucretia atque Leonora, ſorores eius faciunt? - - - How much does his moſt ſerene highneſs Alphonſus of Eſte II our prince? How much do the princeſſes Lucretia, and Leonora his ſiſters, eſteem you?

(7) Called Peter Paul de Ribera de Valencia. He has written the Elogy of our Tarquinia in the fourteenth book of a work intituled, Le Glorie immortali de' Trionfi, & Heroiche imprese d'ottocento quaranta cinque Donne illuſtri antiche, e moderne, dottate di conditioni e ſcienze ſegnalate: Cioè in ſacra Scrittura, Theologia, Profetia, Filoſofia, Retorica, Grammatica, Medicina, Aſtrologia, Leggi Civili, Pittura, Muſica, Armi, & in altre virtu principali.

(8) Patricius, ubi ſupra.

(9) Hilarion de Coſte, Tom. ii, pag. 802, 803.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'cient and flouriſhing colony of the people of Rome, and 'daughter of Camillus, who for his merits and nobility 'was made knight of the order of St James, inſtituted 'by the kings of Spain, imitates, and, by her virtues, 'reſembles thoſe famous Roman heroines, ſo that ſhe ſeems 'to want in nothing except her not being born in Rome, that 'this alone might not be wanting to compleat her glory, 'the ſenate and people of Rome have decreed to preſent 'her with the freedom, &c. Ribera has only put theſe 'Latin words in Tarquinia Molza's Elogy, and all 'the patent in Italian, wherein are related all the qua- 'lities and ſtudies of this heroine, the nobility of 'her family, and the deeds of her anceſtors which I 'have ſpoken of above. The decree was made in 'the Capitol the eighth of December MDC. Curtio 'Martolo being for the time chancellor of the ſenate, 'and of the Roman people, Angelo Foſco being chan- 'cellor of the ſenate and people.

MONANTHEUIL (HENRY DE) in Latin Monantholius [A], a native of Reims in Champagne, was king's profeſſor of Mathematics at Paris, in the year 1577 (a) [B]. He was alſo dean of the faculty of Phyſic at Paris (b). He had been educated under Ramus in the college of Prele, and was a very zealous ſtickler for the Philoſophy of this new founder of a ſect. Thuanus, who informs us of this paticular (c), makes an honourable mention of Monantheuil, who had taught him Arithmetic and Geometry. He had been preceptor to the learned Peter de Lamoignon (d), whoſe Epitaph Theodore Beza has written in Latin verſe. He publiſhed at Paris, in 1599, his Latin tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Mechanics (e) [C], and added to it a very learned commentary. Death prevented his finiſhing a large work of Mathematics, upon which he had laboured a long time, and which was to be intituled Heptatechnon Mathematicum. We ſhall take notice of his other works in the remarks. He was one of du Vair's, the keeper of the ſeals, particular friends, and is the Muſæus mentioned by du Vair in his book of Conſtancy. He had a ſon called THIERRI DE MONANTHEUIL who was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and compoſed a book intituled de Puncto [D], which he dedicated to his father. This Thierri died at Paris in 1621, being fifty years of age. His ſiſter CATHARINE was married to Jerome Goulu, as we have already obſerved (f). See Mr Menage (g).

(a) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 567.

(b) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de P. Aurault, pag. 254.

(c) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. i.

(d) Uncle to the firſt preſident de Lamoignon. Menage, ibid.

(e) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 306.

(f) Above, remark [A] of the article GOULU (JEROME).

(g) Ubi ſupra.

[A] In Latin Monantholius.] This is doubtleſs his true Latin name; but becauſe Voſſius, I know not why, calls him Monatholius, Mr Moreri has not only omitted his French name, which he ought to have given, but has alſo put him under a Latin name, ſomewhat diſguiſed, I mean that of Monatholius. He has added nothing to the ſhort account, which he found of him in Voſſius.

[B] He was the king's profeſſor . . . in the year 1577.] I could eaſily believe he entered upon this profeſſion in 1574, being at that time a profeſſor of Phyſic; I could eaſily believe this, I ſay, from the title of the oration inſerted by du Verdier Vau Privas, in the ſupplement to the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque. Henrici Monantholii Rhemi Scholarum Medicinæ Profeſſoris, oratio pro Mathematicis artibus, Pariſiis habita, ibidemque excuſa in 4to. apud Dionyſium à Prato 1574. But this other title of an oration at the 367th page of the ſecond part of Thuanus's catalogue might keep me in ſuſpence, Henrici Monantholii Oratio pro ſuo in regiam Cathedram ritu 8. Pariſ. 1585.

[C] He publiſhed . . . his Latin tranſlation of Ariſtole's Mechanics.] When I find on one hand, that the Sieur Konig (1), upon Cardan's teſtimony, tells us of one Francis Monantholius author of a book intituled Ludus iatromathematicus, and on the other, that Henry de Monantheuil wrote a book called Ludus iatromathematicus, Muſis factus ad averruncandum tres Academiæ pernicioſiſimos hoſtes, πόλεμον, λιμὸν, λοιμὸν (2), I am ſomewhat diſpoſed to believe, that here are two authors made of one, and that the Petrus Monatholius, mentioned immediately after, as an author who publiſhed Commentaries at Paris upon Ariſtotle's Rhetoric, in the year 1599, is a new multiplication of the ſame writer, and a miſtaking of his Rhetoric for a treatiſe of Mechanics. However, I venture not to determine the point, not having a library ſufficiently furniſhed at my command.

(1) Biblioth. pag. 548.

(2) See Lindeniut renovat. pag. 397.

[D] THIERRI . . . . his ſon . . . . wrote a book intituled de Puncto.] Monantheuil, the father, had writ upon the ſame ſubject: ſee in Thuanus's catalogue this title, Henr. Monantholii de Puncto primo Geometriæ principio 4. Ludg. Bat. Commel 1600. The Oxford catalogue does not mention this treatiſe; but we find it in a Panegyric, Henrico IV Galliarum Regi dictus, printed at Paris in 1594, and an Admonitio ad Jac. Peletarium de augulo contactus, printed at Paris 1581.

MONARDES (NICHOLAS) a Phyſician of Seville, flouriſhed in the XVIth century, and came into great reputation by his practice (a), and by the books he publiſhed [A]. Some think he died in the year 1588. But it is more probable he died in (a) See the remark.

[A] He acquired a great reputation . . . . by the books he publiſhed.] The book intituled De ſecanda vena in pleuritide inter Græcos & Arabes Concordia, was printed at Seville in the year 1539 in 4to. His treatiſe De roſa & partibus ejus; de ſucci roſarum temperatura; de roſis perſicis ſeu Alexandrinis; de malis, citris, aurantiis, & limoniis, was printed at Antwerp in the year 1565, in 8vo (1). The Spaniſh book wherein he explained the virtues of American drugs: de las drogas de las Indias, was extreamly uſeful to mankind, for it contained remedies for many diſeaſes. It alſo got Monardes a deal of glory. Let us hear what he ſays upon it. Quæ (prima pars) ſuperioribus annis tam felicibus auſpiciis in publicum prodiit, ut inde hominum vita tot morborum periculis objecta multiplicia eademque præſentanea remedia ſibi paraverit, atque ego bonorum judicio non mediocrem eruditionis & diligentiæ laudem reportaverim (2). Thus he ſpeaks concerning the firſt part of this work in an Epiſtle dedicatory to Pope Gregory XIII (3). He adds, that the deſire of promoting the public good, weighed much more with him, than the applauſes he received in compoſing a ſecond part, and he obſerves that it was of vaſt ſervice to the public. Poſtea non tam auræ popularis (quamquam ea ſecundiſſime afflabat) ſuavitate illectus, quam communis utilitatis amore commotus alterum ejuſdem argumenti Syntagma concinnavi: in quo innumera medicamenta quæ hactenus intra naturæ arcana delituerant, magno humanæ ſalutis emolumento in lucem produxi (4). Note, that before he publiſhed any thing on this ſubject, he was acquainted by a long experience with the ſovereign virtues of the American medicines. Quum rerum medicinalium ab occidentali uſque India, ad nos convectarum utilitates adeo mirabiles ut ægrotos quamplurimos pæne jam deploratos ſanaverint, aſſidua medendi periclitatione atque longinqui temporis uſu percepiſſem; eas res . . . . via ac ratione tractare conſtitui (5). Obſerve alſo, that Don Nicolas Antonio ought to have told us, that the two firſt parts of this work were printed one after another. This he did not know; for he would have us believe they were publiſhed both together, and that the firſt edition was in the year 1569 in 8vo. De las drogas de las Indias, ſays he (6), duobus tomis, qui primum editi ſunt ab authore anno 1569. What he adds is not more exact, 'Poſtea adjuncto tertio, unum 'ex tribus majoris formæ volumen publicavit anno '1580, 4to. - - - - Afterwards having added a third,

(1) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Script. Hiſpan. Tom. ii, pag. 122.

(2) Nicol. Monardes, Epiſt. Dedicat.

(3) It is before the edition of Seville, 1574.

(4) Id. ib.

(5) Id. ib.

(6) Nicol. Anton. ubi ſupra.

l 5

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(f) Nicol. Antonius, in Biblioth. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. ii, pag. 122.

in 1578 (b). We ſhall ſhew in the remark, that the editions of his books have not been rightly told by Don Nicholas Antonio.

'he publiſhed one of the three volumes in a larger ſize, in the year 1580, in 4to.' It is certain that the third part was printed, with the two others in 4to, in 1574, at Seville, by Alonzo Eſcrivano. I have this edition: it is dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII. And it was to oblige this Pope, that the author publiſhed it in this manner. 'Quæ meorum ſtudiorum monumenta quum 'ejuſcemodi Genium habuerint, ut ſanctitati tuæ ſum- 'me placuerint, eaque Romam ex ultima Hiſpania de- 'ferenda curaveris, operæ pretium me tibi facturum 'exiſtimavi, ſi utramque hujus operis partem conjun- 'gerem, ac nunc primum tua potiſſimum cauſſa ter- 'tiam adjicerem (7). - - - - Since the fruits of my ſtudies (7) Nicol. Monardus, ubi ſupra. 'are of ſuch a nature as to pleaſe your Holineſs, and 'that you cauſed them to be brought to Rome from 'the remoteſt part of Spain, I thought it would oblige 'you, if I ſhould join both parts of this work together, 'and now for the firſt time add a third, chiefly on 'your account.' He added to it three dialogues; the firſt, de la piedra Bezaar, y de la yerva Eſcuerçonera: The ſecond, de la nieve y del bever frio: The third, de las grandezas del Hierro, y de ſus virtudes medicinales. The two firſt had been publiſhed before (8), but not the third. Nicolas Antonio did not know of any other edition of the third than that of the year 1580. All theſe Spaniſh works of our Monardes have been tranſlated into Latin by Cluſius, and into Italian by Annibal Brigantus. The ſame Cluſius hath alſo tranſlated into Latin Monardes's three books, De varios ſeceretos y experiencias de Medicina. Thoſe of American drugs were tranſlated into Engliſh by I know not whom, and into French by Anthony Colin, ſworn Apothecary to the town of Lyons. The Lindenius renovatus does not mark the year of any Spaniſh edition.

(8) That De la piedra Bezaar, &c, at Seville, 1569, in 8*vo: that* De la nieve, &c, at Seville, 1571, in 8*vo.* Nicol. Anton. ubi ſupra.

MONIMA, wife to Mithridates, ſmote the heart of this prince from the firſt moment he ſaw her. It was in the town of Stratonicea, ſoon after the great advantages obtained by him over the Roman Generals Oppius, Manius, &c. He thought this young woman ſo handſome, that he ſecured her perſon, and put her into his ſeraglio (a). Others ſay, that ſhe was of Miletus, and that Mithridates never could obtain the laſt favour, but by taking the fair way, that is, by marrying her. He attacked her by ſtrong ſollicitations; he made her a preſent at one time of fifteen thouſand crowns, but all in vain, he was forced to come to a marriage contract; nor would ſhe ever bed with him, till he had fairly ſigned it, and adorned her with the royal diadem and title of Queen (b) [A]. This conduct made her famous throughout all Greece. Her condition after all was nothing but meer ſhew; the ſolid part of happineſs was wanting. The poor Monima often regretted her native country and made a ſad end [B]; for Mithridates being overcome by Lucullus, and fearing leſt his wives, ſhould fall into the hands of the enemy, ordered them all to be put to death. He had given the government of Epheſus to Philopœmen Monima's father (c). It cannot be doubted but that his paſſion for this beautiful perſon was conſtant; ſeeing after his death there were found amongſt his papers ſome wanton letters which had paſſed between them (d).

(a) Appian. in Mithridaticis, pag. m. 123.

(b) Plutarch. in Lucul. pag. 503. A.

(c) Appian, ubi ſupra, pag. 134.

(d) Plut. in Pompejo, pag. 639.

[A] Mithridates . . . . did not lie with her . . . . till he had adorned her . . . . . with the title of Queen.] Ταύτης ὁ πλεῖστος ἦν λόγος ἐν τοῖς Ἕλλησιν ὅτι τῆ Βασιλέως πειρῶντος αὐτὴν. καὶ μυρίας πενταπισχιλίας χρυσοῦς προπέμψαντος, ἀνέσχεε, μέχρις ὁ γάμων ἐγένοντο συνθῆκαι καὶ διάδημα πέμψας αὐτῆ, βασίλισσαν ἀνεγόρευσεν. Erat hujus celebre inter Græcos nomen, quod quum eam Rex attentaret, & quindecim millia aureorum miſiſſet, eatenus fuerit reniſa, dum ſponſaliis factis miſſoque diademate appellavit reginam (1).

(1) Plutarch. in Luculio, pag. 503, A.

[B] The ſolid part of happineſs was wanting: ſhe regretted . . . . her native country, and made a ſad end.] All this Plutarch tells us in the place, where he relates how Mithridates, flying from Lucullus, ſent Bacchides, one of his eunuchs, to his ſiſters and wives, with orders to put them to death. 'The poor lady, 'ſays he (2), ſpeaking of our Monima, ever ſince this 'barbarous king had married her, lived in great diſ- 'content, continually deploring her unfortunate beau- 'ty, which inſtead of a huſband, had procured her a 'maſter, and inſtead of that conjugal ſociety, which 'was befitting a lady of honour, had given her a 'guard and garriſon of Barbarians, who kept her as 'a priſoner, far from the ſweet country of Greece, in 'a place where ſhe had only the dream and ſhadow 'of the happineſs ſhe hoped for; and, on the con- 'trary, had really loſt the ſubſtance, which before 'ſhe enjoyed in her native country: and when this 'Bacchilides came to them, and had laid before them 'the king's command, that they might chuſe that 'way of dying, which each thought the eaſieſt, and 'leaſt painful, ſhe ſnatched her royal diadem off 'her head, and tying it about her neck, hanged her ſelf 'therewith; but the wreath not being ſtrong enough, 'immediately broke, whereupon ſhe cried out, O! 'curſed and unfortunate ſtring, wilt thou not do me, at 'leaſt, this one ſad piece of ſervice? At which words, 'ſhe threw it upon the ground, and ſpit upon it, and 'then ſtretched out her fine neck that Bacchilides 'might cut her throat.'

(2) Id. ib.

(a) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 729.

MONIN (JOHN EDWARD DU) a native of Guy, in the county of Burgundy (a), publiſhed a great many Poems [A], in the reign of Henry III. He has been placed in the catalogue of extraordinary wits [B]. He was killed at twenty ſix years of age (b). It

(b) See the remark [B].

[A] He publiſhed a great many Poems.] Here is the catalogue of them, as we find it in Du Verdier's Bibliotheque (1): 'A Philoſophical compariſon of the 'ſun and moon with our ſoul and intellect, according 'to Merc. Triſmegiſtus, and ſome Platoniſts. Toge- 'ther with ſome Poetical diſcourſes and ſonnets; the 'whole printed at the end of the Latin verſion he 'has made of the Week of William de Saluſte, Sieur 'du Bartas, which he intituled, Ber ſithias ſive mun- 'di creatio, publiſhed at Paris in 8vo, by Hilary le 'Bouc, 1579. The new works of John Edward du 'Monyn, Philoſophical Poet, containing Diſcourſes, 'Hymns, Odes, Amours, Counter-amours, Eclogues, 'Elegies, Anagrams, and Epigrams, printed at Paris 'in 12mo, by John Parent in 1582. Uranologia, 'or the Heavens; containing, beſides the ordinary 'doctrine of the ſphere, ſeveral fine diſcourſes, printed 'at Paris in 12mo, by William Julian, 1583. Miſ- 'cellaneorum Poeticorum libri. Pariſiis 8vo.' Claude du Verdier (2), ſon to him who has furniſhed me with this paſſage, has cenſured our du Monin in ſeveral things, and Father Leſcalopier obſerves, with reſpect to du Bartas's Latin tranſlation, 'Moninus . . . nimis 'incultus Poëta viſus eſt, interpreſque parum fidus (3). 'Monin - - - ſeems to be a very unpoliſhed Poet, and an 'unfaithful tranſlator.'

(1) Du Verdier, pag. 729.

(2) See his book intituled, In Autores pene omnes, antiquos potiſſimum, Cenſio.

(3) Leſcalop. in Cicer. de Natur. Deorum, pag. 236.

[B] He has been placed in the catalogue of extraordinary wits.] Gabriel Naudé deſigning to prove (4) that Picus, count of Mirandola, was not the only perſon who had made a prodigious progreſs in learning in his youth, ſays, (5) that Paul de la Scala maintained in the year 1553 at Bologne, one thouſand five hundred forty-three concluſions

(4) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 499. See alſo his Syntagma de Studio liberali, pag. m. 87, and his Dialogue of Maſcurat, pag. 468.

(5) Ib. p. 503.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It is said, that du Perron was accused of being an accomplice in his murther [C], and that he was forced to sue for his pardon. I think d'Aubigné has been guilty of an anachronism in speaking of du Monin [D].

conclusions upon all sorts of subjects, and this before he had attained to the age of two and twenty years. He produces afterwards the examples of Postel, Gesner, Erasmus, Agrippa, and Maldonat, 'and last of all, 'that of this Edward du Monin, who, we may say, 'was compounded only of fire and spirit, since he 'had acquired before the twenty-sixth year of his 'age, in which he was killed, the knowledge of the 'Italian, Spanish, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, tongues, 'and of Philosophy, Physic, Mathematics, and Divini-'ty, with such facility in the Poetry of all these 'languages, that he translated into Latin verse du Bar-'tas's work of the Creation, in less than fifty days, 'and saw printed before his death five or six con-'siderable volumes of his Poems, which were high-'ly commended by the finest wits of the last age, 'Fumeus, du Perron, Goulu, Auratus, Morel, Baif, and 'du Bartas.'

[C] Du Perron was accused of being an accomplice in this murther.] This I find in a book of Gisbert Voëtius, in the place where he relates the progress of cardinal du Perron's fortune. 'Perronus, says he (6), si 'cum illo (Plesseo Mornæo) comparetur, quis qua-'lisve fuerit, judicent illi qui virum propius norunt; 'Ministri reformati filium fuisse constat, cui nomen 'Perroni fuit inditum à vico ejusdem nominis in quo 'Genevæ habitaverat pater, priusquam in Norman-'diam veniret. A patre initio fuisse educatum in spem 'Ministerii, sed à D. de Matignon, cui carmina quæ-'dam obtulerat inductum fuisse ut Lutetiam se confer-'ret, ubi fortunæ lautioris poëtæ spes esset sub Hen-'rico III ibi innotuisse, & cum aliis nonnullis postu-'latum fuisse cædis Eduardi du Monin, etiam poëtæ, 'qui versibus suis eum perstrinxerat, adeo ut literas 'gratiæ, quas vocant, à Rege obtinuerit; cui a lectio-'nibus fuit, donec oratione apud eum habita, qua pro-'babat Deum esse, (7) obtulit se die sequenti contra-'rium probaturum, si Regi adlubescret. Quam ob 'caussam jussus aula excedere, paulatim tamen se non-'nullis insinuavit, maxime Cardinali Vindocinensi. Et 'tandem se immiscuit iis qui Regem Henricum IV ad 'religionis mutationem pertraxerunt, unde ei ad Epis-'copatum primo, deinde ad Cardinalatum patuit via. '---- *Who or what sort of man Du Perron was, if 'compared with Du Plessis Mornai, let those judge who 'knew him best: it is certain, he was the son of a Re-'formed minister, and had the name of Du Perron 'given him from a street so called at Geneva, where his 'father had lived, before he went into Normandy. That 'he was at first educated by his father, with a view to 'the ministry, but was persuaded by Mr de Matignon, to 'whom he had presented some verses, to go to Paris, 'where a Poet might hope to advance his fortune under Hen-'ry III; that there he became noted, and with some 'others was accused of murdering Edward du Monin, who 'was also a Poet, and had handled him severely in his 'poems, so that he was obliged to get letters of pardon, 'as they call them, from the king; to whom he used to 'read lectures, till one day after he had made a speech 'before him, in which he proved there was a GOD; 'he offered, if the king pleased, to prove the contrary 'the next day. For which reason he was ordered to 'leave the court; however, by degrees, he insinuated 'himself into the favour of some, and particularly the 'cardinal de Vendosme. And at last joined himself to 'those who induced king Henry IV to change his re-'ligion, by which means he came first to be made a 'bishop, and afterwards a cardinal.' Note, that he cites no body, and yet he was very fond of making citations.

(6) Gisbert Voëtius, Desper. Causa Papatus, pag. 677, 678.

(7) See the Journal of Henry III, ad diem 25 Nov. 1583, and the Epistle Dedicatory to the Confession of Sancy.

[D] I think d'Aubigné has been guilty of an anachronism in speaking of du Monin.] He says (8), that du Monin, whom the king named the Poet of the Light Horse, played a lady a malicious trick, who had desired him to write an elegy upon the disturbance the coaches caused in the streets. He excused himself, and telling her, He was going to Lyons, concealing that he was going to surrender himself to the duke of Savoy (9), she desired him to get her a suit of tapestry wove in emblems. He discharged his commission, and got her a set representing four triumphs, each of which consisted of three pieces; the first was the triumph of impiety; the second of ignorance; the third of cowardice; the fourth of beggery (10). The embroidery of the grotesque work, adds the author, is a writing in cypher, which no body understood: But du Monin, who having nothing more to fear, since he had passed the mount du Chat, sent the explication and account of it all at length to the little knight.' The lady, whom d'Aubigné designed to ridicule, is doubtless the Sieur de la Verenne's wife, he supposes she had told du Monin, that the king had taken from Madam a suit of tapestry, worth a hundred and fifty thousand crowns, to give it the duchess, and that it would be more becoming his majesty, now she was dead, to make a present of it to Monsieur (11), than to make himself the heir of the deceased. The duchess here mentioned is Gabriela d'Estrée, mistress to Henry IV, who died in the year 1599. D'Aubigné must therefore imagine, that du Monin was alive that year. But how can this hypothesis be reconciled with what we have seen above (12), that he was killed in the reign of Henry III, at twenty-six (13) years of age, and that his chief works were printed before the year 1584 (14)? He was still living that year, as la Croix du Main assures us (15). Either d'Aubigné perplexes and confounds times, or else he speaks of another du Monin.

(8) D'Aubigné, in the fourth book of the baron de Feneste, cap. xvi, pag. m. 285.

(9) Ibid. pag. 286.

(10) Ibid. pag. 288.

(11) We are by this word to understand the husband of the lady who spoke to Du Monin.

(12) In the remark [C].

(13) In the remark [B].

(14) In the remark [A].

(15) Pag. 221, of his Bibliotheque.

MONSERRAT MONTANNES (MICHAEL) lived in the XVIIth century. He was a Spaniard, who forsook the church of Rome to go over to the Protestant communion, and published some small pieces of controversy. I have seen one of them (a), intituled Aviso sobre los Abusos de la Iglesia Romana. He shews in it that he had read the Scripture much, for he cites it at every turn. He concludes his book by exhorting his nation to convert themselves, by describing the disorders which the vows of celibacy caused in Spain [A]. He observes, among other things, that the confessors allow the Nuns a most criminal remedy for incontinence, when they declare they burn (b). All this is followed by a great number of scripture passages in praise of marriage. He had printed another tract in the year 1631 (c).

(a) Printed at the Hague in 1633, it was approved by Henry Arnold minister of Delft.

(b) Y a las encerradas Monias, sus Confessores les conseden que tengan su viril de barro para sus concupicentias por que dizen que se queman, y assi las remediam con este grand pecado. Aviso, &c. pag. 126.

(c) At the Hague, with the approbation of the same Arnold. It is written in Spanish with this title, That the Pope is Anti-Christ.

[A] He describes the disorders which the vows of celibacy caused in Spain.] He affirms, that the secular and regular clergy walk abroad well armed, and fight so desperately when they are attacked, that the officers of Justice are afraid of them. Quanto al voto, bien sabeys lo que los religiozos y clerigos hazen, que salen de sus casas con espada y broquel, que la misma justicia y corxetes temen de encontranse con ellos, por que dan golpes dezatinados por causa del gran ardor libidinoso, y tambien por no ser presos y conocidos. Y muchos Canonigos, por mas modestia, se van a los partidos, despues de los maytines a purgarse con las rameras, para poder dormir. Los demas de la Clerecia tienen sus desguaceros y concubinas y muchos hijos dellas (1).

(1) Monserrate Montannes, pag. 126. I copy him word for word, and the very errors of the press, that may be in it.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MONSTRELET (ENGUERRAND DE) author of a Chronicle of France, which has often been printed [A], and which reaches from the year 1400 to 1467, lived in the XVth century. He deſcended from a noble and ancient Family (a), and was governor of the town of Cambray. As that town ſtood neuter betwixt the French, the Engliſh, and Burgundians, he enjoyed all the repoſe that an Hiſtorian could deſire, and the opportunity of hearing the relations of all ſides. Some ſay, that he wrote with the more fidelity, as he was in a place, where nothing obliged him to ſeek the friendſhip of one party, or fear the hatred of the other (b); but it is more certain, that he ſhewed himſelf a little too partial to the houſe of Burgundy [B]. He kept a correſpondence with the heralds, with the agents, and with other perſons, that were conſiderable for their ſtation, and helped out his intelligence by the publick reports (c). He has enriched his Hiſtory with edicts, the letters of kings and princes, remarkable ſayings, articles of peace, and of truces, capitulations of towns, challenges, ſummons, &c (d). I do not know the year of his birth, nor that of his death.

(a) Bullart, Academ. des Sciens Tom. i, pag. 129.

(b) Id. ib.

(c) Id. ib.

(d) Id. ib.

[A] His Chronicle has often been printed (a).] I know no older edition than that of the year 1512 at Paris (1). There was another in the ſame city in the year 1572. The latter was reviſed and corrected by the copy in the king's library (2). Du Cheſne ſpeaks of an edition of Paris 1603 (3). Add to theſe the edition of the Louvre.

(1) La Croix du Maine, pag. 75.

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 277.

(3) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. des Hiſtor. de France, pag. m. 50.

[(§ a) Monſtrelet paſſes for an injudicious Hiſtorian, and Rabelais, L. III. Ch. xxiv, cenſures him as an idle talker, who, in the very beginning of his hiſtory, had tranſgreſſed the rules preſcribed to Hiſtorians by Lucian. As for the reſt, of all the editions of Monſtrelet, thoſe wherein Dennis Sauvage had a hand are the worſt, becauſe of the liberty he took in changing many words and phraſes, whereof he has not always given the ſenſe. At the end of theſe interpolated editions, are ſome additions, printed under the title of a Continuation of Monſtrelet. REM. CRIT.]

[B] He ſhewed himſelf a little too partial to the houſe of Burgundy.] Spondanus calls him Burgundi fautorem (4), a favourer of the houſe of Burgundy; tho' in another place (5) he owns he is a ſincere writer, and very exact in ſetting down the times. La Popeliniere makes him ſuſpected, for thus he ſpeaks: Enguerrand de Monſtrelet collecting the moſt notable tranſactions in France after Froiſſard, has hardly ſhewn himſelf a better or more judicious writer, tho' ſomewhat truer, and leſs paſſionate (6). As he had juſt accuſed Froiſſard of extreme partiality for the Engliſh againſt the French, he does not pretend that we ſhould reckon Monſtrelet very impartial. An Hiſtorian who is ſomewhat leſs prepoſſeſſed than another who is ſo to exceſs, is none of the faithfulleſt. He adds, that Monſtrelet continued his hiſtory to Lewis XII, and places him in the year 1500. I believe he is miſtaken as to this laſt date; and I am ſure, that Monſtrelet's Chronicle is not carried further down than the five or ſix firſt years of the reign of Lewis XI, for it ends at the funeral of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy. La Popeliniere made uſe of an edition, to which the Bookſellers had added ſupplements, as far as Lewis XII. This was the occaſion of his error.

(4) Spondan. ad ann. 1415. num. 32, pag. m. 753.

(5) Id. ad ann. 1467, num. 2.

(6) La Popeliniere, Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, livr. viii, pag. 435.

MONTAIGU (JOHN DE) high-ſteward of France under Charles VI, had the misfortune to diſpleaſe the duke of Burgundy, who abuſed the authority he had obtained in the kingdom to ſuch a degree of violence, that he cauſed him to be beheaded the ſeventeenth of October 1409 (a). Some ſay, that the memory of this high-ſteward was juſtified three years after [A], when the power of his oppreſſor was at an end, and that his bones were honourably interred by a public order. Francis I. made a reflexion upon this, which gave occaſion to a very judicious anſwer. We ſhall ſee it below [B]. Conſult the Continuation of the Menagiana (b).

(a) And not the ſeventh of October 1408, as Moreri affirms. According to him this man had been arreſted, tried, put to the queſtion, ſentenced to loſe his head, and actually beheaded all in one day.

(b) Pag. 87, 88, Edit. of Holl.

[A] Some ſay, that his memory . . . . . was juſtified three years after.] Mr Menage denies it: theſe are his words which are full of curious particulars: ‘ (1) James ‘ du Breuil, in his Paris Antiquities, at the chapter ‘ concerning the foundation of the Celeſtines of Marcoucy, has written that John de Montaigu's corps ‘ was carried to Monfaucon, in a ſack filled with ‘ ſpices; and that all the time it was at Monfaucon, ‘ the celeſtines of Marcoucy daily gave a certain ſum ‘ to the executioner of Paris to look after it, and ‘ that four years after his execution, his memory ‘ having been vindicated at the ſollicitation of Vidame de Laonnois, his ſon, ſon-in-law to the conſtable d'Albret, his eſtate was reſtored to his heirs. ‘ It is true, the body of John de Montaigu was ‘ taken down from the gallows the twenty-ſeventh of ‘ September 1412, after it had hung ſome years at Monfaucon. But what du Breuil ſays of the ſack filled ‘ with ſpices, and the executioner's having a charge ‘ of his body, is a fable. Nor is it true, that his ‘ memory had been vindicated. As for his eſtate, ‘ tho' he had been condemned without the knowledge ‘ of Charles VI, yet this prince granted the forfeiture ‘ of it to Lewis duke of Guienne, the dauphin. But ‘ it is certain, (as I have learned from Mr Perron (2), ‘ who has been particularly curious about the life of ‘ John de Montaigu) that his eſtate was at laſt reſtored ‘ to his heirs.’

(1) Menage, Hiſtoire de Sablé, livr. x, chap. v, pag. 271.

(2) He has publiſhed a book intitled, L'Anaſtaſe de Marcouſſy, ou Recherches curieuſes de ſon origine, progrès, & agrandiſſement. Journal des Sçavans, of the thirteenth of June 1695, ſpeaks of it.

[B] Francis I . . . . gave occaſion to a very judicious anſwer.] I will give it in Stephen Paſquier's words. ‘ The ſame king, ſays he, ſpeaking of Francis I (3), paſſing by the Celeſtines of Marcoucy, and aſking ſome ‘ of the Monks within, Who founded that monaſtery? ‘ was anſwered, that it was John de Montaigu, high ſteward of France, in the reign of Charles VI. This lord ‘ had been hanged on a gibbet at Paris, at the inſtance of ‘ the duke of Burgundy, who then domineered over all ‘ France. King Francis, as it was his uſual way, always ‘ to hold ſome profitable, diſcourſe ſaid to the company, that he greatly wondered, how he who had ‘ ſo long governed the king, his maſter, ſhould be ‘ condemned to death; conſidering, that after ſome ‘ years, his bones were honourably interred in this ‘ place, by a decree of juſtice: from whence it was ‘ eaſy to conclude, that the judges had paſſed an unrighteous ſentence. Upon which a monk anſwered the king pretty bluntly, that his majeſty was ‘ in ſome meaſure miſtaken, for the Sieur de Montaigu's trial was not by judges, but by commiſſioners; meaning, in his rough way, that commiſſioners packed to the humour of a lord whoſe power ‘ was then exorbitant, ſeldom preſerved in their judgments the conſcience of good judges. Whether this ‘ was ſpoken by the monk from meer ſimplicity, or ‘ an artful deſign, it gave occaſion of laughter, how ‘ much ſoever it ought to have turned to edification: ‘ for, to ſay truth, commiſſioners, tho' they are not ‘ corrupted, yet are ever ſuſpected by all ſober perſons, and moſt people think that ſuch judges are ‘ choſen to the liking of thoſe who cauſe them to be ‘ delegated, only to obtain ſome advantageous decree, ‘ or to execute ſome projected revenge under the maſk ‘ of juſtice. Which the parliament having taken into conſideration, to prevent ſcandal, and the oppreſſion ‘ of the people, which commonly happen on all ſuch ‘ occaſions, upon a preſident's ſpeech in our own ‘ time, it was by a ſolemn oath decreed, that no counſellor of that court ſhould ever accept or act in any ‘ ſuch commiſſion, unleſs all the commiſſioners were ‘ taken from the ſame body, and not picked here ‘ and there out of ſeveral courts. Which however is ‘ not giving the diſeaſe an intire cure, but only ſome ‘ abatement (4). Theſe good conſiderations are but ill ‘ obſerved.

(3) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, livr. vi, chap. viii, pag. m. 471.

(4) See the article GRANDIER, remark [F].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MONTAUBAN, a city of Guienne in Querci, upon the river Tarn, is famous on ſeveral accounts. A Gentleman of note (a) has already communicated to me ſome very good memoirs concerning this town; but as he has given me a promiſe of others much larger, and more exact, I ſhall defer this article, in hopes of putting it one time or other into the beſt condition. I only touch upon one thing, which is ſomewhat extraordinary, it relates to a ſmall book, which the abbot de la Roque has inſerted in his Memoirs of the Church [A].

(a) Mr YSARN, heretofore minister of Montauban, now of Amſterdam. His merit is well known, even by good books publiſhed by him.

[A] A ſmall book, which the abbot de la Roque has inſerted in his Memoirs of the Church.] The title of it is, Montauban juſtified, or an anſwer to the faithful of the P. R. R. who aſk, 1. Whether Salvation may be had in the Roman church. 2. Whether it be lawful for any temporal advantages, and particularly in times of affliction, to change one's religion, by J. D. B. and J. L. J. miniſters of the Holy Goſpel. To ſhew upon what occaſion this work was publiſhed, we muſt know that there happened a popular tumult at Montauban about the year 1661. Soldiers were ſent thither ſome months after, and quartered for the moſt part in the Proteſtants houſes; and as they were ſuffered to commit diſorders, and live at diſcretion, and a great many had billets upon the ſame houſe, their landlords began to apprehend that they ſhould ſoon be reduced to beggary. On the other hand, all the inhabitants who turned Catholics, were eaſed of quartering; which induced a great many burghers of Montauban to embrace this religion (1). This gave occaſion to the book we ſpeak of, wherein the author undertook the apology of the inhabitants, who rather choſe to go to maſs, than to ſee their families ruined. It was eaſy to diſcover in this writing, the trace of a miſſionary's pen; and yet the abbot de la Roque, ſeveral years after, inſerted it intire in his Memoir of the Church (2) as the work of a good Proteſtant. He advances with a moſt egregious confidence, that this book was publiſhed by two miniſters of Upper Guienne, in the face of all their churches, and all their brethren; whilſt none of the party was at the pains to undeceive the public, as to the point which theſe two Divines had advanced, that the Huguenots might without ſcruple of conſcience turn Catholics, &c. With the ſame aſſurance, he affirms that this work pacifyed the troubles and diſturbances in their conſciences and families, when ſeveral inhabitants of Montauban abjured the Proteſtant religion, to be freed from quartering ſoldiers: for which reaſon, adds he, I inſert it intire in my Memoirs, as well becauſe it is a curious piece, as becauſe it is very ſcarce, there being hardly a copy of it to be found. This conduct is the effect either of groſs ignorance, or inexcuſable fraud. No Proteſtant ever took the book of Montauban juſtified to be written by a miniſter. Father Meynier, a great cavilling perſecutor, was ſuſpected to be the author of it; as alſo of an oration, which had been ſpread ſome time before (3), and which Mr Euſtache, miniſter of Montpellier, anſwered by a little book intituled the Orator Tertullus convicted. The ſuſpicion was well grounded; for Alegambe's continuator aſcribes the book we ſpeak of to the Jeſuit Meynier. Could the abbot de la Roque be ignorant of this fact? And were not there ſufficient marks of impoſture in this whole work? As for the reſt, it is ſo full of paſſages of Proteſtant authors, wherein the true church is acknowledged to be diſperſed in ſeveral communions without excepting the Romiſh, that it is ſtrange Mr Nicole ſhould look upon Mr Jurieu's ſyſtem as a new thing.

(1) Moſt of them returned to the Proteſtant religion as ſoon as the ſtorm was over.

(2) Publiſhed at Paris in the year 1690.

(3) It bore the title of Harangue des Sages de la R. P. R. à la Reine. See, above, remark [A], of the article EUSTACHE.

MONTECATINUS (ANTONY) a native of Ferrara, flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He read public lectures upon ſeveral ſubjects in his own country, and afterwards was made firſt profeſſor of Philoſophy there. He was very particularly favoured by Alphonſus II, duke of Ferrara, who deputed him to the courts of Rome and France, and honoured him with ſeveral other employments [A]. He died at Ferrara in 1599, being ſixty three years of age (a). We have ſeveral volumes of his compoſing [B].

(a) Taken from Agoſtino Superbi da Ferrara, pag. 83, 84, dell' Apparato de gli Huomini illuſtri della Citta di Ferrara.

[A] The duke of Ferrara . . . . honoured him with ſeveral . . . . employments.] This is what was put in Montecatinus's epitaph, as it is recited by Agoſtino Superbi (1). 'Alfonſo II Duci ſereniſſimo aures, 'conſilia, operam fideliter præſtitit. Legationes pro 'illo ad Regem Gall. Ad ſummos Pont. perfecit. 'Urbem Regii rexit; non ſemel univerſam ditionem 'Conſiliarius pro dux adminiſtravit. Ferrariæ tribu-'natum geſſit. - - - - He was a faithful confident, coun-'ſellor, and ſervant, to the moſt ſerene duke Alphonſus II. 'He was deputed by him to the court of France and 'Rome. He was governor of the city of Regio, and 'frequently had the whole adminiſtration of affairs un-'der the duke. He was chief magiſtrate of Ferrara.'

(1) In his Apparatus to the Illuſtrious Perſons of Ferrara, pag. 84.

[B] We have ſeveral volumes of his compoſing.] He publiſhed at Ferrara in 1587, a Commentary upon the firſt book of Ariſtotle's Politics. It is one volume in folio, dedicated to cardinal Ruſticucci, and printed by Victorio Baldino, Printer to the duke. At the beginning, there are twenty two tables, containing an analyſis of Ariſtotle's entire work of Politics. He made ſuch another commentary on the ſecond book of the ſame work of Ariſtotle, which was printed at Ferrara by Benedict Mammarellus in the year 1594, in folio with this title, Ariſtotelis Politicorum, hoc eſt, civilium librorum liber ſecundus, ab Antonio Montecatino in Latinam linguam converſus, & partitionibus, reſolutionibus, ſcholiis illuſtratus. He dedicated it to cardinal Peter Aldobrandino, nephew to Thomas Aldobrandino, who tranſlated Diogenes Laërtius; he ſays that a diſcourſe he had had at Rome with this tranſlator, twenty eight years before, determined him to dedicate his book to this young cardinal. The year does not appear in the date of the Epiſtle dedicatory, but doubtleſs we are to underſtand the year 1594. He adds three other treatiſes to this volume, namely, Platonis libri decem de Republica, & Antonii Montecatini in eos partitiones, & quaſi paraphraſis quædam: Platonis libri duodecim de legibus, vel de legumlatione & Epinomis, & leges quæ in libris illis ſparſim ſunt diffuſæ, ab Antonio Montecatino in epitomen & ordinem quemdam redactæ: quinque veterum rerumpublicarum Hippodamiæ, Laconicæ, Creticæ, Carthaginienſis, Athenienſis contra quas Ariſtoteles in poſteriori parte ſecundi politici diſputavit, antiqua fragmenta. His Commentary upon the third book of Ariſtotle's Politics, was printed at Ferarra in the year 1597, in folio, by Victorio Baldino. He had in 1591 printed (2) his Commentary there in octavum librum phyſicæ Ariſtotelis. I do not know the year of the impreſſion of his Commentary in primam partem libri tertii Ariſtotelis de anima. Let us ſee whether Naudé ſpeaks advantageouſly of this author. 'Ad Platonem quod attinit, ſays he '(3), tres, quos noverim, commentatores ſolummodo 'nactus eſt, Antonium nempe Montecatinum qui li-'bros de republica Platonis & Ariſtotelis diexodicis 'notis, tabulis, diſtinctionibus explicare conatus, nun-'quam neque ſibi, neque lectori ſuo ſatisfecit - - - 'As to Plato, there are only three commentators upon 'him, that I know of, viz. Antonius Montecatinus, who, 'by endeavouring to explain the books of Plato's and 'Ariſtotle's Republic, with large notes, tables, and di-'viſions, could never ſatisfy himſelf nor his reader.'

(2) In folio.

(3) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Polit. pag. m. 27.

MONTFLEURI, a famous Comedian, who was for a long time admired on the theatre of the Hôtel of Burgundy, left one ſon, who did not follow the profeſſion of a Comedian, but wrote ſeveral plays which were well received. They were all collected

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google together in the year 1705, twenty years after the death of the author. They are in two volumes, and in number fourteen (a)

(a) Taken from the Mercure Galant, of Aug. 1705, pag. 324.

MONTGAILLARD (BERNARD DE) known by the name of the Little Feuillant [A] in the times of the League, ſon of Bertrand de Percin lord of Montgaillard [B], was born in the year 1563. He became a Feuillant in the year 1579, and immediately fell to preaching, tho' he had not ſtudied Divinity. He preached at Rieux, at Rhodez, and Toulouſe, with ſuch ſucceſs, that theſe words of Scripture were applied to him, bleſſed is the womb that bare thee. The court of France was no leſs charmed with his ſermons, than the province of Languedoc. He went to Paris, when king Henry III invited the order of the Feuillants thither; and had not preached twice, before this prince and the queen-mother appointed him to preach the ſermon at the Auguſtines, the day that the knights of the Holy Ghoſt were inſtalled. He ſucceeded admirably in this ſermon, and came off with no leſs reputation in preaching at the Louvre, and elſe-where; which made the king deſire that he ſhould preach all the Lent, in the royal pariſh of St Germain de Lauxerrois. Theſe ſermons, and thoſe he preached at St Severine, got him the reputation of the moſt famous preacher, that had been known at Paris in the memory of man, ſo many talents he had for the pulpit, and eſpecially for moving and maſtering the paſſions, and ſubduing ſouls. Some devout women, and amongſt others Dame Acarie, choſe him for their only director [C]. He exerciſed ſo many acts of mortification amongſt the Feuillants, that the Pope commanded him to quit that order, to prevent the ſhortning his life. Having eſpouſed the intereſts of the League with too much heat [D], he retired into the Netherlands, where he was in great eſteem. He ſpoke ſome funeral orations (a) by order of the archduke Albert, and afterwards that of this prince in the year 1622 (b). He was then abbot of Orval. He died of a dropſy in that abbey the eighth of June 1628. He had always deſired to be buried under a gutter, and it was only to avoid the charge of (a) That of the archduke Erneſt, brother of the archduke Albert, and that of the empreſs their mother.

(b) The archduke died the thirteenth of July 1621. His funeral was ſolemnized the twelfth of March following; the abbot d'Orval preached the ſermon.

[A] He was known . . . . by the name of the Little Feuillant.] This would induce us to believe, that he was a very little man, and yet he was of a middle ſtature; but the name was given him, when he firſt began to be known at Paris. He was then very little, and tho' he was twenty years old, he had not done growing (1). This name ſtuck by him, even when a riper age had put him out of the number of little men. This account comes to me from the ſame hand which ſent the body of the article, I am indebted for both to the curious and learned author of the notes upon Sancy's Confeſſion, and the Catholicon of Spain.

(1) Compare what has been ſaid in the article MARETS (SAMUEL DES-) remark [A].

(2) The two letters he wrote on that ſubject were inſerted in the Lettre Paſtorale of Mr Juries of the firſt of March 1688. He wrote them to count d'Uſſon (brother of Mr de Bonrepaux, ambaſſador of France, to Denmark and Holland) who commanded the troops in thoſe parts, and who was made lieutenant-general in the year 1696. You will find one of theſe letters, with ſeveral reflexions in praiſe of this prelate's conduct, in the preface to a very good book, which was printed in the year 1689, intituled, L'Impiété des Communions forcées. Mr Le Page, who is the author of it, and who had been minister at Dieppe, died minister of the Walloon church at Rotterdam, the nineteenth of November 1701.

[B] He was ſon of Bertrand de Percin lord of Montgaillard.] And of Antoinette du Vaillet, both of noble and ancient families in the city of Toulouſe. The family of Montgaillard ſtill ſubſiſts in ſplendor. The biſhop of St Pons, ſo well known by his writings, and ſo much eſteemed by the Proteſtants, for his openly diſapproving the violence that was done the Reformed, by forcing them to communicate (2), is of this family.

[C] Some devout women and . . . . Dame Acarie choſe him for their only director.] She was wife to the Sieur Acarie, maſter of accompts. He was called, ironically, the lacquey of the League; becauſe, being lame of a leg, he was one of thoſe who went and came, and beſtirred himſelf with the greateſt zeal for the intereſts of the party; he was the huſband of the Bleſſed Mary of the incarnation, by whoſe good example he profited little (3). The author of the new notes upon the Catholicon, has communicated to me a reflexion he has made. As this furious leaguer's wife, ſays he, was under the direction of the Little Feuillant, ſhe was far from diſapproving the League: It was not therefore on this account, that her huſband profited ill by her example. The better to know this woman, we muſt read what follows: Mary Alais (§ a), this man's wife, was a devotee †, known at preſent by the name of the Bleſſed Mary of the Incarnation: in her widowhood ſhe retired to the houſe of the Beguines, called the chapel of St Avoye; which is a houſe for widows, where ſhe was made ſuperior ‡.' Her Life is printed at Paris by Thierry (4).

(3) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, livr. i, pag. 57. He cites the Notes on the Catholicon; that is, the Notes of the edition of 1677. But theſe Notes ſay only that he was called Lacquey ironically, becauſe he was lame. This is a bad reaſon: what Maimbourg ſupplies is more probable; but he ſhould not have mentioned the circumſtance of lameneſs as one part of the reaſon why he was called Lacquey.

† Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, livr. i, in 1584.

‡ Bonfons, Antiq. of Paris, fol. 165. Edition of 1605. (4) Notes upon the Catholicon, pag. 478, Edit. of Holland 1696.

[(§ a) This paſſage, which concerns me, ought to be rectified, at leaſt with reference to what we read in p. 400 of the Catholicon d'Eſpagne, Edit. of 1699. Dame Acarie and Mary Alais are two very different perſons. REM. CRIT. [of Mr le Duchat.]

[D] Having eſpouſed the intereſts of the League with too much heat.] The author of the Notes upon the Confeſſion of Sancy informs me, that this part of the life of the Little Feuillant is very ſlightly touched, in the book, the extracts of which he has communicated to me. Wretched law of panegyric, which permits the ſuppreſſing the infamy of thoſe who are to be praiſed! but in vain are they ſuppreſſed in this book; they are to be found elſewhere. Here is a paſſage from the Catholicon, where a proceſſion of the League is deſcribed. 'Amongſt others there were ſix Capuchins, having each a helmet on his head, with a plume of feathers on the top, they were dreſſed out in coats of maile, with ſwords by their ſides, girt on over their habits; one carrying a lance, another a croſs, a third a javelin, a fourth an arquebuſs, a fifth a croſs-bow, all covered with ruſt out of a Catholic humility: the reſt had pikes, which they often brandiſhed for want of better paſtime, except one lame Feuillant ‡, who, being armed cap-a-pee, made himſelf way with a back ſword and a battle-ax at his girdle, his breviary ſlung behind him, and drew the eyes of all the ſpectators, whilſt ſtanding on one foot, he flouriſhed his ſword before the ladies (5).' I have put in the margin the note of the edition of 1677. The author of the new Notes has obſerved at the 308th page, that this action of Brother Bernard de Montgaillard is very true, but that it was not done in the proceſſion for the ſtates of the League in 1593, as the author of the Catholicon ſuppoſes, but at the muſter of the Eccleſiaſtics and Monks at the ſiege of Paris in the year 1590. He refers us to Thuanus, whoſe words I am going to cite: 'Omnium oculos in ſe convertebat Bernardus è Foliaceno ordine adhuc juvenis nuper Henrico III Rege concionibus notus apud populum, qui altero pede claudus nuſquam certo loco conſiſtens, ſed huc illuc curſitans, modo in fronte, modo in agminis tergo latum enſem ambabus manibus rotabat, & claudicationis vitium gladiatoria mobilitate emendabat (6). - - - - Bernard, a Feuillant, well known among the people for his ſermons when very young, in the time of Henry III, drew the eyes of all upon himſelf, becauſe, tho' lame of one foot, he was continually running up and down, ſometimes in the front, ſometimes in the rear, and never ſtood ſtill, flouriſhing a back-ſword with both his hands, and reſtifying the defect of lameneſs by the motions of a Gladiator.' Mr Maimbourg

‡ This was brother Bernard, called the Little Feuillant, who afterwards retired into Flanders, where he lived a long time, and enjoyed an abbey.

(5) Catholicon, pag. 15.

(6) Thuan. lib. xcviii, circa fin. pag. m. 359, ad ann. 1590.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of affectation, that he at last consented, that which go from the great dormitory to the chu the great miracles are recounted in it, w him [E]. No body will offer to deny but report [F]: but they affirm that it was all tempt upon the life of Henry the Great (c

(c) Taken from the Memoir communicated to me by the author of Catholicon d'Espagne. He had it from a book, the title whereof he fo Clairevaux: vive representation de la vie exemplaire & religeux trej de l'Abbaye d'Orval, de l'Ordre de Cisteaux, au païs de Luxembourg de l'incomparable Sainct Bernard Abbé de Clairevaux, & du grand L nellemént trois jours durant, en l'Eglise d'Orval les 10, 11, & 1: André Valladier, Docteur en Theologie, Conseiller, Aumosnier, Royale de Sainct Arnould de Metz, de l'Ordre de Sainct Benoist. I

Maimbourg will tell us, what share this Monk had in the horrible crimes of the Leaguers (7): 'The preachers, 'the most famous whereof were the curates Pelletier, 'Boucher, Guincestre, Pigenat, and Aubry, Father 'Bernard de Montgaillard, sirnamed the Little Feuil- 'lant, and the famous Franciscan Feuardent, preach- 'ing in the parishes of Paris, during the festival of 'Christmas, changed their sermons into invectives, a- 'gainst the sacred person of the king, &c. . . . (8). 'The duchess was received at Paris with all imagi- 'nable honour, and an incredible joy of the people, 'who reverenced her as the mother of two holy 'martyrs; and the Little Feuillant preaching * one 'day before her, forgat himself so far, as to say, turn- 'ing about to her, but addressing his words to the 'late duke of Guise, O holy and glorious martyr of God, 'blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that 'thou hast sucked!' Nor was he content to be a trumpe- ter of sedition in the pulpit, but suborned an assassin to murther Henry IV. See the remark [G].

(7) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, livr. iii, pag. 295.

(8) Id. ib. pag. 305.

* Journal de Henri III.

[E] The great miracles are recounted in it, which God had wrought for him and by him.] He was cured twice by a miracle, at the intercession of the Holy Virgin, his protectress. The first of these miracles, 'was wrought at Paris about the year 1589 by Roze 'bishop of Senlis, who, at the sollicitation of the pro- 'vincial of the Jesuits, consented at last to touch this 'man's tongue, whose speech had been taken away 'by a mortal catarrh; so that upon pronouncing the 'word Effata, by the holy Roze, followed with the 'hymn Ave maris stella, sung by Messieurs de 'Mayenne and Nemours, with the Monks of the 'convent, when they came to the words ut vi- 'dentes Jesum, the dying person (for whom the 'prayer Egredere anima Christiana had already been 'said), repeated Jesum, spoke afterwards, and 'preached the Sunday following, the second day after 'the miracle. The other adventure is of the year '1619; at which time F. Bernard being almost given 'over, having had a stoppage of urine for fourteen 'days, the Virgin of Montaigu, to whom nine days 'devotion had been made in his behalf, delivered, 'him of twenty two pounds of water, and a stone, 'which he voided at the same time (9).' Moreover, this Monk's panegyric is stuffed with 'revelations, 'contemplations, and extasies, which were so fre- 'quent with the deceased, that they destroyed his 'appetite for eating and drinking, and he would 'have died of them, if he had not himself prevailed 'with God, that he might be delivered from any 'violent degrees in this kind. . . . . Scarce had he 'expired, when a Dropsy, of which he died, gave 'occasion to a miracle. As he was prodigiously 'swelled up, his body could not be got into the 'leaden coffin designed for him. And, in the mean 'time, whilst they were making it wider, a Monk 'took that opportunity to kiss once more his poor 'abbot: at that moment he perceived to issue from 'the face of the dead, so divine and miraculous an 'odour, that he seemed to him to be perfectly re- 'vived in body and soul. . . . . A Religious of great 'merit and quality, having always had the profoundest 'veneration for the holy abbot, spake to him in his 'sleep, Sure you are happy; to which he answered, 'Yes, I am happy. His panegyrist was besides so 'persuaded, that he had not passed through the fire 'of Purgatory; that, during the three masses, which 'he celebrated to his memory, during the three days 'of his obsequies, it never came once into his thoughts 'to pray to God for his soul (10).' By these samples, the reader may easily judge, that our panegyrist has

(9) From the Memoir communicated by the author of the Notes on the Confession of Sancy.

(10) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google print of him [H]. Nor ought we to forget that Juſtus Lipſius has much extolled this monk's piety and eloquence (d).

(d) See the ſeventy ninth letter of the century of Lipſius. ad Germanos & Gallos.

' after a long impriſonment, he was forbidden, by a ' decree, to come within ten leagues of the king's ' perſon; theſe are horrible deſigns for church-men to ' be guilty of.' This paſſage is found in the 228th leaf of the firſt tome of the Chronologie Novenaire of Peter Victor Cayet, under the year 1589, and was ſhewn me by the author of the new Notes upon the Catholicon. The Little Feuillant's panegyriſt inſiſts but ſlightly on the years of the League: he ſpeaks of them in a rambling manner, and ſhews every thing on the faireſt ſide; he declares in general, that this Monk ' had the glory of being the moſt power- ' ful, the moſt thundering, and zealous, as well as the ' moſt ſincere and diſintereſted inſtrument in bringing ' Henry IV into the pale of the church. It is true, ' he inſinuates, that he was accuſed of being an ac- ' complice in ſome conſpiracies againſt this prince's ' life, but adds, that this prince cleared him by his ' ambaſſadors to Clement VIII, to whom they were ' alſo ordered to ſignify Henry IV's eſteem for Father ' Bernard (12).' This needed a citation of ſome printed book of undoubted authority.

(12) From the Memoir communicated by the author of the Notes on the Confeſſion of Sancy.

[H] We muſt ſay a word or two of a print of him.] ' Our abbot's panegyriſt tells us, that he always lay ' upon a plank, and that a joint-ſtool ſerved him for ' a pillow. But to make himſelf amends, it appears ' he took his eaſe in the day-time; for his print re- ' preſents him ſeated in a fine eaſy-chair, filled with ' a noble cuſhion, which ſeems to be ſtuffed with the ' fineſt downe. Before his eyes is placed a picture ' of the Virgin Mary, to whom the holy abbot ad- ' dreſſes theſe words, which flow from his pen: ' O Domina mea, quid hic facio? educ è carcere ' animam meam, ad confitendum nomini tuo. - - - - ' O my lady, what do I here? bring my ſoul out of ' priſon, that I may confeſs thy name. At a diſtance ' is ſeen a heap of volumes on fire (13), and by the ' ſequel of the book, we find they are the volumes ' compoſed by the Little Feuillant, which this abbot ' himſelf ſet fire to out of humility, upon recover- ' ing from a fit of ſickneſs, ſeeing one of his Monks, ' whom he had commanded to do it, expreſs a re- ' luctance thereto. On one ſide of him is a lamb, ' which the book ſays had appeared to him, after he ' heard a voice, juſt before the raiſing ſome calumnies ' againſt him in Flanders, cry out thrice in one night, ' have a care. At his feet are four mitres, that of ' the biſhopric of Angers, which a little after the ' arrival of the Feuillants at Paris, Henry III of- ' fered him by Meſſ. de Monthelon and Miron, coun- ' ſellors in the court, and which he refuſed; thoſe of ' the biſhopric of Pamiez, and of the famous abbey ' of Marimond, which he alſo refuſed, and even ' employed his intereſt to get them beſtowed on others; ' and that of the abbey of Nizelle, which the arch- ' duke gave him, that he might always be near him, ' but which he kept no longer, than the firſt vacancy ' of the great and opulent abbey of Orval (14).'

(13) The only piece which appeared under his name, is the funeral oration on archduke Albert.

(14) Taken from the Memoir of the author of the Notes upon the Confeſſion de Sancy.

MONT-JOSIEU (a) (LEWIS DE), in Latin Demontjoſius or Demontjoſus, a gentleman of the country of Roüergue in the XVIth century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and publiſhed ſome books [A]. He taught the king's brother (b), and the duke de Joieuſe (c), the Mathematics, and accompained the latter to Rome in the year 1583 (d). He wrote a book there which ſhewed he was an excellent Antiquary [B]. Being returned to France, he applied himſelf to illuſtrate the Mechanics of the ancients, and to render them uſeful to the public. He took upon him to cleanſe the city of Paris from all dirt and naſtineſs; but this undertaking almoſt ruined him. Another misfortune much greater followed it, for he married a very bad wife who was the cauſe of his death. He would have executed many more things than he did, had fortune been more favourable to him. He was of a ſweet and affable temper, and had a genius altogether fit for the liberal arts. This is the elogium Thuanus gives him.

(a) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 806, calls him Montjouziou.

(b) La Croix du Maine, pag. 497.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 296.

(d) Thuan. lib. lxxviii, pag. 478.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books.] We find this liſt of them in Du Verdier Vau-privas (1): Traité des Semaines de Daniel, & des paroles du prophete Ezechiel, printed at Paris in the year 1582. Item, Traité de la nouvelle Coſmographie, in which he ſhews the errors of Aſtronomers as to triplicities and ſigns. Item, two books de la Doctrine de Platon, & de l'Explication des Nombres Platoniques; an excellent and very learned work. He wrote alſo in Latin a moſt uſeful book, De re Nummaria & Ponderibus. Item, les Preceptes de Rhétorique; put exactly in a table, by a ſingular method. There wants in this liſt the chief work of this author; is that which I am going to ſpeak of, and which was not printed till after the Bibliotheque Françoiſe of Du Verdier Vau-privas was publiſhed.

(1) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 806.

[B] ... wrote a book, which ſhewed he was an excellent Antiquary.] This book is intituled, Gallus Romæ Hoſpes, and was printed at Rome, in the year 1585, in 4to, and dedicated to Pope Sixtus V. Thuanus ſpeaks of it thus: ' Ludovicus Demontioſius rara rei antiquariæ ' doctrina inſignis, ... Romæ hoſpes multa ad urbis ' terrarum olim dominæ illuſtrationem, atque interdum ' plura, quam multi Romani Cives, paucorum menſium, ' quo in ea fuit, ſpatio contulit, V Libellis Sixto V in- ' ſcriptis, in quibus de Obeliſcis, Jano Bifronte, Sep- ' tizonio, Pantheo, Symmetria templorum, Caryati- ' dibus, quas Gallus Italos docuit, de Sculptura vete- ' rum, cælatura, Sculptura gemmarum, pictura, foro ' Romano, aliiſque urbis locis non aliis ſcripta, & ' recentiorum pleroſque errores notat (2). - - - Lewis ' de Montjoſieu, famous for his ſingular knowledge in ' antiquities ..... a ſtranger at Rome, has, during the ' ſpace of a few months he was there, contributed much, ' and even more than many Roman citizens, to the illu- ' ſtration of the city which was formerly miſtreſs of the ' world, by the five books he dedicated to Sixtus V, ' wherein he gives an account of what was omitted by ' others, and ſhews moſt of the errors of the Moderns, ' concerning the Obeliſks, Janus Bifrons, Septizonium, ' Pantheon, Symmetry of the Temples, Caryatides, which ' a Frenchman taught the Italians, the Sculpture of the ' Antients, Carving, the Sculpture of Gems, Painting, ' the Forum Romanum, and other places of the city.' There is in this work a treatiſe de Pictura & Sculptura Antiquorum, which was re-printed at Amſterdam in the year 1649, with Vitruvius.

(2) Thuan. lib. lxxviii. pag. m. 478.

MONTMAUR (a) (PETER DE) profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the college royal of Paris, in the reign of Lewis XIII, was reckoned the greateſt paraſite of his time [A], and made himſelf ſo odious to the wits; that they employed againſt him all the

(a) I have found its name ſpelt different ways in printed books, Monmor, Monmaur, Mommaur, Montmor. I have followed that which he himſelf uſed.

[A] He was reckoned the greateſt paraſite of his time.] I will only cite four verſes of Mr Boileau.

Tandis que Pelletier, croté juſqu'à l'échine,
S'en va chercher ſon pain de cuiſine en cuiſine,
Sçavant en ce metier, ſi cher aux beaux Eſprits,
Dont Monmaur autrefois fit leçon dans Paris (1).

While Colletet, a vot'ry of the Nine,
Thinks himſelf happy, if he's ſure to dine.
Thoſe leſſons which at Paris Montmaur read,
Still ſtand him and his brother wits, inſtead,
And get them oft a meal in time of need.

(1) Boileau, Sat. I, ver. 77.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the art and ſtrokes of the moſt virulent ſatire [B]. the Jeſuits of Bourdeaux, (b), and as he had an ex of his progreſs that they prevailed with him to Rome, where he taught Grammar for three ye afterwards diſmiſſed, on account of his weakly at Avignon, and got a great deal of money tha not finding his account at the bar (c), he bet ſhare in the favours which cardinal Richelieu t the moſt childiſh part of that art, I mean anagr [C]. He ſucceeded Goulu in the royal prof Theſe are the true facts I thought I might bo Menage, and intermixed with many ingenious able to diſcover in it his native country, but if we muſt ſuppoſe him born in Querci; this would of his birth [D]. I have read in the Memoirs

(b) Menage, in Vita Gargilii Mamurræ, pag. m. 10.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 11.

(d) Id. ib.

(e) Id. ib. pag. 12.

(f) Id. ib. pag. 15.

(g) Id. ib. pag. 17.

[B] He made himſelf ſo odious to the wits, that they employed againſt him all the ſtrokes of the moſt virulent ſatire.] The commentary on this text ſhall be taken from the Valeſiana. The profeſſor Montmaur loved to live well at another's expence. He was admitted to the houſes of all the great men, who kept open table, by the help of ſome Greek and Latin ſentences, the coin in which he always paid for his ordinary. After he had eat and drank plentifully, to divert his hoſts, he fell to ſlandering all the learned both living and dead, and not one of them could eſcape his laſh. Moſt of the learned thought themſelves obliged to ſet him forth as he deſerved, and to do him juſtice. Mr Menage was the firſt who ſounded, as I may ſay, the alarm againſt him. He compoſed his life in Latin, and at the end of this piece, in a ſmall epigram of five verſes (2), he exhorted all the learned to take arms againſt this common enemy. I (3) was not willing to be one of the laſt, that ſhould engage in ſo pleaſant a war; I printed two Latin pieces of this profeſſor, one in proſe, and the other in verſe, with notes: and tho' theſe two pieces together contain but eight pages, I divided them into two tomes. I added afterwards his life, written by Mr Menage, and all the Latin and French verſes I could collect from ſeveral hands, to which I joined ſome Latin epigrams, that I had made upon him. As every one took fictitious names, I did the like, taking that of Quintus Januarius Fronto, Theſe three names fitted me perfectly well; Quintus, becauſe I was the fifth brother; Januarius, becauſe I was born in January; and Fronto, becauſe I have a large and high forehead. This book was printed at Paris, in 1643, in 4to, with this title, Petri Monmauri Græcarum Literarum Profeſſoris Regii Opera in duos Tomos diviſa, iterùm edita & notis nunc primùm illuſtrata à Quinto Januario Frontone. It is very ſcarce (4).

(2) You will find it below, in remark [I].

(3) That is to ſay, Hadrian de Valois.

(4) Valeſiana, pag. 36. & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

As ſcarce as it is, I have ſeen one copy of it. Mr Simon de Valhebert (5) did me the favour to ſend it me. The ridicule, to which poor Montmaur was expoſed, would touch the moſt ſtupid. For they give as the firſt tome of his works, a piece, intituled, Nemeſis in maledicos calumniatoris Buſbequii Manes, ob convicia ab eo temerè, malignè, falsò, & contra jus gentium Epiſtolæ XLII inſerta adverſus Auguſta Galliæ Parlamenta, which only contains two pages. In this there is nothing but proſe; but the ſecond volume contains a mixture of proſe and verſe. The proſe conſiſts in a letter of three pages, amiciſſimo, doctiſſimo, & ſupra ſæculi fidem & morem candido D. D. Maigne, Ducis Frontiaci μακαρίτυ præceptori. The reſt is of the ſame length, and conſiſts of an elegy, the title whereof is almoſt as long as the piece itſelf; which is this: Epicedion Generoſiſſ. & Illuſtriſſ. Principis Eleonori Aurelianensis Ducis Frontiaci, quem XXXV vulneribus confoſſum in obſidione Montiſpeſſulani fortiter & ſtrenuè dimicantem acerba & immatura mors oppreſſit annos natum XVII, paucis ante diebus quam pax firmaretur. Et matris mæſtiſſimæ Illuſtriſſ. Princip. Annæ Nomparis Calmontiæ Proſopopœia. This had been printed in the year 1622, ten years before the ſhort invective againſt Buſbequius. I have ſeen alſo, by the favour of Mr Simon de Valhebert, a book in 12mo, printed in Germany (6) in the year 1665. It is intituled Epulum paraſiticum, quod eruditi conditores, inſtructoreſque Car. Feramuſius, Ægid. Menagius, Jo. Franciſcus Saracenus, Nic. Rigaltius, & Jo. Lud. Balſacius hilarem epulantibus in modum Macrino Paraſitogram-

(5) Abbé Bignon's library-keeper. See, above, citat. (60), of the article Esop.

(6) At Nuremberg.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he was made tutor to the Mareſchal de Praſlin's eldeſt ſon [E]. I ſhall relate a curious paſſage, which will at once ſhew his own romancing, and the falſity of a ſtory publiſhed againſt him [F]. It may, in my opinion, be ſaid without any danger of miſtake, that this

Tu, MEMMI, decus Aonidum immortale Sororum,
Qui famam ingentem meritis ſuperantibus imples,
Tu deſperatis reſtas ſpes unica rebus.
Et Muſas quòd doctus amas, quòd Pallade Græcâ
Inſignis, mediis clarum caput inſeris aſtris,
Macrinum pateris bonus, & miſereris egeni
Tabentiſque fame, nullo miſerante, Sophiſtæ.
Græca etenim cùm verba ſonat, licet ore Cadurco,
Illa placent, feris didicit quæ Græculus annis.
Ecce tibi properatus adeſt, & Κοίραvε χαῖρε
Ingeminans, menſæ optatum ſortitur honorem (14).

(14) Menagii Miſcellan. pag. 11, 12, libri edititi.

Memmius, immortal honour of the Nine,
Whoſe merit anſwers to thy mighty fame,
Thou art the only refuge in diſtreſs.
Thy love of learning, and thy wiſdom great
Up to the ſkies thy reputation raiſe.
That wretched Sophiſt, poor and hunger-ſtarv'd
Macrin, whom none laments, thy bounty ſhares.
The little Greek, which very late he learnt,
Tho' ſpoke in Querci-tone, gives thee delight.
Here he comes, gingling Κοίραvε χαῖρε
(Your ſervant Sir) and gets an hearty meal.

But the anonymous author of the Hiſtory of the life and death of the great Mogor (15), expreſſes himſelf more clearly, and poſitively affirms, that Montmaur was born at Cahors, and that his mother was a noted proſtitute. I miſtruſted theſe ſatirical writings, and applied my ſelf for better information to Mr Simon de Valhebert, who I thought might have heard Mr Menage mention ſeveral particulars, and might be furniſhed with ſeveral pamphlets about Montmaur at the Abbé Bignon's. He was pleaſed to inform me of this particular, amongſt other things (16), that this profeſſor was a native of the pariſh of Betaille, in the lower Limouſin. I have ſince read a poem of Balzac, which ſhews that the province of Limouſin was his native country.

(15) It is in the collection of Illuſtrat. de Valeſ.

(16) Which he had learned of Mr Baluſe.

Ne jactet nimis Auratum, cunaſque Mureti:
Nobilis hunc quoque tam claris natalibus, aſper
Eduxit pago Lemovix; dein magna Tholoſa
Civem habuit, propriumque tenet nunc maxima rerum, Haud cedens Dominæ formoſa Lutetia Romæ (17).

(17) Balzac, at pag. 162, of the Barbon.

We may obſerve, by the way, that thoſe who have ſatirically written his life, ſend him firſt to Bourdeaux, without mentioning his journey to Toulouſe: But Balzac ſends him directly from Limouſin to Toulouſe, and then to Paris.

[E] He was made tutor to the mareſchal de Praſlin's eldeſt ſon in 1617.] The abbot de Marolles obſerves, that the three ſons of the duke of Nevers, had but 'one tutor called G. G. of Orleans, a man of no ge-'nius, who yet was preferred before many, and a-'mongſt others before Peter Montmaur, ſirnamed 'the Grecian, who ſucceeded the other as tu-'tor to the eldeſt ſon of the mareſchal de Praſlin.' What Mr Menage ſays, that he was ſirnamed the Grecian ironically, is only a ſatirical pleaſantry. Sed quod fidem omnem ſuperat, Græcè tunc neſciebat, GRÆCUS enim ea tempeſtate per antiphraſim, quod minime Græcus eſſet, ab Invidis ac Malevolis vocabatur (18).

(18) Menagius, in Vita Gargilii Mamurræ, pag. 26.

[F] I ſhall relate a paſſage . . . . which will ſhew his own romancing, and the falſity of a ſtory publiſhed againſt him.] I have read this ſtory in a book, ſcarce known out of the country where it was printed. This encourages me to give it entire. There is no need of tranſlating it, it will ſuffice to obſerve on their behalf, who underſtand not Latin, that our Montmaur having told the chancellor, that ſuch and ſuch things were to be found in ſuch and ſuch authors, had the confuſion of not being able to prove it, when the books were laid upon the table. Mommorius Græcarum literarum Profeſſor Regius, ſolus ſui ordinis eques, & apud Urbis Proceres inexhauſtæ dictionis, eruditionis, ac memoriæ, ideoque gratus menſarum aſſecla, coram Illuſtriſſimo Cancellario, (is repente me acciri juſſum, & curru ſuo humaniter acceptum, in villulam amici, paulò ultra ſuburbia, exſpatiatum duxerat) multos authores laudavit, Græcos & Latinos, ad locum quemdam D. Pauli, ubi ad beſtiarios & damnatos alluditur. Ego ſubdubitavi de fide laudantis, alioſque quiderant, in meam ſententiam adduxi, nonniſi conſultis libris ei credendum. Poſtridie, ubi diluxit, ſcripſi ad unum è familiaribus & domeſticis Illuſtriſſimi Cancellarii, me animi causâ, domum veſperi reverſum adiiſſe authores ab eo citatos, nil eorum quæ dixerat, reperiiſſe: Non credideram fore, ut id reſciret Dominus, aut porrò ſuâ curâ dignum duceret. Biduo pòſt ad ſolitum prandium ivit Mommorius, multis jociis ſuper menſam exagitatus eſt, tanquam falſi ſuſpectus, aut planè reus. Illico homo miræ confidentiæ partes agere, velut in ſcena, cavillari, vociferari, vix exſpectare dum è menſa ſurgeretur, appellare ſingulos & univerſos. Præſertim Illuſtriſſimam Matronam, quæ ad latus viri erat, ut, quæ teſtis & conſcia objectorum fuiſſet, ſuo de Accuſatore triumpho intereſſe vellet: & cedo, inquit, libros, Heſychium, Manilii Aſtronomica, Strabonem, alios qui cum ſat citò reperiri non poſſent à novo nomenclatore, quamvis in refertiſſima Bibliotheca, mittitur confeſtim ſervus à pedibus meos poſtulatum, mox etiam currus, qui me adveheret. Adventu meo non parva expectatio omnium, quorſum res evaderet, nam, tametſi hominis hiſtrioniam ſatis intelligebant, ob ingentem tamen fiduciam, vel à me ipſo vera dicere prope credebatur. Itum eſt in cubiculum ſuperius, prolato omni librorum inſtrumento, ſedit Illuſtriſſ. Cancellarius tamquam ſupremus judex, aſſidebant duo Libellorum Supplicum Ex-magiſtri, Conſiſtoriani Comites, aliquot Abbates, & viri honeſti complures utrimque: Totam controverſiam expoſuit diſertè & dilucidè Heros ille maximus, laudatâ nonnihil etiam modeſtiâ meâ, tum juſſit Mommorium ex libris, quorum jam copia fieret, ſuas authoritates petere. Ibi noſter tergiverſari, aliena concionari, verborum diverticula quærere, conceſſo ſemel quod petierat, mox aliud requirens, eas editiones parum commodas cauſari, nec interim de ſententia decedere, nec manus dare; cum urgeretur à Cancellario, nihilominus comperendinationem petere. Seſqui-horam ferme tenuit ea declinatio, donec pronuntiatum eſt, falſi manifeſtum eſſe, & ſoluta riſu concione, Bataviæ Ex-legatus ad ignem, ex tempore hos vernaculos recitavit à ſe factos.

Mommor, c'eſt fait de ta memoire,
Tu bronches ſous le vieux Bourbon,
Tous les Autheurs te font faux-bond,
Si tu n'as recours au Grimoire (19).

Thy mem'ry, Montmaur, is undone,
Thou ſtumbleſt under old Bourbon,
All authors fail, as to quotation,
Without thy book of conjuration.

(19) Nicolaus Borbonius, Epiſtola V ad Claudium Memmium, Avauxiam, pag. 471. It is to be found at the latter end of Charles Ogier's book, intitled, Iter Danicum, Suecicum, Polonicum, printed at Paris 1656, in 8vo.

Nicholas Bourbon's letter, from whence I take this ſtory, is dated the third of November, 1637. The thing happened five or ſix days before (20). Montmaur was not therefore forbid the chancellor's houſe, at the time that his life was ſatirically written by Mr Menage in the year 1636 (21). It is therefore probable, that the words I am going to cite are a pure fiction, or founded on a falſe report. 'Mamurram 'è Convivio propter neſcio quid infandum Magnus 'Nomophylax turpiter ejecit: quo infortunii genere 'acerbius homini Paraſito accidere nullum poteſt. A-'riſtippum quidem Dionyſius olim conſputavit, ac 'poſtremus ut accumberet juſſit: ſed tamen ut accum-'beret juſſit, nec cenâ, ut Mamurra, privatus eſt A 'riſtippus (22). - - - - The great judge turned Mamurra 'ſhamefully from table upon the account of ſome horrible 'thing, I do not know what: than which no kind of diſ-'grace could happen more grievous to the paraſite. Diony-'ſius indeed formerly ſpit in the face of Ariſtippus, and 'ordered him to ſit the loweſt at table; but yet he al-'lowed him to ſit at table, and Ariſtippus was not de-'prived, as Mamurra, of a dinner.' Mr Feramus, who wrote a poem againſt Montmaur, before Mr Menage publiſhed the life of Gargilius Mamurra (23), ſuppoſes in ſeveral places, that the chancellor had forbid this profeſſor his houſe. He expreſſes this admirably well.

(20) Dies erat Simoni & Judæ Apoſt. Sacer. Ibid. pag. 473.

(21) The Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Life of Gargilius Mamurra, is dated from Angers the twentieth of October 1636.

(22) Menagius, ubi ſupra, pag. 22.

(23) This appears from the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Life of Mamurra.

Sed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google this man was not near so contemptible as he is represented. He loved good eating too well, he went to dine with great men oftener than he ought to have done; he talked to them I do not doubt, with too great ostentation; but if his happy memory, if his reading, if his ready wit, had not recommended him [G], would he have had such access to the chancellor, to the president de Mesmes, and to some other persons eminent for their rank, their good judgment and learning? Let us beware how we take the satirical descriptions of his person and actions, for a faithful picture. The best Poets and wits of his time gave each other the word, conspired against him, and endeavoured to outdo one another in turning him into ridicule, so that they have invented numberless untruths of him. We must therefore look on what they have said as pieces of wit, meer romances, and not as an historical narration [H]. Balzac lifted with so much zeal in this kind of crusade, that he vouchsafed to descend from the altitudes of his gravity,

Sed plurimus hæret
Claras ante domos atque alta Palatia magni
SEGUERII, cum fortunæ, fortisque recordans
(Qua licuit quondam divinæ accumbere mensæ)
In vetitas audax irrumpere cogitat ædes.
Ah! quoties votis precibusque, & supplice fletu
Admitti petiit. sed inexorabilis ille
Janitor, Helvetiæ duris de rupibus ortus,
Arcet ab ingressu, prohibetque, & jussa minatur
Verbera, & offensi Domini pro crimine pœnas,
Intentans fustem, sumptamque iratior hastam,
Ni cedat procul & retro vestigia vertat (24).

(24) Miscellan. Menag. pag. 9. libri adoptivi. See also pag. 16, 19.

- - - - But, he oft repairs
Before the gates of great SEQUERIUS' house,
And thinking on the noble cheer, which he
Was wont before to have, intends to rush
Into the house which he had been forbid.
How oft, alas! with humble suits and tears
Did he admittance beg; but all in vain.
The cruel porter, bred of hardest rocks,
Denies access, and threatens him with blows
As he was bid, and to revenge the crime
Of that affront his master had receiv'd.
At last enrag'd, he takes a club and pike
To knock him down, unless he will be gone.

[G] If his happy memory, if his reading, if his ready wit, had not recommended him.] See what Mr Menage was forced to confess: 'Cum felici adeo Mamurra esset 'memoria, ut legentis modo, cuncta quæ olim in 'libris didicerat, posset referre, memorem illum 'convivam MEMMIUS non oderat (25). - - - - As 'Mamurra had such a happy memory, that he could re- 'peat, like one reading, all he had learned formerly in 'books, MEMMIUS did not dislike him for his guest.' In all probability, Montmaur created himself many enemies by the excellence of his memory. It made him bear the sway in all companies, or rather it set him up as a tyrant over them. He who can tell whatever he has read, and assumes magisterial airs, rolling a torrent of literature from his lips, with the greatest ease, silences and stuns other learned men in conversation. They look little and meer dwarfs by him: they cannot hinder his engrossing the whole discourse, nor dare they attempt it: they sometimes suspect he is in the wrong, but have not the assurance to contradict him, distrusting their own memory, and dreading his, even in things, which they fancy he mistakes. We have seen above, that the learned Nicolas Bourbon, though full of doubts as to some citations of Montmaur's, yet durst not attack him, till he had at leisure consulted his library. If you add to this, that Montmaur was apt to slander, and full of vanity, you will easily conceive, that he must needs be hated. A haughty beauty, who obscures and eclipses all others in the circle, is an odious object to the ladies. The learned are little better disposed in like cases. They who saw they were not able to make head against this professor with their tongue, had recourse to the pen, and strove which should defame him most with their writing.

(25) Menag. in Vita Mamurræ, pag. 19. Compare with this the beginning of the passage of Nicolas Bourbon, quoted above, citation (19).

I have heard say, that an advocate, the son of a tipstaff in one of the courts, made an agreement one day with some of his friends, to mortify Montmaur, who was to dine with the president de Mesmes. The conspirators met betimes at the president's. The advocate and his friends had agreed not to let this professor have a word of the discourse, but relieve each other, and the moment one had done speaking, another was to take up the discourse. Montmaur no sooner appeared in the room, but the advocate cried out, war, war. You degenerate mightily, says Montmaur, your father never cried any thing but peace, peace (26). This was a thunder-stroke, that disconcerted the whole plot. The advocate was so dashed, that he had not a word to say all dinner-time. I believe Montmaur by his talkativeness and confidence easily disengaged himself from the snares that were laid for him. I do not know whether it was by accident or design, but as he dined one day with the chancellor Seguier, the servant spilt a dish of soop on him as he was taking it away. He kept his temper to a wonder, and looking at the chancellor (whom he suspected to have been the author of this trick) he told him: Summum jus, summa injura, by which extempore allusion, he turned all the laughter on his own side (27). It was an ingenious turn, but the humour of it cannot be expressed in English. It was a pun, as the chancellor of France is the chief judge, and the word jus in Latin signifies two things, justice and soop.

(26) This is the employment of the tip-staff, while the court sits.

(27) See the continuation of Menagiana, pag. 201, Edit. Hal.

Note, that a great many blamed Mr Menage for composing so satirical a piece upon Montmaur (28); but he excused himself by this among other reasons, that he did not pretend to give the description of any particular parasite, but the character of a parasite in general by touches of invention. This was justifying himself by a lie (29). Non parasitum unum aliquem, non assentatorem, sed omnes parasitos, omnes assentatores sub Mamurræ fictis conquisitisque vitiis deformati personam, describere mihi mens fuit (30). I do not think Mr Menage ever wrote any thing wherein learning, wit, and fineness of language, have been better mixed than in this. Mr Simon de Valhebert writes to me, that he has a piece by him which seemed to be Mr Menage's: It is exactly the style of his Requête des Dictionaries: Written in a hand which he does not know, but with some corrections in Mr Menage's hand, and intituled, The petition of Petrus Montmaur, king's professor in the Greek tongue, to the parliament. It contains above three hundred verses, wherein his History seems to be very well written, and these verses are of the same measure with those of his Requête des Dictionaires. I have observed, that Mr Menage has not espoused the story, which is found in some pieces of the collection de Hadrien de Valois, to wit, that Montmaur gave the porter of the college of Boncour such a stroke over the head with a billet, that the fellow died of it. See the following remark.

(28) Næ igitur in nos iniqui fuere qui hunc nobis de Mamurra ludum .... velut atrox & fastigiosum facinus objecerunt. Menag. sub fin, Epist. Dedicat. Vitæ Mamurræ.

(29) Mr Menage spoke against his conscience; and Mr de Balzac too, when he said in the preface to his Barbon, that the notion he formed to himself was general, and had no particular object... It was a ghost and phantom of my own making, an artificial man that I had formed and organized. And consequently not being of the same species as other men, and not having one relation in the world; no body could interest themselves in it's behalf, nor take offence at it's infamy.

[H] We must look on what they have said as pieces of wit .... and not as an historical narration.] But what shall we say to the fact just before mentioned? One would think the most virulent satirist incapable of publishing such a falshood, as that a man is actually in prison for murder. And yet some of Montmaur's adversaries affirmed, he was imprisoned for a crime of this nature. Did they ground themselves on any reality? It were infinitely more hazardous to affirm than deny it; especially when we take notice, that most of the satirists were silent as to this murder, which yet was the most favourable handle imaginable for rendering Montmaur, as they proposed, the horror and execration of the public. However, let us see the accusation:

(30) Menagius, sub fin. Epist. Dedicat. Vitæ Mamurræ.

Quoy qui ce soit, le Parasite,
Est mieux traité qu'il ne merite:

On

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google gravity, and give his thoughts an air of pleaſantry: which was much a harder taſk upon him, than it would have been for Scarron to write in the ſerious and bombaſt ſtyle. He did more, he ſounded the alarm; he animated his friends to take pen in hand, and to furniſh their quota [I]. It is pretty remarkable, that the members of the Faculty of

On ne luy peut faire d'ennuy;
Metamorphoſer ſa perſonne
En Loup, en Porc, en une Tonne,
C'eſt encor trop d'honneur pour luy.
Qu'il le ſoit en une Marmite,
En Tournebroche ou Leichefrite,
En Perroquet, en un Corbeau;
C'eſt une grace très-viſible
Le bien façonner n'eſt poſſible
Qu'aux pieds delicate d'un Bourreau.
Auſſi ce Meſſer Cicofante,
Pour monſtrer que c'eſt ſon attente,
Fit l'autre jour un joly tour,
Caſſant d'une buſche flottée
La lourde caboche efvantée
Du gros Janitor de Boncour.
Mais ce grand chercheur de lippée
N'euſt pluſtoſt fait cette équipée,
Qu'il ſe vit abſous du peché:
Car il receut telle mornifle
Sur ſon gras muzeau qui renifle,
Que ſon œil en reſta poché.
Et qui pis eſt, Dame Juſtice
Pour chaſtier ſon malefice,
Grippant ce Cuiſtre en triſte arroy,
Les pieds nuds, un torchon en teſte,
Conduiſit cette malle beſte
Dans la noire maiſon du Roy.
Tous ſes compagnons de cuiſine,
Et ceux qui craignent la famine,
S'oppoſent à ſa liberté,
Crians par tout que ſa preſence
Sans doute affamera la France,
Et qu'elle a cauſé la cherté (31).

(31) The hiſtorical Elegy of the Sieur Gomor, in the collection of Hadrian de Valois.

The following Latin is ſuch another quibble (32).

Horatii Gentilis Peruſini in MAMURRAM, ob cæſum ab eo Collegii Harcurtii (33) Janitorem.

(32) In the ſame collection, at the end of the Orbilius Muſca of Serrafin.

(33) According to the preceding paſſage, it ſhould be the college of Boncour, and not Harcourt, as likewiſe according to the author of a Latin Ode to Balzac, which is in the collection of Hadrien de Valois, and which ſays, that Montmaur, guilty of the murder of this porter, eſcaped the gallows only by bribing the judges.

CÆDE nocens, hominiſque reus Mamurra perempti
Emiſſus vinclis eſt, Genovefa, tuis.
Et potuit reperire vades, quia plurima crimen
Elevat hoc ratio, nil graviuſque meret.
Janitor occiſus nimirum haud penditur aſſis,
Nec propter dabitur talio vile caput:
Cumque illi Mamurra petitum ſtipite grandi
Comminuit cerebrum, perdiderat proprium.

On MAMURRA, for killing the porter of the college of Harcourt, by Horatius of Peruſia.

Mamurra's free, who was confin'd
With horrid murder being charg'd.
But he with eaſe could ſureties find
By which he might have been enlarg'd.
For many reaſons at that time
Could be produc'd in his excuſe,
Which did extenuate his crime
Deſerving no ſevere abuſe.
The murder'd porter was not worth,
A pin, nor retaliation,
And when Mamurr his brains daſh'd forth,
He had entirely loſt his own.

[I] Balzac liſted himſelf . . . . was willing . . . . to deſcend from the altitudes of his gravity . . . . and animated his friends to take pen in hand, and to furniſh their quota.] He was not the firſt who preached up this Cruſade: that honour is due to Mamurra's hiſtorian; as we have ſeen above (34). This Hiſtorian concludes his book with an epigram, in which by his exhortations and imprecations, he invites the whole world to come in to the war againſt Montmaur.

Quiſquis legerit hæc, poeta fiat:
Et de Cenipeta mihi jocoſos
Scribat Gargilio repente verſus.
Qui non ſcripſerit, inter eruditos
Inſulſiſſimus ambulet patronos.

Who e're reads this, ſtraight let him be Employ'd in works of Poetry;
Againſt that ſtinking paraſite
Gargilius, let him quickly write.
May he who will not be concern'd
Be reckon'd aſs among the learn'd.

(34) In the remark [B], at the paſſage of the Valeſiana. To which join this paſſage of Furetiere, pag. 101, of the Nouvelle Allegorique: the moſt unhappy of all was Montmort, captain of the Alluſions, and who had alſo a regiment maintained by the Equivokes. He was delivered over to Menage, a ſtrict and ſevere judge, who examined his life from the beginning to the end, and canvaſſed every action. After having convicted him of ſeveral crimes, he condemned him to ſuffer death by poetical arms, being firſt toſſed in a blanket as uſual. He was even the firſt who ſhot at him; afterwards all the reſt of the learned went in file, &c.

Here you ſee the concluſion of the Hiſtory of Mamurra. It may therefore be ſaid with a great deal of reaſon, that Mr Menage rang the alarm-bell, and by another metaphor, that he beat up for volunteers. Mr Balzac failed not to liſt himſelf, and exhort his friends to take up arms. He ſerved both in the infantry and cavalry. The Barbon (35), a work in proſe which he ſent to Mr Menage, was accompanied with two poems, one of which is intituled, Indignatio in Theonem Ludimagiſtrum Ex-Jeſuitam laudatorem ineptiſſimum Eminentiſſimi Cardinalis Valetæ (36); the other is a letter to Mr Boiſrobert, in which he intreats him to attack Montmaur, and to approve his inviting Mr Feramus to the ſame enterprize.

(35) It was printed at Paris in 8vo, in the year 1648.

(36) It is in the collection which Hadrian de Valois, publiſhed in 1643.

Nec ſolum tibi Semidei dicantur, at ipſe
Therſites, ipſe antiquo qui dictus Homero,
Ore animoque canis; pridem cui ſenſus Honeſti eſt,
Extinctuſque in fronte pudor. Fœdiſſima longas
Beſtia det pœnas. Deſcende ad probra Latini
Nominis, ac turpes Mamurra interprete Graios,
Pollutumque notis omni ex Auctore volumen.
Monſtra refer verborum, alio quæ vexit ab orbe, Terribiles Griphos, &c (37).
- - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - -
Hîc docto te Marte potens, Ferrame, vocamus,
Ante alios: (ea vota meo ſint grata Metello)
Cum tot tela volent, tot in unum tela parentur,
Otia agas, tuaque arma neges communibus armis?
Vana pium-ne putet deformi parcere Monſtro,
Relligio? Tu-ne invictos torquebis Iambos
In caput alterius? Vivet-ne obſcœnus amator,
Atque hoſtis Muſarum, omnis temerator Honeſti,
Pindi terta lues? Peſtem tamen ille minorem
Scaligeri Tullique cliens, & Cæſare læſo
Conſpicuus Sæclis, nigro devovit Averno:
Nec tales Verona tulit ſine vindice chartas (38).

(37) Balzac, pag. 160, 161, of the Barbon.

(38) Id. ib. pag. 165.

Not only demigods deſcribe, do thou
Therſites too ſet forth, by Homer call'd
In mouth and mind a dog, and who long ſince
All ſenſe of ſhame and honeſty has loſt.
Let th' filthy beaſt long puniſhment endure,
Deſcend to thoſe, who of the Latin name
The ſcandal are, and to thoſe ſhameful Greeks
Interpreted by Mamurr, and that book.
Which is with notes from every author ſtain'd.
Relate the monſtrous words that he has brought From another world, hideous Gryphi, &c.
- - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - -
Here we, Ferramus, chiefly thee invite, of Arts in the univerſity of Paris, did not come in to the aſſiſtance of their brother Peter Montmaur. It is a ſign he could not gain the love either of the regents of the college, or of the wits. What a ſtrange hurly-burly had there been, if theſe regents had made a counter-league in his favour, and obliged themſelves to bend all their Grammar and Rhetoric, in proſe and verſe, againſt his perſecutors. There were ſome men of merit, who condemned the bitter invectives of the latter. The paſſages I ſhall mention on this head,

In learned war moſt potent (and I pray
This may to my Metellus grateful be)
Whilſt darts ſo many fly, and are prepar'd
Againſt one ſingle foe, can'ſt thou ſit ſtill
And help deny in ſuch a common cauſe?
To ſpare an ugly monſter can'ſt thou think Religion bids? or at another's head
Invincible Iambics wilt thou fling?
A lover vile ſhall we permit to live,
An enemy to virtue, and the muſe,
Peſt of Pindus? And yet a leſſer plague
Verona's Poet to black Avernus damn'd.

Conſidering the methods theſe gentlemen took to ſtrengthen their league, and raiſe the whole poſſe of the Republic of Learning, one would think the queſtion was, not how to make Barbarians raiſe the ſiege of Parnaſſus, when determined to give up the Muſes to the ſoldiers diſcretion; but how to re-take it from theſe uncircumciſed, and reſtore to their liberty the chaſte daughters of memory, detained in the dark dungeons of a ſacrilegious, impure, and abominable, nation.

There were thoſe who cenſured ſomething in theſe verſes of Balzac. They taxed them with inhumanity and obſcurity. The obſcurity conſiſted in the words, which deſign the Poet Catullus. We have ſeen above (39) what Balzac anſwered; and you may ſee in his diſcourſes, his anſwer to the charge of inhumanity. He there ſhews, how unjuſt it is to ſay that he is more inhuman to the new Mamurra, than Catullus was to his enemies. 'I have meant, ſays 'he (40), only a ſimple Poetical curſe, or at 'moſt a ſimple death; for in good Latin to 'devote to Hell, or Avernus, means no more than 'death; and hemlock, a halter, or the ſword, may give 'it. But the vindictive Catullus exceeds theſe com- 'mon puniſhments: he ſpeaks of the greateſt and 'moſt cruel torments: He condemns his bad Poet to 'be burnt alive, as a Sorcerer or Atheiſt.

(39) In the remark [K] of the article CATULLUS.

(40) Balzac, Entret. xvii, pag. m. 204.

Infelicibus uſtulanda flammis.

And lower,

Et vos interea venite in ignem.

Others blamed him for meddling with a kind of compoſition which they did not think him fit for. Conſider, pray, theſe words of Mr Gueret: 'Men have, 'beſides, that diſtempered fancy to pretend to ſucceed 'in every thing: they are not willing to be reckoned 'of a ſtinted genius: as there is hardly any Poet but 'extends his juriſdiction from the epigram up to the 'epic poem, ſo there is no Orator who from pane- 'gyric does not deſcend to the billet-doux .... Scar- 'ron, whom nature had framed intirely burleſque, and 'whoſe mind and body ſeemed deſignedly turned for 'this character, had yet the boldneſs to attempt a 'tragedy, and would doubtleſs have finiſhed it, if 'death had not prevented the temerity of his enter- 'prize: in fine, Balzac himſelf has followed this bad 'example, and not content with the glory of the ſub- 'lime ſtyle, would fain have ſhewn by the Barbon, 'that he was no leſs fit for raillery: but he was much 'miſtaken on this head; the niceſt judges diſapprov- 'ed his taſte, and his Barbon has only ſpoiled his 'other works. Let us always follow our genius, and 'never wander out of our own province, nor envy 'others a glory for which we our ſelves are not for- 'med (41).' Mr de Balzac had received much more agreeable news about his Barbon, for they informed him, that this work met with great ſucceſs, and was admired at Paris. See this beginning of one of his letters to Mr Menage. Bene eſt, abunde eſt, plus ſat eſt etiam mihi. Quæ ſcripſi ego olim, municipalis ille & Orator & Hiſtoricus, probata nuper ſunt Lutetiæ Pariſiorum. In ampliſſimo orbis Terrarum theatro Barbo meus Saltavit & Placuit (42). In my opinion Mr Gueret's judgment is not the moſt equitable. The Barbon I confeſs, is of too ſerious a ſtyle: the raillery has not all that eaſy and gay turn which others would have given it; but his ridicule on pedantry is expreſſed happily and to the life by many ſingular characters.

(41) Gueret, Guerre des Auteurs, pag. m. 137, 138.

(42) Balzac, Epiſt. Select. pag. m. 182.

If any one would ſee an excuſe for the ſharpneſs of Balzac's reſentment, let him conſult Feramus's poem where we may read that Montmaur not only exerciſed his ſlandering faculty againſt the Scaligers, the Salmaſius's, and the Grotius's, but alſo treated Mr de Balzac with the laſt contempt.

Te quoque BALZACI, noſtræ decus addite genti,
Urbe vetat, patriâque jubet torpeſcere villâ,
Indecorem Regique tuo nova condere Regna
Quærere & effecto Virtutes Principe dignas (43).

Thee Balzac too, an honour to our tribe,
From city he debars, and to remain
Stupid in thy own native village bids,
To found new kingdoms for thy king to ſeek
Thoſe virtues, which the fab'lous prince become.

(43) Feramus, apud Menagium in libro adoptivo, pag. 14.

Here you ſee that the affront was perſonal, and that the public cauſe was not the only one he had to defend. I have ſome ſuſpicion, that the paſſage I have cited in the article DESBARREAUX (44) concerns our Montmaur. That would be ſtill a ſtronger proof of the violence of Balzac's reſentment.

(44) Citat. (20).

[K] There were ſome men of merit who condemned the outrages of Montmaur's perſecutors.] Three authorities will ſuffice on this head. I ſhall firſt cite Mr Couſin: 'Amongſt the poems, ſays he (45), that 'Mr Menage compoſed at that time, there were two 'which made a great noiſe. One was the metamor- 'phoſis of the paraſite-Pedant into a parrot. Under 'this name he meant a profeſſor of the Greek tongue, 'againſt whom ſeveral other Poets had bitterly inveigh- 'ed, reviling him in ſport and merriment, with in- 'jurious and inhuman ſatires. The other was the famous Requête des Dictionaries.' Thus he ſpeaks in his pretended elogy of Mr Menage, where you may pleaſe to obſerve, that he ſays nothing of the Life of Mamurra, which is a much more conſiderable work, than the Metamorphoſis he has cited. But I wonder leſs at his ſilence, than at Mr Menage's friends, who have prefixed an abridgment of his Life to the Continuation of the Menagiana. They ſay nothing of this Life of Mamurra.

(45) Journal des Sçavans, of the eleventh of Auguſt 1692, pag. 542, Edit. of Holl.

My ſecond witneſs, his fictitious name, is Vigneul-Marville. We will tranſcribe a part of his diſcourſe (46). 'The profeſſor Montmaur was not ſo deſpicable a 'man as moſt believed him. He was an excellent 'genius, and had great talents. The Greek and La- 'tin tongues were, as it were natural to him. He 'had read all the good authors of antiquity; and 'being favoured by a prodigious memory, joined to 'a great vivacity, he made the juſteſt applications of 'whatever he had obſerved moſt curious. It is true, 'there was generally a touch of ill nature in them, 'which provoked the fury of thoſe who were the 'objects of his wit: by theſe talents he eaſily intro- 'duced himſelf to perſons of quality, who loved the 'recreations of Parnaſſus. His avarice ruined him; 'for he had an eſtate which he made no uſe of; and 'he was too great an admirer of good eating. He 'uſed to tell his friends; gentlemen, do you find diſhes 'and wine, and I will find ſalt. And the truth is, 'he ſcattered it about plentifully, at the good tables 'which (46) Vigneul Marville, Mélange d'Hiſtoire & de Litérature, pag. 86, de la 1 Edit. de Rouen.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

head, contain things that will explain this article. Montmaur lodged in the college of Boncour, and this circumſtance furniſhed matter of raillery [L]. He died in the year 1648

' which he frequented. His ſatirical humour had ' no bounds, he was a Lucian all over. But he ' chiefly exerciſed it upon the bad Poets. . . . . Ne- ' ver were ſo many ſatires in proſe and verſe written ' againſt any one man, as againſt Montmaur. Every ' body ſpent his whole ſtock this way upon him. En- ' tire collections are ſtill extant of them. The beſt ' are thoſe of Mr Menage. Montmaur's friends ad- ' viſed him to print his witiciſms upon theſe trouble- ' ſome writers: but the love of quiet tied up his ' hands, and he was contented to laugh at thoſe tri- ' fles and deſpiſe them. One of his friends having ' told him, that Mr Menage had metamorphoſed him ' into a parrot: very well, ſaid he, I ſhall not want ' wine then to cheer my heart, nor a beak to defend ' me; and as this metamorphoſis was much praiſed, ' no wonder, added he, that ſuch a great prater as ' Mr Menage ſhould make a good parrot. Mont- ' maur took much more to heart Meſſ. Dupuy re- ' fuſing him admittance into their cloſet, which was ' the center of the fineſt gentlemen of Paris. Theſe ' gentlemen, of a gravity like that of Cato, took the ' ſciences by the moſt ſerious handle, and could not ' eaſily bear thoſe who were only (as one may ſay) ' the Punchinello's of learning. They did not un- ' derſtand raillery: It was ſafer committing a ſoleciſm ' in the face of a whole univerſity, than de- ' ſcending to humour and drollery in their pre- ' ſence (47).'

(47) L. ii. pag. 88.

My third witneſs is Vavaſſor. He has not named Montmaur, but deſcribes him in ſo clear a manner, that we may be ſure he is the man he means. He gives him no encomium; he charges him with ſome very great and odious faults; but otherwiſe does him juſtice as to his learning, and condemns not only the authors who ſo virulently abuſed him, but even the magiſtrates who permitted ſuch licentiouſneſs. He afterwards makes a reflexion that is judicious enough; to wit, that by a juſt judgment of GOD it often happens, that princes and their miniſters who neglect to puniſh the boldneſs of ſatiriſts and libellers, are puniſhed ſoon or late for their unconcernedneſs, in the ſame kind, and expoſed to the fury of ſlandrous tongues. I give but a rough draught of this Jeſuit's thoughts. He has very nobly expreſſed them in a work which is hardly now to be met with in the Bookſellers ſhops. And therefore I ſhall be excuſed if I ſet down his own words. Vidimus quemdam nuper non expertem literarum, ſed cui nihil placeret, nec pulcrum videretur, niſi quod eſſet ſuum. Hunc propter ipſius odioſiſſimos mores, nemo tum poeta ſive ſcriptor alius nefas duxit conſcindere omnibus probris. Quanctiam non recte nec ratione, mea quidem ſententia, & peſſimo exemplo. Non enim, ſi dignus is contumelia; perboneſti, graves & literati viri digni tamen, qui contumeliam inferrent. Et erant alioquin in iſto, quæ amare poſſes ſine moribus, memoria, cognitio ſermonis Græci, varietas aliqua doctrinæ & copia; unde diſcerent nonnihil etiam periti, quamvis hominem non probarent. Sed valuit nimirum maledicentia, grata cunctis, etiam iis, qui nequi ſibi maledici, neque maledicere ipſi aliis velint. Atque hanc, ut a me ante dictum eſt, maledicentiam vetant, natura, ratio, mos, diſciplina, jura, leges: ubique gentium ac terrarum, atque in omni memoria pœnæ maledicis graves propoſitæ, crimen tamen impunitum perſæpe & olim fuit, & nunc eſt, & erit, vel veterno & ſocordia, vel prævaricatione eorum, a quibus oporterit pro officio vindicari. Ac multa peccant principes, & in his illud, quod tantam petulantiam, ita ut meretur, quantumque poſſunt, non coerceant, nec populo caveant ſatis, nec privatos conſervent ab injuria. Interim nutu divini numinis & providentia quid ſit? Ne ab iſtis quidem abſtinetur tam lente ferentibus probra in alios: immo linguas hominum magis infeſtas habent, miuſque ſermones effugiunt obtrectatorum: & audire plerumque coguntur ipſi, quæ nolint, quia de aliis patiantur dici, quæ non debeant (48).

(48) Franciſcus Vavaſſor, de Epigrammate, cap. x, pag. 98, 99. This book was printed at Paris in 1672, in 8vo.

Thus I have given you the three authorities I promiſed. If we barely conſider the formal and expreſs declarations, the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur paſſes the ſevereſt ſentence on our gentleman's adverſaries: but if we conſider the force of the expreſſions, Vigneul Marville is the ſevereſt judge, for declaring that Montmaur was an excellent wit, who had read all the good authors of antiquity, and who had great talents, a profound underſtanding of Greek and Latin, a prodigious memory joined with a great vivacity, &c. He charges the ſatires that were made on him, with extream injuſtice. All his conceſſions in favour of Montmaur, are as ſo many ſtrokes with a rod of iron on the heads of theſe ſatiriſts, ſince they all conſpire to make this profeſſor paſs for the moſt ignorant blockhead in nature: and note, that the praiſes he has given him, ought to have the more weight, becauſe he has not concealed his faults. What he obſerves of his inſenſibility is ſurprizing, and I know not what could have been imagined wiſer, than to laugh, as Montmaur did, at the writings of his enemies. But it is prodigious, that a man of ſo much reading, wit, and memory, ſhould write nothing on that occaſion, or hardly ever publiſh a book in all his life. We muſt believe, that the fire of his wit required the preſence of living objects, and that his vaſt memory ſunk in a great meaſure, when he was to compoſe in ſolitude, and in the ſhade of a cloſet (49). We muſt believe I ſay, that Montmaur found by experience, as ſeveral others do, that it is infinitely eaſier to diſcourſe off-hand, than to write a good book. The way to make this profeſſor's knowledge uſeful to the public, would have been to give him a judicious diſciple, who ſhould conſtantly have attended him, and collected whatever he had heard him ſay. In that caſe we ſhould have had a Montmauriana, which perhaps would have been a good book. I believe there were ſome who diſapproved that contempt which our Montmaur expreſſed for the ſatires made upon him, and who could have wiſhed he had demanded juſtice of the courts; for his adverſaries not content to accuſe him of ignorance, and of being a vain trifler in anagrams, and ſilly puns, charges of which the public juſtice takes no cognizance, nihil hæc ad edictum prætoris; reflected on him as a baſtard and murderer, as we have ſeen above (50), and here is a paſſage charging him with forgery and ſodomy.

(49) Compare what has been ſaid above, remark [B] of the article CRE-MONIN.

(50) In the remarks [D] and [H].

J'adis dans un fameux procez,
Dont il eut un honteux ſuccez,
Il appella d'une Sentence,
Qui n'eſpargnoit que la potence,
Quand de tout point il eut eſté
Convaincu d'une fauſſeté:
Car il imitoit de nature
Toute ſorte de ſignature,
Et gagna tout en jugement
Quand il ne tint qu'à ſon ſerment.
Il eut d'autres vices encore
Que je tairay, car je l'honnore.
L'on dit que ſon valet un jour
L'accuſa de la ſale amour,
Imputant à ce Paraſite
Le crime d'eſtre Sodomite (51).

(51) Hiſtoire de la Vie & de la Mort du grand Mogor, pag. 25, 26, in the collection of Hadrian de Valois.

This exceeds raillery: A man is anſwerable for ſuch an accuſation in a court of juſtice. The actio injuriarum lies againſt him in this caſe (52), and the accuſed may plead the law of the Code, ſi quis famoſum, according to which the defamer, who does not produce good proofs, is puniſhed as a ſlanderer.

(52) Compare with this theſe words of Horace, Epiſt. I, ver. 152, lib. ii. Quin etiam lex Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam Deſcribi.

[L] He lodged in the college of Boncour, and this furniſhed matter of raillery.] Let us prove this fact from Mr Menage's Words.

Quâ collis Genovefa tuus ſupereminet Urbem,
Stat Becodina domus, docti celeberrima quondam Atria Gallandi, ſummo Rectore juventæ.
. . . . . .
Quâ exiguo conduxerat ære penates
Gargilius (53).

(53) Menag. Miſcell. pag. 7, 8.

And by theſe fine verſes of Feramus,

Quâ poſuit ſtabiles Pariſina Academia ſedes
In monte excelſo, mons eminet altior, illic

Exiguâ

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1648 [M]. He publiſhed ſomething againſt Buſbequius (b). It is ſaid he had five thouſand livres per ann. and was very covetous (i).

(b) Buſbequium mortuum nec reſponſurum invaſit. - - - He fell upon Buſbequius who was dead and could not anſwer him. Menag. in Vita Mamurræ, pag. 30. See the remark [B]. (i) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 200, Dutch Edit.

Exiguâ parvos habitat mercede penates.
Non illuc ſtudia, & docti vicinia Phœbi
Pellexere hominem, ſed ut hinc toti incubet Urbi,
Majoreſque alto ſpeculetur vertice fumos,
In tua jejunus ruiturus prandia, MEMMI,
Vel famoſa tuæ, BONELLI, fercula menſæ,
Seu veſtras, HANE QUINE, dapes tantâ arte paratas.
Et quicumque alij menſâ præſtatis opimâ
Luculli illuſtres, Mæcenateſque beati (54).

(54) Feramus, in Macrini Paraſitogrammatici ἡμιάρᾳ, init. apud Menagium ibid. in libro adoptivo, pag. 7.

You ſee they pretend that he lodged in this college, the better to diſcover the ſmoke of the kitchens of Paris, it being the higheſt part of the town. But if it was convenient on this ſcore, it was very inconvenient in another reſpect, by being at too great a diſtance from the houſes where the paraſite uſed to dine. This put him to the expence of keeping a horſe. Mr Menage talks very pleaſantly upon it. 'Verum 'cum ſummo in cacumine montis Genovefani tunc 'temporis habitaret, ut hinc ſcilicet culinarum fumos, 'ex quibus auguria captabat, commodius proſpicere 'poſſet; atque adeo horum omnium quos aſſiduè cole- 'bat, ab ejus tugurio domus longè diſtarent: ne ad * Biretus, in Vita Ronſ. 'illorum cœnas ac prandia tardius accederet, Equum 'ſibi comparavit: qui quoniam Becodiana in Schola, '* quam Parnaſum Pariſienſem Ronſardus vocare ſole- (55) Menagius, in Vita Mamurræ, pag. m. 20. 'bat, ſtabulabatur, Pegaſus eſt appellatus; de quo Car- 'men eſt SPESSEI (55). - - - - But as he then lived 'on the top of Mount Genevieve, that from thence he 'might the more conveniently obſerve the ſmoke of the 'kitchens, from which he took his omens: and as the 'houſes he daily frequented were a great way off from 'his own cottage; that he might not come too late to 'dinner or ſupper, he bought an horſe, which being 'ſtabled in the college of Bancour, called by Ronſard 'the Parnaſſus of Paris, was named Pegaſus: where- 'upon SPESSEUS wrote a poem.' The thought in the beginning of this paſſage is pleaſant enough; to wit, that Montmaur, in conſulting the auguries, did not wait for the appearance of vultures, or any other kind of birds, but was attentive to the ſmoak of the kitchens only. He ſhould conſequently have ſaid (56), that Montmaur having an opinion of the augural art, applied himſelf chiefly to Capnomancy (57). Theſe gentlemens raillery is become a common-place to all who would characteriſe a paraſite. A paraſite ſay they, going out of his lodgings, without knowing where he ſhall dine, guides his ſteps through the ſtreets of Paris by the ſmoak of the kitchens, and this ſmoak is his compaſs and polar ſtar, &c.

(56) That is, in the place where Mr Menage gives a liſt of the arts and ſciences which Mamurra had a mind to underſtand.

(57) That is the the art of divination by ſmoke.

[M] Montmaur died in the year 1648.] This I look on as unqueſtionable, though I have not found it in any author, for Mr Simon de Valhebert has been pleaſed to inform me, that he was told ſo by the abbot Gallois, who conſulting the regiſters of the college royal, found that Montmaur in the year 1623, obtained the reverſion of the place of Profeſſor of the Greek tongue, after Jerome Goulu (58), that he died in the year 1648, and was ſucceeded by James Pigis.

(58) A Pariſian who died in the year 1639.

MONTPENSIER (THE DUCHESS OF) favourite to Catherine de Medicis. See LONGWIC.

MOPSUS. There are two perſons principally of this name in the books of the ancients. One was ſon to Ampycus and Chloris; the other was the ſon of Tireſias, according to ſome, or of Manto daughter to Tireſias, according to others (a). We ſhall ſay ſomething of each. MOPSUS, the ſon of Ampycus, was inſtructed by Apollo in augury, and became very conſiderable by means of this art during the expedition of the Argonauts (b). He was ſirnamed Titareſian (c), from the place of his birth, a village in the country of the Lapithæ in Theſſaly. However his own country was not the ſcene where he accquired moſt honour, but that of Africa. He landed there, having loſt his way in his return from Colchos, and died by the bite of a ſerpent (d). They ſay he was buried near Teuchira one of the towns of the Pentapolis (e) [A], and honoured with a temple in the province of Cyrene [B], which became famous for an oracle. The firſt inſtitution of which is attributed to Battus the Cyrenean (f). Ammianus Marcellinus tells us (g) that the heroical manes of Mopſus, buried in Africa, aſſwaged ſeveral kinds of pain, and commonly cured them. This Hiſtorian is guilty of an error in this point which

(a) Hygin. cap. xiv, Scholiaſt. Apollon. in lib. i, ver. 65.

(b) Hygin. ibid. Apollon. Argonaut. lib. i, ver. 65. Valer. Flaccus, Argon. lib. i, ver. 383, & paſſim alibi. Statius, Theb. lib. iii, ver. 521.

(c) Apollon. ibid. Heſiod. in Scuto.

(d) Apollon. lib. i, verſ. 80, & lib. iv, ver. 1520.

(e) Lycophron. Caſſand. ver. 877. Clem. Alexandrin. Stromat. lib. i.

(f) Clem. Alex. ibid.

(g) Lib. xiv, cap. viii.

[A] Teuchira, one of the towns of the Pentapolis.] Here I have followed the opinion of the learned Valeſius (1), who has proved from Lycophron, that Mopſus was buried near Teuchira. However, I muſt ingenuouſly own, that in examining the paſſage of this obſcure Poet, I could not think but that our Argonaut's tomb was rather characterized in it, with regard to Auſigda upon the river Ciniphas, than with regard to Teuchira. Now this river is not far from Pentapolis (2). Beſides I own I cannot conceive, why Valeſius pretends, that if Mopſus had been buried in Pentapolis, Ammianus Marcellinus ought not to have mentioned the ſhoar of Africa, and the Punic glebe (3); he may eaſily be juſtified by their authority, who ſay that Mopſus died in Africa, amongſt which are Tertullian and Apuleius, to whom we may join Apollonius and Seneca (4) who make him die in Libya. This reaſoning ſuppoſes, that Pentapolis was not a part of Africa; but I cannot imagine, conſidering how many great men have maintained the contrary, why Ammianus Marcellinus ſhould not be permitted to do the ſame: he ſometimes runs into poetical phraſes, wherein the general name is preferred before the particular. After all, in Lycophron's Caſſandra, we ſee that the coaſt of Teuchira is called the manſions inhabited by Atlas. Is not this intended to ſignify in general the coaſts of Africa?

(1) Henric. Valeſius, in Marcel. pag. 41.

(2) See Mela, lib. i, cap. vii.

(3) Quod ſi ita eſt male hic Africæ littus, & ceſpitem Punicum poſuit Marcellinus. Valeſ. ubi ſupra.

(4) See the remark [E].

[B] He was honoured with a temple in the province of Cyrene.] If we had rather have the teſtimony of a heathen, than that of Clemens Alexandrinus, we need only read theſe words of Apuleius: 'Tantum 'eos Deos appellant qui ex eodem numero juſte ac 'prudenter vitæ curriculo gubernato, pro numine 'poſtea ab hominibus proditi fanis & cerimoniis vulgo 'advertuntur, ut in Bœotia Amphiaraus, IN AFRICA 'MOPSUS, in Ægypto Oſiris, alius alibi gentium '(5). - - - - They only call thoſe gods, who having led 'a juſt and prudent life, are afterwards reported by men 'to be deities, and are honoured with temples and cere- 'monies, as Amphiaraus in Bœotia, MOPSUS IN A- 'FRICA, Oſiris in Ægypt, and others elſewhere.' Lutatius, the Scholiaſt of the Poet Statius, ſays, in ſpeaking of the ſame Mopſus: 'In tantum magnus fuit in 'augurali peritia ut poſt mortem templa ei dicata ſint, 'à quorum adytis ſæpe homines reſponſa accipiunt. '- - - - - He was ſo famous for his ſkill in Divination, 'that

(5) Apul. de Deo Socratis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

which is common to him with ſome other authors [C]. As to the other MOPSUS, I find that the ſame Strabo, who makes him the ſon of Tireſias at the end of the ninth book, makes him the ſon of Apollo and Manto in his thirteenth and fourteenth books. And that Pauſanias (b) makes him the ſon of Manto and Rhacius, the head of a colony which paſſed from the Iſle of Crete into Aſia. Nothing of all this can be eaſily reconciled with his being king of Argos, or with the national epithet of Argian which has been given him [D]. All who mention him, make him a great maſter in the art of Divination. It is ſaid that he broke the heart of Calchas, the famous Calchas who was ſuper-intendant of the augurs, during the long war of Troy, that he fairly broke his heart in a diſpute between them which was the beſt Diviner [E]. Calchas went on foot from Troy to Claros, in company of Amphilochus, and to try Mopſus's ability he aſked him, ſhewing him a big-bellied ſow, how many young ſhe carried, he anſwered three, one of which was a ſow-pig. The thing proved true. Mopſus aſked Calchas in his turn, how many figs there were on ſuch a fig-tree. Calchas could not tell, and died of grief (i). No body, ever ſo little verſed in books, will wonder, that this ſtory ſhould be differently related; for to judge of things by experience, there is a fatality in this which humane nature cannot avoid. There are authors then who ſay (k), that it was Calchas aſked the number of figs (l), and that Mopſus anſwered ten thouſand, and that they might all, one only excepted, be contained in a certain meaſure which he named. This anſwer, found exactly true upon trial, made Calchas die of vexation. Others will have it, that Calchas bid him tell how many young ones the ſow went with, and that the truth of his anſwer to this queſtion was that only which broke his heart, ſo that there was no

(b) Lib. vii, pag. m. 207.

(i) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. m. 442. Lycophr. ver. 425.

(k) Strabo, ibid.

(l) Servius, in Eclog. VI, Virgil. ver. 72. Grounding himſelf on the Poet Euphorion, ſays they were apples.

(6) In the body of this article.

(7) In Statium, Tom. ii, pag. 818.

(8) In Eclog. VI, ver. 72.

(9) Lloyd who adheres againſt thoſe who confound the two Mopſus's, quod Argonautica expeditio generatione integra belloin Trojanum antecellit. - - - that the expedition of the Argonauts preceded the Trojan war a whole generation; & Barth. ubi ſupra, who aſſerts, that the Argonautarum vates attingere minime potuit tempora à reditu Trojæ. - - - the augur of the Argonauts could not reach to the time of the Trojan war. Calviſius maintains the contrary, ed. ann. mundi 2727.

(10) In Tertull. de Anima, cap. alvi.

(11) In Ammian. Marcell. lib. xiv, pag. 40, 41.

(12) This is the epithet Strabo gives him.

(13) See Apollodorus, Bibl. lib. iii, pag. m. 209.

'that after his death temples were dedicated to him, 'from which men often received Oracles.' We have already ſeen (6) Marcellinus's teſtimony.

[C] Ammianus Marcellinus commits a fault which is common to him with ſome other authors.] It is his confounding Mopſus the Argonaut with the ſon or grandſon of Tireſias. Barthius (7) obſerves, that even the ancient writers put one for the other, and he expreſsly accuſes Servius to have done it: but he does him wrong, ſince Servius (8) ſpeaks only of Mopſus in general. The charge would be much juſter againſt Ammianus Marcellinus, from whom Barthius cites that paſſage, as a good proof of theſe two things: I. That Mopſus's tomb was in Africa. II. That it was not poſſible for Strabo to have ſeen it in Cilicia. He leaves us to judge which of theſe two ancient authors is miſtaken, and does not perceive Ammianus Marcellinus's error in the paſſage he cites. Valeſius is the perſon who obſerves it. The thing is plain. This hiſtorian ſays on one hand, that the city of Mopſus was the place or habitation of Mopſus the Diviner; and on the other, that this Mopſus having been driven on the coaſt of Africa, in his return from the conqueſt of the Golden Fleece, died there, and that his tomb wrought miracles. He who gave his name to Mopſueſtia, and he that founded ſeveral towns in Cilicia, are doubtleſs the ſame Mopſus, now the latter was cotemporary with Calchas and Amphilochus, and flouriſhed after the Trojan war; it was not he therefore who went with the Argonauts. Clemens Alexandrinus has not taken notice of this, ſince, as Valeſius obſerves, he thought the Mopſus, who flouriſhed at the time of the Trojan war, had been in this expedition. I do not object to him what others might do (9), that great age, which this ſuppoſition would infer; but he ought to have remembered, that this perſon loſt his life in his return from Colchos. Pamelius (10) takes him for the Argonaut who gave out oracles in Cilicia. We ſhall preſently ſee a ſlip or two of Meurſius. They diſtinguiſh in Calepin three Mopſus's. I. The Augur, who founded the town of Phaſelus upon the confines of Pamphylia. II. The Lapithyte, the ſon of Ampycus. III. He who diſputed againſt Calchas.

[D] The national epithet of Argian was given him.] Valeſius (11), to diſtinguiſh our two Mopſus's, names the firſt Lapithum (12), or Theſſalum, and the latter Argivum. But whem I conſider that Tireſias was a Theban, and think on the fierce and bloody war which the Argians made twice upon the Thebans, during the life of Tireſias, we cannot ſee how he could have a ſon, who, for diſtinction's ſake, ſhould be called the Argian. If Manto was a prieſteſs of Delphos, and Apollo begat Mopſus upon her, why ſhould this Mopſus be called an Argian? Or why, if he ſprung from the marriage which ſhe contracted with Rhacius in Aſia, ſhould he bear this title? There would be leſs difficulty in this, were he her ſon by Alcmeon (13). However, Cicero affirms, he was king of Argos: 'Amphilochus & Mopſus Argivorum Reges fuerunt, ſed 'iidem Augures, iique urbes in ora maritima Ciliciæ 'Græcas condidere (14). - - - Amphilochus and Mopſus 'were kings of the Argives, and, at the ſame time, Au- 'gurs, and built Grecian cities on the ſea-coaſt of Cilicia.' If ever Meziriac's Commentary on Apollodorus comes out, which I rather wiſh than expect, we ſhall learn many things about the two Mopſus's (15).

(14) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i, cap. xl.

(15) See his Commentary on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 911.

[E] It is ſaid that he broke the heart of Calchas . . . in a diſpute which was the beſt Diviner.] Moreri's continuators have been guilty of ſeveral faults in relating this diſpute. I. They have repreſented Mopſus as the aggreſſor, which they ought not to have done, ſince he does not appear ſo in any of the different relations, which Strabo has given. II. They ought not to have cited Heſiod, without adding, that what he has ſaid upon this head, is to be met with in Strabo. This addition is neceſſary as often as we cite an author whoſe work is loſt, and is known only from the citations of others. III. They ought not to have cited Heſiod on any account, ſince they do not relate the matter as he does. They ſay, that Mopſus put the Queſtion to Chalcas about the number of figs. Whereas Heſiod ſays it was Calchas aſked Mopſus that queſtion. They were doubtleſs deceived by Charles Stephens after Mr Lloyd and Hofman. 'Dolore contabuit quod propoſita ſibi à Mopſo 'caprifico (ut refert Heſiodus) aut (ut Pherecydes, ma- 'vult) ſue gravida, conjicere not potuiſſet, quot in illa 'ficus eſſent, quotve hæc utero ſuculas gereret: quos 'tamen Mopſus ſine ullo errore divinavit (16). - - - He 'pined away with grief, becauſe a queſtion being put to 'him by Mopſus about a figtree, (as Heſiod ſays) or (as 'Pherecydes will have it) a big-bellied ſow, he could not 'tell how many figs were on the former, nor how many young 'the latter carried, which, however, Mopſus divined 'right.' IV. They ought not to have cited the firſt book of the Iliad, which has nothing of what they ſay. I am leſs ſurpriſed at all this, than at the ſtrange miſtake of Meurſius. This learned man (17) imagines, that Mopſus was worſted in this diſpute, if we be decided by Seneca the Tragedian. Seneca Mopſum inferiorem factum vult in Medea:

(16) Car. Steph. in voce Calchas, pag. m. 546.

Omnibus verax ſibi falſus uni
Concidit Mopſus, caruitque Thebis
Ille qui verè cecinit futura.

(17) Comment. in Lycophron. pag. 206.

Firſt, he does not ſpeak in this place of Mopſus Calchas's antagoniſt, but of Mopſus the Argonaut. Secondly, Seneca ſays no more than this, that Mopſus with all his prophetical ſkill, died in the expedition. I will ſet you down the whole paſſage, ſince it is not free from falſhood on another ſcore.

Ite nunc ſortes, perarate Pontum
Sorte timenda.
Idmonem, quamvis bene fata noſſet,
Condidit ſerpens Libycis arenis.
Omnibus verax, ſibi falſus uni
Concidit

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

no need of Mopſus's propoſing a queſtion in his turn, which Calchas could not reſolve. There are ſome who maintain that all this happened not at Claros, but in Cilicia (m). Mopſus loſt his life in another kind of conteſt [F], for it is ſaid (n) that he and Amphilochus ſet out together from Troy, and built the town of Mallus in Cilicia. That Amphilochus left him there to go to Argos: that miſſing his aim he came back again to Mopſus, who would have no more to do with him: that they fought a duel in which both of them fell, and that their tombs, which were ſhewn at Margaſa near the river Pyramus, were ſo ſituated, that one of them could not be ſeen from the other. It is certain that Cilicia was not the leaſt theatre of Mopſus's actions: he built ſeveral towns in it (o), that which was called Mopſueſtia (p) had a particular relation to his perſon: Cilicia was principally the place where he was worſhipped as a God, and where he gave out oracles (q). Plutarch tells a ſtory of them, which confounded the incredulity of the Epicureans (r).

(m) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 464.

(n) Id. ib. & Lycophr. ver. 439.

(o) Cicero, lib. i, de Divinat. Pompon. Mela, lib. i, cap. xiv, & ibi Iſac. Voſſius.

(p) Μόψου ἱδρύα, quaſi lares Mopſi. See Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 465. Mopſueſtia vatis illius domicilium Mopſi, ſays Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xiv. St Jerome calls it, Mopſi viculum. See Berkelius, in Stephan. pag. 567, & Photius, Biblioth. num. 176, pag. 392.

(q) Tertull. de Anima, cap. xlvi. Origines, lib. iii, contra Celſum. Euſeb. de laudibus Conſtant.

(r) De Oracul. defectu.

Note, that Mopſus's applying himſelf to Divination did not hinder his begetting children. He had three daughters, Rhode, Meliade, and Pamphylia. Their names were given to ſome countries (s).

(s) Photius, Bibl. num. 176, pag. 392, ex Theopompo.

Concidit Mopſus, caruitque Thebis
Ille què veri cecinit futura.

Here are three examples of the ſad Fate of the moſt famous ſooth-ſayers. The laſt is that of Tireſias, who died a fugitive, and baniſhed from Thebes. The firſt is that of Idmon, who died in Africa by the bite of a ſerpent; the other is that of Mopſus, of whom Seneca is content to ſay, in an indefinite manner, that he died. But here he takes one for the other: he attributes to Idmon what does not belong to him; for Mopſus was he who died in Africa of the bite of a ſerpent. Beſides Apollonius, whom I have cited, obſerve how Hyginus ſpeaks of him (18). 'Mopſus 'Ampyci filius ab ſerpentis morſu in Africa obiit.--- 'Mopſus the ſon of Ampycus died in Africa by the bite of 'a ſerpent.' I am not ignorant what ſtrains are given to this paſſage, and how many different ways of pointing it the Critics have invented. Rhodiginus (19) doubtleſs applauded himſelf on having put a point after condidit, and taking ſerpens for a participle. But I do not believe any judicious perſon thinks this more likely than ſaying, that the Latin Poet was under a miſtake. Do not we ſee the beſt hiſtorians confound facts which are near their own time, and ſuch as are no leſs remarkable, than the death of the ſooth-ſayer of an army could be in the imagination of a tragic Poet? Did Gruterus (20) who refers the caruit Thebis to Mopſus, think, that Mopſus was a Lapithyte? He changes I know not how many preter-tenſes into futures: he will have it that Seneca tranſgreſſed againſt hiſtory; but not that the temptation of crouding many great examples of morality into a chorus, has made him have recourſe to the aſylum of a prolepſis, or confound his Chronology. I can beſides all this maintain, that Seneca's words are no proof of what Valeſius alledges them for, I mean Mopſus's death in Africa. The paſſages he produces from Tertullian and Apuleius, only prove that Mopſus was honoured as a God in that country; but he ought to have alledged ſomething more expreſs from his authors, before he offered them as witneſſes of a man's deceaſe in ſuch or ſuch a place.

(18) Fabula xiv, pag. m. 46, 47.

(19) Antiq. Lect. lib. xxix, cap. xv.

(20) Apud Senecam Scriverii, pag. 237.

[F] Mopſus loſt his life in another kind of conteſt.] This by no means reſpecting Chalchas, I ſhall venture to ſay, that Strabo's tranſlator has not rendered theſe words right, ὃ μόνον δὲ τὴν περὶ τῆς μαντικῆς ἔσεν μεμυθεύκασιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῆς ἀρχῆς. Neque de divinatione duntaxat eos contendiſſe fabulantur, ſed etiam de imperio (21) ------ And it is reported, they not only contended about divination, but likewiſe about command.' This eos neceſſarily refers to Calchas and Mopſus; we muſt therefore expect to ſee them diſpute for command, yet nothing of this appears by the ſequel; it is Mopſus and Amphilochus that fall out. Strabo has expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner as not to have any ſhare in this ſmall cenſure.

(21) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 464.

MORGUES (MATTHEW DE) Sieur de St Germain, preacher in ordinary to Lewis XIII, and firſt almoner to Mary de Medicis, this king's mother, made himſelf very much known by ſeveral libels he publiſhed againſt cardinal Richelieu. He was born in Vellai in Languedoc (a), and was of a family which had been praiſed by Lewis Pulci preceptor to Leo X (b). He turned Jeſuit, and taught ſome claſſes at Avignon in the college of the ſociety (c). He quitted this profeſſion ſome time after, and dextrouſly leaping over the walls of the college (d), he capitulated at liberty, and made up the buſineſs as well as he could [A]. He employed in his juſtification a kind of dilemma, which was retorted upon him [B]. He preached in Paris with great ſucceſs

(a) Matthieu de Morgues, Lettre de change proteſtée, pag. m. 946.

(b) Id. ib. pag. 947.

(c) Prémiere Lettre de change de Sabin à Nicoleon, pag. 711, of the Pieces pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire, Edit. 1643, in 4*to.*

(d) Ibid. pag. 713.

[A] He leaped over the walls of the Jeſuits college at Avignon . . . . and made up the buſineſs as well as he could.] What he advances on this ſubject, is inconſiſtent with what was objected to him. This objection imports, That he became a prieſt in a ſtate of apoſtacy, before he had by any diſpenſation diſengaged himſelf from the bonds which ſtill tied him by one end, to an order he had deſerted (1). Many, continue they, may have heard cardinal Spada ſay ſometimes as much, before whom you ſtood crying a long time to ſee if you could move him to ſome compaſſion. Now hear what he anſwered to an author, who called him an apoſtate Jeſuit: He whom you accuſe, declares he was very young when he entered into the ſociety, and that he neither quitted it out of levity, nor libertiniſm. He might have married after his retreat, if he pleaſed, or have choſen any other profeſſion than that he took, being in no ſacred orders, nor of an age to take them (2). Does not this imply, that he quitted the Jeſuits before he had made any vow? How then could he be tied to their order by one end? Note, that he anſwers nothing, to what was ſaid of his teaching ſome claſſes in the Jeſuits college at Avignon. We muſt therefore believe the accuſation true. Whence it follows, that he diſguiſes things, in ſaying, he was free to marry when he left the ſociety.

(1) Prémiere Lettre de change de Sabin à Nicoleon, pag. 716, of the Recueil des Pieces pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire, Edit. 1643, in 4*to.*

(2) Morgues, Reparties ſur la Réponſe à la Remonſtrance, pag. 7.

[B] He employed a kind of dilemma which was retorted upon him.] 'He tells us, that if the Jeſuits 'be men of probity, he ought to be praiſed for 'having kept good company; if not, he deſerves no 'reproach for having left them. But it is true, they 'are men of probity, and it were wrong not to 'have continued with them,' ſuppoſing either that 'a man left them to turn libertine, or that he could 'not leave them with a good conſcience, or that 'they themſelves could not juſtly diſpenſe with one 'who had not made profeſſion againſt them (3).' This is his anſwer: let us ſee what was replied to him: 'Your argument reſembles thoſe daggers 'which were antiently made uſe of in tragedies: it 'enters into itſelf without giving the leaſt wound. I 'turn it againſt you, and ſay; if the Jeſuits are 'wicked, you deſerve blame for having kept ill com'pany; if good, you cannot deny, but you are to 'blame in having left them. There is nothing to 'be ſaid againſt this.' But it is true, they are men of probity, ſay you. 'This has always been 'my opinion; but it has not always been your's.

(3) Id. ib. pag. 8.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſucceſs [C], and in the year 1613, was appointed preacher to queen Margaret (e). He was afterwards preferred to be preacher to the king in the year 1615, in Father Portugais's place, and in the year 1620, was preacher to the queen-mother. He had the cure of Notre-Dame des Vertus near Paris. They who writ againſt him accuſed him of having ſold this cure, but he denied it [D]. He was named to the biſhopric of Toulon by Lewis XIII, but never could obtain his bulls. He gave his anſwer to the reproaches, which were made him on this occaſion, the beſt turn that could poſſibly be given it [E]. He retired to his father's houſe upon the confinement of Mary de Medicis. Cardinal Richelieu who had taken meaſures to make him priſoner in that retreat [F], failed of his aim;

(e) Matthieu de Morgues, Reparties ſur la Réſponſe à la Remonſtrance au Roi, pag. 7.

'You did not ſpeak in this manner, when having 'weighed the Jeſuits and Huguenots in a balance, 'you equally condemned them to depart the king-'dom. Your diſcourſe is ſtill to be ſeen in print (4).' Let us add to this another paſſage, which more diſtinctly informs us, that he hated the ſociety he had left. 'Tell us of what order was that young monk 'of your claſs, whom you got to hold your writings 'a top of the wall while you leaped down; for it is 'not certain, whether he was a Carmelite, or a 'Jacobin..... Tell us, what was the true reaſon 'of that ſentence, by which, in one of your books, 'you have ſince condemned thoſe whom you de-'ſerted, to be baniſhed France? Who ſays, that it 'was only the vexation of ſeeing one of the ſociety 'at the king's ear, who did not much recommend 'your preaching to his majeſty? who pretends, that 'it was only out of pure ſpite to him? But it is moſt 'certain, that another of their enemies having aſked 'you, why baniſhing miniſters and Jeſuits together, 'you would ſend theſe good Fathers into a better 'country than their fellow-exiles, to whom, however, 'you wiſhed much leſs harm? You anſwered, it was, 'that finding themſelves in a better condition, they 'ſhould think leſs of returning into the country 'from which you expelled them (5).' Some pages before he had been taxed with writing a book againſt a Jeſuit, which he could not defend before the king in the Louvre (6), and had been reminded (7), that of the three words of which he compoſed his fine title, the two firſt were borrowed from Rome, and the third from Athens.

(4) Première Lettre de change de Sabin à Nicolas, pag. 716.

(5) Ib. pag. 730.

(6) Ibid. pag. 710.

(7) Because he had blamed his adverſary for taking the name of Cleonville, half Greek, half Latin.

[C] He preached in Paris with great ſucceſs.] He affirms in a ſmall piece, publiſhed in the year 1631, that he had preached two thouſand times in the capital city of the kingdom (8), and ſays elſewhere (9), that there was not a pariſh in this great city, but he had preached in. All the court, adds he (10), valued my ſermons; the Doctors, Bachelors, Regulars, and the moſt celebrated Lawyers of Paris enquired after them: many of the curious have filled their table-books with them, and a great number of citizens of good ſenſe have found great ſatisfaction in them.

(8) Morgues, Reparties à la Réponſe, pag. m. 11.

(9) Id. Lettre de change proteſtée, pag. 925. 926.

(10) Ibid. pag. 940.

[D] His enemies accuſed him of having ſold this cure, but he denied it.] John Sirmond, under the falſe name of Sabin, addreſſes him after this manner (11): You underſtand not ſo much as the two languages, which common uſe makes moſt familiar to well-bred men. And therefore I look upon it, as a kind of ſpiritual prodigality in that honeſt man, who to recompenſe that little, you were capable of teaching thoſe children, he had committed to your inſtruction, gave you this cure (12), which you ſold after a few years, to go and put off your bad French near the table of the late queen Margaret. Note, that it is obſerved (13) he had been curate of Aubervilliers. Let us ſee how he defends himſelf againſt the charge of ſelling his cure of Nôtre-Dame des Vertus. I reſigned it, ſays he (14), into the hands of the deceaſed Mr Galemant, firſt director to the Carmelite Nuns in France. It was not poſſible to commit Simony with a ſaint, who did ſo many miracles in his life, and after his death, that they talk of canonizing him. Thus, in order to thruſt me into hell, Sabin would drag a bleſſed ſaint out of Paradiſe. The truth is, queen Margaret de Valois took me from that place, where the great reſort of people, kept a continual noiſe, enemy to the neceſſary repoſe of a man of letters. The cardinal de Joyeuſe commanded me, from that princeſs, to reſign the benefice into the hands of Mr de Galemant, who had been his great vicar at Rohan: he reſigned it preſently after, to the Fathers of the oratory, who poſſeſs it ſtill, and who know I never had any recompence for it.

(11) Première, Lettre de change de Sabin, pag. 725.

(12) In pag. 714, he had been reproached with ſelling his cure of Notre-Dame des Vertus.

(13) Ibid. pag. 729.

(14) Morgues, Lettre de change proteſtée, pag. 923, 924.

[E] He gave his anſwer to the reproaches made him upon the refuſal of the bulls, the beſt turn that could poſſibly be given it.] One of his adverſaries publiſhed this (15): 'He is a renegado Jeſuit, who in his con-'verſation commonly inveighed againſt the power of the 'Pope, under pretence of defending the privileges of 'the Gallican church, by that means ſowing, as much 'as he could, the ſeeds of diviſion between the church 'and ſtate..... The moſt intimate friend he ever 'had was Fancan, a man notorious for his impiety, 'a reputed Atheiſt; and who was convicted of hav-'ing always favoured the intereſts of Hereſy, both 'within and without the kingdom. This kind of 'converſation and company got him ſo ill a repu-'tation, that the king having, at the recommenda-'tion of ſome, who did not thoroughly know the 'man, nominated him to the biſhopric of Toulon 'ſome years ago, he could not procure teſtimonials 'from men of worth, ſufficient to induce his holineſs 'to grant him his bulls; ſo that he has been forced 'to quit his biſhopric.' I paſs over Matthew de Morgues's anſwer concerning his intimacy with Fancan (16), and only relate what concerns the re-fuſal of the bulls. 'He whom he accuſes, aſſures 'him he never entered into a diſpute either for or 'againſt the privileges of the Gallican church. Nor 'was that the thing which ſtopped his bulls, but 'the ill offices of the cardinal, who was per-ſuaded by two malicious men, that the dignity of 'a biſhop, would render more conſiderable with the 'queen, a perſon whom they had always kept at a 'diſtance from her, becauſe they were jealous of his 'capacity and courage. If Mulot did once fall out 'with the cardinal, he would lay open his manage-'ment with the late Mr Herbault, ſecretary of 'ſtate; and if the biſhop of Mande du Pleſſis were 'alive, and would ſpeak the truth, we ſhould know 'all the tricks the cardinal played in this affair. 'His holineſs knew the malice; and one of the 'wiſeſt gentlemen of France can witneſs, what the 'Pope ſaid upon this ſubject in granting the bulls, 'which were demanded, when leave was deſired to 'require a free gift from the biſhopric upon other 'conſiderations (17).' He anſwered much the ſame to the Sieur Sirmond. 'Sabin ſays alſo, that the bulls 'for the biſhopric of Toulon were refuſed me: he 'is miſtaken. Cardinal Richelieu has retarded them 'by his artifices, but has not been able to get them 'refuſed. His holineſs is too juſt to deny me the 'recompence of the ſervices I have done the church 'theſe twenty years, and the king too generous to 'ſuffer his nomination to be condemned. Some, 'againſt the rules of charity, ſtruck in with the 'cardinal who oppoſed me: but the difficulty was 'removed, when, of my own accord, I begged of 'the king, that he would permit me to recommend 'a biſhop: which his majeſty granted with regret. 'I kept a part of the revenue, which the revenge of 'the cardinal has deprived me of, becauſe I defended 'the reputation of the princeſs, who has given him 'an hundred times more (18).' He does not diſown his friendſhip and intimacy with Mr Servin, Gillot, and Derivaux, thoſe true Frenchmen, worthy magiſtrates, and uncorrupt judges (19).

(15) Réſponſe au Libelle intitulé très-humble, &c. Remonſtrance au Roi, pag. 560, of the Recueil des Pieces.

(16) It is to be found at the eleventh and twelfth pages of his Reparties.

(17) Morgues, Reparties, pag. 10.

(18) Idem, Lettre de change proteſtée, pag. 924, 925.

(19) Id. ib. pag. 925.

I relate theſe things, only to ſhew the ſpirit which advanced or retarded promotions at that time. I believe theſe baſe intrigues will laſt as long as the world.

[F] Cardinal Richelieu had taken meaſures to make him priſoner in that retreat.] Cardinal Richelieu diſpatched a commiſſion to the Sieur de Machault, intendant of Languedoc, to ſeize the perſon of Matthew de Morgues. The intendant charged the provoſt of Niſmes, and that of Vellai with the execution of it, and wrote 'to the judge Mage of Puy, and ſome lords, to aſ-'ſiſt the king's officers in taking him. The commiſ-'ſion was to take St Germain dead or alive, to ſeize all 'his

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

aim; for St Germain made his escape before having left Compiegne (f), and designing to manded him to answer a writing, intituled which the honour of this princess had been trea 1631 the answer she desired [G], and afterw of the cardinal Richelieu (g). The worst was, this cardinal's praises [H]. This gave his e weapons. He followed Mary de Medicis ou

(f) Ibid. pag. 5.

(g) Du Chatelet, Sirmond, Balzac, Dupleix, &c.

'his papers, without making an inventory of them, 'and send them to Beaucaire; whilst the prisoner 'should be conducted to Mande, to be put into the 'hands of the bishop (20).' The author believes that this prelate, who had been valet to the cardinal, would have got him strangled or poisoned without noise. He had notice of the design the night before the intended execution, quitted his father's house, and found a retreat in the wildest country of France, where he was concealed for six weeks, with all manner of inconveniencies to his health. . . . . What was cruellest, says he, in all this proceeding, was the affliction which the sight of the provost and archers gave my father and mother, who were very old, for I was the youngest of eight children, and had grey hairs. He pretends that the cardinal designed to dispatch him, to prevent his writing a History. 'This good lord, says he (21), 'well knew that St Germain was not a man of the 'times, that GOD had given him a little sense to ob- 'serve how things were managed, that his soul was 'just enough not to suffer innocence to be over- 'whelmed without a sigh, and that his courage was 'not so mean as to forsake his mistress in her suf- 'ferings. The cardinal was jealous of these qualities, 'which are not for his turn: he suspected what was 'not, but what might be. . . . . He resolved to impri- 'son a man, who did nothing that could justly dis- 'please him, but who one day might give a true 'history of the times, and frankly declare what he 'had known good in the queen's conduct, and evil in 'the cardinal's.'

(20) Id. Repartie, pag. 4.

(21) Id. id. pag. 3, 4.

It is very probable the cardinal dreaded St Germain's pen, and had some suspicion of the libels it would produce, and which afterwards sadly mortified his Eminence. We see that in all the negotiations for recalling the queen-mother, he stipulated that St Germain, who by defamatory libels, had omitted nothing to rob him of his reputation, should be delivered up to the king (22). This great man had the weakness to be extreamly vexed by satires, as I have related elsewhere (23).

(22) See the Life of cardinal Richelieu, Tom. ii, pag. 162, 175, Dutch Edit. 1694.

(23) In the article GRANDIER, in the text, between the remarks [D] and [E].

[G] He published in 1631 the answer she desired.] It is intituled, True and wholesome advices of Francis Loyal, concerning the calumnies and blasphemies of the Sieur des Montagnes, or an examination of a libel, intituled, a defence of the king and his ministers. It is one of the principal tracts of the collection of pieces in defence of the queen-mother, which has been so often reprinted.

[H] He had before published books full of this cardinal's praises.] The author of the answer to his remonstrance to the king (24), cites several passages of them, to convict him of a contradiction, which might destroy all his credit. An extract also of a letter, which he wrote the seventh of June 1627, to the cardinal, was alledged (25), in which he promised him a perpetual and inviolable adherence, founded on the remembrance of the great benefits he had received, and on his admiration of the eminent qualities of this minister. This was somewhat puzzling to our de Morgues, let us see what he says in his own justification. In the first place he supposed that his adversaries represented him as a satirical author, from the books he had written before his rupture with the cardinal. But this was not their thought, they only insisted on the books he published for the queen-mother, after she was at variance with this minister. He might so easily have understood their meaning, that there is ground enough to suspect him of insincerity in this point. In the second place he pretended, that the cardinal's ill designs did not shew themselves, till after the persecution stirred up against the queen-mother. Let us cite his own words to each of these points.

(24) It is in the collection of Mr du Chatelet.

(25) Ibid. pag. m. 560, 561.

St Germain never writ any thing but two pieces concerning public affairs, one by command of the cardinal,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

France, till after the death of the cardinal. He forced Father Sirmond's nephew, one of his principal antagoniſts, to quit the field [I], and, as he had foretold during his diſgrace (b), he obtained the royal privilege to publiſh his books. He lived to the year 1670 (i). He lodged a long time at the Incurables, in the ſuburbs of St Germain, and died there being eighty eight years of age (k). He preached there every year the penegyric of St Joſeph [K]. He boaſted much of the Hiſtory he had written of Lewis XIII, and ſaid he would enjoin his heirs to print it after his death. Patin has ſpoken more than once of this work [L]. Balzac treats Matthew de Morgues very ill in the firſt letter

(b) See the remark [I].

(i) Patin, Lettre DXXX, pag. 580, Tom. iii.

(k) Id. ib. pag. 579.

' and treatiſes, which might give him an inſight in-
' to foreign affairs; and for a great number of curio-
' ſities (30), and ingenious inventions, which he was ' fond of, and received with thanks, but which were ' followed the next, or even the ſame, day, by ill
' offices with the queen, and eſpecially with his ho-
' lineſs's nuncio; to whom he ſignified, that St Ger-
' main was author of the Divine without paſſion, in ' which he himſelf was ſtruck at under covert expreſ-
' ſions, tho' the cardinal had added, with his own ' hand, the paſſage that could offend him. This is ' the coin in which he has paid the pen, which ' is called Mercenary.' This is not only curious, but even highly probable. The cardinal had ſuch diſtant views, ſo much ambition, and ſo many enemies to deal with, ſo many ambuſhes to prevent and to lay; that he was forced to ſpread his ſnares every where, and always have two ſtrings to his bow.

(30) Add to this these words of the Lettre de change proteſtée, pag. 941: Cardinal Richelieu, whom all his flatterers hold for the moſt learned, and the ſtrict genius of the time, has written employed and experienced more, in odd and curious matters, in Latin, in French, in proſe and verſe.

[I] He made . . . . . Father Sirmond's nephew quit the field.] This I find in the hiſtory of the French academy. ' Mr Sirmond . . . . wrote ſeveral pieces ' for the cardinal, upon the affairs of the time, and
' moſt of them under feigned names. The abbot de
' St Germain, who was a writer of the oppoſite ſide,
' uſed him very ill in the piece which he intituled
' the Chimerical Embaſſador. He writ an anſwer to
' it, which is inſerted in Mr du Chaſtelet's collection.
' The abbot de St Germain replied, and treated him
' ſtill more injuriouſly, which obliged him to write
' a new piece in his defence. But cardinal Riche-
' lieu and king Lewis XIII happening to die in this ' juncture, he could never obtain, under the regency,
' a licence to print this book. This troubled him
' mightily, and ſeeing at the ſame time his enemy
' returned to court, and the favour veering to the op-
' poſite ſide, he retired into Auvergne, where he ' died being about ſixty years old (31).' This Mr Sirmond was a member of the French academy, and you ſee he had the mortification to be forced to yield to a rebel-writer, who had not only uſed him ill, but even attacked the whole body of the academy, which had almoſt the ſame deſtiny as Sirmond; for it found no redreſs, it ſaw the triumph of it's cenſor, and the works of this haughty critic printed with the royal licence. Mr Pelliſſon ſupplies me with proofs, ' The
' firſt that wrote againſt the academy, ſays he (32),
' was the abbot of St Germain, who was then at
' Bruſſels, accompanying the queen-mother, Mary de
' Medicis, in her exile. As he never left inveighing
' in his writings, and that with the greateſt animo-
' ſity againſt every action of cardinal Richelieu, he ' fell upon the French Academy in a very injurious
' manner, confounding it with that other academy,
' which the Gazetteer Renaudot had erected in the ' office of intelligence; whether he deſigned this mi-
' ſtake, or whether he was actually miſinformed of ' what paſſed in Paris. The academy would not anſwer
' him by a book on purpoſe; but Mr du Chaſtelet,
' who was a member of it, and whoſe pen the car-
' dinal made uſe of to anſwer moſt of theſe Bruſſel
' libels, was deſired, upon an offer firſt made to the ' aſſembly by himſelf, to add a few lines on this
' head; which were afterwards read, and approved
' by the ſociety *. The pieces of the abbot de
' St Germain againſt cardinal Richelieu, have been
' ſince printed at Paris (33) in two volumes, after
' the death of the late king Lewis XIII: Mr du
' Chaſtelet's anſwers were part of a work, which he ' had not finiſhed, being prevented by death, and
' which has never been printed.'

(31) Pelliſſon, Hiſtoire de l'Acad. Françoiſe, pag. m. 305.

(32) Id. ib. pag. 67, & ſeq.

* Reg. 9. & 30. Juillet 1635.

[K] He preached there every year the panegyric of St Joſeph.] This I learn from a moſt ingenious criticiſm, which is a continuation of Parnaſſus Reformed, and is intituled, The war between the antient and modern authors. Mr Gueret there ſuppoſes that upon the arrival of abbot de Morgues at Parnaſſus, cardinal Richelieu and Balzac would oppoſe his taking a place among the Hiſtorians; and that his Eminence made the following ſpeech. Behold, behold, here is the man, who alone has attempted to diſturb the glory of my miniſtry; behold the only pen, which I was never able to gain, and yet I now have met with him, after whom I have ſometimes marched entire legions in vain, and the purſuit of whom has made me loſe more than one campaign. I well knew, continued he, that I ſhould catch him in one world or the other; it is but fit he ſhould now pay for all the damage he has done me, it is fit I revenge my ſelf of that invincible malignity, which neither the fear of puniſhments nor the hopes of rewards could correct in him; and if the god, which preſides here, does not do me juſtice, I will quickly make him him ſenſible, that I have not ſpent all my force againſt Rochelle (34).' He ſuppoſes that this abbot ' with an un-
' daunted look, and above all fear, only ſhook his ' head, and looking upon his Eminence, your haughty
' carriage, ſays he, is out of date; you have no armies
' here to back it, the day of your reign is over,
' and I have this advantage of you, that truth
' marches by my ſide, and that I am in a place, where
' you hold no other rank, than that of an author
' (35). Mr Gueret adds (36) that the abbot eſcaped the ' ſtorm, that was intended to be raiſed againſt him
' but there enſued a great conteſt, what place he
' ſhould hold, whether among the Hiſtorians or the ' libellers during the wars. Each ſide offered very ' ſtrong arguments on this head, and the diſpute had ' never been ended, if he himſelf, tired out with this ' troubleſome formality, had not bethought him of ' gaining a little riſing ground which joined to Par-
' naſſus, where all the learned of his character and ' profeſſion, place themſelves out of the way, that they ' may have no fellowſhip with the reſt, whom they
' term profane. Biroüat, who firſt deſcryed him,
' ran forward to meet his friend, and after ſeveral
' mutual embraces, you renounce then, ſays he to ' him, the panegyric of St Joſeph, and this good
' ſaint has loſt in you, one of the moſt zealous of his
' adorers, and his preacher in ordinary **.'

(34) Guerre des Auteurs, pag. 104. Dutch Edit.

(35) Id. ib. pag. 106.

(36) Id. ib. pag. 109.

 Every year he preached at the Incurables on the feſtival of St Joſeph.

If I have collected more particulars than the text of this remark required, it was by the way of an introduction, which informs us, what the opinion of a fine wit had been of our Matthew de Morgues.

[L] Patin has ſpoken more than once of his Hiſtory of Lewis XIII.] Here is an extract of his 351ſt letter, dated the twentieth of March 1665. ' Yeſterday, being the feſtival of St Joſeph, Mr Mat' thew de Morgues, who is eighty two years of age,
' preached the ſermon at the Incurables, where he ' lives, in honour of St Joſeph, before the queen's
' majeſty: he is the author of the pamphlets pub-
' liſhed at Bruſſels againſt cardinal Richelieu, in vin-
' dication of the queen-mother, whoſe almoner he
' was: he is a learned great man, and has by him a
' juſt hiſtory of the late king Lewis XIII, which he ' does not deſign for the preſs till after his death;
' he has got ſix manuſcript copies of it, which he ' has committed to ſix of his beſt friends, who will ' not fail to execute his intentions in due time (37)'. Let us ſee alſo what he has ſaid in the 458th letter. ' It is probable this Hiſtory (38) will be confuted
' by that which we are promiſed by Mr Matthew
' de Morgues, Sieur de St Germain, who begins from
' the birth of Lewis XIII, and continues it to his ' death: this gentleman will not ſuffer his Hiſtory
' to be printed in his own life-time, but he tells me
' he has put it into the hands of thoſe who will ' be faithful to him: you muſt know he is eighty
' four years old; I am far from wiſhing his death,
' and I ſhould be very ſorry for it, yet I ſhould be glad ' to ſee this Hiſtory, whereof I have heard him tell
' ſome very notable particulars and ſurprizing truths, both

(37) Patin, Lettre cccli, pag. 39. Tom. iii.

(38) That of cardinal Richelieu, by Father le Moine.

(37) Matthieu de Morgues hoped for it; for in the preface of the collection of his works, which he published at Antwerp, he has theſe words, I hope that my writings one day will be printed at Paris very correctly under the licence of the great ſeal.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google letter of the eighth book (l). To crown his inconſtancy, ſays he, of a deſerter, as we have known him from more than a dozen parties, he muſt, for his laſt trade, turn paraſite to the Spaniards, and ſecretary to the diſaffected French at their court. Note, that he was not diſpoſed towards cardinal Mazarin, as he had been towards cardinal Richelieu; for if we may believe the Patiniana, he wrote the libel intituled Bons Avis ſur pluſieurs mauvais avis. It is a defence of cardinal Mazarin, to which it is thought Mr le Laboureur wrote an anſwer for the prince of Condé. Both theſe pieces are good for nothing (m).

(l) In the edition in folio. It is dated the fifteenth of July 1625; but it ought to be 1635.

(m) Patiniana, pag. 107, Edit. Paris 1701.

‘ both to cardinal Richelieu's diſhonour, and in defence ‘ of the queen-mother (39). This man, ſays he, in another place (40) ‘ knows moſt of the court in- ‘ trigues for ſixty years paſt, part of which he has ‘ been an eye witneſs to, having lived in the fa- ‘ mily of the queen-mother: the Hiſtory he has writ- ‘ ten will be very curious, and will bring to light ‘ ſeveral memoirs hitherto concealed, and very ſad ‘ truths concerning the miniſtry of this cardinal, who ‘ ruled France moſt cruelly, & in virga ferrea, and ‘ with a rod of iron.’ Here you ſee two men, one of which was not fit to write, the other not the beſt diſpoſed to read the Hiſtory of cardinal Richelieu impartially. Patin hated all abuſe of ſovereign power; reaſon and nature endued him with this paſſion, which threw him into an exceſſive averſion for the cardinal; he gave credit to all the ſlanders an Hiſtorian could invent of him, and therefore could not judge as he ought to do, of the merit of this Hiſtory: for to paſs an equitable judgment, a man muſt be entirely free from affection or hatred. With much more reaſon muſt we ſay, that Matthew de Morgues was wholly unqualified to write the Hiſtory in queſtion. He had been perſecuted by his Eminence; he hated him mortally; he would conſequently have miſrepreſented matters, every thing muſt have appeared criminal to him; and if any thing had looked fair in his own eyes, he would have ſuppreſſed or tarniſhed it's luſtre. It is certain, that they who have had to do with the cardinal, have left us wretched pictures of him; ſome have ſaid too much good, and others too much ill; ſome meant to acknowledge, or to obtain, his favours, and others to revenge themſelves for his injuries; they all wanted that diſintereſtedneſs, which is eſſential to a good Hiſtorian; they either hoped, or feared, or hated (41). Matthew de Morgues would however have had this advantage, that moſt readers would have given a ſpecious name to the licence he had taken. You will find above (42), in a paſſage of Tacitus, the confirmation of what I have ſaid. It muſt be owned, that we are naturally more inclined to ſuſpect the Hiſtorians who praiſe, than thoſe who blame. See the remark [A] of the article of the marſhal de MARILLAC.

(39) Patin, Lettre ccccl viii, pag. 345, Tom. iii.

(40) Idem, Lettre dxxix, pag. 574, of the ſame volume.

(41) Statui res geſtas populi Romani . . . paucis- ſimis ea magis quod mihi à ſpe metu, partibus Reip. animus liber erat. - - - - I reſolved to write the tranſactions of the Roman people . . . . ſo much the rather as I was not engaged to any party, and was perfectly free from the influence of hope or fear. Salluſtius, in Procem. Bell. Catilin.

(42) In the article MARILLAC (Lewis de), citat. (14).

MORINUS (John Baptist) Phyſician and royal profeſſor of mathematics at Paris, was born the twenty third of February 1583, at Ville Franche in Beaujolois. He went through his courſe of Philoſophy at Aix in Provence, afterwards ſtudied Phyſic at Avignon, and was admitted Doctor there in that Faculty in the year 1613. The year following he went to Paris, and was entertained in Claude Dormi biſhop of Boulogne's family, who ſent him to make diſcoveries about the nature of metals in the mines of Hungary. He went down into the very deepeſt pits, and thinking he had diſcovered that the earth is divided like the air into three regions; he wrote a treatiſe on this ſubject [A]. Upon his return to his prelate, who entertained a Scotch Aſtrologer, he began to reliſh Judicial Aſtrology [B], and by the rules of his art calculated the events of the year 1617. He found that the biſhop of Boulogne was threatend either with death or impriſonment, and failed not to acquaint him with it. The prelate only laughed at it (a), but meddling ſoon after in ſome intrigues of ſtate, and miſtaking the right ſide, he was treated as a rebel, and caſt into priſon. Morinus was entertained by the duke of Luxemburg, brother to the conſtable de Luines, in the year 1621 [C], and lived in his

(a) And yet he was infatuated with Aſtrology. Morin. Aſtrolog. Gall. lib. xxiii, pag. 648.

[A] He wrote a treatiſe on this ſubject.] It was the firſt he publiſhed; it came out in the year 1619, under the title of Mundi ſublunaris Anatomia. They who have written his life, pretend that he proved by ſo many ſolid arguments, that the bowels of the earth are divided into three regions, that he gave a vogue to this opinion, without ſupporting it by the authority of any antient Philoſophers (1). An opinion has a vogue, when it finds followers, and this is all I mean by it. As for the reſt, this work was dedicated to Mr du Vair, keeper of the ſeals (2), who had been patron to our Morinus at Aix in Provence, when he was firſt preſident there, and who was alſo his diſciple in the Mathematics in the year 1608. Finding how well qualified Morinus was for the ſciences, he encouraged him to reſume his ſtudies. Morinus himſelf relates this. ‘ Anno quippe 1608, illuſtriſſimus D. ‘ Du Vair, Senatus Aquenſis Protopræſes, fuit meus ‘ in Mathematicis diſcipulus; qui obſervata mei inge- ‘ nii ad ſcientias aptitudine, tam validè mihi perſuaſit ‘ ſtudia mea per decennium intermiſſa repetere, ut ‘ anno 1609, Aquis Sextiis ingreſſus ſim Philoſophiæ ‘ curſum, ſub D. Marco Antonio, tunc temporis ‘ Philoſopho celeberrimo; & anno 1611, curſum Medicinæ ſub Profeſſoribus Regiis Fontano & Merindolo, viris etiam librorum editione famoſis (3). - - - ‘ For in the year 1608, the moſt illuſtrious Mr du Vair, ‘ firſt preſident of the parliament at Aix, was my ſcholar ‘ in Mathematics, who, obſerving my capacity for ‘ the ſciences, ſo powerfully perſuaded me to reſume my ‘ ſtudies, which had been diſcontinued for ten years, that, ‘ in the year 1609, I entered upon a courſe of Philoſophy ‘ at Aix, under Mr Marc Antony, a very famous Phi- ‘ loſopher at that time: and in the year 1611, a courſe ‘ of Phyſic under the royal profeſſors, Fontaine and Me- ‘ rindol, who were likewiſe famous by the books they ‘ have publiſhed.’

(1) Ut enim tres in regiones aër diſtinctus eſt, ſic etiam triplex regio in terræ viſceribus animadverti poteſt ſumma, media, infima, & id quidem validiſſimis rationum momentis adeo ſtabilivit, edito hujus argumenti ad annum 1619 libello, ut hæc ſententia etſi nulla Philoſophorum veterum authoritate fulciatur, ſuos tamen habeat ſectatores. Vita Jo. Bapt. Morini, pag. 3, num. 16.

(2) Vincentius Panurgus, in Epiſtola de tribus Impoſtoribus, pag. 14.

(3) Morinus, in Defenſione ſuæ Diſſertationis de atomis, & vacuo, pag. 5.

[B] His prelate entertained a Scotch Aſtrologer; he began to reliſh Judicial Aſtrology.] His name was Daviſon, he renounced Aſtrology, applied himſelf to Phyſic, and became very famous by his works, and by the courſe of Chemiſtry, which he publickly taught in the royal garden of Paris (4). He was invited into Poland (5), and had the honour to be firſt Phyſician to the queen (6). One thing I muſt not forget, which is very remarkable, that Daviſon grew out of conceit with Aſtrology, becauſe of the uncertainty of this art, and betook himſelf to Phyſic. Morinus, on the contrary for a like reaſon, was diſguſted with Phyſic, and applied himſelf to Aſtrology, and both with ſuch ſucceſs, that they deſerve to be ranked among the famous men of that age. Eſt vero quod in ipſo (Daviſſono) ac Morino non leviter admiremur, artium nempe quas profitebantur factam ab utroque veluti permutationem: Aſtrologiam Scotus, ſcientiam alter Medicam ſectabatur; uterque proceſſu temporis, poſt experimenta complura in arte propria, nil ſubeſſe certi deprehendit, unde animus amborum fluctuans, in quo pedem figeret, non inveniebat. Tædet itaque hunc & illum aberrantis plerumque judicii, Medicus ergo in Aſtrologum vertitur, & in Medicum Aſtrologus, tam ſecundo exitu ut beati tranſfugæ, inter hujus ætatis viros inſignes annumerari mereantur (7).

(4) It was printed at Paris in the year 1635.

(5) Vita Morini, pag. 4, num. 21.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid.

[C] Morinus was entertained by the Duke of Luxemburg . . . . in the year 1621.] They who have given us his life leave a chaſm here, which betrays their want

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

his family eight years. As ſoon as he heard of the death of Sainclair (b), royal profeſſor of Mathematics, he put in for his place and carried it. He took the oath of profeſſor in February 1630. He was adviſed to marry his predeceſſor's widow; but the firſt viſit he made her, he found ſhe was juſt going to be buried [D]. From that time he took a firm reſolution never to marry, and kept it all his life. He made himſelf many friends. He had acceſs to great men, and even to cardinal Richelieu [E]: and he obtained want of judgment. They ſay, the impriſonment of the biſhop of Boulogne had left Morinus deſtitute of ſupport, if he had not been entertained by that duke in 1621; and they had juſt before ſaid that this biſhop was impriſoned in 1617. What became then of Morinus in this interval of four years? This ought at leaſt to have been ſhewn. Let us fill up this chaſm by a paſſage of Morinus himſelf, who tells us, that after his prelate's fall, he lived with the abbot de la Bretonniere, as Phyſician in ordinary, till he was entertained by the conſtable's brother during the ſiege of Montauban. 'Manſi, ſays he, (8) apud Epiſcopum 4 an-'nis, tum ſolicitatus à reverendiſſimo D. de la Breton-'niere ſancti Ebrulphi in Normania Abbatis optimi, 'me cum ipſo durante gravi peſte Pariſienſi in Nor-'maniam contuli, ejus Medicus ordinarius. Anno 'autem 1621, dum Rex obſideret Montem Albanum, 'vocatus fui in Aulam ab illuſtriſſimo mihique valde 'amico Domino Ludovico Tronſono, Regi à ſanctio-'ribus Conſiliis & ſecretis, ut eſſem Medicus ordi-'narius Ducis à Luxemburgo, quod ægrè tulit opti-'mus Abbas. - - - - I continued with the biſhop four 'years, and then being ſollicited by the very reverend Mr 'de la Bretonniere, the excellent abbot of St Evroul in 'Normandy, I went with him into Normandy as his 'Phyſician in ordinary, during the time of the great plague 'at Paris. But in the year 1621, whilſt the king be-'ſieged Montauban, I was called to court by my good 'friend the moſt illuſtrious Mr Lewis Tronſon, privy-coun-'ſellor to the king, that I might be Phyſician in ordinary 'to the duke of Luxemburg, which the good abbot took 'ill.' He often complains of this duke's ingratitude, and ſays, it was the reaſon of his quitting him; and as he was taking his leave, he threatened him with a diſeaſe, which carried him off in two years (9).

(b) He died the twenty ninth of June 1629.

(8) Merin. in Defenſ. ſuæ Diſſertationis de atomis, pag. 106, 107.

(9) Quem devorum hii conatus deterere ob ſummam eos ingratitudinem, præſertim illi ante diſceſſum mortalem lethalem intra biennium ex ipso etiam eventus eſt. Morin. Aſtrolog. Gallica, lib. xxiii, pag. 398.

[D] He had been adviſed to marry his predeceſſor's widow . . . . . He found ſhe was juſt going to be buried.] Morinus governed himſelf by the ſtars; and finding they did not adviſe him to marry, he reſolved to live a bachelor. However, the perſuaſions of his friends ſhook him in ſuch a manner, that he thought on matrimony in good earneſt, the rather, becauſe Sainclair's widow was reputed rich, and a favourable occaſion offered of ſucceeding, not only to this profeſſor's chair, but alſo to his bed and caſh. He was going to pay his devoirs to the widow, and to make the firſt overture of his deſign. But ſeeing the door of the houſe in mourning, and underſtanding from the neighbours that the gentlewoman was juſt going to be buried, he was ſeized with an extream aſtoniſhment, and immediately ſet a fixed reſolution never to marry. No doubt this confirmed the good opinion he had conceived of Aſtrology; 'Hoc honore magiſterioque pol-'lentem familiares amici conjugio propoſito ſtabilire 'firmius voluerunt: vivebat anteceſſoris conjux memo-'rati modo Sanclari, non abjicienda quidem illa 'plane, & quam opibus non contemnendis inſtru-'ctam popularis fama jactabat, par eſt, inquiunt 'ut quemadmodum Sanclari cathedræ, ſic & ejuſdem 'opibus ducta ipſius uxore ſuccedas: conſilio iſtiuſ-'modi ſæpius repetito Morinus tandem acquievit, 'Dominamque inviſere ea mente conſtituit, & pro-'cum gerere prima vice: propior factus ædibus ni-'gra veſte videt limen obſeptum, docentque vicini 'Sanclari conjugem eſſe mox ad tumulum efferen-'dam. Id audiens quantum obſtupuerit, cogitate: 'tum vero de cœlibatu perpetuo conſilium ſibi quon-'dam ducibus aſtris injectum, certiſſimum fore decre-'vit, omnibuſque in poſterum renunciare nuptiis, & 'quicquid vitæ reliquum eſſet in doctrinis ac librorum 'ſeu lectione, ſeu ſcriptione placido tenore tranſigere, 'atque in amicorum convictu ſuaviſſime conſenescere. 'Hoc fixum apud ſe ratumque nunquam poſtea vio-'lavit. Quid enim libero lectulo jucundius? numquid 'uni conjugi moleſtiarum plerumque ſeminario tot 'amicos tamque illuſtres anteferret? (10)- - - - And he 'determined to ſpend the remainder of his life quietly in 'ſtudy, in reading and writing books, and in the agree-'able converſation of friends. This firm and fixed reſo-'lution he never afterwards broke. For what could be 'more comfortable to him than a free bed? Should he 'not prefer ſo many, and ſuch illuſtrious friends, to a wife, 'who is commonly the ſource of trouble and vexation?' All this is worthy of a profeſſor of Mathematics. His friends had been often forced to return to the charge in perſuading him to marry; they backed and ſupported the motives of duty in the caſe, by thoſe of intereſt; and when at laſt they had gotten his conſent, he prepared for his firſt viſit with ſo much tranquillity, that the Lady had time enough to die before ſhe received it. He was ſo little inquiſitive about his miſtreſs, that he heard nothing of her ſickneſs, before he knew ſhe was going to the grave; nor did he know that, but by coming himſelf to the place, to make the firſt declaration of love. This has much of the Philoſopher in it.

(10) Vita Morini, pag. 6, num. 32.

The ſcheme of his nativity preſaged him nothing but misfortunes from the female ſex (11). He confeſſes that in the year 1605, he received two dangerous wounds on account of a woman (12), and that next to the grace of GOD, he owes to Aſtrology the happineſs of ſtopping the fatal conſequences of his conſtellation: for having diſcovered the influence of a certain ſtar in the exaltation of Venus, which was found in his horoſcope, he took ſpecial care of himſelf, being apprized from whence all the misfortunes came, which he had gone through on account of women. Tot mala, infortunia, magnaque vitæ pericula mihi propter mulieres acciderunt in juventute, ut jam illa recogitando ſtupeam, multoque plura & forſan deteriora mihi acciderent, niſi Deus Opt. Max. mei miſertus fuiſſet, ab eiſque me liberaſſet, & Aſtrologia circa 35 meæ nativitatis annum quo huic ſcientiæ cœpi, infauſtæ & mihi per experientiam periculoſæ illius conſtitutionis monuiſſet (13).

(11) See the remark [O].

(12) Die nona Julii 1605, duo periculoſiſſima vulnera propter famoſam mulierem . . . . He received on the ninth of July 1605, two very dangerous wounds, upon the account of a famous woman. Morin. Aſtrolog. Gall. lib. xxiii, pag. 617. It is likely he takes the word famoſus here in a bad ſenſe.

[E] He had acceſs to great men, and even to cardinal Richelieu.] The author of Morinus's life, ſpeaks of it in theſe terms (14): 'Richelieus Cardinalis im-'menſus ille genius, judicio nunquam, ubi quempiam 'pertentaſſet, errante, dignum ea exiſtimatione Mori-'num duxit, ut ipſum ad ſecretius Muſæum admit-'teret, deque negotiis momenti graviſſimi conſuleret. '- - - Cardinal Richelieu, that vaſt genius, who was 'never miſtaken in forming a judgment of any man, 'thought Morinus ſo deſerving, that he admitted him 'to his ſecret councils, and conſulted him in matters of 'the greateſt moment.' This is a very mangled ſtory, and ſuch as panegyriſts uſually give: we do not find in it the cardinal's change to Morinus, nor this Aſtrologer's furious rage againſt the cardinal. Let us ſupply this omiſſion. Morinus being poſſeſſed with the falſe notion, that he had found out the true ſcience of longitudes, and that the cardinal did him a very great injuſtice by refuſing him the recompence which ſuch a diſcovery deſerved (15); conceived an extream indignation, and a moſt lively reſentment againſt him, which laſted as long as he lived. He went no more to wait on his Eminence, and it was only out of love to Mr Chavigny, his patron, and for the glory of Aſtrology, that he made a prognoſtication which the cardinal deſired of him. 'Priuſquam Pariſiis diſce-'deret (16) optavit ſcire quid de ſua valetudine atque 'vita ſentirem eo in itinere, non quidem per ſe (quem 'ab annis 4, non videram ob denegatam mihi re-'munerationem ſcientiæ longitudinum à me in-'ventæ (17), utcunque ſuo ſcripto eam mihi pollici-'tus fuiſſet) ſed interpoſito Magnate ſibi fidiſſimo, '& mihi amico, ſcilicet illuſtriſſimo D. Comite de 'Chavigny, qui ad tertiam uſque vicem meum ea de-'re judicium petiit, quod libenter recuſaſſem ſi potu-'iſſem: at ipſius Magnatis obſtrictus beneficiis, & 'pro honore Aſtrologiæ tandem reſpondi Cardina-'lem eo in itinere cum vitæ periculo ægrotatu-'rum (18). - - - - Before he left Paris, he deſired to 'know what I thought concerning his health and life in 'that journey, not indeed directly himſelf (for I had 'not ſeen him for four years, becauſe he refuſed me the 'recompence, tho' promiſed under his own hand, for find-'ing

(13) Id. ib.

(14) Pag. 6, num. 33.

(15) See the remark [H], at the end.

(16) This relates to his journey to Rouſillon in 1642.

(17) Teſtantur quidem omnes Aſtronomi me ſcientiam illam perfecte demonſtraſſe, ſed Cardinalis Richelius perfidia & proditione Commiſſariorum meorum me promiſſo præmio iniquè fraudavit. Morin. ubi ſupra, lib. xxiv, pag. 687.

(18) Morin, ibid. lib. xxiii, pag. 613.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

obtained from cardinal Mazarin a penſion o duly paid him. He was conſulted as to futur that his figures frequently indicated what cam in his predictions concerning a ſecretary of

' ing the ſcience of Longitudes), but by the moſt noble and
' illuſtrious count de Chavigny, his confident, and my
' good friend, who aſked me three times to give my opi- ' nion in that matter, which I would fain have de-
' clined if I could: but having obligations to this noble-
' man, and for the honour of Aſtrology, at laſt I an-
' ſwered, that the cardinal would be ſeized with a dan- ' gerous illneſs in that journey.' He ſpeaks diſadvantagiouſly of his Eminence in his books, and imputes to him all the misfortunes of Europe, and eſpecially the war between France and Spain in 1635. ' Qui
' bellis per totam Europam excitatis pluribus homi-
' num millionibus ferro, flamma, fame, peſte aliiſ-(19) Id. ib. ' que modis cauſa mortis extitit (19). - - - Who, by
' ſtirring up wars throughout all Europe, was the cauſe
' of the death of many millions, by ſword, famine, pe-
' ſtilence, and other ways. . . . Pluribus per totam Eu-
' ropam ferro, flammis, ſanguine, fame, peſte, & ca-
' daveribus horridam, idem contra Cardinalem depre-
' cantibus, quod olim Brutus poſt cladem Philippicam
' noctu aſtra intuens contra Antonium, ex Apiano,

* Ib. pag. 647. Jupiter ut ferias qui horum eſt cauſa malorum *.

' Many, over all Europe, which is become frightful to ' look at, by reaſon of the ſword, fire, blood, famine,
' peſtilence, and dead carcaſſes, imprecate the ſame curſe
' upon the cardinal, which Brutus formerly after the ' overthrow of Philippi, liſting up his eyes to the ſtars
' by night, imprecated upon Antonius from Appian,

O Jove, ſtrike the man, who is the author of all theſe calamities.

He obſerves that the cardinal declared this war without conſulting either the ſtates of the kingdom, or the parliaments. Galliâ bellis civilibus, & extraneis ad- huc vigentibus, admodum attenuatâ, Cardinalis Riche-lius, inconſultis Regni comitiis, aut Senatibus, ſed ſponte propria, horrendum bellum inter Reges Galliæ & Hiſpaniæ declaravit, quod adhuc perdurat, quamvis omnia paſſim ad extremam deſolationem redacta conſpician-(20) Id. in Diſ- tur (20). See what Mr Bernier anſwered, who acſertat. de atomis cuſed him of ingratitude, and of ſpeaking evil of the & vacuo, pag. perſon of Lewis XIII, and even of invalidating the
31. royal authority: ' An-ne, quamtumve ſit crimen
' publicè efferre, non poſſe Chriſtianiſſimum Regem
' indicere bellum, inconſultis comitiis, aut Senatibus,
' diſceptare meum non eſt . . . . verum jus belli indi-
' cendi abſtuliſſe Regi, ut illud transferres in Cardi-
' nalem Richelium, non video qui poſſit id crimen à
' publicis ac Regiis animadverſoribus tolerari. Prætereo
' quam injurius, & ingratus ſis adverſus tantum Car-
' dinalem, à quo tot bona accepiſti, & cui maledicere
' tamen tam privatim quam publicè non deſinis, eo
' dumtaxat nomine, quod exſatiare immenſam tuam
' aviditatem noluerit, dum, ob tuam illam chimæram
' longitudinum inventarum, contendiſti tibi ab illo
' deberi montes aureos. Nempe hoc loco illi attribuis (21) Berner. A- ' non modo uſurpatam tyrannice authoritatem, &c (21).
natom. ridiculi ' - - - Whether it be, or how great a crime it be, openly muris, pag. 192, ' to publiſh, that the moſt Chriſtian king cannot declare 193. ' war without conſulting the ſtates of the kingdom, or
' the parliaments, it is not my buſineſs to diſpute . . . . .
' but to take the right of declaring war from the ' king, in order to transfer it to cardinal Richelieu, is
' a crime of ſuch a nature, that I do not ſee how it can
' be tolerated by the public magiſtrate, who derives his ' authority from the king. I paſs by your injuſtice and
' ingratitude to the cardinal, from whom you have re- ' ceived ſo many favours, and whom notwithſtanding
' you are continually reviling, both in public and private,
' only forſooth becauſe he would not gratify your immenſe
' avarice, whilſt you pretended he owed you mountains of
' gold for that whimſical notion of your's of having found
' out the Longitude. For here you charge him not only
' with an uſurped tyrannical authority, &c.'

[F] It is pretended, that his figures indicated what came to paſs.] His firſt eſſay was that of foretelling the impriſonment of the biſhop of Boulogne; but his maſter-piece this way, and what gave him a mighty

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Aſtrological oracles [G]. He publiſhed a great number of books [H], but had not the without ſtaying till her nativity was rectified. Cur amabo ſiderum ille adeo peritus, & per ea rerum futurarum acerrimus indagator, Dominam ſuam Mariam Mediceam maritam de ipſo quam optime nulla opitulatione ab ſtellis obtenta juvit? Sic ajunt æmuli: nonne ſæpius exaggerant iidem de ſuis faticanis aſtrologis conqueſta eſt, ſe tanquam à præſtigiatoribus deceptam in tot calamitatum incidiſſe voragines, unde emergere nequiverit! Enimvero quidnam iſti caperatæ fronte Cenſores dicturi ſunt, ubi audierunt Reginæ hujus nativitatem nunquam à Morino exploratam fuiſſe? cum tamen paucis ante diebus quam ad exteros ſe fuga reciperet, id ipſum fieri juſſerit, aſtrologo autem Morino non admonito re infecta diſceſſiſſe (33). We ſhall ſpeak below of his predictions againſt Gaſſendus. I am very ſure the moſt incredulous cannot but be pleaſed with the paſſages which I have here related; becauſe they ſhow how the greateſt ſtateſmen ſuffer themſelves to be infatuated with judicial Aſtrology, and that even in the XVIIth century they have not been exempt from this folly, at the courts of the greateſt princes in Europe (34). Queen Chriſtina wanted to ſee Morin the firſt time ſhe had been at Paris, and declared ſhe took him to be the ableſt Aſtrologer in the world (35). It is a ſign ſhe had employed him in ſome figures, or had taken the pains to conſider thoſe he had erected. I obſerve that the miſtake of ſix days in the death of Lewis the Juſt, ſeems nothing, when we conſider it only in a general view; but when we know the circumſtances of it as related by Gaſſendus, we cannot forbear ſaying, that it was one of the greateſt mortifications an Aſtrologer could receive.

(33) Ib. pag. 15, num. 76.

(34) See the following remark.

(35) Quo primum vice Lutetiam venit Morinum ad videndum accerſi juſſit, quem in Aſtrologicis omnium perfpicaciſſimum palam & clare teſtata eſt. Vita Morini, pag. 16, num. 80.

Gaſſendus ſays, that Morinus paid him a viſit the twenty ninth of April 1643, and told him, I remember you confeſſed to me five or ſix months ago, that if I could notify the day on which a great perſon ſhould die, on whoſe nativity I had taken much pains, and who was then indiſpoſed, you will look on it as a convincing proof, both of my capacity, and of the excellence of my art. I now come to acquaint you that the king will die upon the eighth of May next. Gaſſendus has not forgot to obſerve, that Morinus had given him no anſwer concerning this great perſon, who was ill at that time, and who died ſoon after (36). He obſerves alſo, that about the end of April 1643, the Phyſicians declared, that Lewis XIII would die in a ſhort time, but as to the day of his death, there was a diſagreement among them. Morinus declared to Gaſſendus, that the third of May would be extreamly dangerous to this monarch, who however ſhould linger out five days longer and no more. Gaſſendus, without dwelling on the conſideration, that this prognoſtic was made at a time when there was no hopes of the king's recovery, waited for the event as a thing that might be of ſome conſequence, with reſpect to Aſtrology, ſince he had no reaſon to ſuſpect that the ſymptoms obſerved by the Phyſicians, ſerved as a foundation to Morinus's prediction, and knew withal, that this Aſtrologer had ſtudied the nativity of Lewis XIII, with infinite application, and boaſted that he had by it diſcovered the days of each particular incident in the courſe of this monarch's life. If therefore this art had any kind of certainty, it muſt be in relation to the laſt day of the king's life. And obſerve Gaſſendus was informed, that Morinus had told others, that, by the rules of Aſtrology, the king was in danger of dying not only the eighth of May, and ſome days preceding, but alſo on the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth of the ſame month. He ſaid nothing of the fourteenth, which yet was the day of his death (37). Thus we manifeſtly ſee, that his pretended ſcience was illuſive, and that the miſtake of ſix days is in this caſe a deciſive blow.

(36) This was undoubtedly cardinal Richelieu.

(37) I take this from the 128th and 129th pages of Mr Bernier's Anatomia ridiculi morin; but it is a paſſage which Mr Bernier owns from Gaſſendus's Apology, Adverſus animadverſiones Jo. Morini.

[G] He was not fortunate in his predictions concerning a ſecretary of ſtate .... who depended much on his Aſtrological oracles.] I mean the count de Chavigni, and ſhall give an inſtance of his credulity with relation to Aſtrology. Having determined to go into Provence in the year 1646, he deſired to have Morinus along with him; but as this Aſtrologer never undertook any thing without the approbation of the ſtars, he would not venture upon this journey, except they promiſed him good ſucceſs. He therefore deſired time to conſult them, and after that, promiſed to accompany his Mecenas (38). He deſired he would leave it to him to chuſe a propitious hour for their departure, and aſſured him, that experience would teach him, how material a thing it is to ſet out in an enterprize under a favourable diſpoſition of the ſtars (39). Mr de Chavigny would conteſt no ſuch point with him, but aſſured him of his entire ſubmiſſion. Morinus found, that the beſt time to ſet out would be upon the ninth of May, nine minutes after four in the morning, and deſired that every thing might be ready that moment. The orders of the ſecretary were ſo punctual and ſo well executed, that every thing was accordingly ready at that inſtant. He had four good dials in his garden, on which they obſerved for half an hour together, the approach of the critical minute, and took coach precisely at the time when the ſhadow on the dial had reached this minute. They arrived happily at Antibes: and when Mr Chavigny, who was count of it, was about to return to Paris, he was informed by his Aſtrologer, that it was requiſite to conſult the Heavens about the hour of their departure. He was no leſs tractable now than he had been the firſt time, he ordered every thing to be got ready with ſuch exactneſs, that he and his retinue were on horſeback preciſely at twenty ſeven minutes after four in the morning of the ſecond of July. 'Fuerunt rurſus omnia pro diſceſſu parata ad 'ipſum momentum, expectavitque mecum illuſtriſſi- 'mus Dominus in ſuo cubiculo, feneſtris ad Orientem 'apertis donec ſolem ortum conſpexit, tuncque ſine 'more conſcendit equum cum toto comitatu (40). .... 'All things were again got ready againſt the moment 'prefixed, and the moſt noble count and I waited in his 'bed-chamber, the windows towards the eaſt being open, 'till he ſaw the ſun riſen, and then immediately he took 'horſe with all his retinue.' Their return was very proſperous, the maſter, and ſervants, and horſes, arrived all in good health, notwithſtanding the heat of the ſeaſon. But when he came to Paris, he diſcovered ſome intrigues of the cabinet againſt his fortune. He was accuſed among other things, of having taken an Aſtrologer with him to conſult about the deſtiny of the king, the queen, and cardinal Mazarin, &c. (41). Finding that his adverſaries had made him greatly ſuſpected, he twice deſired Morinus to tell him whether the ſtars threatned him with any misfortune. Morinus anſwered him they did not, and adviſed him to wait on the cardinal; but precautioned him, that all hours were not alike propitious, and that he would chooſe him one by the rules of Aſtrology. He choſe him an hour in which the tenth houſe, which is that of dignities, went very well (42). Chavigny followed his directions, and was very well received by the cardinal (43). I only relate all theſe things to ſhew the weakneſs of thoſe who ſometimes ſit at the helm. The deſtiny of nations and kingdoms is in their hands, whilſt their own depends upon the caprices and viſions of an Aſtrologer. Their paſſions and ideas have commonly a greater ſhare in the government, than the will of the monarch, becauſe they dextrouſly infuſe into him whatever they have a mind to. And thus whilſt they are managed by the counſels of an Aſtrologer, may it not be ſaid, that the happineſs and miſery of the people depend on this Aſtrologer? This ſecretary of ſtate was named in the year 1645, for the embaſſy to Munſter (44). It is probable he would have taken Morinus along with him, to know the critical minute when this or that memorial ought to be preſented, or this or that anſwer given. Would not this have been hazarding a thouſand good opportunities of advancing the general peace ſo neceſſary to all Europe? Morinus made ſuch account of the doctrine of elections (45), that he believed, there was nothing more uſeful to kings, or their firſt miniſters, than a council of three Aſtrologers who ſhould have the ſchemes of nativity, not only of all the neighbouring princes, but alſo of all the great men of the court (46). By this means, ſaid he, we ſhould know the favourable conjuncture to begin a war, what confederate prince would act firſt, and what generals ought to be choſen. We ſhould not give the chief directions, as is uſually done, to an unſucceſsful prince; we ſhould not take the year that is moſt adverſe to him, and moſt propitious to the prince, his enemy; we ſhould not chuſe unfortunate generals: and what I have ſaid, adds he, of war, ought to be applied to the marriages of kings, embaſſies, &c.

(38) Morin. Aſtrolog. Gallica, lib. xxvii, cap. vii.

(39) Illuſtriſſimum Dominum . . . ab Aſtrologia non alienum rogavi, ut ipſi placeret me diem & horam ad proficiſcendum fortunatam eligere, ſeque expertorum quanti eſſet momenti ſuſcepta ſub congruo cœli ſtatu inchoare; Ibid. pag. 778.

(40) Ibid. pag. 782.

(41) Ibid. pag. 783.

(42) Ibid. pag. 784.

(43) Ibid.

(44) Ibid. pag. 779. This nomination was revoked.

(45) Thus the Aſtrologers call the choice of the times, according to the aſpects of the planets, and the poſition of the Heavens.

(46) Morin. Ibid. cap. iii, pag. 773.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the ſatisfaction to ſee his favourite work printed

Let us now come to the falſities of his predictions concerning the count de Chavigny.

He had foretold that lord ſhould have a fit of ſickneſs, but ſaid nothing of his impriſonment: Yet Mr de Chavigny continued in good health, but was made a priſoner. Now ſee how they excuſe this Aſtrologer: They pretend that he foreſaw both the impriſonment and and the ſickneſs, and was more inclined to determine for the former, but did quite the contrary, becauſe Mr de Chavigny had declared, that he would laugh at any prediction of impriſonment. 'Ultimum 'quod infimulant Chavignii carcer eſt, quæ ſolum fuit 'erroris interceptio: cum enim in annua ipſius revo- 'lutione ex aſtris & morbum & carcerem colligeret, & 'ad carcerem prædicendum proclivior fuiſſet Aſtrologus, 'ægritudine tamen rem decidit. Namque & ipſe Cha- 'vignius hujus forte qui carceris eſſet, metus diſſimu- 'lator, aut tale nihil ſibi metuens (ſe quippe apud au- 'lam gratioſiſſimum eſſe confidebat) carcerem ſibi fru- 'ſtra intentari dixerat; vates itaque noſter arti ſuæ 'non ſatis credulus hac vice hallucinatus eſt (47) - - - 'For Mr de Chavigny believed he was in very great 'favour at court: and therefore our Aſtrologer diſtruſt- 'ing a little his own art, was for this time miſtaken.' A poor excuſe! He was likewiſe reproached with being deceived about the marriage of this lord's daughter. I relate Mr Bernier's words ſomewhat at length, becauſe they let us ſee the impoſtures of this ſort of people: 'Illis (quos habere amicos vultis & à quibus mag- 'nam mercedem ſperatis) ſcilicet omnia fauſta, ac vi- 'tam præcipue longævam pollicemini; nam aliqua 'quidem hiſce, illiſque temporibus occurſura pericula; 'ſed benignos eſſe ſiderum aſpectus, qui malignis po- 'tentiores, illa ſuperanda præmonſtrent. Quamquam 'ne ſic quidem defugere odium, ac infamiam poteſtis; 'cum loquuti ad gratiam, & juxta inania veſtra placita, 'ſpe inani illos lactatis, quâ ſe deluſos dum ſentiunt, 'mirum quibus vos, artemque veſtram diris devoveant. 'Id vero, ut tibi imprimis contingat, familiare eſt, cui 'publicitùs exprobrata ſunt innumera prope, & nota 'publicè exempla, ut circa filiam illuſtris Comitis Chia- 'vinii; ut circa filium illuſtris Præſidis Gobelini; ut 'circa Præfectum ærarii Bullonium; ut circa illum, cu- 'jus cauſâ cæſus fuſtibus, litem intentaſti coram Judice 'ſanctæ Genovefæ. (48) - - - - For, to thoſe (whom you 'would make your friends, and from whom you expect great 'rewards) you progneſticate every thing fortunate, and 'eſpecially long life; and though they will meet with ſome 'dangers in theſe times, yet the aſpects of the ſtars being 'kind and more powerful than thoſe that are unkind, ſhew 'that they will overcome them. But not even thus can 'you eſcape hatred and infamy; for as you ſpeak according 'to the favour of your own ſilly imaginations, you feed 'them with vain hopes, whereby when they find them- 'ſelves deluded, they damn you and your art both to the 'pit of hell. But this commonly happens to you in parti- 'cular, who are reproached with a thouſand notorious 'inſtances, as with regard to the count de Chavigny's 'daughter, the illuſtrious preſident Gobelin's ſon, the trea- 'ſurer Buillon, and him upon whoſe account being cud- 'gelled, you entered an action before the judge of St Ge- 'nevieve.'

(47) Vita Morini, pag. 16, num. 79.

(48) Berner. Anatomia ridic. muris, pag. 138. Morin. Defenſ. Diſſert. pag. 121, anſwering Bernier, denies what concerns the daughter of Mr de Chavigni.

[H] He publiſhed a great number of books.] Since I have already ſpoken of the firſt (49), I ſhall here begin with the ſecond. It was printed in the year 1623, under the title of Aſtronomicarum domorum cabala detecta. In 1624 (50), not being able to anſwer by word of mouth (as he had prepared for it) the Theſes which Antony Villon (51) would maintain, he anſwered them in writing. This Villon, who commonly went by the name of the Philoſophical Soldier, had poſted up theſes againſt Ariſtotle's doctrine, which were to be defended at the late queen Magaret's palace. The aſſembly was very numerous, when the firſt preſident ſent an order to Villon and his two companions, not to maintain their propoſitions. There was afterward a decree of parliament againſt them, and againſt their theſes. See the French Mercury (52), where you will find an abſtract of Morinus's treatiſe againſt the doctrine of thoſe Innovators. It is ſaid in his life (53), that this book got him the reputation of an able Chemiſt, and a ſubtle Philoſopher, and upon this occaſion we are told a thing which is worth relating. Morinus had applied himſelf to Chemical

(49) In the remark [A].

(50) See his Life, pag. 9, num. 38.

(51) He was of Provence. Vinc. Panurgus, de tribus Impoſtoribus, pag. 57.

(52) Tom. x, pag. 504, and the following, ad ann. 1624.

(53) Pag. 9, num. 38.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and did not come out till after his death. I ſpeak of his Aſtrologia Gallica (c). He had among other adverſaries the famous Gaſſendus [I]. He died at Paris the ſixth of November

(c) See the remark [K].

'tia conſecutus eſt (65). - - - - At laſt, the reward he obtained from the king and his privy-council, ſhewed, that his labour was not loſt as on barren ground, for having humbly preſented to them a petition in the year 1645, he obtained a yearly penſion of two thouſand livres upon the abbey of Royaumont.' Let us not omit his Aſtrological notes againſt the marquis de Villennes (66), nor his Confutation of the Preadamites (67). This marquis pretended to Aſtrology, and was willing the public ſhould know it; for he got a book on this ſubject printed, which is aſcribed to Ptolomy (68). About four years after Morinus attacked him with a little too much heat, as the writer of his life confeſſes (69), excuſing him however on his great zeal for the truth (70). I am indebted to Mr Clement, who ſo well deſerves the place he is in (71) on account of his learning and obliging temper; I am, I ſay, indebted to him for a catalogue of John Baptiſt Morinus's works, wherein I have found ſome treatiſes not mentioned by the writer of his life: Here are two of this nature. Ad auſtrales & boreales aſtrologos pro aſtrologia reſtituenda epiſtolæ (72). Letters written to the Sieur Morinus, approving his diſcovery of the Longitude, and his anſwer to Herigone (73).

I ſhall lengthen out this note to give more light to Morinus's pretenſions about the Longitude. He maintained (74) with the greateſt aſſurance, that the commiſſioners named by the cardinal ſtarted a thouſand cavils upon him the day of the experiment; but that he came off ſo happily as to force them to own to the aſſembly, that his demonſtrations were good. Ten days after, continues he, the Sieurs Paſchal, Mydorge, Beaugrand, Boulenger, and Herigone (75) met by order of the cardinal to examine this doctrine a-new upon the four points, which his Eminence preſcribed them. They gave a judgment quite contrary to their firſt declaration, and ſhewed it the cardinal, who commanded them to publiſh it. Morinus appealed from them to the moſt famous Aſtronomers of Europe, and obtained their deciſion, condemning the ſecond ſentence of the commiſſioners. ' Ab illis commiſſariis ' proditus, & à Cardinali Richelio fraudatus promiſſo ' præmio, de illa ſecunda ſententia provocavi ad celebriores Europæ Aſtronomos quibus ſcripſi librumque ' meum tranſmiſi, qui omnes ſuis ad me reſponſis primam ſententiam approbarunt, ſecundum vero falſitatis & iniquitatis unanimiter condemnarunt (76). - - - ' Being betrayed by thoſe commiſſioners, and deprived by cardinal Richelieu of the promiſed reward, I appealed from the ſecond ſentence to the moſt eminent Aſtronomers of Europe, to whom I wrote and tranſmitted my book, all of whom, in their anſwers to me, approved the the firſt ſentence, but condemned the ſecond as falſe and unjuſt.' This did him no kindneſs as long as the cardinal lived, but was not uſeleſs after his death; for Morinus addreſſing himſelf to the king's council, and publiſhing a long narrative, obtained juſtice by a penſion of two thouſand livres. He made it appear, that the commiſſioners had betrayed their conſcience to pleaſe the cardinal. I relate this, as I find it in his own book; but I give little credit to it. Poſtulationem meam narratoriam quanta potui arte compoſui, ut evidentiſſime pateret injuſtitia in me perpetrata à Cardinali Richelio, quem conſtabat excitaſſe Commiſſarios meos ut ſuam in me ſecundam ferrent ſententiam primæ ac veræ prorſus contrariam (77). He eſpecially meant the Sieur Herigone, and wrote violently againſt him. He denies that he had ever been his diſciple. ' Fallitur ' dum ait Herigonum fuiſſe meum in Mathematicis ' præceptorem. Nam dum in illum ſcripſi, quod ' fuiſſet ignarus, perfidus & proditor Judex in mea ' Longitudinum cauſa: pro ſua defenſione mihi reſpondens inania, non oblitus fuiſſet mihi exprobrare, ' quod ejus fuiſſem diſcipulus ingratiſſimus (78). - - - - ' He is miſtaken, in ſaying that Herigone had been my maſter in Mathematics. For having ſaid in my book againſt him, he was an ignorant, falſe, and perfidious judge in my cauſe of the Longitude: in his frivolous anſwer by way of defence, he would not have forgot to upbraid me with having been his ungrateful diſciple.'

[I] He had amongſt other adverſaries the famous Gaſſendus.] The original of the diſpute was this. In the year 1642, Gaſſendus printed two letters which he had written to Peter du Puy, de motu impreſſo à motore tranſlato. Here he ſtrongly combats the objections of thoſe, who ſay the earth does not move: Morinus was one of them, and ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the Copernican ſyſtem. He therefore believed himſelf the perſon attacked, and complained, that Gaſſendus, violating the the laws of their antient friendſhip, became the aggreſſor. In a word, he took pen in hand and publiſhed a book againſt Gaſſendus in 1643 (79). Gaſſendus confuted it the ſame year, without any heat, but with much ſtrength of reaſon (80). He did not publiſh this book, and even engaged to ſuppreſs it, when he was reconciled to Morinus by the mediation of the baron of Tourves (81). It was printed for all this in 1649, with a violent preface compoſed by Neuré, the author's friend. Gaſſendus excuſed himſelf upon it to Morinus and proteſted he knew nothing of the printing of his work (82). His letter was publiſhed by Morinus who joined it to a book which he printed. Gaſſendus writ him another letter, complaining of his having publiſhed the former. But Morinus printed alſo a fragment of this ſecond letter, together with a new libel. Hereupon Gaſſendus broke off all correſpondence with him, and would take no more notice of the writings of ſuch an adverſary: but his friends took the thing in another manner; they publiſhed his ſecond letter entire, and reſolved to ſtrike this Aſtrologer home. Accordingly, when his Diſſertation came out de atomis & vacuo, publiſhed at Paris in 1650, againſt Epicurus's Philoſophy, which Gaſſendus had put out (83), they handled it unmercifully. Bernier publiſhed a book (84) intituled, Anatomia ridiculi muris, which was followed two years after by the Favilla ridiculi muris, in which he quite demoliſhes the apology which Morinus printed (85) for his Diſſertation. This enraged him to that degree, that he put out (86) a book with this title; Vincentii Panurgi epiſtola de tribus impoſtoribus. Theſe three impoſtors were Gaſſendus, Bernier, and Neuré.

He was chiefly expoſed on his preſuming to foretel that Gaſſendus ſhould be ſeized with a mortal diſtemper in the year 1650, and that the effects of it ſhould appear, either at the end of July, or the beginning of Auguſt. This Aſtrological prediction was falſe, and drew on the author a terrible peal of reproaches and inſults. ' Qua providentia factum dicam, ' they are Mr Bernier's words (87), ò rerum bonarum ' inaniſſime, futiliſſimeque Morine! ut ultro mihi præ' bueris anſam, quam captare ab aliquot elapſis men' ſibus geſtiebam (neque ego ſolus, ſed multi etiam ' alii, quibus veritas cordi eſt) ut propalarem, ſcilicet ' mendaciloquium illud inſigne, quo in æternum op' probrium tuæ damnatæ aſtrologiæ auſus es ſecure at' que impudenter prædicere ter, & publicis etiam ſcrip' tis evulgare, Gaſſendum mortali morbo laboraturum, & vim morbi extremam, ex qua deberet ejus mors conſequi, futuram in ipſomet Julii, Auguſtique confinio ſuperioris anni milleſimi ſexenteſimi quinquageſimi. - - - - ' By what providence ſhall I ſay it happened, O Morinus, thou vaineſt and ſilliеſt of mortals! that of your own accord you ſhould give me the handle I was deſirous to take theſe ſeveral months paſt (and not only I, but many others too, who love the truth) to publiſh that notorious lie, whereby, to the eternal diſgrace of your condemned Aſtrology, you dared impudently to foretel three times, and even in writings to publiſh, that Gaſſendus ' would be ſick, &c.' Morinus (88) anſwered, as all falſe prophets do, that he did not poſitively foretel Gaſſendus's death that year, but only warned him of a mortal danger, which might be avoided by good precautions. One of his antagoniſts was more exact than Mr Bernier, for he acknowledged the Aſtrologer's reſtrictions. ' Aſtrologus Morinus ad ſtabiliendam ' amplius ſuarum prædictionum certitudinem judicat ' ex aſtris ac divinat, ſed cum præcautionibus conſue' tis Almanachiſtarum quod D. Gaſſendus morietur an' no 1650 (89). - - - - - Morinus the Aſtrologer, to con' firm the certainty of his predictions, judges and di' vines by the ſtars, but with the uſual precautions of ' Almanack-makers, that Gaſſendus will die in the year ' 1650.' But notwithſtanding all his little precautions, this Aſtrologer deſerved to be expoſed as he was. I ſhall not relate all that Gaſſendus has obſerved

(65) Ibid. num. 54.

(66) See the Mercure Galant, Tom. i, where the academy of Ambignac is ſpoken of, and that for the month of February 1678, pag. 93.

(67) Refutatio compendioſa erroneæ ac deteſtandi libri de Præadamitis. Vita Morin. pag. 10, num. 45.

(68) Centiloquium Ptolemæo vulgò adſcriptum. Ib. num. 43.

(69) Si quid in eo eſt quod quiſpiam jure poſſit carpere, non diffitebor contra Authorem hunc nobilem calentis ingenii leves quaſdam inſultus haberi. Ibid.

(70) Præfervidi erat, neque ſat toleranti animi, ſed qui amore veritatis caleret ardentius. Ibid.

(71) At Paris in the king's library.

(72) Printed in the year 1628, in 8vo.

(73) Printed in 1635, in 4to.

(74) Morin. Aſtrologia Gall. lib. xxiii, pag. 623.

(75) They were ownmiſſioners in this cauſe.

(76) Morin. ubi ſupra.

(77) Id. ib.

(78) Morin. in Defenſ. Differt. pag. 107.

(79) Intituléd, Ake telluris fra-ctus.

(80) His confutation is contained in the third letter of the treatiſe de motu impreſſo à motore tranſlato, Oper. Tom. iii, Edit. Lugdun. 1658.

(81) Morin. in Defenſ. Diſſertat. pag. 21.

(82) Ibid. See alſo the Anatom. ridiculi muris, pag. 8.

(83) At Lyons in the year 1649, in three volumes in folio.

(84) At Paris in the year 1651.

(85) At Paris in the year 1651.

(86) At Paris in the year 1654.

(87) Bernerius, in Anatom. ridicali muris, pag. 127.

(88) Morin. in Defenſ. Diſſertat. pag. 114.

(89) Apud Morin. ibid. pag. 112.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

November 1656, and was buried in his par

(d) Taken from his Life, printed in Latin before his Aſtr printed in French, at Paris, i ſerved upon it (90), but content my ſelf with theſe words of his abridger (91). 'Here I might particularly mention the ſcheme of the nativity of Mr Maridat (92), a member of the great council, in which we might ſee that the Aſtrologer John Baptiſt Morinus who erected it, has ſucceeded much like Noſtradamus in that of Mr Suffredy; but all this is ſo full of fooleries and impertinences, and falſe events, and ſmells ſo ſtrong of the juggler and gipſy, whoſe end is only to deceive and get a piece of money, that I can hardly think of it with patience. I ſhall only ſay to the eternal ſhame of this Aſtrologer, Morinus, that ſeeing Gaſſendus, who made a jeſt of his judicial Aſtrology, was infirm, and ſeized with a defluxion on his lungs, he was ſo impudent as to foretel, and publiſh to the world in a printed paper, that he ſhould die about the latter end of July, or the beginning of Auguſt, 1650; pretending hereby to erect a trophy to his Aſtrology; and yet Gaſſendus was never in better health than at that time, and ſo recovered his ſtrength, that on the fifth of February the next year (93) we walked I remember up the mountain of Toulon to make the experiment of a Vacuum.'

(90) Gaſſend. Phyſicæ, Sect. II, lib. vi, pag. 747, Tom. 1, Operum.

(91) Bernier, Abregé de la Philoſophie de Gaſſendi, Tom. iv, pag. 485, 486, Edit. de 1684.

(92) See it in Gaſſendus, ubi ſupra, pag. 746, 747.

MORINUS's ſubterfuges when his prophecies proved falſe.

It is pleaſant enough to ſee how many evaſions Morinus made uſe of, when his predictions failed. He ſuppoſed, that the influences of the ſtars did not act neceſſarily, and that a wiſe man could over-rule them. 'Poteſt qui ſciens eſt (hoc eſt qui propria vel alterius 'ſcientia monitus eſt) multos ſtellarum effectus averſtere, ex Ptolomæo Aphor. 5. centiloquii. Qui eſt ipſemet Aphoriſmus quem citat D. Thomas, dum ſuperius dixit ſapiens dominabitur aſtris (94). - - - - A wiſe man (that is, he who is warned by his own or another's knowledge) may avert many effects of the ſtars, according to the fifth aphoriſm of Ptolomy's Centiloquium. Which is the very aphoriſm cited by S. Thomas, where he ſaid, the wiſe will over-rule the ſtars.' Applying this to his prediction againſt Gaſſendus, he obſerves that this Philoſopher avoided the blow by good and ſalutary precautions, by a regular diet, and moderate exerciſe, and by removing to Toulon where the air was more agreeable to his conſtitution (95). He adds, that perhaps the fear of the prediction made him pray to GOD more earneſtly to preſerve his health, and that his prayers being heard contradicted Aſtrology, which otherwiſe would not have been erroneous (96). 'Deinde etiamſi data 'prædictio mea Tabellioni, fuiſſet quò ad effectum ab 'Aſtris naturaliter inevitabilis, nonne Gaſſendus prædictionis meæ conſcius ex ſupra poſitis, potuiſſet ut 'Ezechias lib. 4. Reg. cap. 20. rogare DEUM ſecretò, quo ipſum à morbo vel morte liberaſſet ſupernaturaliter, ſicque deluſus & adhuc pro falſo propheta habitus fuiſſem? Nonne ægroti & nautæ in procella de vita naturaliter deſperantes votis liberantur . . . . His ergo omnibus ſupernaturaliter liberatis, nunquid Aſtrologus mortem eo tempore prædicens ex cauſis naturalibus, pro falſo Propheta erit habendus? Certe non magis quam Jonas, qui ex ipſius DEI verbo Ninivitis, & urbis & hominum univerſalem prædixit ſubverſionem; quæ tamen non eſt ſubſecuta, quod inſigni pœnitentiâ à Rege ad minimum pecus, ſibi precaverint adverſus iram DEI, qui illorum miſertus eſt (97). - - - - And then, tho' my prediction had been naturally infallible with regard to the influence of the ſtars, might not Gaſſendus, being forewarned of it, have followed the example of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. and prayed to GOD in ſecret, that he would deliver him from death and diſeaſe in a ſupernatural way, and thus I ſhould have been deceived, and looked upon as a falſe prophet? Are not ſick perſons and mariners in a ſtorm, who naturally deſpair of life, ſometimes delivered by prayers . . . . All theſe then being in a ſupernatural way preſerved, muſt an Aſtrologer, who foretels death at that time from natural cauſes, be accounted a falſe prophet? Surely no more than Jonas, who, by the command of GOD, propheſied the utter deſtruction of the city and people of Nineveh, which however did not happen, becauſe, by a ſignal repentance, they all, from the king to the ſmalleſt of the cattle, guarded againſt the wrath of GOD, who took

(93) That is to ſay, in the year 1650, which is the following year with regard to the time when Morinus publiſhed his prophecy, he publiſhed it in 1649. Mr Bernier, in abridging, forgot to remove this equivoque.

(94) Morin. in Defenſ. Differtat. pag. 114.

(95) Ibid. pag. 116, 117.

(96) Fortaſſis Gaſſendus mortem admodum metuens, nec omnino ſuæ conſidens rigidæ diætæ, DEUM precatus eſt, qui ipſum exaudivit. Ib. pag. 120.

(97) Ibid. pag. 119.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

What Guy Patin has said of him deserves relating [K]. He speaks of him as of a mad man; and it is certain there was a spice of madness in that head of his. Morinus was strangely perplexed about his saying, that Antichrist was born [L]. But as absurd as he was as the sweetest consolation (102). III. That he was sordidly covetous, and set his schemes only to get money by them. He answers the first reproach by proving, that from the time he was admitted Physician, till he was made professor of Mathematics, he had lived either with the bishop of Boulogne, or the abbot of la Bretonniere, or the duke of Luxemburg (103). Observe, that he was but thirty years old when he was made Doctor of Physic. See the last remark (104). He confutes the second reproach, by maintaining, that if they enquire of his neighbours, and particularly of Mr Colletet, or of the judges of St Genevieve, or of the Fathers of the Christian doctrine, they will find that they never heard of this adventure (105). Lastly, he says, that he is not covetous, nor never was, and that the stars shew him to be as liberal as Gassendus is niggardly, according to the scheme of his nativity. He maintains, that his private lectures of Astrology had been worth to him an hundred thousand livres, if he would have taken all the scholars he might have had: But that he had always refused even those who were eminent for their quality: That he need only instance his nieces: GOD has provided for them, says he, by my labours and expences. I have put two of them into the convents of Ville-Franche; and as to the third who intends to marry, I have a thousand crowns in ready money for her portion when ever a match offers. Nec curent amplius de pecuniis necessariis ad conjugia nepotularum mearum . . . Placuit enim DEO suam erga illas providentiam exercere meis laboribus atque expensis: duas enim feci Religiosas Francopoli, in Monasteriis B. Mariæ Visitationis, & Divæ Ursulinæ; & quia nubere vult tertia, ad hujus præsentaneam dotem, seorsim reposita sunt à me librarum tria millia. Quod abest à me dici vanitatis gratia: sed duntaxat ad repellendum à me tetrum illud avaritiæ sordidæ crimen, quod mihi imponit Anatomista murium. Etenim pro tenuitate mea etiam à puero fui semper liberalis; quippe tantum natus ad liberalitatem, quantum Gassendus ad avaritiam, ut ex utriusque figuris cœlestibus atque vitâ patebit, nullisque unquam peperci sumptibus pro veritatis & honoris mei defensione. Sique lucri & pecuniarum fuissem cupidus, plus quam centum millia librarum mihi comparassem Parisiis, ex privatis solum Astrologiæ lectionibus; sed nullos habere volui discipulos etiam Magnates, mihi qualem voluissem mercedem offerentes (106). In another book (107) he acquaints the public, that he had married her as she desired, notwithstanding the misfortunes of the war. This is no such mighty matter, for he confesses his annual income was about four thousand livres (108). He acknowledges he was obliged to Astrology for this fortune: It was by that he got into the good graces of Mary de Medicis, who procured him the professorship (109).

[K] What Guy Patin has said of him deserves relating.] 'I hear that the Astrologia Gallica of the Sieur John 'Morinus a native of Ville-Franche in Beaujolois, formerly Doctor of Physic at Valence (110), the king's 'professor in Mathematics in our college royal, is 'at last printed at the Hague in Holland. I am 'told there are a great many abusive reflexions in it 'on the Physicians of Paris, and others who do not 'approve judicial Astrology, or Chemistry; and I do 'not wonder at it, for the man was mad: there are 'two volumes of it in folio. The queen of Poland 'has given two thousand crowns towards the charge 'of the edition, at the instance of a secretary of her's 'who is fond of Astrology. Thus you see how princes 'are cheated: if it were a good book that might 'be useful to the public, no Printer would have been 'found, nor any body else that would have undertaken 'it (111).' He had said in another letter (112), 'I have 'yet another death to tell you of. It is that of the Sieur 'Morinus of Beaujolois, king's professor in Mathema'tics. So that you see him dead at the year's end as 'well as Mr Gassendus: but there is no danger of 'their biting one another now; for one lies at St Ni'colas in the Fields, the other at St Stephen's on 'the Hill. One was a very sober man, the other 'crack-brained and half mad; but be it how it will, 'it is certain they will be upon the level in the 'other world in spite of all the Mathematics, and all 'the pretended judicial Astrology, which Morinus was 'bewitched with.' It is true, that Morinus's Astrologia Gallica was printed at the Hague in the year 1661. But it is only one volume in folio, divided into twenty six books. The author was thirty years about it: he hoped to have lived to see it out of the press (113); for he had already sent the fourteen first books to the Dutch Bookseller who was to print it, but death came and cut off that hope. There are two Epistles Dedicatory before this volume; one is the author's to Jesus Christ, the other is by an anonymous hand (114) to Louisa Mary de Gonzague, queen of Poland. This princess encouraged Morinus to this great labour, and paid the charges of the impression. Authori animum ne tanto operi deesset, subsidium ut illud in publicum proferret, regali cura, regali munificentia addidisti (115). When there was a talk of marrying her to some prince, Morinus declared, that this marriage would never take effect, and that she was destined to marry a monarch. This was one of his best predictions; and the author of his life makes the most of it. 'At quam omnibus suis partibus ab'solutum fuit vaticinium illud Mariæ, tunc Principi, 'nunc vero Reginæ Poloniæ ab Morino editum! de 'futuro ipsius conjugio cum illustrissimo Principe dide'batur rumor, quod quidem potissimum illi fuisset, 'ac plurimæ dignitatis: nihilominus tamen haud 'ineundum fore nostrer asseruit, cum Regem ei con'jugem astra pollicerentur (116). - - - - - But how ex'actly accomplished was that prophecy of Morinus, with 'regard to Mary, then a princess, but now queen of Po'land! a report was spread that she was to be mar'ried to a most illustrious prince, which indeed would 'have been a very considerable and honourable match for 'her: Morinus however affirmed it would never happen, 'because the stars promised her a king for her husband.' I could easily believe, that he had the assurance to give out this prediction: for besides that this princess was a royal match, and probably enough might marry a king; we must know, that Morinus, was naturally very fool-hardy, and had a great many back doors to creep out at, in case his prediction proved false (117). Besides this lady had great faith in Astrology, and it is to such that the Astrologers most confidently promise dignities. The abbot de Marolles, who perfectly knew her, deserves to be cited. 'Another time, says 'he (118), speaking against judicial Astrology at 'the princess's, who was very much inclined in fa'vour of it, because of the advantage and satisfaction 'there was in knowing futurities, I had against me 'not only her secretary, who was a man of sense, and 'versed in this science, and her first Physician Augu'stine Corade, who practises with so much success, 'but also the abbot of Belozane, and some others.' We need not wonder at her expences on a book, the author of which had flattered her with the hopes of a crown, which she actually obtained. It is possibly to this Astrological promise she alluded, when she gave the following answer. 'She was at the palace 'of Orleans, where as the abbot de la Riviere told 'her, he passionately desired to see her Monsieur's 'wife; she replied laughing, that Monsieur was not 'a king, and that she was destined to be a queen '(119).' The abbot de Marolles tells this, where he relates the visits she made after the ceremony of her marriage with the king of Poland.

[L] He said that Antichrist was born.] And even that he was immediately to appear, and in a little time to make all the conquests which tradition promises him. When Morinus was asked, how it was possible for Antichrist to seize on so many fortified towns in so short a time, he answered, that he would send an army of Magicians from the clouds, who should kill the soldiers and inhabitants. Almost half mankind, added he, are Magicians, as they assure us, who have been at the Devil's assembly; and all Magicians are military men. Ecce enim jam fabula non es ob famosam illam non modo adventantis, sed etiam jam pro foribus existentis Antichristi prædictionem; de quadam ex te quæreretur, qui posset tam cito, ac ipse efferres, expugnare Antichristus tot arces munitissimas; Solitus fuisti

(102) Ibid. pag. 103.

(103) Ibid. pag. 106, 107.

(104) Citat. (37).

(105) Ibid. pag. 108.

(106) Ibid. pag. 120.

(107) In Præfat. Astrolog. Gallic. pag. 31. See his words, Tertiam ad votum suum marito copulavi etiam difficillimis bellorum nostrorum temporibus.

(108) Ibid.

(109) Ibid.

(110) He should have said, at Avignon.

(111) Guy Patin, Letter cxxxiii. dated the eighteenth of February 1661, pag. 319, Tom. II.

(112) The eighth. It is dated the seventh of November 1656. See pag. 419, of the first Tome of Patin's Letters.

(113) Jam editionis hujus operis triginta annos integros accuratissimè limati stabat in procinctu, librosque quatuordecim priores ad Typographum Batavum transtulerat cum id meditantem mors oppressit. Vita Morin. pag. 12, n. 55.

(114) Who points out his name by these letters, G. T. D. G. V.

(115) Epist. Dedicat.

(116) Vita Morini, pag. 14, num. 72.

(117) See the remark [I] of this article.

(118) Memoires, pag. 148, ad ann. 1643.

(119) Memoires, 166. ad ann. 1645.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was in moſt of his principles, he very well Peripatetics are never to be undeceived, viz. th forms, is exceeding impertinent [M]. We m marks of Mr Des Cartes's eſteem [N]; and that fuiſti excipere; cum ex relatu eorum, qui ex Sabbatis Magorum adveniunt, dimidia pene hominum pars in Magis ſit, ac Magi omnes milites ſint, qui Sathanæ nomen dedere, quique ab Antichriſto, tanquam ſummo Duce deducendi in militiam ſunt; fore, ut cum volet Antichriſtus expugnare urbes, quæ ſponteneam ſui deditionem non fecerint, eam Magorum nubem emittat ſurſum in aërem, quæ ſuperne irruens ſtragem tam civium, quam militum immanem edat (120). - - - For the magicians are liſted in the ſervice of Satan, and are to be commanded by Antichriſt, as their chief-general. The author of his Life makes three excuſes for him. 1. That he had read in a book of cardinal Cuſanius, that the oracles of Scripture fix the end of the world to the year 1675. In the ſecond place, that Alabaſter, a man excellently verſed in the Cabala and the Bible, had publiſhed the ſame thing. 3. That ſeveral poſſeſſed with the devil in ſeveral countries had declared to their exorciſts, that the beaſt of the Revelation was born, which the wickedneſs of the time made very credible. Cardinalis Cuſani ſcriptoris minime contemnendi conjecturam de ultimis temporibus legerat, quo libro ad annum 1675 totius orbis terminus ac interitus ex literis aſtruitur inſpiratis. Idem ſcripſit Anglus Alabaſter in tubarum ſpiraculis libro edito, author, inquam, Orientis idiomata, & ſcripturas & Cabalam mirifice callens. Complurium exorciſmorum qui habentur excuſi volutarat Morinus hiſtorias, in quibus paſſim Energumeni in variis regionibus natam eſſe beſtiam proclamarunt, quod creditu facile nequitia temporis noſtri præſtat & ſuadet (121). Three very fine reaſons!

(120) Bernerius, Anatomia ridiculi muris, pag. 185.

(121) Vita Morini, pag. 16, num. 77.

[M] He very well underſtood. . . . that all the Peripatetics teach, concerning ſubſtantial forms, is exceeding impertinent.] If we did not know it by experience, we ſhould hardly believe it poſſible for men of ſenſe, who ſpend all their life in philoſophizing, to maintain (122), that a ſubſtance diſtinct from matter, is nevertheleſs material, and ſubſiſts only dependently on matter; that it is produced from the power of matter without exiſting in it previouſly; that it is not compounded either of matter, or any other pre-exiſting thing, and that notwithſtanding it is not a created being: laſtly, that without the aſſiſtance of any knowledge to direct it in it's operations, it produces the machines of animals and plants. They ſtill maintain all theſe monſtrous doctrines, after having been confounded with the objections of a Father Maignan, of a Gaſſendus, &c. and this appears very wonderful to me. Morinus diſcovered all theſe abſurdities, and abandoned the Peripatetic ſect upon all theſe points. ‘ Quæ‘ ſtionem de ortu vel productione formarum ſubſtantialium ‘ eſſe totius Phyſices difficillimam; quæque maximorum ‘ Virorum ac præſertim Neotericorum ingenia torſit. ‘ Dum alii volunt eas educi de potentia materiæ, a‘ lii ipſas de novo creari, alii eas produci à corporibus ‘ cœleſtibus, alii eas eſſe tantùm quandam elementa‘ lium qualitatum proportionem; ſicque eas eſſe acci‘ dentales, & alii alia. Ego verò in Aſtrologia Gal‘ lica lib. 20. Qui inſcribitur, de actione univerſali ‘ corporum cœleſtium, ſectione 4. capite 7: om‘ nes haſce opiniones Rationis examini ſubjicio, ac ‘ evidenter probo nullas ipſarum eſſe poſſe veras: om‘ nium autem abſurdiſſimam, eſſe eductionem formæ ‘ de potentia materiæ (123). - - - - The queſtion about ‘ the riſe and production of ſubſtantial forms is the moſt ‘ difficult in all the Phyſics, and which has puzzled ‘ the parts of the greateſt men, eſpecially the Neoterics. ‘ Whilſt ſome will have it that they are produced from ‘ the power of matter, others that they are created a‘ new, others that they are produced by the celeſtial bo‘ dies, others that they are only a certain proportion of ‘ elementary qualities, and conſequently are accidental; ‘ and others, other things. But in my Aſtrologia Gal‘ lica, lib. 20, intituled de actione univerſali corpo‘ rum cœleſtium, ſect. 4. cap. 7, I have examined all ‘ theſe opinions by the rules of right reaſon, and have ‘ evidently proved that none of them can be true; but ‘ that the moſt abſurd of all is the production of form ‘ from the power of matter.’ The worſt of it is, he ſubſtituted in the room of theſe doctrines, an hypothe-

(122) See the remark of the article GORLÆUS (DAVID).

(123) Morinus, in Defenſ. Diſſert. pag. 66.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ingenuous relation of ſeveral things which were to his own diſadvantage [O].

‘ hanc multis extraneis foliis, floribus, & fructibus in-‘ ficient, ſi tantum planta generetur, & non potius
(127) Morin. in Defenſ. Differt. pag. 67. ‘ chymæra diverſarum genere rerum (127). - - - - - ‘ Nothing can be more abſurd than to imagine, that the ‘ ſimilitude of flowers, leaves and fruits of the ſame tree,
‘ in colour, ſmell, taſte, and figure, ſhould proceed from
‘ the meer motion of atoms, from whence proceed their ‘ poſition and order. And among all the flowers, leaves,
‘ and fruits of an apple-tree, there never happens to be
‘ a flower, leaf, or fruit of a pear tree, or other plant
‘ from the motion of atoms. For unleſs this motion be ‘ regulated by ſome ſpecific knowledge, which cannot be ‘ conceived in atoms, it will only cauſe the fortuitous ſi-
‘ tuation and order of the atoms, which either will ne- ‘ ver produce any plant of a determinate ſpecies; or elſe
‘ will infect it with many heterogeneous leaves, flowers
‘ and fruits, if only a plant be generated, and not ra-
‘ ther a chimerical mixture of things of a different kind.’

[N] He received ſeveral marks of Mr Des Cartes's eſteem.] He became acquainted with him in the year 1626 (128). Some time after he preſented him with his book of Longitudes, and was thanked for it in a moſt obliging letter from him (129). He ſent him objections concerning light, in the year 1638 (130). Theſe words of his letter are remarkable. ‘ I have ‘ ever been one of your favourers, who by my tem‘ per naturally hate and deteſt thoſe raſcally invidious ‘ men, who ſeeing ſome exalted genius, like a new ‘ ſtar, appear above them, inſtead of taking kindly ‘ his labours and new inventions, ſwell with envy
‘ againſt him, and have no other deſign but to eclipſe
‘ or extinguiſh his name, his glory and his merits;
‘ tho' they themſelves are retrieved by him from ‘ ignorance, and receive the knowledge of things
‘ from him gratis. I have paſſed through theſe trials,
‘ and know exactly what they are. Poſterity will ‘ reſent my misfortune, and ſpeaking of this iron age,
‘ will truly ſay, that fortune did not favour learned
‘ men. I wiſh however, ſhe may be more favoura‘ ble to you, than me.’ What pride and vanity is here! Mr Des Cartes anſwered the objections; Morinus replied (131), ‘ And we have this ſecond writing in‘ ſerted in the firſt tome of Mr Des Cartes's letters
‘ *, and followed by a new anſwer that Mr Des Cartes ‘ made to it in September, with a diſpatch which ‘ ſurprized him, but which let him know that he ‘ had a value for him. Morinus † pretended not to ‘ be entirely ſatisfied with this ſecond anſwer, and ‘ thence took an occaſion of making him a new re‘ ply ‡ in October, that he might have the honour
‘ of writing laſt. Mr Des Cartes, who was ever
‘ very free from the ambition of ſo falſe a glory, did
‘ by that mark perfectly diſcover Mr Morinus's cha‘ racter of mind. He would not refuſe him the ſa‘ tisfaction he propoſed to himſelf, ſince it coſt him
‘ ſo little. And * therefore writ to Father Merſenne,
‘ about the middle of November, that he would not ‘ give any farther anſwer to Mr Morinus, ſince he did
‘ not deſire it.’ It is certain Mr Des Cartes did not deſpiſe this man's objections. ‘ He judged them ‘ worth his notice as ſoon as he had received them,
‘ and preferable to thoſe of Mr Petit, as well for ‘ their ſolidity, as for the nature of the difficulties in ‘ them. He  wrote more than once to Father ‘ Merſenne, to deſire him to let Morinus know from ‘ him, that he not only took his writing kindly, but ‘ that he was obliged to him for his objections, as being ‘ very proper to make him ſearch for truth with greater ‘ application; and †† that he would not fail to an-
‘ ſwer them in the moſt punctual and civil manner,
‘ and as ſoon as poſſible (132).’ Let us not end this remark without relating a thing which may edify the readers, as much as the haughty complaints of the royal profeſſor in Mathematics muſt have ſcandalized them. We have ſeen that Morinus ‘ had finiſhed his ‘ objections by . . . . complaints of the misfortune he ‘ was under from the practices of his ſpiteful ene‘ mies, wiſhing that fortune might be more favoura‘ ble to him than ſhe had commonly been to the ge-‘ nerality of the learned. Mr Des Cartes, who could ‘ hardly reliſh this language, was harder put to it to ‘ anſwer this concluſion than all the reſt ††. I no
‘ ways pretend, ſaid he to him on this ſubject, to de- ‘ ſerve the civilities you expreſs to me at the end of ‘ your writing, and yet it would not become me to confute
‘ them. Therefore I can only ſay, that I condole with ‘ you on the blindneſs of fortune, in that ſhe does not ſuf-
‘ ficiently acknowledge your merit. But as for my own ‘ particular, I thank God ſhe has never yet done me ei- ‘ ther good or ill: and I know not for the future, whether
‘ I ought rather to deſire her favours, or to fear them.
‘ For as it does not ſeem honeſt to borrow any thing
‘ which a man cannot return with intereſt, I ſhould
‘ think it a great burthen upon me to find my ſelf in- ‘ debted to the public (133).’ Here you ſee what ought to be the language of a true Philoſopher. Mr Des Cartes would have merited this title by that one quality he here ſpeaks of. But as for Morinus, he diſgraced Philoſophy by his murmurs againſt the injuſtice of his time. He manifeſted a ſoul that was mercenary and greedy of penſions and rewards. A ſham Philoſopher! a ſham ſcholar!

(133) Baillet, ubi ſupra, pag. 356.

[O] He gave an ingenuous account of ſeveral things to his diſadvantage.] He ſays (134), that his mother, on her death-bed, diſinherited him, and denied him her bleſſing. She was ſomewhat recovered from this averſion to him; the prieſts and relations repreſented to her, that her will would be null, and that ſhe would beſides run a great riſk of damnation, ſo ſhe conſented to give him her bleſſing, and leave him a legacy though the ſmalleſt that could be. He pretends, that the cauſe of this hatred, was his having ſaid to his elder brother, when their father and mother were both ſick, that he had rather have his father than his mother live, if one of them muſt needs die. The mother died two days after, in the diſpoſition of mind juſt now mentioned againſt her ſon. Here you ſee a fact not much to the honour either of the mother or ſon; but nothing coſt an Aſtrologer too dear, when he can aſſign the reaſons of it by his principles. This is Morinus's caſe; he finds (135) in the ſcheme of his nativity, that his mother was to hate him. He finds he was to be often impriſoned, and confeſſes that in his youth he found himſelf very near to this misfortune, upon the account of his whoring, and vindictive temper (136). The malignant influence of ſome planets in his nativity having been corrected by the favourable aſpect of ſome others, the priſon was changed into an evil of another kind, which had ſome affinity to a captive ſtate; for from the age of ſixteen to forty ſix, Morinus was always under ſome maſter. He ſerved no leſs than ſixteen ſucceſſively; he lived with notaries, with writing-maſters (137), with preſidents, biſhops, abbots, and at laſt with the duke of Luxemburg. The reaſon of his changing his ſervice ſo often, was, that he quarrelled with the miſtreſs of the houſe, or ſome unforeſeen accident happened, or the maſters were guilty of intolerable ingratitude. Quod autem per carceres feri non potuit per ſervitutem effecit, cumulus ille Planetarum in duodecima domo . . . eſt enim ſervitus . . . ſpecies quædam incarcerationis quod homo in aliena domo non liber, ſed alteri mancipatus vivere teneatur. Siquidem ab anno 16 ad 46 vita mea fuit perpetua ſervitus, domineſque habui 16 quos omnes deſerehqui vel ob jurgia cum dominabus, quarum imperium cum ferre nollem odia paſſus ſum . . . vel ob caſus repentinos, vel ob dominorum intolerabilem ingratitudinem (138.) He finds the cauſe of all theſe events in the ſcheme of his nativity; his wranglings with the miſtreſs, the ingratitude of his maſters, the mean condition of ſome, the middle ſtate of others, and the high dignity of a third ſort. No ſtars hit truer, tho' to his coſt, than thoſe that threatened him on the ſcore of women (139). I have already mentioned (140) two wounds he received for a woman of pleaſure. This, perhaps, was in a houſe of ill fame. I reckon as nothing the violence offered him by ſome ſoldiers, who, at the inſtigation of ſome whores, entered his houſe (141). An honeſt man is not ſecure from ſuch affronts: let us alledge nothing that is ambiguous. He confeſſes (142), that having had the honour to be known to kings and queens, to princes and cardinals, and the principal men of the kingdom, there were at moſt but five perſons of high rank who loved him, or did him any good; whether becauſe of his ſkill, or the candour of his nature, or by ſympathy; and that, on the contrary, envy and antipathy had expoſed him to the hatred of ſo many people, that

(134) In Aſtrologia Gallica, lib. xvii, pag. 398.

(135) Ubi ſupra.

(136) Parumque abfuit quin in mea juventute verificatum fuerit ob vindictæ & libidinis paſſiones. Ibid.

(137) This is doubtleſs the ground of the reproach mentioned before, citation (101).

(138) Morin ubi ſupra.

(139) Propter ☽ & ♀ in duodecima quæ mihi ex parte mulierum multa mala damna vitæque pericula pepererunt. - - - Becauſe of the Moon and Venus in the twelfth houſe, which on the ſcore of women procured me many calamities and dangers of my life. Id. ib.

(140) In the remark [D], citation (12).

(141) Ib. lib. xxiii, pag. 649.

(142) Ib. lib. xvii, pag. 398.

(128) See Mr Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 138.

(129) It is the fifty eighth of the firſt volume of Des Cartes. See the Life of Des Cartes by Mr Baillet, Tom. i, pag. 265.

(130) See the fifty eighth letter of the ſame volume.

(131) Baillet, ib. pag. 357.

* Pag. 221, Tom. i.

† Pag. 234, Tom. i.

‡ This writing is to be found in the firſt volume of the letters of Mr Des Cartes, pag. 242.

* Pag. 416, Tom. ii.

 Tom. iii, of the Letters, pag. 390.

†† Pag. 396, Tom. iii, & pag. 360.

(132) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 355.

‡‡ Pag. 219, 220, Tom. i.

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

that it frighted him to think of it. Horret memoria referre quot inimicos habuerim vel ob invidiam, vel ob antipathiam (143). To ſay no more, can we conceive a greater piece of folly than that of a man, who complains he had been the object of envy, and boaſts of being beloved by great men, for the ſake of his learning? His greateſt accuſers on the topic of vanity, and a mercenary temper, are his own books. He boaſts, in one of his anſwers, that he had maintained a perpetual war for ſeventeen years together, againſt fifteen Mathematicians or Philoſophers, and had forced them all to a diſhonourable retreat. He ſays, that in the year 1636, his fame was ſpread almoſt over all Europe (144). At every turn he tells us of his pretended demonſtration of the Longitude, as a thing publickly acknowledged by the moſt famous Mathe-

(143) Ibid. pag. 398, 399.

(144) Tunc vero nominis mei fama per totam ferme Europam diffuſa eſt. Ibid. lib. xxiii, pag. 649.

MORINUS (SIMON) a fanatic, burnt a diſordered a long time [A]. He affirmed (a), mation of the church, and that all nations ſhould that this great renovation was to be accompliſhed in his ſtate of glory, incorporated in Morinus his to which he was deſtined, he was to be attended participated in the glorious ſtate of JESU champions of glory. The Sieur John Des-Mar his diſciple, and thereby diſcovered this horr

(a) See the preface of the Lettres Viſionaires.

[A] His mind had been diſordered a long time.] See the book intituled, Thoughts of Simon Morinus; it was printed in the year 1647. It has neither the name of the Printer, nor place where it was printed. The author was in priſon at Paris for the errors of the Enthuſiaſts, when Gaſſendus's friends writ againſt the Aſtrologer John Baptiſt Morinus, whom they reproached with either being the brother or relation of this priſoner. The Aſtrologer will have this to be the ſecond of their lies. Secunda (impoſtura) dum aſſerit quendam Simonem Morinum in carceribus Archiepiſcopatus hujuſce aſſervatum, ob illuminatorum doctrinam quam profitetur, eſſe meum conſanguineum ſive fratrem (1).

(1) Jo. Baptiſta Morinus, in Defenſione ſuæ Diſſertationis de atomis & vacuo, pag. 105. This book was printed in the year 1650.

[B] Des-Mareſts . . . . feigned himſelf his diſciple, and diſcovered his Enthuſiaſm.] He himſelf was a great Enthuſiaſt (2), and waited for a wonderful and holy revolution; but imagining it would not happen the way that Morinus declared, nor in that of another viſionary, named Charpy de Sainte Croix (3), he took it in his head to oppoſe them both. Charpy pretended, that all theſe wonders were to be brought about by a certain lieutenant of JESUS CHRIST, of the race of Judah, to whom he applied the cleareſt prophecies of the Meſſiah (4)' We have ſeen, in the body of this article, Morinus's pretenſion, and here follows that of the Sieur Des-Mareſts. I relate it in the words of an author, who makes uſe of the preſent tenſe; 'The Sieur Des-Mareſts teaches with them, that it is true, the world is about to be reformed, that all ſects ſhall be united to the Catholic religion; but that all this muſt be done by the great prophet Eliachim Michael, which is no other than the Sieur Des-Mareſts of Sorlin, and by an army of a hundred forty four thouſand victims, or humble ſouls, which he is to muſter, and give up to the king, that they may execute this great enterprize under his command, according to the lights which the Sieur Des-Mareſts is divinely inſpired with. It is very plain, that this laſt prophet could not agree with the two others, and that he had in his viſions wherewithal to deſtroy theirs. For, as we have ſeen one mad-man, who fancied himſelf GOD the Father, confute, in a convincing manner, another mad-man, who fancied himſelf GOD the Son, becauſe, ſaid he, I, who am GOD the Father, know very well that I have not begotten you: ſo the Sieur Des-Mareſts could, with the greateſt eaſe, prove to himſelf, that Morinus's and Charpy's notions were falſe. Charpy, ſaid he, imagines that the world muſt be reformed by a lieutenant of JESUS CHRIST joined with the Jews: and Morinus ſays, this will be by JESUS CHRIST himſelf incorporated in him, and accompanied by the combatants of glory. Now I am very certain that they are both miſtaken, ſince it is by myſelf, Des-Mareſts of St Sorlin, Eliacim Michael, and by my victims that all this muſt be wrought.

(2) See his article above.

(3) He is author of a book intituled, L'ancienne nouveauté de l'Ecriture Sainte, which Mr Arnaud confuted. The Journal des Sçavans, of the firſt of March 1666, makes mention of this confutation. This viſionary renounced his errors. See the Queſtion curieuſe ſi Mr Arnaud eſt héretique? pag. 147, Edit. 1695.

(4) Preface to the Lettres Viſionaries, pag. m. 226.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſome followers. I have heard ſay, I. That he had promiſed to riſe again on the third day, and that hereupon a great mob got together at the place where he was burnt (b). II. That the firſt preſident Lamoignon aſked him, whether it was any where written, that the great prophet, or new Meſſias, ſhould be burnt, and Morinus being already condemned, cited this verſe of the ſixteenth Pſalm, Igne me examinaſti, & non eſt inventa in me iniquitas. Thou haſt tried me by fire, and no iniquity was found in me. The author whom I cite in the remarks obſerves, that the XVIIth century was fruitful in Fanatics [C]. I have juſt received a moſt curious Memoir concerning our Morinus [D].

(b) It was at the Greve.

Since the ſecond edition I have learned ſome circumſtances of his trial, which will ſerve for a ſupplement and corrective to his article [E].

' and according to GOD: by which he ſhewed, that ' he only ſubmitted to what ſhould be commanded ' him on the part of GOD, and according to ' GOD... (9). This was not the laſt of the Sieur ' Des-Mareſts diſguiſes. He held ſeveral other con- ' ferences with Morinus in the ſame ſpirit of diſſimula- ' lation and deceit. He wrote to him ſeveral letters ' as his diſciple, he received ſeveral from him as ' from his maſter. He ſuffered this Fanatic, and theſe ' abuſed gentlewomen, to conſider him as being entirely ' of their cabal. And at laſt proceeded to that pro- ' digious extravagance, which I am going to relate in ' his own words. To hinder Morinus and his wife, who ' was tormented by her Devil upon his account, from ' ſuſpecting him, he reſolved to give him a declaration, by ' the firſt letter he writ to him, that he acknowledged ' him for the Son of Man, and for the Son of GOD in ' him, knowing well that Morinus was the ſon of a man, ' and that the Son of GOD was in him, as every where ' elſe. This letter, ſays he, of the firſt of February, ' 1662, was ſo acceptable to Morinus, that to make him an ' acknowledgement for that declaration, which he believed ' very expreſs, he writ an anſwer to him the ſecond of ' February, by which he gave him, as by a great grace, ' the title of his forerunner, calling him a true John ' Baptiſt riſen again.'

(9) Ibid. pag. 208.

The Janſeniſt whom I copy, does afterwards confute this treachery of the Sieur Des-Mareſts, by the principles of St Auguſtin. He ſays almoſt the ſame things, which Mr Arnold has ſince obſerved, in complaining of the impoſture of a falſe Arnold, by which a profeſſor of Douay was drawn into a ſnare.

[C] The author whom I cite.... obſerves that the XVIIth century was fruitful in Fanatics.] See the words of this author (10): ' Our age, which has been as ' fruitful as any other in extraordinary things, has ' particularly been ſo in Fanatics: and it looks as if ' mens heads were turned I know not how, this way, ' and that they had a natural biaſs towards it; for, ' as in contagious diſeaſes, we commonly ſee all other ' diſtempers degenerate into plagues and carbuncles, ' ſo we have frequently ſeen in this age irregular ' devotions, and ſuch as are built upon human ' caprice, degenerate into fanatical illuſions. The ' ſtory of the hermits of Caen has been celebrated all ' over the kingdom; and if they had made a due en- ' quiry into the ſociety of the Holy Sacrament, they ' might perhaps have diſcovered a great many things ' of this nature.' He afterwards ſets forth the viſions of Charpy de St Croix, of Morinus, and Des-Mareſts. If he had added thoſe which at the ſame time were vented in Holland (11), he would have much ſtrengthened his poſition. The cloſe of this age does not belie the other parts of it, dignum patella operculum, - - - like cup, like cover.

(10) Preface of the Letters Provinciales, pag. 225.

(11) See the remark [I] of the article MARETS (SAMUEL DES).

[D] I have juſt received a moſt curious memoir concerning our Morin (12).] Here are ſome paſſages of it in the words of the original: ' Simon Morinus was a ' native of Aumale, and had heretofore been com- ' miſſioner to Mr Charron, extraordinary-treaſurer ' for the war. He was a man of no letters, and ' groſsly ignorant, who, pretending to ſpirituality, fell ' into great errors. He was not content to publiſh ' them in private to ſeveral perſons, who looked on ' him as a mad-man, but ſet forth part of them in a ' book which he printed ſecretly in 1647, in 8vo, ' under the title of Morinus's thoughts, dedicated to ' the king: It is a mixture of viſions and nonſenſe, ' which include the principal errors ſince condemned ' in the Quietiſts, except that he carries them further ' than any other has done; for he formally teaches, ' that the greateſt ſins do not deſtroy grace, but ſerve, ' on the contrary, to humble human pride. He ap- ' plies the words of St Paul, which are commonly un- ' derſtood of temptations to the higheſt enormities. ' He ſays, that in every ſect and nation, GOD has ' his elect, which are true members of the church. ' That among the means of depriving themſelves of ' all property and preſumption, a director may forbid ' his penitent from coming to maſs on holy-days, or ' to the communion, &c. order him the commu- ' nion without confeſſion, forbid what is commanded, ' and command what is forbidden.

(12) It was communicated to the Bookſeller by the abbot R.

' That GOD permitted that Peter ſhould deny him ' to humble his preſumption; that his deſire of ' dying for JESUS CHRIST, was not a perfect ' virtue; nor his denial, a vice deſtructive of virtue; ' that he denied him with his lips, and not with his ' heart.

' He denies that St Peter's ſin was a ſin unto ' death.

' He ſays, that St Paul was not only in the in- ' firmity of the fleſh, but that he ought to be ſo, ' and ſubmit to it, and that he had given way to ' the temptations of the fleſh.

' That frequent communion is profitable only to ' beginners, becauſe JESUS CHRIST is much bet- ' ter found on the bread of croſſes, than under the ' milk of bread.

' That one may eat before the communion, not ' only for infirmities ſake, but by advice of the dire- ' ctor, in order to mortify himſelf.

' That every fall preceded by fear, and followed by ' pleaſure, is not a ſin, but a teſtimony of our weake- ' neſs, which ought to humble us.

' This is pretty nigh the tenour of this Fanatic's ' doctrine, which is void of any principles.

' He printed with theſe thoughts ſome hymns, the ' ſtile of which is pitiful..... He was for ſome ' time in priſon, and releaſed as a viſionary, till ' 1661. At which time Des Mareſts St Sorlin, who ' had had great intimacy with him, and pretended, ' as he himſelf confeſſes in his writings, to own him ' for the Son of Man, raiſed from the dead; informed ' againſt him, and became his accuſer... Upon this ' occaſion he was tried, and condemned to be burnt a- ' live; which was executed in March 1663. It is ſaid ' that he had ſome diſciples, who were ſent to the gal- ' lies; and the late Mr de Neuré ſaid that he had ' ſeen one of them at Marſeilles, who believed Mo- ' rinus was riſen from the dead. But they who knew ' Mr de Neuré, knew there was no great depen- ' dance on the ſtories he told, when they tended to ' Libertiniſm. For he repreſented this man, as fully ' convinced of Morinus's reſurrection, This man died ' with conſtancy enough, and it was then ſaid, that ' the judges had been very rigorous, and that it had ' been enough to have confined him in a mad-houſe. ' They defended themſelves by the numerous im- ' pieties, which he had owned for his opinions, and ' which he maintained, not indeed with wit, but ' however in cold blood, and with great obſtinacy.

[E] I have learned ſome particulars of his trial, which may ſerve by way of ſupplement, and corrective to his article.] ' The fourteenth of the ſame month ' (of March 1663) one named Simon Morinus, a na- ' tive of Richemont near Aumale *, by a decree of the ' court of parliament, after having made the amande ho- ' norable in his ſhirt with a rope about his neck, and ' a torch in his hand, before the principal gate of ' the church of Noſtre Dame, to which he was car- ' ried in a cart, and from thence to the place de ' Greve, and there tied to a ſtake in order to be ' burnt alive, with his book intituled Thoughts of Mo- ' rinus, and all his writings and his proceſs, and after- ' wards his aſhes were ſcattered in the air, as a pu- ' niſhment for having taken the title of SON of ' GOD; and his accomplices were condemned to be ' preſent at his execution, and then to be galley-ſlaves ' for ever, having firſt been whipt by the hands of the ' hangman,

* His ſentence ſays alſo that he was of Richemont near Aumale.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' hangman, and branded with the mark of flower-
' de-luces on the right and left ſhoulder.' This is what we are told by Francis Collatet, ſon of William, in his abridgment of the Annals of Paris, printed in 1664 in 12*mo at the* 452*d page. For a fuller information as to what concerns Morinus, I ſhall add what has been extracted from the ſentence of death paſſed upon him: he was condemned the ſeventh of March, but the execution was put off till the fourteenth, in order to confront him and his accomplices, and to endeavour to diſcover more of them. Francis Rondon, curate of la Madeleine les Amiens, who had committed, as the ſentence ſays,* wicked and enormous acts; Marin Thouret, prieſt, and John Poictou, ſchoolmaſter, were preſent at the execution, and from thence ſent to the Gallies. Margaret Langlois, widow of the late Claude Nadot, called Malherbe, was whipped at the foot of the ſtake. Joan Homatier, wife of the ſaid Simon Morinus, and Claude Morinus their ſon, were acquitted and ſet at liberty (13).

(13) Memoir, manuſcript communicated by Mr Lancelot.

MORISON (ROBERT) a Phyſician and profeſſor of Botany at Oxford, was born at Aberdeen in 1620. He took his maſter of arts degree in 1638, and a little after taught Philoſophy in that Univerſity. He ſtudied Mathematics at the ſame time, and afterwards applied himſelf to Botany, and his father and mother being deſirous to have him a Divine, he learned Hebrew, and compoſed even a Hebrew Grammar for his own uſe. But his inclination for Botanical knowledge was ſo ſtrong, that they were obliged to let him turn all his ſtudies that way. He had made a great progreſs in it, when the civil wars forced him to leave his country, which however he did not do before he had ſignalized both his zeal for the royal cauſe, and his courage in a battle fought upon a bridge (a) betwixt the inhabitants of Aberdeen, and the Preſbyterian forces. He there received a dangerous wound in his head. As ſoon as he was cured of it, he went to France, and ſettling in Paris, applied himſelf with great diligence to Botany and Anatomy. He took his doctor of Phyſic's degree at Angers in 1648, and as he had the reputation of an excellent Botaniſt, he was ſent for by the duke of Orleans, who, in the year 1650, gave him the direction of the royal garden of Blois. He continued in this employ till the death of this prince, and then went over into England in Auguſt 1660. Charles II, to whom the duke of Orleans had preſented him at Blois in the month of February of the ſame year, called him to London, and gave him the title of his Phyſician, and of Regius profeſſor in Botany, with a penſion of two hundred pounds ſterling. The Præludium Botanicum, which he publiſhed at London in 1669, made him ſo eſteemed, that the univerſity of Oxford invited him to the profeſſorſhip in Botany; he accepted it, with the approbation of the king, and diſcharged the duties of it with wonderful application and ability. He died at London in 1683, in the ſixty third year of his age. The public has ſeen a very conſiderable part of the works he compoſed [A], wherein he followed a method entirely new, which has been very much commended by good judges (b).

(a) Ad pontem fluminis Deæ. - - - At the bridge of the river Dee. Vita Rob. Moriſoni. The Dee, is a river near whoſe mouth Aberdeen is ſituated.

(b) Taken from his Life before the third part of Plantarum Hiſtoria Oxonienſis univerſalis.

[A] The public has ſeen a . . . . part of the works he compoſed.] Being in the ſervice of Gaſton of France, duke of Orleans, he brought into the garden of Blois 250 plants, never before deſcribed, and invented a new method of explaining Botany. He communicated it to this prince, who encouraged him to undertake a hiſtory of plants upon this plan, and promiſed to ſupply the expences, and to leave him all the profit. That prince's death prevented the execution of this deſign. But when Moriſon had a penſion from the king of England, he thought more than ever of this great work. I have mentioned (1) the Præludium Botanicum, which he publiſhed in 1669. I add that, in 1672, he publiſhed the ninth ſection of the ſecond part of his Hiſtory of Plants. The univerſity of Oxford contributed largely to the charge of printing this book, which the author gave as a ſpecimen of his great work. He was ſo encouraged by the praiſes and exhortations written to him, that he publiſhed in 1680, the ſecond part of his Hiſtory of Plants. It is a large volume in folio, intituled, Plantarum hiſtoriæ Univerſalis Oxonienſis, pars ſecunda, ſeu Herbarum, Diſtributio nova per tabulas cognationis & affinitatis ex libro naturæ obſervata & detecta. This work was much eſteemed: we may ſee what commendations Mr Herman (2) gives it in the preface to his Hortus Lugduno-Batavus. Some blamed that part of this volume intituled, Hallucinationes Caſpari Bauhini, &c. They thought there was ſomething of pride in the liberty he had taken to cenſure writers, who had done ſuch great ſervices to Botany. Our author, encouraged by the ſucceſs of this great volume, laboured diligently on a continuation, but died before he could put the laſt hand to the third part. It was neceſſary therefore to put it under the care of ſome other perſon. Jacob Bobart (3) was pitched upon, a moſt able Botaniſt, and excellently verſed in the method he had learned from Moriſon. It is by his labour, this third part has at laſt ſeen the light in 1699. It is in folio. We do not know what became of the firſt (4).

(1) In the body of the article.

(2) Profeſſor of Phyſic and Botany at Leyden.

(3) He is director of the Phyſic garden of the univerſity of Oxford.

(4) Taken from the Life of Moriſon, prefixed to the third part of his Hiſtory of Plants.

MORLIN (JOACHIM) a riged follower of Luther [A], was born in 1514. He diſcharged the ſacerdotal function in ſeveral places (a), and particularly at Arnſtadt, from whence the magiſtrates expelled him in 1543 (b), not being able to bear his too flaming zeal [B]. He was called to a profeſſorſhip at Konigſberg in Pruſſia, and it was there

(a) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 456.

(b) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 468, num. 9. See alſo Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 771.

[A] A rigid follower of Luther.] This I learn from Melchior Adam. ' Fuit Lutheri ſectator & acer ' doctrinæ ejus in toto miniſterio ſuo cuſtos . . . . in ' articulo de Cœna ſententiam Lutheri retinuit, quod ' Chriſti corpus in, ſub, aut cum pane ſit (1). - - - - ' He was a follower and ſtrenuous defender of Luther, ' in the whole courſe of his miniſtry, ... he maintained Luther's opinion as to the Euchariſt, that the body of Chriſt was in, under, or with, the bread.'

[B] His too flaming zeal.] Melanchthon, who undoubtedly knew him, repreſents him of too fiery a temper, and too much addicted to diſputing. Having heard that Heſhuſius was returning to Roſtock, with deſign to be preſent at the diſpute of Bremen, he thought that Morlin was the author of all this managment. I often foretold, adds he, that he would excite more tempeſts than he would ever be able to lay. ' Cogitavi horum conſilio-
' rum architectum eſſe Morlinum, & is habet ſocios ha-
' rum technarum artifices. Scribam Davidi Chytræo ne
' inſtituant diſputationem theatricam, quæ non parvos
' motus excitatura ſit, ſi procedat. Tibi etiam hor-
' tator ſum, ut ſi te in certamen vocabunt poſtules ti-
' bi quoque concedi ut accerſas Petrum Martyrem,
' me, & alios quoſdam amicos. Novi geneſim Mor-
' lini: & ſæpe ei prædixi, eum moturum, quæ ſedare
' non poterit (2). - - - I am perſuaded, Morlin is at
' the

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 457.

(2) Philipp. Melanch. Epiſt. ad Albertum Hardenbergium, apud Melchior. Adam ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

there he oppoſed Oſiander, who maintained a new doctrine about Juſtification. He impugned that novelty with extream heat both in his writings and ſermons; but was born down by the credit of his adverſary, who got him expelled out of Pruſſia in 1552, notwithſtanding the interceſſions of the people (c). He retired to Brunſwic, where he was colleague to the famous Chemnitius. He entered into the diſputes of the times [C], and was at almoſt all the conferences, where the queſtions concerning Free-will, and the neceſſity of good works, &c. were diſcuſſed. He returned into Pruſſia 1566, and was there made biſhop of the province of Sambia by Sigiſmund Auguſtus, king of Poland, and by Albert, duke of Pruſſia, who was no longer infatuated with his Oſiander. He continued in that poſt all the reſt of his life, and died in 1571, being cut for the ſtone againſt the advice of his Phyſicians. He publiſhed ſeveral books (d) [D], and left a ſon as great a lover of Theological diſputes as himſelf [E]. I forgot to ſay, that when he was admitted Doctor of Divinity at Wittemberg in the year 1540, a queſtion drawn up by Luther was propoſed to him, concerning the uſe of church-revenues [F].

(c) Etſi plebs ad principem pro eo ſupplex intercederet. Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra.

(d) Taken from Melch. ubi ſupra.

' the bottom of all this contrivance, and has ſome aſſo-
' ciates, who are ſkilled in theſe artifices. I will write
' to David Chytræus to prevent a public diſputation,
' which will raiſe great diſturbances, if it proceeds. I
' would adviſe you alſo, if they ſhould challenge you in-
' to the controverſy, to demand the liberty of calling in
' Peter Martyr, myſelf, and ſome other friends. I know
' Morlin's temper; and have often foretold him, he
' would raiſe what he could not lay.'

[C] He entred into the diſputes of the times.] The author cited in the preceding notes, might well ſay, there was hardly any age wherein the diſputes of Divines were more frequent than in the time of our Morlin. Let us paſs by the great diſputes between the Roman Catholics and the Proteſtants; and only conſider Lutheraniſm. Good God! what diviſions were not ſeen among the Divines of that party; and with what heat and virulence maintained? All the fiery ſpirits Africa and Aſia ever produced, were but phlegm in compariſon to theſe German doctors. It is ſaid, that our Morlin oppoſed the burial of thoſe who attended the ſermons of Andrew Oſiander, and would never be perſuaded to baptize their children. ' Dogma Oſiandri quantopere deteſtentur qui ' confeſſionis Auguſtanæ cenſeri volunt, cum ex Wit-' tenbergenſium Doctorum cenſura, tum ex Matthiæ ' Flacci, & Joachimi Merlini non ſcriptis magis quam ' factis, abunde cuivis perſpicere licet. Nam quo lo-' co Merlinus habuerit eos, qui cum gregis ſui eſſent, ' Oſiandri ſermones audiebant, obſcurum non eſt. Nec ' ſepultura mortuos dignabatur, nec infantes eorum ' ut baptizaret, adduci potuit (3). - - - How much the ' doctrine of Oſiander was deteſted by thoſe who declar- ' ed themſelves of the Augſburgh confeſſion, may be abun- ' dantly diſcovered, both from the cenſure of the Wittem- ' berg doctors, and from the practices as well as writ- ' ings of Matthias Flaccus, and Joachim Morlinus. ' For the behaviour of Morlinus to thoſe of his flock, who ' attended the ſermons of Oſiander, is ſufficiently known. ' He refuſed them the rites of burial, and their chil- ' dren thoſe of baptiſm.' Can there ever be a prepoſſeſſion more extravagant, or a zeal more furious than this? What is wonderful is, that Lutheraniſm ſhould ſtand it's ground in the midſt of ſo many violent diſputes. It is a contradiction to the maxim, Concordiâ res parvæ creſcunt; diſcordiâ maximæ dilabuntur (4). We might hence draw a proof of God's particular providence; for, according to the courſe of human affairs, it ſeems neceſſary to admit the truth of our Saviour's maxim in the goſpel, Every kingdom divided againſt itſelf is brought to deſolation, and every city or houſe divided againſt itſelf ſhall not ſtand (5): In whatever caſe therefore this does not happen, we ought to ſuppoſe the finger of GOD. This way of reaſoning is very ſpecious, and very probable: but let us obſerve by the way, that JESUS CHRIST has not alledged this maxim, as univerſally true in a metaphyſical, but in a moral ſenſe; and I am even of opinion he urged it only ad hominem againſt the Jews. The growth of the Roman commonwealth in the midſt of violent and continual diviſions, is as remarkable an exception to this general rule, as the preſervation of Lutheraniſm amidſt the ſchiſms which diſtracted it, and which furniſhed ſo much matter to the common enemy to inſult and reproach it. Let us return to our Morlin, and relate what Melchior Adam ſays of him: ' Brunſvigæ dùm eccleſiaſten agit, ' variæ, ut nullum ferè ſeculum feracius fuit Theologi- ' carum rixarum, quàm ſuperius, excitatæ fuerunt, ſu-' per variis capitibus religionis controverſiæ, utpote ' de neceſſitate bonorum operum: de libertate voluntatis ' humanæ: de Adiaphoris: de particula ſola in enun- ' ciatione illa: Fide juſtificamur: & de aliis. Harum ' cauſa pleriſque conventibus actionibuſque inſtitutis ' interfuit Morlinus (6). - - - - While he was miniſter ' at Brunſwic, no age being more fruitful of Theologi- ' cal controverſies than the paſt, ſeveral diſputes were ' raiſed on various articles of religion, as on the ne-' ceſſity of good works, on free-will, on things in-' different, on juſtification by faith alone; and ſome ' others. Morlin was preſent at moſt of the meetings ' and tranſactions theſe occaſioned.

(3) Hoſius, de expreſſo verbo Dei, apud Prateolum, Elencho Hæret. pag. m. 512.

(4) Salluſt. de Bello Jugurth. pag. m. 214.

(5) St Matthew chap. xii, ver. 25.

(6) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 456.

[D] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Melchior Adam gives theſe titles of them. Pſalmorum Davidis enarratio. Catechiſmus Germanicus. Poſtilla & explicatio ſummaria Evangeliorum dominicalium. Refutatio mendacii Theologorum Heidelbergenſium, de Luthero. De vocatione Miniſtrorum, & quatenus magiſtratui ſas ſit eos ab officio removere. Defenſio adverſus accuſationem novorum Wittembergenſium Theologorum. De peccato originis contra Manichæorum deliria. Epiſtola ad Oſiandrum. Mr de Seckendorf (7) ſpeaks of a book publiſhed by our Morlin in 1565, which contains ſeveral particulars at large, which Luther uttered in the preſence of ſome perſons a little before his death.

(7) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 693.

[E] He left a ſon as great a lover as himſelf of Theological diſputes.] He was called MARC JEROM MORLINUS. He joined with Wigandus's faction, againſt Heſhuſius in the diſpute de abſtracto (8).

8) Micrælius, Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 771.

[F] A queſtion was propoſed to him . . . . concerning the uſe of church-revenues.] Mr de Seckendorf has inſerted in his Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm (9), the queſtion as it was propoſed. It was aſked, whether the revenues, which were deſigned for the maintenance of the miniſters of the Goſpel and for ſchools, ought to be taken away from thoſe who oppoſe the Goſpel, that is the monks and Romiſh clergy (10). He who propoſed the queſtion, added the reaſons of his doubts. On the one hand, ſays he, the miniſters of the goſpel have no right to force any body, nor can eſtates be taken away from impious men without committing violence. On the other hand, we know that St Auguſtin maintained, that the emperor was in the right to give the eccleſiaſtical revenues of the Donatiſts to the Orthodox. The magiſtrates are obliged to take care, that every body ſhould enjoy what belongs to him. But the revenues in queſtion do not belong to impious canons, but to the true church; and therefore Orthodox magiſtrates ought to treat theſe impious men as robbers (11). If they do not, the good paſtors and poor ſcholars muſt ſtarve. If Morlinus had liked to anſwer agreeably to the ſentiment of Luther, he might eaſily have decided that queſtion; for it appeared plainly Luther was of opinion, that the revenues of the Romiſh church ought to be applied to the maintenance of miniſters and ſchools.

(9) Lib. iii, pag. 313, num. 10.

(10) Ei (Morlino) ut moris eſt, quæſtio propoſita fuit per ephebum à Luthero conſcripta, his verbis, utrum reditus donati Eccleſiis ad Evangelii Miniſtros alendos, &c. Ibid.

(11) Hi reditus non ſunt impiorum Canonicorum, ſed ſunt veræ Eccleſiæ. Quare Magiſtratus Eccleſiæ debet etiam partem ſumere de impiis tanquam prædonibus. Ibid.

MORUS (ALEXANDER), one of the greateſt preachers of his age among the Reformed, was the ſon of a Scotchman, who was principal of a college which the Proteſtants had at Caſtres in Languedoc. He was born in 1616, in that city, and being of a very quick apprehenſion, the progreſs of his ſtudies was very ſwift. When he was ſcarce twenty

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

twenty years old (a), he was ſent to Geneva, there to continue his ſtudies in Theology; and finding that the Greek profeſſor's place, then vacant, was to be diſputed for, and that the curators of the academy by their programma had invited ſtrangers as well as citizens to enter the liſts; he ſtood for it among ſeveral other competitors, Miniſters, Advocates, and Phyſicians, who were almoſt all of them twice his age; and was ſo much admired for his fine and eloquent manner of turning every ſubject in this learned trial, that he obtained the prize (b). Having diſcharged this office about three years, he ſucceeded Spanheim in thoſe of Divinity profeſſor in the academy and miniſter in the church of Geneva, which, on being called to Leyden (c), he had quitted (d). As he was a very celebrated preacher, and had added to this talent a great ſtock of learning (e), it is not to be wondred at if all his colleagues were not his friends. But it muſt be confeſſed, there were many other things which created him trouble; for beſides his manners, which in all places where he had lived, were a ſubject of ſlander in regard to his love of women, his beſt friends allowed he was both very imprudent and impatient [A]. However there were two parties formed in Geneva; one for, and the other againſt him. And doubtleſs the firſt of theſe parties was compoſed not only of ſuch as had an eſteem and friendſhip for Mr Morus, but of others alſo, who, without any real love or eſteem for him, ſaw their enemies at the head of the contrary party. Every day afforded inſtances of this kind. I know not how Mr Morus procured the favour of Salmaſius; but it is certain that the latter drew the other into the United Provinces. Some pretend it was to mortify Mr Spanheim [B] who had been at variance with Mr Morus at Geneva. At firſt Salmaſius endeavoured to procure him a profeſſorſhip in Divinity at Harderwic (f), but this not ſucceeding, he got him called to Middelburg. Mr Morus accepting the call

(a) Alex. Mori Fides publica, pag. 225.

(b) See the Life of Stephen le Clerc, one of the competitors, printed at Amſterdam 1685, before the Quæſtiones Sacræ of David le Clerc, &c.

(c) He went thither in 1642.

(d) Mori Fides publica, pag. 226.

(e) See what Tanaquillus Faber wrote to him Epiſtolar. lib. i, pag. 219.

(f) See the remark [C].

[A] His friends allowed he was both very imprudent and impatient.] It is owned in a preface (1), written in behalf of Mr Morus, that his too warm temper, his too great liberty of ſpeech, and his too earneſt deſire of riſing above others, had often given room to thoſe continual enmities which reigned betwixt him and his rivals. The author adds, that he had never heard Mr Spanheim ſay any thing worſe againſt Morus than that he was proud: he ſays alſo, that in the judgment of Salmaſius, Mr Morus truſted too much to his falſe friends, and was indolent, but otherwiſe had a fine genius and univerſal capacity. Mr Diodati in a letter (2), he wrote in favour of Mr Morus to Salmaſius confeſſes, that this miniſter 'aimed at nothing more than making an innocent defence, but that he did this with a warmth and vigour which had often been prejudicial to thoſe who had attacked him. . . . . That he was good natured, without fraud or malice, free and generous . . . . . warm and very ſenſible of affronts, but eaſily reconciled; one who never was the aggreſſor, but had terrible weapons to defend himſelf withal. I ſcarce ever knew any one, continues he, who had reaſon to boaſt of attacking him. Conſcia virtus, and if you add to it, genus irritabile vatum, furniſh him a compleat ſuit of armour againſt his aſſailants.' I beg leave to make a ſhort reflexion upon the illuſions, occaſioned by friendſhip. Here you ſee that Mr Diodati, from a tender reſpect for Mr Morus, reckons that as nothing, which is indeed a capital and moſt unbecoming vice in a miniſter; I mean a vindictive ſpirit in the higheſt degree, and extreme pride and paſſion. It is in effect blackening a miniſter, and diveſting him entirely of the ſpirit of the Goſpel, which ought to be inſeparable from his character, to confeſs what Mr Diodati has here ſaid of him; and yet he thought this abated but little from the praiſes he plentifully beſtowed upon his friend. He excuſes, as well as he can, this vindictive humour of Mr Morus. The importunity, ſays he (3), of his enemies ſeemed to deſerve that they ſhould be ſeverely rebuked now and then, to teach them to be quiet.' I every day meet with ſuch who have the ſame blind ſide, with reſpect to a miniſter they have conceived an opinion of, under the cover of his great abilities, they ſpeak of his very Iſmaeliſm (4) almoſt with commendation. He is a dangerous enemy, ſay they, he has teeth and nails, and woe to them who provoke him (5) as if they were deſcribing, after the heathen manner a colonel of dragoons, or as if a miniſter of the Goſpel were a knight of the Thiſtle, armed with a threatning device, Nemo me impune laceſſit: nul ne s'y frotte (6).

Qui me commorit, (melius non tangere, clamo)
Flebit & inſignis tota cantabitur urbe (7).

Take warning, urge me not, or in lampoon
Your name ſhall ſhine, a jeſt to all the town.

It is hard to believe, that ſuch miniſters are attached to religion by any other ties than thoſe of vanity; and becauſe it furniſhes them with a pretence of ſetting up for petty tyrants. Once more, examine all the depravities to which human nature is ſubject, and you will find none more oppoſite to the ſpirit of Chriſtianity, than the violence that appears in the quarrels of ſome of theſe gentlemen. This ſhews that in all their proceedings, they have a mind to make known their power, ſo that no perſon for the future may preſume to reſiſt them. Without having read Homer, they put in practice the words of Agamemnon, much better than any text of Scripture.

Ἐγὼ δέ κ' ἄγω Βρισηίδα καλλιπάρηον
Αὐτὸς ἰὼν κλισίηνδε, τὸ σὸν γέρας· ὄφρ' ἕυ εἰδῇς
Ὅσσον φέρτερός εἰμι σέθεν, συγέη δὲ καὶ ἄλλος
Ἴσον ἐμοὶ φάσθαι, καὶ ὁμοιωθήμεναι ἄντην.

Ego autem abducam Briſeïda pulchram-genas,
Ipſe profectus ad tentorium, tuum præmium: ut bene intelligas
Quanto potentior ſum te: timeat autem & alius
Æqualem ſe mihi dicere, & comparari contra (8).

But then prepare, imperious prince! prepare,
Fierce as thou art, to yield thy captive fair:
Ev'n in thy tent I'll ſeize the blooming prize,
Thy lov'd Briſeïs with the radiant eyes.
Hence ſhalt thou prove my might, and curſe the hour,
Thou ſtood'ſt a rival of imperial pow'r;
And hence to all our hoſt it ſhall be known,
That kings are ſubject to the gods alone.

POPE.

(1) Before the ſecond apology of Milton, Edit. Hagæ Comit. 1654. George Crantzius, Doctor of Divinity, is the author of this preface.

(2) Produced in the Fides publica, pag. 111, &c.

(3) Fides publica, pag. 114.

(4) Milton, Defenſ. pro ſe, pag. 134, produces a letter, which ſays of Mr Morus what was propheſied of Iſmaël, that his hand would be againſt every man, and every man's hand againſt him.

(5) Δυσμενέων παῖδες τῷ σφ μένει ἀντιάασιν. See Homer. Iliad. lib. vi, ver. 127.

(6) It was that of a king of Navarre. See Bouhours, Entret. des Deviſes, pag. m. 463, 464.

(7) Horat. Sat. I, lib. II, ver. 45.

(8) Hom. Iliad. lib. I, ver. 184.

See Milton at p. 44, and 190, of his Reply. See alſo the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, where it is confeſſed, that Morus, among all his good Qualities, had ſome which did him no honour; that he was imprudent, imperious, ſatirical, contemptuous, and that he ſcarce allowed any thing good but his own works, and the praiſes of his admirers (9).

[B] Some pretend it was to mortify Mr Spanheim.] Sorbiere ſhall be my voucher, who writes thus to Mr Patin (10). I can only tell you of Mr Spanheim, what was publiſhed at the time of his death, that Salmaſius had killed him, and that Morus was the dagger. The ſtory is long, but to give it you in a few words, I ſhall only ſay, that Salmaſius hated the late Spanheim from an emulation of wit and reputation in the ſchools; that to mortify him, he cauſed Morus to be ſent for into Holland, tho' he knew him only by name, becauſe he was the ſcourge and averſion of his colleague: That the doctor moved Heaven and earth to hinder his coming, and died when he received

(9) Hiſt. de l'Edit de Nantes, Tom. iii, pag. 454.

(10) Sorbiere, Lettre lxiv, pag. 442.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

call left Geneva in 1649, and carried a good teſtimonial of his Orthodoxy [C]. He preſented himſelf before the ſynod of the Walloon churches aſſembled at Maeſtricht (g), preached with the the applauſe of the whole auditory, and then went to take poſſeſſion of the Divinity profeſſorſhip in the illuſtrious ſchool of Middelburg, and of the paſtorſhip of the church of the ſame city. The magiſtrates of Amſterdam, at his arrival in Holland, offered him the Hiſtory-profeſſorſhip (b), which was become vacant in their illuſtrious ſchool by the death of Voſſius; but not being able to draw him from the engagements he was under to the city of Middelburg, they ſent for David Blondel: and yet three years after, hearing that Mr Morus was offered a Divinity profeſſorſhip in France, they renewed their offers to him. He then accepted this employment, and diſcharged it with great ability. He diſappeared for ſome time, taking a journey into Italy that proved pretty long [D], which it is ſaid he had no cauſe to repent [E]. During this journey he wrote a fine Poem (i), on the defeat of the Turkiſh fleet by the Venetians. This Poem procured him a chain of gold, which the republic of Venice preſented him. He returned to diſcharge his office, and after having weathered ſome ſtorms in the Walloon ſynods [F], he went into France, to be miniſter of the church at Paris, where a great many people wiſhed for him: ſeveral others oppoſed him, and appeared at ſome provincial ſynods, and afterwards at the national ſynod of Loudun (k), with bags full of papers againſt Mr Morus. All their accuſations were eluded or found null [G]; for he was admitted miniſter of the (g) Fid. publica, pag. 157.

(b) Ibid. pag. 213.

(i) See it's encomium in the letters of Tanaquillus Faber, lib. ii, pag. 157.

(k) It began the tenth of November 1659, and ended the tenth of January 1660.

received the news that his adverſary was on his journey. . . . . . To this he joins a ſhort Elogy on Mr Sphanheim, and then, concerning Mr Morus, he adds, I cannot give my judgment of him without being thought partial, becauſe he has been my intimate friend ever ſince we were ſchool-fellows, that is, for above five and twenty years, and I engaged in his battles againſt Father Jarrige: but it is certain, and confeſſed by all the world, that he has a lively genius, vaſt thoughts, that he ſhines and makes a great figure.

The letter which Mr Sphanheim wrote to Voſſius in March 1648 (11) deſerves to be conſidered, and may ſerve for a confirmation of ſome things which Mr Sorbiere, has juſt ſaid. We there meet with this particular, that Mr Godefroy (12) had not given ſo advantageous and glorious a teſtimony to Mr Morus, but out of hatred to Mr Spanheim. The latter threatned to publiſh all the tranſactions at Geneva relating to the good teſtimonials Morus had obtained there, and what had been his manner of life and behaviour in that city. I find in the ſame letter, that Mr Morus proteſted upon oath to the magiſtrates of Geneva, that he had not any thought of Mr Spanheim in the oration hereafter mentioned (13).

(11) It is the occaſion with of thoſe which were written to Voſſius.

(12) Profeſſor of the civil-law at Geneva.

(13) In the remark [L].

[C] He left Geneva, and carried a good teſtimonial of his Orthodoxy.] This teſtimonial was given him by the church of Geneva, January 25, 1648. It is at full length in Latin and French in the Fides publica of Mr Morus (14), where we alſo find, the enemies of this miniſter to fruſtrate the good intentions of Salmaſius, who had a mind to ſettle him as profeſſor of Divinity in Guelderland, had given out that Mr Morus was a pernicious Heretic, who not only believed, that, according to the intention of God, JESUS CHRIST ſuffered equally for all men; and that the ſin of Adam is not imputed to us; but alſo that the Holy Ghoſt is not God, or that we are not bound to believe he is. Upon this occaſion the church of Geneva gave the perſon accuſed a teſtimonial ſo full of praiſes, that it looked rather like a rhetorical panegyric than a ſentence of abſolution. Mr Morus appeared in it whiter than ſnow in all reſpects, both as to life and doctrine. They affirm, that his moſt inveterate enemies can object nothing to him that deſerves any cenſure (15). Yet we ſhall ſhow hereafter (16), that Milton received ſeveral memoirs from Geneva, which blacken our Morus terribly.

(14) Pag. m. 81.

(15) Si vitæ integritatem ſpectes, hinc te niveus morum candor retrahit, illinc admirabilis & ſibi ſemper conſtans innocentia. Apoſtolus vult Epiſcopum eſſe ἀνεπίλημπτον. Nihil utique illi vel ab inſenſiſſimis hoſtibus & livoris felle maligno turgentibus meritò objici poteſt, quod juſtæ ſit reprehenſionis obnoxium.

(16) In the remark [M], citation (30).

[D] He diſappeared, taking a journey into Italy which proved pretty long.] We find in a Latin oration which he ſpoke at Amſterdam, after his return from Italy, the reaſon why he returned no ſooner. He there mentions ſeveral dangers he had met with. For the reſt, they who ſay he undertook this Journey without acquainting his ſuperiors with it, are not much in the wrong; for the leave given him at Amſterdam the twentieth of December 1654, was only for a journey into France, for three or four months. But upon his return he appeared before the ſynod of Leyden in May 1656, and ſaid he ſaw great probability of advancing the glory of God in Italy, by the preaching of the Goſpel; and was thanked for his good advice.

[E] He had no reaſon to repent his journey into Italy.] It is reported, that falling dangerouſly ill at Florence, he ſaid ſo many fine things to the Phyſician who attended him, that this Phyſician was wholly ſtruck with admiration of him, and giving an account of it to the Great Duke, raiſed his curioſity to ſee this learned ſtranger: ſo that Mr Morus, being recovered, was introduced to an audience of his highneſs, and ſo charmed him with his diſcourſe, that he afterwards received ſeveral marks of his particular favour and eſteem. Others will have it, that Mr Morus was known to this prince before he fell ill. This is what we find in a ſmall book juſt publiſhed (17). 'The great duke 'of Tuſcany received Mr Morus very graciouſly in his 'dominions and capital city; he favoured him with 'his friendſhip and eſteem; he ſent him his own Phy- 'ſician when he was ſick at Florence; and made him 'rich preſents, worthy both of him that gave, and of 'him that received them . . . . . It is ſaid, that the 'Phyſician whom the duke ſent, to viſit and take 'care of him in his illneſs, was ſo ſurpriſed, in 'the converſation he had with him, to hear him rea- 'ſon with ſuch force, judgment, and penetration, on 'all the ſciences, and particularly that of Phyſic, 'that he owned, how able ſoever he himſelf was in 'his own profeſſion, his patient knew more of it 'than he did, who had beſtowed all his thoughts and 'ſtudies on that ſcience.'

(17) Panégyrique de Mr Morus, primed at Amſterdam 1695, pag. 14.

[F] After he had weathered ſome ſtorms in the Walloon ſynods.] In effect, the ſynod of Tergou ſummoned him in April 1659, to anſwer certain articles exhibited againſt him. He went to Tergou, but did not think fit to appear before the ſynod, and only acquainted them, that he no longer depended on any church but that of France, to which he had engaged himſelf. This did not prevent his condemnation as he had expected; for the ſynod declared him incapable of exerciſing the Miniſtry in that country, to the edification of the people, or of receiving the communion in it (18). The ſynod of Nimeguen confirmed this cenſure in September 1659 (19), notwithſtanding the letters of the church of Paris, concerning the admiſſion of Mr Morus into their church, accompanied with an act of the ſynod of Aï, dated May 8, 1659, ratifying this admiſſion. Mr De Thuanus, who was then ambaſſador of France at the Hague, took part in favour of Mr Morus, by preſenting a long memorial to the States-General, who, by an act of April 6, 1660, communicated to the ſynod of Haerlem, ordered informations to be laid before them, of all which had paſſed in this affair. The ſynod deputed three paſtors and two elders to the States, to give them the account which they deſired. And here I think the matter reſted.

(18) Theſe are the words of the Synod, article xxvii: The aſſembly declares, that the ſaid Alexander Morus is incapable of exerciſing any function of the holy miniſtry of the Goſpel among us, or of partaking of the Lord's holy ſupper, till by a ſincere repentance of his ſins, and a blameleſs converſation he makes a reparation as well for the ſcandals he has given us, &c.

(19) The aſſembly has judged, that the former aſſembly had ſufficient reaſons to pronounce this ſentence; and therefore the preſent Synod has approved, ratified, and confirmed a-new the xxviith article of the former Synod. Acts of the Synod of Nimeguen of the month of September 1659. Art. xxi.

[G] All their accuſations were eluded or found null.] We ſhall relate what is found on this ſubject, in the Hiſtory of the edict of Nantes. The king's commiſſioner to the national ſynod of Loudun, 'did not oppoſe the 'reading of the informations ſent from Holland a- 'gainſt Alexander Morus, whoſe miniſtry was then de- 'ſired by the church of Paris. He even was of opi- 'nion that in their judgment they ought to have regard 'to theſe acts, and to ground their reſolutions upon 'them: but he cauſed to be inſerted in the decree of 'the ſynod a kind of proteſt, importing that judgment 'ſhould be given according to the liberties of the edict, 'the laws of diſcipline, and cuſtoms of the king- 'dom, without being ſubject to any foreign authority,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the church of Paris. Mr Daillé who had ſerved him with all his intereſt in ſeveral ſynods [H], ſoon after repented what he had done; for there aroſe a violent quarrel between them, which produced a thouſand partialities in the flock. In general, Mr Morus in the midſt of the applauſes which his inimitable way of preaching [I] procured from an extraordinary croud of auditors, had the mortification at Paris to ſee his reputation attacked by perſons of merit, who accuſed him a-new to the ſynods [K], from

' juriſdiction, or deciſion; or remitting the party ac-
' cuſed to the juriſdiction or judgment of others out
' of the kingdom, contrary to the ordinances and edicts,
' to the prejudice and diſadvantage of the king's ſub-
' jects. By this means the commiſſioner decided the ' affair rather than the ſynod, becauſe the proceſs not ' being finiſhed in the country where the accuſation
' was firſt brought, and the proteſt of the commiſ-
' ſioner hindering Morus being remitted thither, to
' juſtify himſelf upon the place, there were not ſuf-
' ficient informations to convict him: he was therefore ' abſolved and his vocation confirmed. But it would ' be difficult to ſay, whether this vocation did more
' hurt or good, becauſe it made ſuch a diviſion in the ' conſiſtory and in the church, that what one of the par' ties called edification, the other called ſcandal: ſo that
' there appeared great exceſſes on one ſide, and paſſion
' on the other; too ſtrict an inquiry to deſtroy Morus,
' and too violent proceedings to ſupport him. A pro' vincial ſynod of the province of Berry ended the ' affair by the king's permiſſion, and was accuſed of
' being ſomething too partial in favour of the ac-
' cuſed, and of taking a little too much pleaſure in ' mortifying a conſiſtory ſo famous as that of Charen-
' ton, which by the merits and capacity of the mem' bers who compoſed it, was then as it were the ora-
' cle of all the churches, (20).

(20) Hiſt. of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. iii, livr. v, pag. 315, ad ann. 1659.

[H] Mr Daillé ..... had ſerved him with all his intereſt in ſeveral ſynods.] I think myſelf obliged to ſet down here the inſults which Mr Daillé's adverſaries offered him upon this occaſion, and the anſwer he gave them in his own juſtification; for this is a part of Mr Morus's adventures. Here then is what Mr Cottiby, formerly miniſter of Poitiers, objected to Mr Daillé (21). ' That which ſurprizes me moſt, is to ' ſee my ſelf accuſed by you, Sir, for whom I might ' have hoped for the greateſt protection and ſupport,
' if by misfortune I ſhould have happened to com-
' mit any fault, which ſhould oblige me to appear be' fore theſe tribunals, in which you generally hold ſo
' eminent a place; for what might I not reaſonably
' expect from a man, who, in the perſon of one of ' his brethren, is the declared defender and advocate
' of one of the impureſt lives in the world, and who,
' after he had pleaded his cauſe in a provincial ſy-
' nod of the iſle of France, was hardy enough in a
' national ſynod, whereof he was the head, (a worthy
' head of ſuch a body!) to patronize him openly, I ' will not ſay againſt the faithful memoirs of the mi-
' niſters of Rohan, of Caen and Lyons, but which ' is more aſtoniſhing, againſt a multitude of accuſa-
' tions from ſome entire provinces, and all this by I
' know not how many turns, much leſs innocent
' than thoſe of the tongue.' Father Adam made him almoſt the ſame reproaches, whom Mr Daillé thus anſwered (22): ' Wherefore would you have me con' demn him, and judge him unworthy of thoſe cha' ritable offices which we owe our neighbour in caſe
' of need; I who have heard him, and not only ' heard him, but, after an exact enquiry into the ' cauſe with all the diligence and application I was ' capable of, have been convinced of his innocence? If ' theſe little kindneſſes had been even owing only to
' my own conſcience, the teſtimony of this would ſuf-
' ficiently juſtify me againſt thoſe violences and ſtrange
' calumnies, with which your proſelyte inveighs a-
' gainſt me in this place. But both you and he do
' me the more wrong in blaming my conduct in this ' affair, as I did him thoſe offices you reproach me
' with, not properly from my own private opinion,
' but by the order of my ſuperiors; firſt by order of
' the conſiſtory of my own church, which entruſted
' me and the other deputies with this affair, in this
' ſynod of the iſle of France mentioned by your pro-
' ſelyte, which was held at Ferté by Juare in 1657;
' and then two years after, not only by order of my ' own conſiſtory and church, but alſo by that of the ' whole ſynod of theſe provinces held at Aï in Cham' pagne, in 1659. I have done good as well as I ' was able, what the aſſemblies, on which I depend,
' expreſsly enjoined and commanded; and what my own
' conſcience, far from being ſhocked at, approved as juſt
' and reaſonable. What crime have I committed in all
' this? Certainly if the defendant were even as guil' ty, as I believe him innocent, yet it is evident I ' could not be to blame for the two judgments by ' which he has been acquitted; for I have defended a
' cauſe which I did, and ſtill do believe to be very ' juſt. I neither had, nor could have any vote in ' the ſentence given; for I acted as advocate and ' not as judge. Beſides, I muſt add, that I acted ' neither as the one, nor as the other in the national
' ſynod, which made the laſt decree about this affair;
' for this defendant himſelf being preſent there, pleaded
' his own cauſe in five or ſix full hearings, with ſo
' much force and evidence, that thanks be to GOD
' he had no need of any other aſſiſtance.' See below the remark [M] towards the end.

(21) Cottiby, Reply to Mr Daillé, pag. 17.

(22) Daillé, Reply to F. Adam, Part iii, pag. 154.

[I] His inimitable manner of preaching.] It conſiſted in certain flights of imagination, which contained ingenious alluſions, and I know not what air of paradox very proper to ſurprize the hearer, and engage his conſtant attention. But his manner of delivery was what was moſt taking. Hence it came to paſs, that his ſermons in writing were not near ſo much admired; and that the greateſt part of thoſe who endeavour to imitate him, only make themſelves ridiculous. The deſire of following his method, which began to corrupt many of the young miniſters, obliged the ſynod of the iſle of France in the year 1675, to make an act which was read in the pulpit of Charenton and elſewhere, forbidding all flights of imagination, and playing with words, &c. in expounding the word of GOD. It will not be diſagreeable in this place to ſee the opinion of an Hiſtorian, who is, beyond compariſon, a better judge than my ſelf. He was, ſays he ſpeaking of Morus (23), extremely followed by the people, and they who leaſt knew why he deſerved admiration, were yet his moſt paſſionate admirers. It is a diſpute among perſons of good judgment, whether his excellency lay in any thing ſolid, or only in ſhew, whether it deſerved to be called a flaſh of lightning, or a ſteady light. But even thoſe who gave ſentence againſt him, could not but hear him, with great pleaſure, and feel in themſelves the ſame paſſions, which he raiſed in others. Some have thought that he had much leſs learning than is commonly imagined: But none doubt his capacity of diſplaying to the beſt advantage that which he was maſter of, and of giving a luſtre to any thing he expoſed to the judgment of the public. However, never did any man receive more flattering applauſes than he, nor could that which was ſaid of another be better applied to any man than him; that if he did not deſerve the advantageous character given of him, at leaſt he diſabled his hearers from giving him a bad one. He had ſaid p. 316, that Morus's method did not pleaſe all the world, and that they who affected to imitate him, had ſeldom or never ſucceeded.

(23) Hiſt. of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. iii, livr. vii, pag. 433.

[K] He was accuſed a-new to the ſynods.] It may be ſaid, Mr Morus did not live at quiet in the church of Paris; for after the month of September 1661, complaints were brought againſt him before the conſiſtory, which came to nothing, and perhaps the reaſon was becauſe he aſked leave to go to England in December 1661. He returned in the month of June 1662. And then the complaints being immediately renewed, the conſiſtory ordered that he ſhould be heard; but that, in the mean time, he ſhould forbear preaching. His partizans would make him preach in ſpite of the conſiſtory, and to that end ſeized upon all the avenues to the pulpit, and would not ſuffer Mr Daillé's ſon to get up into it, which cauſed ſo terrible a commotion, that there was no preaching that Sunday morning. Some maſters of families had recourſe to the parliament, which upon July 27, 1662, ordered a conference to be held upon it. This aſſembly ſuſpended Mr Morus for a year. The ſynod of the iſle of France confirmed and even aggravated

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google from which he was saved only as by fire. His death, which was very edifying, and the marks of piety which he discovered in his last sickness, blotted out the remembrance of what might have been irregular in his behaviour. He died at Paris, in the house of the duchess of Rohan, in the month of September 1670. He was never married. We shall see below the titles of his works [L].

I shall say something of his quarrel with John Milton [M]: and observe, that there are some things in the Menagiana very much to his honour, and others to his disadvantage [N]. One gravated the suspension; but that of the province of Berry, to which this minister appealed, restored him to his office (24). This kind of appeals were allowed by the regulations of the national synods.

[L] We shall see below the titles of his works.] There is a treatise of his, de Gratia & Libero arbitrio; another, de Scriptura sacra sive de causa Dei; a commentary on the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah; notes, ad loca quædam novi fœderis; an answer to Milton, intituled, Alexandri Mori fides publica; Orations and Poems in Latin. Some fragments of his sermons have been printed since his death, and even some entire sermons (25). We shall add one word concerning his orations. He spoke three of them at Geneva, which are very fine. The Latin of them is rather learned than elegant: He affected uncommon phrases, and such significations of words as are almost without example. Of these three orations, one is a panegyric upon Calvin; another is intituled de Pace, wherein he severely condemns, without naming any body, Amyraldus and Spanheim, who were at open war about universal grace. He gives them their due. This was a home reprimand, and rejoiced his very heart. Let us also say a word about his Latin Poems. That which he made on the birth of our Saviour was much esteemed, and so was that which was a thanksgiving to GOD after a great sickness. Mr Perachon, who was then a Protestant, translated them into French verse, and published them at Paris in the year 16 . . . . . I do not remember, that I ever saw any other French verses of Mr Morus's, except the answer he made on the same rhimes to a sonnet which Corras addressed to him after his abjuration.

[M] His quarrel with John Milton.] The occasion of the quarrel was this; in 1652, Mr Morus published a book of Peter du Moulin the son (26), at the Hague, and dedicated it, in the Printer's name (27), to the king of Great Britain. This book which is intituled, Regii sanguinis clamor ad cælum adversus parricidas Anglicanos, is a bitter invective against the parliamentarians, and Milton in particular is extremely ill treated in it. The epistle dedicatory gives him no better usage, but he is abused much more furiously in some verses at the latter end of the book. Milton, who had let several violent books published against the parliamentarians pass without any reply, could not contain when he saw this, in which he was personally concerned, as well by the vast elogiums given in it to Salmasius, as by the terrible reproaches heaped upon himself. He answered it therefore, and supposed, either sincerely or craftily, that he might have the greater advantage against the person whom he refuted, that Morus was the author (28) of this book. He treats him as a dog, or rather as a goat; for he accuses him of a thousand leud actions, and particularly of having debauched a maid-servant at Geneva, and of having kept her since she had a husband, and of having got with child a chamber-maid of Salmasius's wife under promise of marriage. He accuses him of being convicted of several heresies at Geneva, and of having shamefully abjured them with his mouth, but not with his heart. He accuses him of having been deprived at Geneva of his salary for eight or ten months, and of his offices of professor and minister, on account of a charge brought against him for adultery, &c. the issue whereof was, that he must have been condemned, if he had not avoided the definitive sentence, by declaring he would quit the city. He accuses him also of being forbidden the exercise of the ministry by the magistrates of Amsterdam. In fine, he defames him after the cruelest manner in the world, intermixing the stories he tells of him with a parcel of buffoon jests. Mr Morus defended himself by a long list of testimonials, of his orthodoxy and good life, which the consistories, the universities, the synods, and the magistrates of the places where he had lived, had given him. He made it appear, that the judges as well Civil as Ecclesiastical, which took cognizance of the pretensions of the chamber-maid of Salmasius's wife, had declared them null, and clearly acquitted him in this affair, notwithstanding the contrivances of this lady who had employed all her craft against him (29). He makes it appear by the authentic certificates of the magistrates of Amsterdam, of the Walloon consistory, and of the curators of the illustrious school of the same city, that he was never prohibited the exercise of his ministry. I am not ignorant that some exceptions may be alledged against his certificates of a good life, and that it is a little strange, that those which Morus obtained at Geneva should be so different from the testimony of public fame: for after all, it is certain, that Milton received memoirs from Geneva, and that he produced (30) a letter written from that town, which assures, that all the world admired how he came to be so faithfully informed about the conduct of Mr Morus. He was not silenced by his certificates; for he says (31) in particular as to those of Geneva, that they were given before those who accused Mr Morus of adultery had formally prosecuted him. Besides, it is well known, that the greatest storm this minister met with at Geneva, was raised after his obtaining the testimonials of January 25, 1648; and a certain person has published (32), that the magistrates of that city cancelled the act of deposition against Mr Morus decreed against him by the consistory, and commanded the consistory to give this minister a testimonial of good life. But after all, there are infinitely more exceptions to be made to the defamatory reports, which such an author as Milton is capable of collecting, than against these certificates and testimonials. So that upon the whole, I should be of opinion, that considering those certificates which have been produced by his adversary, and the inconveniences justly to be apprehended, if such accusations as are uncertain and without judicial proof, should be preferred before justifications drawn up in due form, that he should be stigmatized as a public calumniator, except as to those facts in which he can defend himself by the help of some authentic acts. I should think in particular, that the distich he has inserted in the London Gazette, ought to be declared a diabolical silly jest. That distich is in these words, for I cannot think Mr Colomiés (33) meant any other.

Galli ex concubitu gravidam te Pontia (34) Mori,
Quis benè moratam morigeramque neget?

Milton's hatred was inveterate enough, as appears by a letter (35) he wrote when Mr Morus's affair was depending before the synod of Loudon. He was of opinion, that if they should decree even nothing more than the deposing this minister, that synod would meet with what no other had ever done, that is, with a happy issue. Synodo interea protestantium Laodunensi (36), propediem, ut scribis, convocandæ, precor id quod nulli adhuc Synodo contigit, fœlicem exitum, non Nazianzenicum; fœlicem autem huic nunc satis futurum si nihil aliud decreverit quàm ejiciendum esse Morum. This letter is dated December 20, 1659. The synod had already sat near two months, and yet Mr Milton speaks of it as an assembly which was to meet, which shows, that he had very little correspondence in France. In another letter (37) he speaks yet more harshly of Mr Morus's call to Charenton, but without naming him.

[N] There are some things in the Menagiana which are very much to his honour, and others to his advantage.] 'Mr Morus declared some time before his death, that no one had tempted him 'to change his religion so much as I. The 'duchess of Aiguillon ordered me to offer him, in her 'name, a pension of four thousand livres, I communicated

(24) All this is related at large in the History of the Edict of Nantes, at the end of the seventh book of the third Tome.

(25) At the Hague in 1685. See the Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, for the month of March, 1685, pag. 333, of the second edition. Eighteen of his sermons have been printed on the eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, at Amsterdam in 1691.

(26) See Daillé, Reply to F. Adam, Part II, pag. 127. Colomiés, Biblioth. Choisi. pag. 19.

(27) There were some copies to which Mr Morus had put his name, as Milton says, Defens. pro se, pag. 23, 25.

(28) The Oxford catalogue ascribes it to Morus.

(29) Illa mihi graviter jamdudum infensa . . . nihil intentatum reliquit ut me in nassam infaustissimi matrimonii compingeret. Quod ubi sensit innotuisse vulgo, me vero palam vehementissimeque reluctari, Acberontea moveba, inquit, & perdam ipsum, quâ sæpe formulâ utitur. Morus, Fides publica, pag. 190.

(30) Milton, Defens. pro se, pag. 132.

(31) Ibid. pag. 92, 141.

(32) Ludov. Molinæus, Paræneſis ad ædificat. pag. 433.

(33) Biblioth. Choisie, pag. 19.

(34) Thus he called the chamber-maid of Salmasius's wife. Mr Morus, without telling what her name was, denies that Milton called her by her right name. See Milton. Defens. pro se, pag. 164.

(35) It is the xxixth.

(36) He should have said Julio-dunensi, or Lausdunensi, &c.

(37) It is the xxivth, and dated the first of August 1657.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

One of his last panegyrists relates a fact which is false [O].

The opinion which Mr Chevreau has given of the character of Mr Morus, is very agreeable to that of several other good judges, and proves at the same time, that those things which are written to a person himself, are sometimes very different from those which are said of him, in letters addressed to others (l) [P]. I shall not pass over in silence, that the illustrious Huetius gives very great elogiums to Mr Morus in some Latin Poems which he inscribed to him. See p. 30, and 77, of the poems of this learned prelate, of the Utrecht edition 1700 (m).

(l) See, above, the remark [M] of the article GROTIUS.

(m) It is the fourth; his Notes on the Anthologia are joined to it.

'nicated this affair to Mr Perefix, then archbishop of 'Paris by abbot Gaudin, and Mr Perefix spoke of it 'to the king. His majesty said, that it was not a 'proper time, and that it would do an injury to Mr 'Morus, because he was then at variance with his 'brethren. Mr Morus occasioned divisions wherever 'he lived: this he did in Holland and elsewhere, 'and even at Paris. I compare him to Helen, who 'kindled a war wherever she came (38) . . . Marshal 'Grammont having been, by the king's order, to visit 'the minister Morus in his last sickness, was asked 'by his majesty at his return how he found him. 'Sire, says the marshal, I saw him die; he died a 'good Huguenot: But what I think him most to be 'pitied for is, that he died in a religion which is 'now as much out of fashion, as a high-crowned-'hat (39).

(38) Menagiana, pag. 153, of the second edition of Holland.

(39) Suite du Menagiana, pag. 82.

[O] One of his last panegyrists relates a fact which is not true.] 'The Sorbonne one day were all surprized (40), 'by an accident which did great honour to Mr 'Morus, and made all their doctors blush, and 'was esteemed a sort of inchantment. A certain 'person whose face was altogether unknown to them, 'and whom they took at first sight for some coun-'try priest, being present at their disputes, desired 'the professor, who presided in that assembly, to give 'him leave to propose some arguments. Which be-'ing granted, he acquitted himself so well, that he 'soon gained the esteem of all the doctors: and as this 'new antagonist urged his arguments with a surprizing force, and beyond what could be expected 'from him, their esteem was changed into admi-'ration. But when they saw that this powerful 'enemy pushed them too hard, and that they 'could stand against the force of his reasons no lon-'ger, all their admiration and esteem was changed 'into anger and indignation; and the dispute grew 'so hot, that if he had not wisely got out of so dan-'gerous a place, he had reason to apprehend some 'mischief. But he imitated JESUS CHRIST our great 'master, when he went out of the temple to avoid 'the snares of the Pharisees, whom he had confound-'ed. In like manner our Morus, after he had stopped 'the mouths of the Pharisees of these latter ages, a-'mused them with soft words, went out of their 'synagogue, and so left them. After he had made 'his escape, they ordered one of their scholars to fol-'low him at a distance, and watch where he went 'in, and afterwards enquire what kind of man this 'was who knew more than all the Sorbonne together: 'which being observed by him whom they so much 'desired to know, he turned about to him who fol-'lowed him, and said only these two words memento Mori; from whence those who sent him pre-'sently concluded, that he who had given them so 'much trouble, was that famous man who was one 'of the pillars of the church of Charenton, and the 'terror of the Romish church (41).' This is what I find in a book published about a year ago, well worth reading. It is now five and twenty years since I told this story in the presence of a doctor of Divinity, curate of R. . . . . a man of wit, and well versed in the customs of his religion. I was persuaded of the truth of the fact, for I had heard it told upon several occasions by men of good sense; and at the age I was then of, I scarce distrusted any thing that came from such persons. The doctor answered me, it is a very good story, and the conclusion is very ingenious; but assure your self it is a romance, for they who propose arguments against the theses that are maintained in the Sorbonne, are always such persons as are well known, and graduates in the Faculty, and obliged to wear the habits or robes belonging to their degree. Had the author of this story known thus much, he would have changed his scene.

(41) Panégyrique d'Alexandre Morus, printed at Amsterdam by John du Fresne, 1695, pag. 14, 15, 16.

[P] The opinion of Mr Chevreau. . . . . is very agreeable . . . . and proves at the same time, that those things which are written to a person himself, are sometimes very different from those which are said of him in letters addressed to others.] Read the two letters which he wrote to Morus himself in 1660 (42), the one in French, and the other in Latin, and compare them with this passage of his letter to Tanaquil Faber: 'You know there are some who natu-'rally love incense from what hand soever it comes, 'who demand it as a debt, and who are so accu-'stomed to it, that it is impossible to please, unless 'one has always a censer in his hand. This is a fail-'ing that deserves to be pitied; but it is a human fail-'ing; besides, that the profound erudition of our 'friend (43) in polite learning, his exact knowledge 'of the Greek, and of all the oriental languages, 'do justly render him considerable and distinguish 'him from so many others who resemble him only 'in his defects. That which pleased me in the fre-'quent conversations we had together, was, that he 'always told me sincerely he thought himself infi-'nitely inferior to Mr Daillé, whom he believed 'to be a more solid Divine than your Calvin. But 'withal, a certain student, whom you know, lately 'assured me, that Mr Morus was preferred before 'Mr Daillé by a general consent, that his flights of 'imagination please people much more by their no-'velty, than the eloquence of Mr Daillé, who was 'fit to be his master (44). . . . What I fear is, that 'he will be intoxicated by these extraordinary applauses 'that he has not the power to offer the least vio-'lence to his free humour, and that he will give way 'to his inclination . . . . without any regard for his 'character, his reputation, or his fortune (45). 'Mr Morus, says he, in another letter (46), has a 'deal of wit and learning, but little religion and judg-'ment. He is, ambitious, restless, changeable, bold, 'presumptuous, and wavering. He understands Latin 'Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, but does not understand 'human life.'

(42) Oeuvres mêlées de Mr Chevreau, pag. 40, & 50.

(43) That is to say, Mr Morus.

(44) Chevreau, ubi supra, pag. 48.

(45) Ibid. pag. 49.

(46) Ibid. pag. 409.

MOSYNIANS, or MOSYNOECIANS (a). Thus certain Mountaineers were called, who lived in trees (b) or in wooden towers (c) in the neighbourhood of the Euxine sea (d). Their customs were so opposite to those of other nations, that those things which others do privately in their houses, they did in public vew; and what others do in public, they did in their private dwellings (e). They did not except the act of generation from this prepostrous rule [A]. Their highest wooden tower was the habitation of their king, a miserable prince; for he was obliged to determine all their differences as judge, and

(a) That is to say, inhabiting towers. See Apollonius, Argon. lib. ii, ver. 1020, & seq. and Strabo, ubi infra.

(b) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. 378.

(c) Id. ib.

(d) Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. xix, & Dionysius Periegetes, ver. 766.

(e) Apollon. Argon. lib. ii, ver. 1020, & seq.

[A] They did not except the act of generation from this prepostererous rule.] Apollonius was in the right to compare them to swine, since they were not ashamed to do this act before the eyes of their neighbours.

Οὐδ' εὐνῆς αἰδὼς ἐπεδήμιος, ἀλλὰ σύες ὡς
Φορβάδες, οὐδ' ἠβαιὸν ἀτυζόμενοι παρεόντας,
Μίσγονται χαμάδις ξυνῇ φιλότητι γυναικῶν.

Nec eos in populo pudet cœtus Venerii: sed, in vicem porcorum
Gregalium, nihil quicquam reveriti arbitros

Humi

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and if he happened to give a wrong judgment, they impriſoned him immediately, and ſtarved him to death (f) [B]. Their kingdom was elective, and they always kept their prince in chains and under a ſtrong guard (g). They lived upon acorns and the fleſh of wild beaſts, and laid ambuſhes for travellers (h), and treated ſtrangers very ill (i). They marked themſelves all over the bodies (k). Conſult Xenophon in the fifth book of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger. He has there given a long account of their manner of arming and feeding themſelves, &c. He ſays, that when alone they talked, laughed, and danced, as if they had been in company.

(h) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. 378.

(i) Pomp. Mela, lib. i, cap. xix.

(k) Id. ib.

(f) Taken from Athenæus, ibid.

(g) Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. 19. See also Diodorus Siculus, lib. xiv, cap. xxxi.

Humi & in propatulo commiſcent cum uxoribus corpora (1).

(1) Apoll. Argon. lib. iv, ver. 1025, pag. m. 245, 244.

The ſcholiaſt obſerves, that we muſt not underſtand this as if they lay in public with all women indifferently, but each with his own wife. Pomponius Mela makes no ſuch diſtinction. 'Propatulo veſcuntur, ſays he (2), PROMISCUE concumbunt & palam. - - - They eat abroad, and their Venery is PROMISCUOUS and public.' I know not what ground the ſcholiaſt had for this diſtinction. Perhaps he had a mind to make uſe of the maxim, that in doubtful matters we ſhould always embrace the more favourable opinion, and paſs in mitiorem the mildeſt ſentence. But the phraſes of Apollonius ſeem very clear againſt this exception, and do plainly confirm the authority of Pomponius Mela; as Diodorus Siculus has alſo done (3). Note, that we find in Xenophon, that the Moſynœcians, with whom he made an alliance had a great mind to lie with the wenches who followed the camp of the Grecians, and that publickly according to their own cuſtom (4). For the reſt, this monſtrous immodeſty has been known in other nations (5).

(2) Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. xx, pag. m. 22.

(3) Diod. Siculus, lib. xiv, cap. xxxi.

(4) Xenophon, de Expedit. Cyri, lib. v, pag. m. 259.

(5) See the remark [D] of the article HIPPARCHIA.

[B] They impriſoned him immediately, and ſtarved him to death.] We ſhall give the very words of Apollonius.

- - Ἦν γάρ τω τὶ θεμιστεύων ἀλίτηται,
Διμῷ μεν' κεῖν' ἦμαρ ἐνικλείσαντες ἔχουσιν.

- - Nam ſi quid alicubi in jure dicundo deliret,
Ipſum eodem die in cuſtodiam datum ſuffocant inedia (6).

(6) Apollon. Argon. lib. ii, ver. 1032.

But in his judgment ſhou'd he chance to ſwerve,
The ſelf ſame day ſees him ſhut up to ſtarve.

Pintianus accuſes Pomponius Mela of not rightly underſtanding the meaning of Apollonius; he pretends, that what this Greek Poet ſays is, that the Moſynœcians ſhut up their king the ſame day he gave the unjuſt ſentence, and condemned him to die of hunger. Pomponius Mela only ſays, that upon his giving any unjuſt ſentence, they condemned him to faſt a whole day. 'Reges ſuffragio deligunt, vinculiſque & arctiſſima cuſtodia tenent: atque ubi culpam prave quid imperando meruere, inedia diei totius afficiunt (7). - - - - - They elect their kings by vote, and keep them in chains, and under the ſtricteſt confinement, and ſhould they offend by decreeing any thing unjuſt, they deprive them of ſuſtenance for one whole day.' Pintianus builds upon the teſtimony of two authors quoted by the ſcholiaſt, and on that of Nicolas Damaſcenus, which he had met with in the collections, of Stobæus. 'Mela verba illa ad famem illo die, pro illius diei accepit. At Apollonii enarratores contra intelligunt, eo ipſo die quo contra jus pronunciaverit in carcerem trudi, quoad fame perreat, citantque ſuæ expoſitionis aſſertores Ephorum & Nymphodorum. Addo ego aſtipulari interpretibus Apollonii, Nicolaum de moribus gentium, referente Joanne Stobæo (8). - - - - Mela underſtood the words 'hunger in that day to mean of that day. But the commentators of Apollonius underſtand it quite contrary, that their king on that very day, that he pronounced the unjuſt ſentence was impriſoned till he died of hunger, and ground their expoſition on the authorities of Ephorus, and Nymphodorus. I add, that of the ſame opinion with the commentators of Apollonius, is Nicolaus in his piece on the cuſtoms of nations, preſerved in Stobæus's collections.' This is the intire paſſage of the ſcholiaſt: Ἱστορεῖ Ἔφορος καὶ Νυμφόδωρος περὶ τούτων, ὅτι τὸν βασιλέα αὐτῶν ἀδικόν τι κρίναντα. ἐγκλείσασι καὶ λιμαγχονῆσαι. Ephorus and Nymphodorus on this ſubject relate, that they ſhut up and ſtarve their king to death on giving a falſe judgment. I have related this on purpoſe to ſhow, that the critic has ſtrained his authority a little too far; for it is not true, that the ſcholiaſt gave the explication of Pintianus to the words of the text, and afterwards proved it by the authority of Euphorus and Nymphodorus; for he barely cites what theſe two authors ſay. I am however of Pintianus's opinion, and find that Iſaac Voſſius has refuted it wretchedly. He ſuppoſes, that the Moſynœcians condemned their king for ſlighter faults to faſt a day, and that for greater faults they condemned him to die of hunger (9). He gives this as the true ſenſe of the words of Apollonius, and maintains they were well interpreted by Pomponius Mela (10). 'Interpretatio Melæ, adds he, ut facilior ita quoque melior. - - - - Mela's interpretation, as it is moſt natural, is alſo moſt accurate.' This is very ſtrange indeed! That Apollonius ſhould mean to inform us of the diſtinction this people made between the ſmall and the greater faults of their prince, that for the former the prince was to faſt a whole day, and for the latter to be famiſhed to death; and yet that there ſhould not be the leaſt phraſe or word in his relation which inſinuates any ſuch diſtinction. That Pomponius Mela ſhall be ſaid to have given the ſenſe of Apollonius faithfully, and yet that he ſhall not mention a word of the puniſhment of the greater faults; that he ſhall dwell on terms the leaſt diſadvantageous to the nation, which Apollonius meant to decry, and be wholly ſilent with regard to facts which might render it the moſt odious; in a word, that there ſhall not be in any of his expreſſions the leaſt footſtep of the diſtinction in queſtion. Who can ever digeſt this? What does Iſaac Voſſius take his readers to be? A thouſand ſuch faults might be found in the beſt writers, by any who would take the trouble of giving their works a critical examination.

(7) Pompon. Mela, ubi ſupra.

(8) Pintianus, Caſtigat. in Pomponium Melam, pag. m. 37.

(9) Iſaacus Voſſius in Melam, pag. m. 104.

(10) Hic quidem videtur ſenſus eſſe verborum Apollonii quæ recte interpretatus eſt Mela, licet contrarium exiſtiment Pintianus aliique viri magni. Id. ib.

Note, it muſt be granted, that Apollonius has expreſſed himſelf very confuſedly, which gave occaſion to Pomponius Mela's miſtake. I am ſurpriſed Diodorus Siculus ſhould ſay nothing of this law, when he obſerves, that theſe Barbarians kept their prince ſhut up all his life-time in the tower of their capital (11).

(11) Locus iſte aliorum caſtellorum veluti caput & primaria regionis arx, fuit: in cuius parte editiſſima rex aulam habebat. Patrius autem hic mos pro lege erat, ut per totam inibi vitam rex ſubſiſtens mandata populis inde diſtribueret. Diodor. Siculus, lib. xiv, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 592.

MOTHE LE VAYER (FRANCIS DE LA). See VAYER

MOTTE, or MOTHE (LA) a town in Lorrain. Moreri deſcribes the ſituation of it, and ſays that it was taken by the French in 1634 [A], and that it has ſince been ruined.

[A] It was taken by the French in 1634.] This is a particular account. Lewis XIII ordered the marſhal de la Force, 'who had always ſome troops on the 'frontiers of Lorrain; to reduce all thoſe places under his obedience, which had not yet ſubmitted. La 'Motte being the ſtrongeſt place was firſt attacked, 'and alone gave the marſhal more trouble than all 'the reſt; although, for want of a ſufficient garriſon, 'as well as ammunition and proviſions, and the 'accidents of the ſeaſon in thoſe parts being ſo favo'rable to the king as to make it impoſſible to throw 'in any ſuccours, it did not defend itſelf ſo long as it

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ruined. This is too general, and a more particular account is not unneceſſary. We ſhall ſay therefore that this place was reſtored to the duke of Lorrain by a treaty of peace in 1641; but as this prince did not execute that treaty, cardinal Richelieu had a ſtrong deſire to have taken la Motte away from him: but he did not however ſucceed in it, for the French troops which blocked it up were forced to retire [B]. It was not afterwards reſolved in earneſt to reduce it till 1645. Cardinal Mazarin ordered his nephew Magalotti to beſiege it, who attacked it with great vigour, but the place held out the longer becauſe it was believed he would not obſerve the articles of the capitulation he ſhould grant [C]. The Marquis de Villeroi, who ſucceeded him in the command of the army, obliged the governor to capitulate: he promiſed among other things that it ſhould be neither raſed nor diſmantled; but this article was not obſerved: the reſentment of the queen-mother prevailed over the obligation of keeping his word [D].

'it otherwiſe might have done, being the ſtrongeſt 'place in all Lorrain, both for it's ſituation on a 'rock, which made the approaches very difficult, and 'for it's not being commanded by eminences on any 'ſide. It was ſurrendered however at the end of three 'months, after Mr d'Iche, the governor who defended 'it, was taken off by a cannon ball (1).'

(1) Memoirs of the marquis de Beauvau, pag. 55.

[B] The French troops which blocked it up, were forced to retire.] 'The king's forces being employed 'in ſeveral places againſt Spain, all that Mr du 'Hallier could do with the few troops left with him, 'was to form a ſort of blockade, in hopes to ſtarve it, 'knowing it was not well ſupplied with proviſions: 'but the duke did not give him time enough, for ap- 'prehending the extremities of the beſieged, he raiſed 'the ſiege of Tanes which he had attacked, to come to 'its relief, and forced Mr du Hallier, after ſome ſkir- 'miſhes to retire with the loſs of his baggage, hav- 'ing before ſent his cannon to Chaumont for greater 'ſecurity (2).'

(2) Ib. pag. 79.

[C] It was believed that Magalotti, would not obſerve the capitulation he ſhould grant.] Here follows the reaſon the marquis de Beauvau gives for it. Magalotti having made himſelf maſter of the counterſcarp, luckily found ſo many veins in the rock that he was very ſoon able to ſpring a mine, under one of the baſtions, but his good fortune did not laſt long; for having reduced the beſieged, either to ſtand an aſſault or to capitulate; Clicot, that his honour might be irreproachable, tho' he ſaw himſelf without any probability of ſuccours, and apprehending alſo that Magalotti would not obſerve any capitulation he might grant, as he had ſworn he would not in a rage he had been in on account of the ſevere reflexions thrown out during the ſiege againſt the queen-mother, the cardinal, and himſelf, reſolved to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity (3).

(3) Ib. pag. 85.

[D] The reſentment of the queen-mother prevailed over the obligation of keeping his word.] We now come to ſee what was the cauſe of this princeſs's indignation, and what alſo were it's conſequences. 'The capitu- 'lation was exactly obſerved as to the garriſon and 'effects of the duke; but the fortifications, and the 'whole town, not excepting even the church, were ſo 'intirely raſed that there is not now the leaſt mark 'of them remaining: the queen-mother having ſo 'deeply reſented the ſcandalous reflexions thrown out 'againſt her, that ſhe rather choſe to forfeit her word 'than loſe her revenge..... Behold the end of 'la Mothe, which, for ſituation, and the ſtrength of 'it's ramparts cut out of a rock, ſeemed impregnable, 'and the materials of this unfortunate place, as a ſort 'of juſt ſatisfaction for the damages it had done the 'neighbouring villages, by incurſions and robberies, 'were made uſe of for their reparation (4).'

(4) Ib. pag. 87.

The marquis de Beauvau juſtly blames this reſentment of the queen-mother. It is ſurprizing, ſays he (5), that ſo great and virtuous a princeſs, who had been always ſo eminently religious, and naturally generous, ſhould be ſo little able to bear abuſes, ſo common to the inſolence of ſoldiers, which are never capable of wounding reputation: and that to revenge herſelf for an injury more imaginary than real, ſhe ſhould chooſe to run the hazard of blaſting her honour by a breach of faith, and of ruining a great many innocent perſons by the deſtruction of a whole town, the ruins of which can never be ſo far concealed from poſterity, as to bury this action in oblivion. Her majeſty had much better have deſpiſed thoſe reflexions of the ſoldiers, and have imitated Catherine de Medicis (6). But if to make an example of them, ſhe was reſolved by all means to puniſh this place which had given way to this exceſs of rage and brutality, ſhe ſhould not have admitted it to capitulate, ſhe ſhould have taken it by ſtorm, or obliged it to ſurrender at diſcretion, coſt what it would; and then, without breach of public faith, ſhe had been at liberty to have taken the vengeance ſhe deſired.

(5) Ibid.

(6) See the Diſſertation on defamatory libels, num. XIII, at the end of this Dictionary.

MOTTE-AIGRON (JAMES DE LA) became famous in the quality of an author during the famous conteſt betwixt Balzac, and Father Goulu, general of the Feuillant Monks. He wrote a preface to Balzac's Letters, and was commiſſioned, jointly with Mr Vaugelas [A], to carry to Father Goulu a copy of Balzac's Apology, in which he treated a certain young Feuillant very harſhly. As Father Goulu took the ſending of this copy for a challenge (a), he immediately ſet himſelf to write againſt Balzac in a very outrageous manner, and ſpent ſome of his ſmall ſhot upon Mr Motte-Aigron; among others theſe following, that he was the ſon of a very honeſt Apothecary, and that he commonly lived at Balzac's table (b). It is pretended, that this was in ſome meaſure violating the laws of Hoſpitality, ſince Father Goulu had more than once lodged at Mr Motte-Aigron's father's (c): but, on the other ſide, it may be a proof, that he knew things from the firſt hand. Be that as it will, he touched his adverſary to the quick, and occaſioned the public to be informed ſoon after, in the dedication of a book, that the pretended Apothecary of Father Goulu was Abraham Aigron, Eſq; counſellor to the king, and judge of the taxes for Angoulême. This epiſtle dedicatory is not ill written (d); but being in Latin, and prefixed to the anſwer which Motte-Aigron wrote in French to Father Goulu, there is an affectation in it which only ſerves to beget a diſlike of the grand elogiums which the author very liberally beſtows on his father, and which he turns in ſuch a manner, as might moſt effectually remove all ſuſpicion of Pharmacy. Not ſatisfied with this preamble, he informs us in the body of the book (e), that his great-grandfather having accompanied

(a) Preface to the ſecond part of the Lettres de Phyllarque, and the firſt letter of the ſecond part.

(b) Lettre XIII de Phyllarque, Part i.

(c) La Motte-Aigron, Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 318, 322. See the article GOULU (JOHN), remark [N].

(d) See among the letters of Balzac, that which he wrote in 1622 to la Motte-Aigron, where he compliments him highly, eſpecially on his fine Latin, in a manuſcript work.

(e) Pag. 306, 307.

[A] Jointly with Mr Vaugelas.] Father Goulu in the preface to the ſecond part of his Letters, ſays, that he who accompanied Motte-Aigron was the prior of Chives; (there are ſome letters to this prior among thoſe of Balzac) but Motte-Aigron informs us (1), that he who went with him to viſit Father Goulu was Mr Vaugelas.

(1) Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 299.

[B] Malleville

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

accompanied Henry II, in his expedition to Germany, was one of the chief captains which the king left in Mets, and one of those who defended that place with the greatest bravery against Charles V. He adds, that his great-grandmother, Catherine de la Barde, was of as noble a family as any in her country, and that his great-uncle by the mother's side, had the honour to be secretary of state, and prime minister to Margaret wife of Henry d' Albret king of Navarre. Father Goulu had already changed his note, for before the publishing of this book he had said, that Mr La Motte-Aigron was too much a gentleman to deny, &c (f). Let who will consider whether this amounts to a full recantation. I do not think it is. And I have been told it was true, that the father of Mr Motte-Aigron had been an Apothecary, but mended his condition by buying the place of a commissioner of the taxes, and at last became mayor of Coignac in Angoumois. Mr Malleville has given a hint of this in an epigram which was not inserted in the collection of his poems [B]. I never could discover what became of our author [C], after the publishing his answer in 1628, or what became of the design he seemed to have, after he had humbled the general of the Feuillants, of retrieving the fruits of his labours which a fire had destroyed. These were pieces relating to the History of Spain, and some other subjects (g). It belongs to those who shall write the Bibliotheque of Angoumois, to inform us of them.

(f) Preface to the second part of the Lettres de Phyllarque.

(g) See his Epistle Dedicatory.

I saw some days ago a book, which affirms that the pains Motte-Aigron took in writing against Phyllarchus, and in favour of Balzac, laid the foundation of a misunderstanding between him and the latter; because Balzac would fain have been thought the true author of the work which was to appear under the name of Motte-Aigron [D].

[B] Malleville . . . . in an epigram which was not inserted in the collection of his poems.] Sorel having observed, that Motte-Aigron to show the intelligent reader where he was pinched, and to create a great opinion of his family, dedicated his book to his father in a Latin epistle with very high titles, adds these words: If it were proper in this place, we should set down the epigram Mr Malleville made upon that occasion; but certain persons in office in France being concerned in it, it would look like insulting their misfortunes at the present juncture (2). As for me who know not what this juncture might mean, and am satisfied, however, that it must be by this time entirely over, I shall make no scruple to set down that epigram, which is as follows:

(2) Bibliotheque Françoise, pag. 132, of the second Edit.

Objet du mepris de Goulu,
Que ton insolence est publique,
Depuis que ton pere est Elu,
Et qu'il a fermé sa boutique:
Mais bien que cette qualité,
Si l'on en croit ta vanité,
N'en trouve point qui la seconde;
Il n'en est pourtant pas ainsi:
C'est un beau titre en l' autre monde;
Mais on s'en moque en celui-ci.

In vain you thus publish, to humour your pride,
And to claim Father Goulu's respect,
That your Sire, all his gallipots laying aside,
*Is preferr'd to be one of th' * elect:*
For as high as you value the name of this place,
It will scarce your gentility show;
We allow it in Heaven a title of Grace,
But no title of honour below.

*The French word Elu, elect, signifies an officer of taxes.

Since the writing of this article, I have happened on a book (3) where these Verses are to be found.

(3) Menagiana, pag. 132, of the first Dutch Edit.

[C] I never could discover what became of our author.] I only find by a letter of Balzac, dated July 29, 1634 (4), that Motte-Aigron was married at Rochelle, that he had some place in the government, and that there had been some quarrel between them two. The Menagiana (5) informs us, that he was a counsellor in the presidial court of Rochelle.

(4) It is the xxxiith of the fifth book, edition in folio.

(5) Pag. 131.

[D] Balzac would fain have been thought the true author of the work, which was to appear under the name of Motte-Aigron.] You will see the particulars of all this in these words of Javersac (6): 'This does not hinder my being sensible how highly he has offended me by his request, and manner of proceeding: which however, I thought, the less strange, after considering in what manner he had treated Mr Motte-Aigron, who has always followed his fortunes with the fondness of a brother. The obligation of a thousand good offices, which his amiable frankness had rendred him, from the first beginning of their innocent acquaintance, to this present hour, were not so considerable with him as his own vanity. After they had communicated to one another their design of writing against Phyllarchus, and Balzac had taken to himself the largest field and most matter, as being the more barren of invention, as well as more interested than the other; he was not satisfied with having above a year's time and liberty to advance his work, while his friend was all that while forced to attend his judges, on account of an arrest which has proved very honourable to him. He would needs for several reasons suppress a book, which, after this suit was over, his friend had leisure enough to send to the press. He does well, in order to monopolize the title of Eloquent, to hinder all others from writing, that in order to be a Nonsuch, there may be no others with whom to compare him. I believe he would be for going as far as that crafty Master Poet who put to death the most ingenious of his scholars, for fear they should excel him in his art. He is so jealous of the reputation, even of his friends, that he never would rightly confess, that Mr Motte-Aigron wrote the preface to his Letters he being unwilling to admit any partner in glory: and even at this day I am certain, that, by an ungrateful and vain imposture, he endeavours obliquely to insinuate, that the book which is now expected, has only its name from Mr Motte-Aigron as godfather, but that he himself is the true father. Which I know to be so much the more false, as I know it to be most true that Mr Motte-Aigron has broke off all correspondence with Mr Balzac, and rejoices in being disobliged by him, to have a just reason to shun him, and grow wise at the cost of his Apologist (7), whose reputation he has blasted, which was esteemed much greater than his own.' Mr Motte-Aigron's preface may serve for some proof of this account; thus he begins it: The intelligence I receive from several hands, that though this book is not extraordinary, yet some would assign it another master according to their fancy, obliges me to inform you, that this adventure is wholly my own, and there is nothing here of a Roger who fights under the arms of Leo. Though I cannot indeed sufficiently commend the complaisance of those who suffer children to be fathered upon them, and am even ravished with their good nature; yet I do not find I have generosity enough to be of their opinion, nor can I endure that any one should make books for me. I cannot so far command my fancy, as to persuade my self, that a work of this kind is really mine; nor should I make more conscience of taking another man's goods, than of receiving benefits of this nature (8). The conclusion of this preface is of the same strain with the beginning, for it contains what follows: But to return to what concerns me, although it be very true, that I have not led my life, in such a manner as to be without friends, and among them, even some who understand the art of writing, yet be it known to you, that as to what concerns the composing this work, they are as much strangers to me, as they who live in the furthermost parts of the world; or, as those were formerly who passed in the opinion of some for the authors of the preface (9), which I have ordered to be reprinted at the end

(7) See the remark [D] of the article BALZAC.

(8) La Motte-Aigron, Advertissement to the readers, in his Réponse à Phyllarque. See the remark [D] of the article BALZAC.

(9) That is to say, the preface to Balzac's Letters.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google end of this discourse. This is spoke like a man of honour: none but the meanest spirited creatures would pass for the authors of a book they never had wrote. It is a fine excuse indeed, to say their love of praise is so ardent, that when they cannot procure it by issue of their own, they are for attaining it by adopting that of others; when this love of praise itself, is a sure sign of a mean spirit. The Custodinos of a bishopric have less of the poltron than the Custodinos of a book. These latter are guilty of wilful cuckoldom; let them say as much as they please, that it is only a cuckoldom in the commonwealth of wit, it is nevertheless a blot, it is a shameful thing.

(a) At Paris by Antony Joallin, in 16mo, with the king's licence.

MOUGNE (ROBERTA) published in 1616 (a) a book intituled, The Closet of a Christian widow, containing prayers and meditations upon divers subjects of the holy Scripture, and dedicated it to the most prudent and virtuous lady Benigne de Rabutin, baroness of Huban, lady of Espeville and Brinon. She informs us in the epistle dedicatory, dated at Blois July the seventh 1615, that she had been a widow twenty six years. After this epistle we find a sonnet to Madamoiselle du Chesne Belon my mother, upon her Closet of a Christian widow. Nicolas Vignier, a minister of the Holy Gospel, is author of this sonnet, and informs us, that the immortal pen of the husband of our Mougne describes in his learned writings the virtues of that woman. She was of the reformed religion, and shows in her book a judicious piety, nursed at the breast of the word of God. The lady Rabutin, whom she calls a rare patron of piety, chastity, and charity, and a pattern to all Christian widows, was also of the reformed religion.

MOULIN (PETER DU) one of the most famous ministers that the Protestants of France ever had, was born. . . . . .

. . . . . .

It is to be observed that he did not believe the story of Pope Joan [A].

[A] He did not believe the story of Pope Joan.] Sarravius tells us so in a passage which I have given elsewhere (1), and which contains an argument drawn from hence, that Mr du Moulin, who was a person so fit to rally, had never made mention of the She-pope, tho it was a subject that might have furnished him with matter enough for raillery. I shall bring another proof. The Jesuit Petra Sancta published, in 1634, some notes upon a letter of du Moulin to Balzac, and added to it the refutation of some things, which this Minister had said touching the ceremonial of Rome with regard to the Pope's inauguration. He had not forgot to mention the close-stool. The Jesuit took this opportunity of refuting, in a few words, the story of the She-pope. Du Moulin made a reply to him (2), and bestowed a whole chapter (3) in justifying, what he had affirmed concerning the ceremonies of the Popes inauguration; but said not a word, either of the close-stool, or of the She-pope. This evidently proves that he believed nothing of the matter; for had he believed it, he could not possibly avoid disputing on this occasion. Rivertus a partisan of the tradition of the She-pope, did not forget to have a push in answering this same piece of Petra Sancta (4).

(1) In the remark [L] of the article BLONDEL (DAVID), towards the end.

(2) His book is intituled, Hyperaspistes five Defensio veritatis accersus calumnias, &c. it is printed at Geneva 1656 in 8vo.

(3) It is the twenty second, of the first book

(4) See the third tome of his works, pag. 587.

MUCIA, the wife of Pompey, was the third daughter of Quintus Mutius Scevola (a), and the sister of Quintus Metellus Celer [A]. She committed adultery with so little reserve, that her husband was forced to dismiss her, although she had brought him three children (b). It was while he was gaining so much glory in the war against Mithridates, that Mucia prostituted her self. When he first heared this ill news, he was not much moved at it; but as he came nearer Italy, he considered more seriously the consequence of this dishonour, and was so touched with it, that he sent his wife a bill of divorce (c). It has been observed that providence intended this as a counterpoise to the glory he had just acquired [B]. He complained of Julius Cesar as the corrupter of Mucia [C], and

(a) Asconius Pedianus, in Argum. Orat. Ciceronis pro Scauro, pag. m. 170.

(b) See the words of Suetonius in the remark [C].

(c) Plut. in Pompeio, pag. 641.

[A] She was the sister of Quintus Metellus Celer.] Cicero informs us of this in a letter he wrote to Metellus. 'Egi cum Claudia, says he (1), uxore tua, & 'cum vestra sorore Mucia, cujus erga me studium pro 'Cn. Pompeii necessitudine multus in rebus perspexe-'ram, ut eum (2) ab illa injuria deterrerent. - - - - - 'I made interest with Claudia your wife, and with your 'sister Mucia, whose regard for me on the score of my 'friendship with Pompey, I had on many occasions ex-'perienced, in hopes that they might have diverted him 'from this injustice. This passage shows, that Q. Metellus Celer, and Q. Metellus Nepos were brothers to Mucia, that is according to Manutius (3), either her cousin-germans, or her brothers by the mother's side. The last opinion seems to me most probable. I believe the mother of Mucia married Quintus Mutius Scevola, after having had by Quintus Metellus Nepos the two brothers I have been mentioning. See, below, a passage of Dion.

(1) Cicero, Epist. ii, lib. v, ad Famil. pag. 229, 230.

(2) That is to say, Quintus Metellus Nepos, brother of him to whom Cicero writes.

(3) Manutius, in Cicero, Epist. ii, lib. v, ad Famil.

[B] It has been observed, that Providence intended this as a counterpoise to the glory Pompey had just acquired.] Plutarch has made this observation, So certainly did he expect, says he (4), speaking of Pompey, to have been honoured at his return into Italy, the most of any man in the world, and to have been welcomed home by his wife and children, with all imaginable duty: but God, who always chuses to checquer the greatest and most remarkable instances of good fortune, with some mixture of ill, laid wait for him by the way, and in his own family formed an ambuscade of sorrow to greet his return; for his wife Mucia, during his absence had dishonoured his bed: however, whilst he was at a great distance, he gave little heed to the report; but when he drew nearer to Italy, and had by that means, I imagine, more leisure to deliberate on this ill news, he then sent a declaration to her, that he renounced and repudiated her as his wife, without writing at the same time, or ever afterwards speaking a syllable of the reason of his so doing it; but the cause is mentioned in Cicero's Epistles. Hence we learn, that Plutarch's memory was rather great than faithful. He remembered that Cicero had writ something about the divorce of Mucia, and that not without commending Pompey's conduct. Upon the credit of his memory, and without ever consulting Cicero's Letters, he affirmed, that they contained the causes of this divorce: but there he was mistaken, and if we had all the authors he has cited, we should find him very often guilty of the like faults. All that Cicero says is this: Divortium Muciæ vehementèr probatur (5) - - - - - Divorcing Mucia is highly to be commended. This is in a letter written in the year of Pompey's triumph; that is in the year of Rome 692.

(4) Plutarch in the Life of Pompey, pag. 641.

(5) Cicero, epist. xii, lib. ad Att. cum, 67.

[C] He complained of Julius Cæsar as the debaucher of Mucia.] Suetonius having named several ladies Cæsar had loved, ends with Mucia and expresses himself thus: 'Etiam Cn. Pompeji Muciam. Nam certè 'Pompejo & à Curionibus patre & filio, & à mul-'tis exprobratum est quòd cujus caussa post tres liberos 'exc-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and was wont, not without ſighing to call him his Ægyſthus, in alluſion to the galant of Clytemneſtra, the wife of Agamemnon; and yet for all this he joined with him ſome time after. The views of his ambition obliterated ſo juſt a reſentment [D]. This occaſioned him ſome ſevere reflexions (d). Mucia quickly found another huſband; ſhe became the wife of Marcus Scaurus, and had children by him. Pompey was a little diſguſted at this new huſband: he took it ill that any one ſhould pay ſo little reſpect to his judgment [E]. Auguſtus made uſe of this Mucia, to prevail upon Sextus Pompeius, her ſon, not to join with Marc Antony againſt him, but rather with him againſt Marc Antony (e). No doubt he had a very great regard for her, ſince after the battle of Actium he gave Marcus Scaurus, this lady's ſon, his life (f), and uſed him with all this clemency purely on Mucia's account. This ſhows us that moſt great lords in all ages have looked upon cuckoldom as a diſgrace only among citizens, and that the ladies who have only loſt their good name, have met with little loſs in reſpect to their fortune and intereſt. I ſhall obſerve by the way that Pompey was not happy in his marriages. [F].

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) Dio, lib. xlviii, pag. m. 418, ad ann. 714.

(f) Id. lib. li, pag. 508.

' exegiſſet uxorem, & quem gemens Ægyſthum appel-
' lare conſueſſet, ejus poſtea filiam potentiæ cupiditate
' in matrimonium recipiſſet. - - - - Alſo Mucia the wife
' of Pompey. For it is certain Pompey was upbraided
' both by the Curio's, father and ſon, and many others, for
' taking to wife, out of thirſt of power, the daughter
' of him, on whoſe account he had divorced a former,
' after bringing him three children, and whom he, ſighing,
' uſed to call his Ægyſthus.'

[D] The views of his ambition obliterated ſo juſt a reſentment.] Men of the greateſt courage act upon ſeveral occations like the greateſt cowards. They forget the moſt ſtinging reproaches, provided their ambitious deſigns may find their account in a reconciliation. Pompey, at his return from the war of Mithridates, was deſirous of having all his conduct approved, and lands diſtributed to his ſoldiers (6). This ſhewed he had vaſt deſigns in view. He got two perſons choſen conſuls, from whom he expected the greateſt favour: but he was miſtaken; the one, Afranius, was better at dancing than any thing elſe; the other, Metellus Celer, reſenting the divorce of his ſiſter Mucia, oppoſed him in all things and in all places (7). Thus Pompey obtaining nothing, and finding his credit declining, formed a league with Craſſus and Cæſar, which was the curſed ſource of the overthrow of the ſtate. Behold the chain of almoſt all the greateſt revolutions. Trace them to their original, and you find them generally ſpring from adultery. If Mucia had been chaſt Cæſar had not lain with her, nor had Pompey divorced her: if he had not divorced her, Metellus Celer had continued his friend, if he had been his friend, Pompey would never have formed an aſſociation with Craſſus and Cæſar; a fatal aſſociation! as Cato wiſely foretold (8). New marriages were projected the better to cement the league. Cæſar who had promiſed his daughter to Servilius Cepio, broke his word, and gave her to Pompey, and fed Servilius with hopes of Pompey's daughter, although ſhe was deſigned for the ſon of Sylla . . . Piſo's daughter was married to Cæſar, which procured Piſo the conſulſhip. Then it was that Cato could not refrain exclaiming againſt this ſort of pimping, this baſe traffic of dignities, bought by marriages. Ἐντᾶυθα δὴ καὶ σρόδρα μαρτυρόμενος Κάτωνα, καὶ βοῶντα, ἐκ ἀνεκὸν εἶναι, γάμοις διαμασχοτευομένης τῆς ἡγεμονίας, καὶ διὰ γυναίων εἰς ἐπαρχίας καὶ στρατεύματα καὶ δυνάμεις ἀλλήλας ἀνθισαγόντων. Quo tempore palàm teſtatus eſt Cato, clamavitque rem indignam eſſe, ut addiceretur nuptiarum lenociniis imperium, ac per mulieres mutuo ſe ad provincias, imperia, exercitus proveherent (9).

(6) Dio, ubi infra.

(7) Μέτελλος δὲ ὁμοῦ ὅτι τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτοῦ, παῖδας ἐξ αὐτῆς ἔχων, ἀπεστέρητο, καὶ πάνυ πρὸς πάντα ἀντιπράξειν. Metellus vero Pompeio iratus quòd ejus ſororem, ſuſceptis etiam ex eo liberis nuntium remiſiſſet, in omnibus ei actionibus obſtitit. Dio, lib. xxxvii, pag. 58, ad ann. 693.

(8) Plutarch. in Cæſare, pag. 713. See alſo in Pompeio, pag. 644.

(9) Id. ib. pag. 714. A.

[E] Pompey took it ill that any one ſhould pay ſo little reſpect to his judgment.] He made Scaurus feel the effects of his indignation when he was accuſed of extortion in the year of Rome 699 (10). Scaurus had a great confidence in Pompey's good offices (11). He had a ſon who was brother by the mother's ſide to Pompey's ſons; this was the foundation of his hope. But he was deceived, for Pompey did him no ſervice at all. He did not ſo much regard the relation of conſanguinity between his ſons, and thoſe of the perſon accuſed, as the affront put upon him by Scaurus's expreſſing a great eſteem for a woman he had diſgraced. I ſay nothing here but what I have read in an antient Writer, and what is probable enough. ' In eo judi-
' cio neque Pompejus propenſum adjutorium præbuit,
' (videbatur enim apud animum ejus non minus offen-
' ſionis contraxiſſe, quod judicium ejus in Mutiam
' crimine impudicitiæ ab eo dimiſſam, levius feciſſe exi-
' ſtimaretur, cum eam ipſe probaſſet, quam gratiæ ac-
' quiſiſſe neceſſitudinis jure, quod ex eadem uterque
' liberos haberet) neque Cato ab æquitate ea, qua &
' vitam ejus, & magiſtratum illum decebat, quoquam
' deflexit (12). - - - - In that judgment neither did Pom-
' pey ſhew any partial favour (for with him Scaurus
' ſeemed to have become rather an object of diſpleaſure,
' by paying ſo little regard to his divorcement of Mucia
' for adultery as to eſteem her a proper wife, than of fa-
' vour by the ties of relation, from their having each of ' them children by the ſame woman) nor did Cato deviate
' in the leaſt from that equity which had adorned his
' whole life, and ſo well became his office.

(10) Aſconius Pedianus, in Argum. Orat. Cicer. pro Scauro, pag. 168.

(11) Id. ib. pag. 170.

(12) Id. ib.

[F] Pompey was not very happy in his marriages.] He had five wives. The firſt was called Antiſtia. He divorced her much againſt his will, to comply with Sylla the dictator, who would have him marry Æmilia the daughter of Scaurus and of Metella, who was then the wife of Sylla. Æmilia was married to another, and big with child: for which reaſon Pompey took her to wife in pure obedience to the imperious will of the dictator. He did not in his own mind approve the forcing away Æmilia big with child from her own huſband, and the obliging him ſo cruelly and infamouſly to divorce Antiſtia (13), whoſe father had been killed only on ſuſpicion of his favouring the party of Sylla for the ſake of Pompey. The mother of Antiſtia killed herſelf upon hearing the tragical end of her huſband. Pompey did not live long with Æmilia, for ſhe died in her lying in of that child, which ſhe was big of when ſhe married Pompey (14). He afterwards married Mucia, and after her divorce, Julia, the daughter of Cæſar, who was to have been married to Cepio in a few days (15). Whether he really loved, or was tenderly beloved by her, he never would ſtir from her: he amuſed himſelf in carrying her about from place to place, and ſhowing her the fineſt ſeats in Italy, without concerning himſelf in buſineſs. Ταχὺ μέντοι καὶ αὐτὸς ἐμαλάσσετο τῷ τῆς κόρης ἔρωτι καὶ προσεῖχεν ἐκείνῃ τὰ πολλὰ καὶ συνδιημέρευεν ἐν ἀγροῖς καὶ κήποις, ἠμέλει δὲ τῶν κατ' ἀγορὰν πραττομένων. Brevi tamen ipſe quoque uxoris juvenculæ emollitus eſt amore, ac ferè aſſiduus cum ea ruri, & in hortis egit. Poſtmiſit etiam negotia forenſia (16). This effeminate life did him hurt, and expoſed him to calumny. But it did not laſt long. One day, at an aſſembly of the people, a murder happened to be committed near him, and ſome of the blood having ſtained the cloaths he had on, he was obliged to put on others. Julia happening to ſee them all bloody in the hands of his ſervants, was ſo affected, that ſhe fell into a ſwoon, and miſcarried. Some time after ſhe was big with child again, and died in child-birth of a daughter (17), which lived but a few days (18). At laſt he married Cornelia; and tho' ſhe was a perſon of great merit, he had the mortification to hear, that this marriage was much condemned. The following quotation from Plutarch, is very curious: ' No ſooner did Pompey return into the ' city, but he married Cornelia the daughter of Me-
' tellus Scipio, not a virgin, but the new fallen
' widow of Publius Craſſus the ſon, who was killed
' by the Parthians, and who was her firſt huſband.
' This lady had a great many charms to make her be' loved, beſides thoſe of her beauty, for ſhe was ' finely accompliſhed in letters, played well upon the ' lyre, was ſkilled in Geometry, and took great
' pleaſure in hearing diſcourſes of Philoſophy, not ' without great benefit and improvement: but what
' is above all, nothing of this made her vain or aſ-
' ſuming, as young ladies commonly are with ſuch

(13) Ἐξελαυνομένης τῆς Ἀντιστίας ἀτίμως καὶ οἰκτρῶς. Expellitur Antiſtia ignominioſe miſereque. Plut. in Pompeio, pag. 613. B.

(14) Taken from Plutarch, ibid.

(15) Plut. ibid. pag. 644.

(16) Id. ib. pag. 647. B, and pag. 644. F.

(17) Ex. Plut. ibid. pag. 647.

(18) Id. in Cæſare, pag. 719. C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google parts and qualifications. Beſides, ſhe was the daughter of one who was unexceptionable both for the nobility of his family, and integrity of his life: yet this marriage was condemned by ſome as unequal in years; for Cornelia was young enough to have made a properer wife for Pompey's ſon: and the wiſer ſort thought this a neglect of the public, at a time of ſuch great confuſions; for the remedy of which he was applied to as the Phyſician, and the whole is put under his ſole protection; and yet he entertained himſelf with celebrating nuptials and feſtivals, when he ought rather to have conſidered his conſulſhip as a public calamity, which would never have been conferred on him ſingly in ſo extraordinary a manner, contrary to cuſtom and the laws, had his country been in a flouriſhing ſtate (19).' This illuſtrious lady repented ſhe did not execute the reſolution ſhe had taken to kill herſelf upon the loſs of her firſt huſband (20). She repented, I ſay, when ſhe ſaw Pompey in a wretched condition on the coaſt of Mitylene, after the battle of Pharſalia. She had been left in this city during the war, and there received ſuch good news of the battle of Dyrrachium (21), that ſhe thought it deciſive, and expected to hear of nothing after but her huſband's purſuing Cæſar. The loſſes of the enemy were magnified to flatter and pleaſe her according to cuſtom. Judge of her affliction, when ſhe ſaw her huſband flying for refuge to the iſle of Leſbos in a borrowed ſhip (22). She was his faithful companion in his flight, even to Egypt (23), and having collected his aſhes, ſhe buried them on mount Albanus (24). But this fidelity proved accidentally to be his deſtruction; for if ſhe had not accompanied him, he had fled into Parthia, and not into Egypt, where he was murdered. It is affirmed, that the only thing which made him change his deſign of going towards the Euphrates, was the fear of diſhonour to which the beauty and youth of Cornelia might expoſe her among a laſcivious people. He was ſo nice upon this head, that he could not bear even the moſt groundleſs ſurmiſe. This ſhows that he was not over happy in his laſt marriage, and that a young and beautiful wife is not at all convenient for a traveller (25). Be that as it will, the following paſſage of Plutarch will not be diſagreeable. Theophanes the Leſbian thought it madneſs to ſlight Egypt, which was not above three days ſailing . . . . and to throw himſelf into the hands of the Parthians, and . . . . to expoſe a (19) Id. in Pompeio, pag. 648.

(20) Id. ib. pag. 659. A.

(21) Id. ib. pag. 658.

(22) Id. ib. pag. 652.

(23) Id. ib. pag. 659, & ſeq.

(24) Id. ib. pag. 662.

(25) See the remark [G] of the article SARA.

MUNUZA, (a), a valiant Mooriſh c the Saracens, who had juſt then conquered S entered into a ſecret alliance with Eudo d conquerors. He complained that they trea which perhaps was only a pretence for cov another much more powerful. He was paſ tain [B], and knew very well, that he c

(a) Others call him Munioz. Roderic de Toledo calls him Muniz.

[A] A Mooriſh captain.] Auguſtin Curio (1) ſpeaks of two Gothic captains, ſubjects of the king of Spain, who favoured the Saracens, one of which was called Mugnuza, and the other Mugnos: the latter lord of Cerdaigne, Cerdaniæ Regulus, obtained of the Saracens the government of the neighbouring places; and as he knew the country, and alſo was very cruel, he did much damage to the Spaniards (2), who from the mountains and woods, in which they ſheltered, made incurſions upon the Saracens. Having made ſome complaints, that the treaty made by his mediation with Eudo his father-in-law, was not obſerved; he was beſieged by Abderama; but eſcaped, and was afterwards taken and beheaded: thus, ſays my author (3), did theſe traytors to their country quickly periſh! What contradictions are here in this Hiſtory! Some ſay, that Munuza was a Mahometan Moor, who rebelled againſt his Calif; others, that he was a Spaniard and a Chriſtian, who went over to a party of the Saracens, and continued faithful to them, except as to ſome complaints. Roderic of Toledo (4) ſays, that Muniz, ſon-in-law of Eudo, put ſeveral Chriſtians to death, and burnt the biſhop Anambaldus.

(1) Hiſtor. Sarracen. lib. i, pag. m. 81.

(2) Contra quos exercitum duxit Mugnoces vir immaniſſimus, qui quod regionum & locorum peritus eſſet, magnis eos cladibus afflixit. Auguſt. Curio, Hiſt. Sarracen. lib. i, pag. m. 88.

(3) Lib. ii, pag. 112.

(4) Hiſt. Arab. cap. xiii.

(5) Abrég. Chronol. Tom. i, pag. m. 192. Moreri has copied this fault.

(6) Audigier, Origine des Françoiſe, Tom. ii, pag. 244.

(7) Oihenart, pag. 191, ſays Momerana.

[B] He was in love . . . with the princeſs of Aquitain.] She was the daughter of Eudo: but I confeſs, I do not know her name, altho' I have read in Mezerai (5), that her name was Lampagia, and in another author (6), that ſhe was called Menina, or Numerana (7). What keeps me in ſuſpence as to Lampa-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

princeſs, and by promiſing to enter into a war againſt the Saracens, in order to prevent their giving Eudo duke of Aquitain any diverſion, while he was attacking Charles Martel. Love therefore was the great principle of the revolt of Munuza. He was the ugliеſt man in the world; on the contrary, the daughter of Eudo was a very great beauty. Beſides, he was a Mahometan, whereas the princeſs was a zealous Chriſtian. Yet all could not hinder her being given to him: the ambition of the father prevailed over the averſion of the daughter. Munuza was as good as his word, he took up arms as ſoon as the marriage was concluded; but with ill ſucceſs. Abderama the governor of Spain (b) puſhed him ſo briſkly, that he was forced to ſhut himſelf up in Puycerda. Munuza had ſome hopes of holding out here, as Don Pelagius had done in the mountains of Aſturia; but beginning to want water, and finding himſelf odious to the inhabitants, he quitted this poſt, and endeavoured by ways which he thought unknown, to retire with his wife to the duke of Aquitain. He was cloſely purſued, and found his condition ſo wretched, that he fell into deſpair, and threw himſelf headlong from the top of the mountains (c), that he might not fall alive into the hands of his enemies. His head was brought to Abderama. His wife was alſo carried to him [C]; but Abderama thinking her too beautiful for himſelf, ſent her to the Caliph (d). He choſe rather to make this preſent to his ſovereign in favour of his ambition, than to keep her for his own private pleaſures. There is no doubt but he diſcovered the alliance between Munuza and Eudo and that among other motives, he deſigned to chaſtiſe the father in law who had been the promoter of this ſon-in-law's rebellion. Accordingly we find that no one was more alarmed than Eudo at this expedition of Abderama, and that no one ſuffered ſo much by it as he, which may ſerve nuza. Let us now conſider the other names given her. They pretend that ſhe was called Menina, or Numerana (10), and endeavour to prove it from monuments in Biſcay, upon the credit of which Garibai relates that Eudo had a daughter called Menina, or Numerana, who was the wife of Froila king of the Aſturias. To make ſomething of this proof, we muſt ſuppoſe, that the princeſs of Aquitain, with whom the governor of Cerdaigne fell in love, was married a ſecond time to Froila, king of the Aſturias. And this is what they ſuppoſe (11). She was married twice; the firſt time to Munioz king of Cerdaigne, a Saracen revolted againſt Iſcan Miramolin, who, under the conduct of Abdirama, his lieutenant-general in Spain, and of Froila king of the Aſturias, then in alliance with Miramolin, defeated Munioz, who was left among the dead in the field of battle, in 737 (12), and left behind him this beautiful widow in the power of Abdirama, who deſigned her for the ſeraglio of Iſcan . . . . . But king Froila being paſſionately in love with her, Miramolin, very honourably ſent her back to him, and Froila married her . . . . The French and Spaniſh authors have therefore falſly aſſigned two daughters to Eudo; one by the name of Menina, married to Froila, the other by the name of Numerana, married to Munioz; it being certain that this was one and the ſame perſon, who was married ſucceſſively to theſe two kings, whoſe name had ſuffered ſome little variation in the Spaniſh and Mooriſh idioms, but is in reality the ſame perſon. This ſuppoſition is founded only upon theſe words of Sebaſtian of Salamanca. ‘ Nuninam quandam adoleſcentulam è ‘ Waſconum præda ſibi ſervari præcipiens (Froila) ‘ poſtea eam in regale conjugium copulans (13). . . . ‘ Froila having given orders to reſerve for himſelf a ‘ certain young maid taken among the Gaſcon captives, ‘ afterwards, made her his queen.’ But who does not perceive the weakneſs of this proof? In the firſt place, the wife of a governor of Cerdaigne, a Moor by nation, could not be a part of the booty taken from the Gaſcons. In the ſecond place, the wife of this governor was delivered up to Abderama, who ſent her to his Calif. She was not therefore the Nunina of Sebaſtian of Salamanca; for ſince Froila gave order, that this Nunina ſhould be ſet a part for himſelf, it is plain, that Abderama had not the diſpoſal of her. Nay it is even to be preſumed, that if he had been preſent in the action wherein this Nunina was taken priſoner, Froila could have given no commands as to this part of the booty. In the third place, if theſe words, Froila commanded, that a certain young maid, who was found among the booty, taken from the Gaſcons, ſhould be kept for himſelf, and afterwards married her, could be explained after this manner, Froila became paſſionately in love with the widow of the governor of Cerdania, who was fallen under the power of Abderama, and had been ſent to Miramolin, by whom ſhe was ſent back very honourably, and Froila married her. If, I ſay, theſe kind of explications were once allowed, there is nothing but what may be found in any words, nor would it be at all difficult to prove black to be white. I do not here aſk, whether it is probable, that any author would deſcribe the daughter of a duke of Aquitain, the widow of a governor of a province, who was become head of a party, and the fineſt princeſs of her time, in the ſtyle of quandam adoleſcentulam è Waſconum præda, - - - a certain young maid among the Gaſcon priſoners. I do not aſk this, I ſay, how reaſonable ſoever it may ſeem, for I fear I ſhould be anſwered, that the authors of theſe times wrote in a very ſimple and careleſs manner. I have ſeveral other proofs beſides this againſt the ſuppoſitions of Mr Audigier. For without making much ado, one need only conſider the words immediately preceding thoſe which he cites (14), to demonſtrate the falſhood of his imaginations; ‘ Vaſcones rebellantes ſuperavit ‘ atque edomuit, Nuninam quandam adoleſcentulam ‘ ex Vaſconum præda ſibi ſervari præcipiens, &c. - - ‘ He defeated and reduced the rebellious Gaſcons, com- ‘ manding Nunina, a certain young maid among the booty ‘ taken from the Gaſcons, to be reſerved for himſelf, &c.’ It is manifeſt, that this booty was taken, not when the governor of Cerdaigne threw himſelf headlong from the top of the mountains, but when the king of the Aſturias puniſhed the rebellion of ſome of his own ſubjects. Now ſince this king of the Aſturias, as to himſelf, could have no rebellious ſubjects beyond the Pyrenean mountains, it is plain the Gaſcons, whom he overcame, were not under the obedience of Eudo the duke of Aquitain: How then could the daughter of Eudo be a part of the booty? The learned Ambroſius Morales (15) has ſhown, that the Gaſcons mentioned in this paſſage of Sebaſtian of Salamanca, are the inhabitants of Alava, Alavanſes. Let us conclude, I. That it is not at all probable, this beautiful widow ever ſaw Europe again, after ſhe ſet foot in the ſeraglio of Calif Iſcam. He would never have cared to part with ſo ſweet a morſel in favour of Froila, whoſe alliance with Miramolin I take to be very doubtful. II. That the daughter of Eudo, wife to Froila, king of Aſturias, mentioned in the monuments of Garibai, is different from her who was married to Munuza. III. That the Nunina whom Froila ordered to be kept for him, and whom he afterwards married, is not the ſame with Menina or Numerana, the daughter of Eudo, who was the wife of Froila, according to the monuments of Garibai. IV. That without giving ourſelves too much trouble to reconcile Garibai and Sebaſtian of Salamanca, it will be beſt to ſay, that one of the two was miſtaken, and in all caſes to prefer the latter before the former. Catel obſerves (16), that the name of the daughter of Eudo married to Munios lord of Cerdaigne, is not known.

(b) The Caliph Iſcam had given him this government.

(c) In 731.

(d) See the Hiſtory of France by Cordemoi, Tom. i, pag. 403.

[C] His wife was alſo carried to Abderama.] Here are two expreſs paſſages to this purpoſe (17), the firſt of Roderic of Toledo, the ſecond of Iſidorus of Badajos. ‘ Viri exercitus caput Muniz præcipitio ‘ jam

(10) Audigier, ubi ſuprà, pag. 243.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) See the following remark.

(13) Oihenart, Not. Vaſcon, pag. 191, ſays, that in the manuſcript of the collection of Navarre at Paris, it is Munam, and in the printed edition Munniminam.

(14) He has cited the paſſage entire, pag. 224.

(15) Lib. xiii, cap. xvii, & xxv, apud Oihenart. pag. 192.

(16) Hiſt. du Languedoc, pag. 525.

(17) Cited by Audigier, Tom. ii, pag. 220. He attributes, at pag. 243, to Iſidore of Badajos, what he had attributed to Roderic of Toledo, at pag. 220.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google serve to refute those who accuse him of having observed (e).

(e) In the remark [I] of the article ABDERAMA.

' jam colliſum cæde ſecunda detruncant, & cum fi-
' lia Eudonis regi ſuo læti præſentant. Abdiramen
' autem de rebellis interitu jucundatus, ejus uxorem,
' cum eſſet pulcherrima, ſummo regi trans maria ho-
' norificè deſtinavit. . . . . Muniz being dead by throw-
' ing himſelf down headlong, the ſoldiers of the army,
' as it were killing him over again, cut his head off
' from his body, and joyfully preſented it, together with
' the daughter of Eudo, to their king. But Abdiramus be- ' ing ſufficiently pleaſed with the death of that rebel,
' honourably appointed the wife, as ſhe was ſo perfect a
' beauty, to be carried over ſea as a preſent to the great
' Caliph.' Let us now hear Iſidorus of Badajos ; ' Cu-
' jus caput ubi eum jacentem repererunt trucidant, &
' regi una cum filia Eudonis memorati ducis præſen-
' tant, quam ille maria tranſvectans ſublimi principi
' procurat honorificè deſtinandam. - - - - Whoſe head,

MUSAC, a gentleman of Burgundy, con printed at Paris in 1629. It is divided into I ſhall give ſome extracts of it, which may ſe diſpute between Balzac and Father Goulu [A

[A] I ſhall give ſome extracts of it which may ſerve for a ſupplement to the Hiſtory of the diſpute between Balzac, and Father Goulu.] The perſons engaged in this academical conference are eight. Some of them ſpeak for or againſt Balzac, others for or againſt Father Goulu ; and laſtly, one acts the part of a judge. We find at pag. 47, that the judicious Valentine, who has raiſed the tomb of the French orator, and followed the Thraſo ſtep by ſtep, examining the Apology (1) page after page, has found a great many faults in it. We ſhall ſee in what manner ſome books which Balzac was about to publiſh were ſpoken of: it is the ſureſt way in the world to make them appear bad, though they were ever ſo good: becauſe in the event they muſt fall infinitely ſhort of the idea given of them. Neither the friends nor the enemies of an author can do him a greater diſſervice, than by proclaiming his works, under ſo pompous a character. It is ſuffocating the child under pretence of careſſing it.

(1) That is, the Apology of Balzac, written by the prior Ogier.

' He will make it appear, if he has but leiſure
' and others patience, that he can ſucceed as well in
' long as in ſhort performances, and that he is ſo
' great a maſter of the weapons of Eloquence, as to ' handle both the long ſword and dagger with equal
' dexterity. This will be found, when they are pro' duced on the ſtage of the world. This prince at
' whoſe appearance the glory of all others muſt va-
' niſh, in the ſame manner as the ſtars fade away at ' the riſing of the ſun. This admirable retirement,
' which will eclipſe the luſtre of Plato's commonwealth.
' This dreadful judgment which in imitation of the fi' nal one will examine all the univerſe, and render ' to every one according to his works ; and this in' comparable Hiſtory where, as in a magic glaſs,
' will appear the moſt ſecret actions of human Life,
' and which will ſerve for a moral and political rule
' to be moſt certainly depended on by all poſterity as ' an invariable principle (2).' This ſame raillery has been expreſſed in other terms: ' All the world waits
' with very great impatience, to ſee quickly the works
' of the author of the letter, ſwell with this grand piece,
' which he has ſpoken of ſo much, and promiſed ſo
' long, and expects that he will diſplay the top-gal' lant ſail of his incomparable eloquence, and ſtrain
' all the ſtrings of his wit to diſcover the whole ſtrength
' of his learning, this retirement or hermitage where
' will be admitted, more pieces than in Plato's com' monwealth. This prince, an inimitable work, a ' fragment of which being publiſhed by way of ſpe-
' cimen, has been taken all to pieces by Phyllarchus,
' will ſhew whether he will be able to maintain
' the empire of wit, or whether his reign will not ' be as ſhort as that of the king of Bohemia. This ' terrible judgment of the living and dead (if we may ' be allowed to uſe this expreſſion without blaſphemy,
' and without invading the office of the Son of God,
' to whom the Father has committed all judgment)
' this judgment which muſt ſurpaſs that of the an' gel Michael, and even of the archangel, if he

(2) Conférence Academique, pag. 194.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(9) Conf. Academique, pag. 58.

of this work, when he gave the particulars of that famous quarrel (a).

(a) In his Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 120, & ſeq.

(10) In imitation of the like judgment, at the end of the third Eclogue of Virgil, Et cornile tua ferant &c.

Eſlevez noſtre langue au plus haut de ſa gloire
Et conſacrez vos noms au Temple de Mémoire (9).

You both deſerve the Heifer (10) as your prize,
Both equal in this learned exerciſe,

Both noble warriours in words we own.
Go hand in hand, grac'd with the laurel crown,
Compleat the glories of our tongue, and Fame
Shall in her temple eternize your name.

MUSCULUS (WOLFGANG) one of the moſt famous Divines of the XVIth century, was born at Dieuze in Lorrain September 8, 1497. His father, who was a Cooper by trade, finding he had an inclination to learning, deſigned him for a ſcholar; but the young man muſt be forced to provide his own ſubſiſtence, that is, to beg his bread by ſinging from door to door. He ſung one evening at Veſpers in a convent of Benedictins (a) with ſuch ſucceſs, that they offered him gratis the habit of the order. He accepted the propoſal, and was then but fifteen years of age. He applied himſelf hard to his ſtudies, and became a very good preacher. He approved Luther's opinions, and maintained them vigorouſly on all occaſions; which made a great impreſſion upon ſeveral of his brother friers, for the greateſt part of the Benedictins of this convent quitted the habit. On the other hand he made himſelf a great many enemies, and was expoſed to ſeveral dangers; but at laſt delivered himſelf out of theſe difficulties, by making an open profeſſion of Lutheraniſm. He eſcaped to Straſburg towards the end of the year 1527, and there married publickly, on the twenty ſeventh of December of the ſame year, Margaret Barth, to whom he was contracted before he quitted the monaſtery. Having nothing to ſubſiſt upon, he placed his wife as a ſervant to a miniſter's family, and bound himſelf apprentice to a Weaver, who turned him away about two months after (b). He had reſolved to earn his livelihood by working at the fortifications of Straſburg (c); but the evening before he was to begin this drudgery, he was informed that the magiſtrates deſigned him to preach every Sunday in the village of Dorliſheim. He was very glad of this, and diſcharged the office with great care; it did not oblige him to reſidence, for he went from Straſburg every Saturday, and returned on Monday. He lodged the reſt of his time at Martin Bucer's houſe [A]. Some months after his affairs took another turn, for it was thought neceſſary he ſhould reſide; accordingly he removed to Dorliſheim, and there ſuffered extreme poverty with great conſtancy [B]. He was recalled to Straſburg at a year's end, to ſerve as miniſter in the principal church. Having diſcharged this office about two years he was called to Augſburg, and began to preach there January 22d 1531. The duties of the miniſtry there incumbent on him, were very painful during the firſt years; for he had not only the Roman Catholics to diſpute with, but alſo the Anabaptiſts. He oppoſed thoſe who were of opinion, that the latter ſhould be put to death, and by degrees obtained of the magiſtrates, that Popery ſhould be wholly baniſhed [C]. He ſerved the church of Augſburg till ſuch time as the magiſtrates were ſo

(a) In the country of Lutzelſtein.

(b) The reaſon of this was becauſe Muſculus would be always diſputing with an Anabaptiſt miniſter who lodged with this Weaver.

(c) Compare above, remark [I] of the article JUNIUS (FRANCIS).

[A] He lodged the reſt of the time at Martin Bucer's houſe.] There he got his board by tranſcribing; for Bucer's hand was ſo bad, that the Printers could not read it; and he himſelf was often puzzled to make it out. But Muſculus who could read it with eaſe, tranſcribed it in a wonderful good hand, and by this means did Martin Bucer a great deal of ſervice, who was at that time employed on ſeveral works for the preſs. I ſhall repeat the words of Melchior Adam, which mention ſome particulars. 'Adeò ma-'lè pingebat Bucerus; ut quæ ſcriberet, à Typogra-'phis, imò ab ipſomet ſæpè Bucero, difficillimè le-'gerentur: Muſculus verò ea legebat expeditiſſimè, '& pingebat elegantiſſimè. Deſcripſit itaque ei 'cum alia plura, tùm verò potiſſimum explicationem 'Zephaniæ Prophetæ, quæ extat, in cujus fronte e-'jus leguntur carmina, & Pſalterium illud totum, 'quod ſub Aretii Felini nomine in lucem edidit (1). '- - - - Bucer's writing was ſo very bad, that the 'Printers, and even he himſelf, could hardly read it: 'But Muſculus read it eaſily, and copied it elegantly. 'He tranſcribed therefore for him, among many other 'things, his Expoſition of the prophet Zephaniah, which 'is in print, and in the beginning of which are to 'be ſeen his verſes, and that whole Pſalter, which he 'publiſhed under the name of Aretius Felinus.' Eraſmus, Lipſius, and ſeveral other great authors, had the ſame defect as Martin Bucer; and there were very few learned men who could write ſo well as Muſculus. This was much more rare in the XVIth than in the XVIIth century.

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. Germ. pag. 374.

[B] He removed to Dorliſheim and there endured extreme poverty with great conſtancy.] He had no houſehold goods, but a little bed which he had brought from his convent. His pariſhoners were ſo charitable as to offer him neceſſary utenſils; but he lay on a little ſtraw ſpread upon the floor (2). The Hiſtorian obſerves, that his wife was then about to be brought to bed (3), and it is from hence Mr Baillet takes occaſion to ſay, That the Proteſtants reckon it amongſt the moſt heroical mortifications of Muſculus, that he lay on the hard ground, and had the generoſity to reſign to his wife the bed he brought from his convent, when ſhe came to want it for her delivery (4). He ſerved a year in the church of this village, without receiving one farthing of his penſion. At laſt the magiſtrates of Straſburg took pity on him, and aſſigned him ſomething out of their public treaſury. 'Annum totum 'in illa eccleſia docuit, cum ne teruncium quidem 'à quoquam ſtipendii loco acciperet, nec etiam pe-'teret; ſed in ſumma paupertate patientiſſimè & tran-'quillè viveret. Quo minus autem illi ſtipendium 'ſolveretur; in cauſa erat Abbas Cœnobii Hohenforſt, 'qui cum omnes illius eccleſiæ decimas, & cenſus an-'nuos colligeret; miniſtro tamen evangelii ſtipendium 'pendere recuſabat; tandem verò Argentinenſes ut ipſius 'penuriam ſublevarent, aliquam illi pecuniæ ſummam, 'è publico ærario benignè numerarunt (5). - - - - He 'taught a whole year in that church, while he nei-'ther received nor ſollicited one farthing of a ſalary from 'any one; but lived patiently and quietly in the great-'eſt poverty. The non-payment of his ſtipend was ow-'ing to the abbot of Hohenforſt, who collected all the 'tithes, and annual revenues of that church, and refu-'ſed to pay the miniſter; but at laſt the Straſburghers, 'to relieve his neceſſities, generouſly ordered him a ſum 'out of their public treaſury.'

(2) Parum autem ſtraminis ſolo inſtratum illi pro lectica erat. Id. ib.

(3) Cum uxor ejus jam partui vicina eſſet. Id. ib.

(4) Baillet, Artic. XI, §. II, of his Anti.

(5) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

[C] He obtained . . . . of the magiſtrates of Augſburg, that Popery might be wholly baniſhed.] Muſculus was at firſt a miniſter of the church of the Holy Croſs. The Catholics who ſtill poſſeſſed the church of Notre Dame, and ſeveral others better than that, and the greateſt part of the convents, uſed all their endeavours, not only to maintain their poſſeſſion, but alſo to expel the Lutherans. They were ſtrongly oppoſed by all the miniſters; but the zeal of Muſculus was much greater than that of his

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

so weak as to receive the Interim in the year 1548. Then he quitted this city, and retired into Swisserland. His wife and eight children followed him some weeks after; he went to meet them at Constance the thirtieth of July, and having waited at Zurich till some convenient call should offer, he was at last invited in the year 1549 by the lords of Berne to be professor of Divinity. He accepted it with much pleasure, and discharged the duty of the place with all possible diligence; and to testify his acknowledgment to the city of Berne, he always refused the employments which were offered him in other places [D]. He confined himself to Theological lectures, and would not accept of a preacher's place which was offered him [E]. He died at Berne August 30, 1563 (d). He was a very laborious and very learned man, and published a great many books [F]. He was also employed in some Ecclesiastical deputations, of very great importance [G]. He made himself his colleagues. Hence it came to pass that the Catholics chiefly hated him. He did so much by his sollicitations, that, on the twenty second of July 1534, the senate and people of Augsburg absolutely forbad them to preach in any part of the city, and left them only eight places where they were permitted to say mass: they abolished it every where else, together with the images: and at last the great council on the seventeenth of January 1537, expelled all the priests and monks, and purged these eight places of idolatry, and consecrated them to the service of the Protestants. Upon this Musculus was made minister of the church which had been consecrated to the holy Virgin. He began to preach there July 15, 1537, and continued to do so quietly till the thirtieth of July 1547 (6). But from that day, to the time of his quitting Augsburg, his ministry was exposed to great troubles. Charles V, having made his public entry into that city, caused the church of Notre Dame to be restored to the Catholics. Musculus preached in the other churches with his usual zeal and freedom. He was watched, he was accused to the emperor as a seditious and calumniating preacher. Michael Sidonius, suffragan to the archbishop of Mentz, went often to hear his sermons, and took notes of them in his table-book. The senate fearing least this minister should be affronted, appointed three men to guard him constantly to church, and home again. There were often tumults at his door; the domestics of the cardinal of Augsburg raised mobs there, which committed a thousand insolences, and broke Musculus's windows with stones, The Spaniards and priests laid snares for him, and bore him down with slanders and clamour (7). Thus the things of this world rise and fall. Every one has his turn.

(d) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vita Musculi, pag. 367, & seq. Vitar. Theolog. All that he has said, is taken from the Life of Musculus, written by Abraham Musculus his son. It is prefixed to the Synopsis festalium Concionum Wolfgangi Musculi, Edit. of Basil, 1599, in 8vo.

(6) Ib. p. 377.

(7) Taken from Melch. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 380, 381.

[D] He always refused the employments which were offered him in other places.] Three attemps were made to bring him over to England, and chiefly after the death of Martin Bucer. The city of Augsburg having recovered it's former liberty in 1552, reckoned him amongst the number of it's banished ministers whom it recalled. The Strasburghers, the electors Palatine Otho Henry, and Frederic, and the landgrave of Hesse, often sollicited him to come and exercise the duties of his function in their churches and universities, and promised him great pensions. He excused himself among other reasons, chiefly because he had a mind to consecrate the rest of his life to the service of the republic of Berne, who had so kindly received him in the time of his exile (8). This conduct is very commendable, and there are not many who have the resolution to follow it.

(8) Ex eodem, ibid. pag. 384, 385.

[E] He confined himself to Theological lectures, and would not accept of a preacher's place which was offered him.] This shows that Thuanus ought not to have said, that he exercised the office of pastor at Berne, Pastoris munere defungens (9).

(9) Thuan. lib. xxxv, (and not 36, as Konig cites) sub fin. pag. m. 716.

[F] He published a great many books.] He began with translations out of Greek into Latin. The first work of this nature which he published (10), was St Chrysostome's Commentary upon the epistles to the Romans, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians. He published (11) afterwards the second tome of the works of St Basil, and then the Scholia of the same Father upon the Psalms, and several treatises of St Athanasius and St Cyril; the Ecclesiastical history of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Evagrius: and Polybius. The principal books of his own composing are these: two sermons, de Missa Papistica, preached at the time of the Diet at Ratisbon in 1541, which were printed at Wittemberg, and then at Augsburg, cum additione de externis Missæ abusibus. Cochlæus wrote against this book in 1544, and this occasioned the Anti-Cochlæus (12), which Musculus published in Latin and High Dutch the same year at Augsburg. He published five years after four dialogues under the name of Eutychius Myon, and with the title of Proscerus (13), upon this question, whether a Protestant can hold external communion with Popish superstitions? They were translated into French at London, and published unper the title of, Le Temporiseur, The Temporiser, by V. Poullain, in the year 1550, in 12mo. Note, that the word Proscerus is an allusion to the Greek word πρόσκαιρος, Temporarius. His Commentary on the Psalms was printed in 1550; that upon Genesis in 1554; one upon the epistle of St Paul to the Romans in 1555; and another upon Genesis in 1557: one upon the epistle to the Corinthians in 1559; and one upon the epistles of St Paul to the Galatians and Ephesians in 1561. His commentary upon the epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians, and upon the first chapters of the first to Timothy, was after his death published by his heirs. His commonplaces are a work which employed him ten years, and were published by him in 1560 (14). A certain writer observes, that in it he has discovered the sordid abuses in the rates of the Romish Chancery. This observation would be lost by a bare translation, we shall therefore give it in the original. 'Minimè 'ridiculus hic MUSCULUS Papistis habetur, præ- 'cipuè cum turpissimam illam Nundinationem, Taxa- 'rum scilicet Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, id est scelerum 'omnium & blasphemiarum thesaurum toti Mundo in 'Locis suis Communibus aperuerit, quo facto crassi 'illi Romani Elephanti, insatiabiles ventres, furere 'videntur, non secus ac si ipsorum in probosci das, mu- 'res, ad rabiem uique eosdem vexantes, irrepsissent. 'Magnus igitur MUSCULUS existimandus, qui in 'Romani Plutonis Purgatoriique Regis auream Ca- 'meram atque Adyta penetravit (15). - - - This MUS- 'CULUS is not looked upon by the Papists as in the 'least contemptible, especially when he lays open to all the 'world in his common-places that most abominable trade, 'the bank of the taxations of the Apostolical Chancery, 'that is of all degrees of wickedness and blasphemy; the 'discovery of which has set those monstrous Romish ele- 'phants, those insatiable brutes, into such a rage, as if 'some mice had got into their trunks, and made them 'quite mad. MUSCULUS, therefore, ought to be 'very much esteemed, for having penetrated into the 'the treasury and cabinet of the Romish Pluto, the 'king of purgatory.' I pass over the books which Musculus wrote in the German tongue; but shall add, that he wrote all this vast number of volumes with his own hand, and never had any Amanuensis (16), and that if his works were very useful to the Protestants in those days, as doubtless they were, they are no longer so now: they have not been read this great while, tho' perhaps that is owing to too refined a taste, and too great a fondness for more fashionable performances. The works of Musculus and other Divines of those days, are given away almost for nothing at all auctions of Libraries.

(12) See M. Baillet, ubi supra.

(13) Epit. Bibloth. Gesneri, pag. m. 825.

(14) Ex Melch. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 383. I wonder Melch. Adam, takes no notice of the Commentary of Musculus on the gospel of St Matthew, and on that of St John.

(15) Jac. Verheiden, in Effigiebus & Elogiis præstantium Theologorum, pag. 101.

(16) Melch. Adam, ubi supra pag. 383.

[G] He was employed in some Ecclesiastical deputations of very great importance.] He was deputed, together with Boniface Lycosthenes, by the senate of Augsburg in 1536, to the synod which was to be held at Eisenac, where he was to treat of the re-union of Protestants as to the doctrine of the Lord's-supper. There was nothing done at Eisenac: Luther wrote to the Divines who were met there, that his health would not permit him to undertake a long journey, and therefore desired them to come a little nearer. They therefore left Eisenac, and advanced as far as Wittemberg, and there prepared and concluded a Concordat. Musculus,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

himself a pretty good master of the Greek and Hebrew Languages, tho' he began very late to study them [H]. We shall take notice of some judgments which have been passed on his writings [I]. It is observed, that he renounced the doctrine of Zuinglius, in the Concordat of Wittemberg, and embraced it again after he retired from Augsburg (e). See the remark [G]. We must not mistake him for ANDREW MUSCULUS a Lutheran author, and professor of Divinity at Frankfort upon the Oder, and superintendant-general of the churches of the March of Brandenburg in the XVIth century. He was born at Schneberg culus, and several others, tho' fully persuaded of the falshood of Luther's doctrine about the real presence, yet consented to the articles of agreement, by which they quitted those clear and distinct explications they had hitherto made use of. They had some good reasons for this condescension, for they hoped, they should, by this means, to the great benefit of the church and state, put an end to a considerable controversy, and restore peace which had been so long wished for: but the event making it appear to them, that all these turnings and windings of words did not at all satisfy the obstinate, but misled the simple, and gave room for thinking that the followers of the figurative sense had changed their opinions, they resumed their first expressions, explained themselves fully and clearly, and openly declared their sentiments. You see I am relating a very nice affair, and if I did not shew that I faithfully translate the very words of the author of the life of Musculus, I might be exposed to the censure of some readers. To prevent their malice, I shall transcribe the original Latin. Quibus autem rationibus, cùm ipse (Musculus) tùm alii multi boni viri, impulsi sint; ut, cum in hac causa crassam quorundam sententiam minimè amplecterentur, in hanc tamen concordiam consentirent, deque sua, qua hactenus, docuerant, perspicuitate nonnihil decederent, prudentes viri facilè intelligunt. Nimirum quod persuasum hoc illis esset, facturos se id summo cum ecclesiæ & Reip. bono. Sic enim solum grævem & malè consultam illam de hac causa controversiam tolli, ecclesiis diu desideratam pacem restitui, & Respub. etiam firmius conjungi & consociari posse. Postquam verò, rerum eventu edocti, his quasi fucis verborum pertinacioribus non satis fieri, simpliciores verò in errorem abduci, seque apud omnes bonos in suspicionem mutatæ sententiæ venire cernerent, ad priſtinam suam perspicuitatem reverſi, & palàm quid sentirent, professi sunt (17). Can they who preach up with a declamatory air the necessity of putting an end to controversies by indeterminate, ambiguous, and intricate, forms of expression, wherein each party may find their own account, produce many treaties of peace in religion concluded by this method? Was not that done at Wittemburg which they think so useful (18)? We have just now seen, that the fruits of it were but of a short duration.

(e) Micrælius, Synt. Hist. Eccl. pag. 781, Edit. 1699.

(17) Id. ib. pag. 379.

(18) Compare this with the above remark [B], of the article BUCER.

Musculus was deputed from the senate of Augsburg to assist at the conferences held between the Protestant and Catholic Divines during the Diet of Worms, and during that of Ratisbon in 1540, and 1541. He was one of the secretaries at the conference of Ratisbon, between Melanchthon and Eccius, and drew up the acts of it (19). The inhabitants of Donawert having embraced the Reformation in 1544, intreated those of Augsburg to send them a Divine, who might form a church among them, and lay the foundations of the true faith. Musculus was made choice of for this office, and preached his first sermon December 28, to those new converts, and afterwards preached to them the word of GOD every day for three months together (20).

(19) Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 379, 380.

(20) Id. ib.

[H] He made himself master of the Greek and Hebrew languages, tho' he began very late to study them.] He began to study Hebrew when he was minister of Strasburg, being then full two or three and thirty years of age. He is said to have made a very swift progress in this language. 'Tantam brevi ejus linguæ 'cognitionem sibi comparavit: ut non sacra solùm 'Biblia; sed & Rabinorum obscurissimos commenta-'rios, & Chaldaicos etiam interpretes, perfectè intel-'ligeret (21). - - - - He very soon made such a proficiency in the knowledge of this tongue, that he not only perfectly well understood the sacred writings, but also the most obscure Rabinical commentaries, and Chaldaic interpreters.' It is added (22), that while he was minister at Augsburg he learned Arabic pretty well, without the help of any master. He was forty years old when he began to study the Greek tongue. Xystus Betuleius, first regent in the college of Augsburg, taught him the first rules of it (23). It is to be wondered at, that Musculus beginning so late to study the Greek tongue, should acquire so great a knowledge of it.

(21) Id. ib. pag. 376.

(22) Id. ib. pag. 378.

(23) Id. ib.

[I] We shall take notice of some judgments which were passed on his writings.] Huetius commends his translations in some respects, but does not think him learned enough either in Greek or Latin. 'Wolffgangus 'Musculus, vir bonus, sed Græcæ linguæ notitiâ im-'paratus, neque Latinâ valdè instructus, brevitate '& nitore, simplicitate etiam ac fide commendatur: 'nam & ea quæ intelligebat, & ea quæ non intelligebat, uti poterat, expressit: nihil videas illum studio 'prætermittere, nihil alienum substituere *: cæteroquin 'halucinatur sæpe, utpote earum artium rudis, quas 'qui colunt, eruditi appellantur (24). - - - Wolfgangus 'Musculus, a very good man, but not very knowing 'either in Greek or Latin, is commended for his shortness, clearness, simplicity, and faithfulness: for he 'has expressed both those things which he did understand, and those which he did not understand, 'as well as possible; you find nothing escapes his intention, nothing is substituted that is foreign, but 'he makes frequent mistakes, for want of a greater 'knowledge in learning.' You would do well to consult the whole passage of Casaubon which Huetius pointed at, there you will find a parallel between Perotus and Musculus, as to their translation of Polybius. Let us see what has been said of another version of this minister. 'Musculus, a Protestant, undertook a 'new translation of the history of Eusebius, which 'he performed happily enough: he adheres very 'much to the letter, and has translated the text with 'great clearness and brevity: but he did not always 'rightly understand his author, and there are several 'faults in his version (25).' He is thought in his commentary upon the Psalms, 'to have shown much more 'modesty, and also more respect for antiquity, than 'the greatest part of other Protestants . . . . that the 'method he followed . . . . is very exact . . . . . that 'it may be said, this author knew the true way of 'explaining Scripture, but had not all the helps which 'were necessary to succeed in it to perfection, for want 'of being sufficiently versed in languages and critical 'learning. He examines, however, without prepos-'session the antient Greek and Latin translations, and 'had a knowledge sufficient to discover that the points, 'which are at this day in the Hebrew text, were not in 'it at the time of the Septuagint and of St Jerome (26).' You will see elsewhere (27) what opinion some have of his Commentary upon the gospel of St John, and upon the epistle to the Romans. Baudouin observes, that Musculus published in his common-places several things which should have moderated Calvin's spirit as to the punishing of Heretics, but that they rather inflamed it the more; insomuch, that, writing upon Zacharias, he carried this doctrine so far, that he seems as if he were for putting the sword into the hand of private persons, in order to take away the lives of Heretics (28). I do not warrant this to be matter of fact, but I relate it only to shew my readers, that it is thought Musculus disapproved the punishment of Servetus. Some think, that, by a fault very common to disputants, he took so much care to avoid one extreme, that he came too near the other; as when in opposing the Anabaptists, he runs down more than he ought the pastoral authority. See the passages which Mr Crenius has collected upon this subject (29).

* Casaub. Præfat. ad Polyb.

(24) Huet. de claris Interpret. pag. m. 225.

(25) Du Pin, Bibl. oth. Tom. ii, pag. 4. col. 1, Edit. of Holland.

(26) Father Simon, Critical History of the New Testament, book iii, ch. xiv, pag. m. 438.

(27) Idem, Critical History of the Commentators on the New Testament, ch. 50, pag. 749, and the following.

(28) See Fr. Balduini, Responsio altera ad Jo. Calvinum.

(29) Crenius, Animadvers. Part vii, pag. 149, & seq. See also pag. 148.

Note, that Father Simon pretends, that Musculus in his Commentary upon the epistle to the Romans observes a neutrality between the different methods of explaining predestination. 'He recites upon the 'places which are most intricate, the expositions of 'the antient commentators, and does not seem forward to give any decision of his own. For which 'reason upon these words of chap. ix. Itaque non 'volenti

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Schneberg in Misnia, and died in 1580 (f). He of the Ubiquity, and explained it after a very bold number of books (g), and being persuaded that Germany, and that the end of the world was ne with the assurance of one who pretends to have and New Testament. The Romish controversi this subject, one thing which they have sufficien

(f) Ex Micræl. ibid.

(g) See the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheque, pag. 46, 47.

' volentis neque currentis, &c. - - - So then, it is not
' of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, &c.
' he gives an abridgment of the various interpreta' tions he had read, without declaring himself at the ' same time for any side. He endeavours to recon' cile grace with free-will, by attributing to each of ' them what is its due. Ab hujusmodi contentionibus,
' says he, nos libenter abstinemus, credentes homini
' quidem esse voluntatem & conatum, sed quatenus
' ad velle & currere divinitus, vel ex gratia, vel ex
' indignatione Dei fuerit motus. - - - I am willing to
' avoid entring into this kind of disputes, being of opinion,
' that there is actually in man a will and an endea-
' vour; but as to the heavenly willing and running,
' this must arise no doubt from the grace or displeasure of
' GOD. He condemns notwithstanding the opinion
' of those who, with the Greek Fathers, have re-
' course to the prescience of GOD, and thinks that
' this cannot be reconciled with the judgment of St
' Paul: Hæc sententia plèna aliena est à Paulo, qui
' omnia tribuit miserentis Dei liberæ voluntati & gra-
' tiæ (30). - - - This opinion is plainly contrary to that
' of St Paul, who ascribes every thing to the free-will
' and grace of a merciful GOD.' I do not understand the moderation of this minister; for the Latin passage which Mr Simon mentions, contains in effect whatsoever is most rigid in Calvin's hypothesis. They who oppose free-will with the greatest strictness, never denied but that the soul of man wills or inclines this or that way, so far as it is moved by GOD.

(30) Father Simon, Critical History of the Commentators of the New Testament, chap. 50, pag. 750.

[K] Andrew Musculus .... was a zealous promoter of the doctrine of the Ubiquity, and explained it after a very bold manner.] Hospinian observes, that this doctrine was invented by Brentius, and that James Andreas added to it the hypothesis of the majestatic body of JESUS CHRIST; but withal, that it appeared Eutychian, and Monophysitical, or asserting only one nature in CHRIST, even in the judgment of many of the Lutherans, and that in effect it is plainly refuted by that article of the Apostle's Creed, He ascended into Heaven. For which reason, adds he, Andrew Musculus coming to the relief of James Andreas, at so hard a pinch, maintained, that the Ascension of JESUS CHRIST was nothing more than a cessation of the visibility of his body. He asserted, that this body was still in the clouds where the Apostles lost sight of it, and that, according to the style of Scripture, and the propriety of the words Ascending and Descending, no change of place ought to be imagined in the Ascension of JESUS CHRIST. I shall give you the words of Hospinian something more largely, because in the relation of such paradoxes, the more a writer abridges, the more danger he runs of imposing upon his reader. ' Idcirco Jacobo Andreæ
' succenturiatus est in gravi isto periculo Andreas Mus-
' culus, qui ascensionem Christi in cœlos dixit esse
' disparentiam, & evanescentiam duntaxat carnis Christi
' in his nubibus, ubi adhuc sit, & versetur, sed non
' visibili modo, forma, & eo conversationis genere,
' quo ante ascensionem & mortem conversatus est cum
' suis Apostolis. Sic enim Sectione 3. Articulorum
' Marchiticorum, Articulo 6. scribit; Constare ex Spi-
' ritus sancti Grammatica, & vocabuli Descendere vel
' Ascendere proprietate, Filii hominis ascensionem in cœlum
' nihil aliud esse, quàm visibilem disparentiam, ac ut
' propriissimè loquitur Lucas Actor. 1. Subductionem per
' nubem ex oculis Apostolorum, discessionem ex hac mor-
' tali hominum vita, transmigrationem ex visibili con-
' versatione hominum, evanescentiam ex oculis hominum
' palpabilis & visibilis hujus vitæ conversationis, in-
' gressum in cœlum, regnum Dei Patris gloriosum. Et
' Artic. 7. Hanc, dicit, ascensionem non factum esse mo-
' tione Physicâ de loco in locum, &c (31). - - - Therefore,
' James Andreas in this extremity was relieved by An' drew Musculus, who affirmed, that the Ascension of ' CHRIST into Heaven was nothing more than a
' vanishing or disappearing of the body of CHRIST in
' those Clouds where it yet remains to this day, tho' not
' in that visible manner and form, nor with that sort
' of conversation which he used with his disciples before

(31) Hospin. Histor. Sacrament. Part ii, pag. 492, ad ann. 1561.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

affinity with them by marriage. An Iriſh Jeſuit having given this title, Quam infamis ſit ubivis conditio Miniſtrorum, to one of the chapters of his Britannomachia Miniſtrorum (36), alledges in the firſt place the following paſſage of Andrew Muſculus, and cites the twenty ſeventh page of the treatiſe of Prophecy. 'Ut jam 'quis prædicantem agere velit, præoptaret, ſcio, nun- 'quam ſe in lucem hanc prodiiſſe. Parentes quoque 'in primo lavacro aquis ſuffocatum eſſe mallent. Quod 'ſi etiam aliqui ex noſtris liberis prædicantes fieri for- 'taſſe cuperent, infamiæ & turpitudinis metu adſpi- 'rare non poſſunt. Uſu venit etiam, cùm quis juve- 'nis virginem aliquam ſibi in matrimonio locari poſ- 'cit; ut eum parentes virginis aut etiam virgo ipſa, 'ſciſcitentur, utrùm prædicans fieri cogitet. Habe- 'mus etiam (quod multò magis horrendum eſt auditu) 'eorum exempla, qui ne repudiarentur, hac lege & 'conditione matrimonium contraxerunt, ut ſe prædi- 'cantes nunquam fore jurejurando promitterent. - - - - 'So that he who would become a preacher, had better, 'to my knowledge, wiſh he had never been born. His 'parents alſo ought to chuſe rather to have ſeen him 'drowned in the water he was baptized in. But if 'ſome of our children ſhould be deſirous perhaps of com- 'ing into that order, they will be prevented from aſpir- 'ing to it by the fear of infamy and diſgrace. It is 'even now become a cuſtom, that if any young man of- 'fers to court a young woman for his wife, the parents, 'or perhaps the very young woman herſelf, will immediate- 'ly aſk if he has any thoughts of the Miniſtry. Nay, (what 'is much more horrid to relate) we have alſo examples 'of ſome, who for fear they ſhould be refuſed, have conſent- 'ed to marry upon this agreement and condition, that 'they ſhould promiſe upon oath never to become preachers.' He ſays afterwards, that Downham at p. 67, of his ſermons makes the ſame complaint as to England. I believe this Downham had in view the firſt times of the reformation under queen Elizabeth; for Sanders relates, that the new preachers were at the beginning ſo negligent or unhappy in chooſing their wives, that they met with leud women and adultreſſes, which gave ſcandal to the meaner ſort of their own ſect, and was the ſport of the Catholics. Queen Elizabeth put forth a proclamation that the biſhops and prieſts ſhould take no woman in marriage that was not of good and honeſt reputation in the judgment of ſome; but, adds he, this did not remedy the evil, becauſe, on the one hand, many could no more live without wives, than they could without bread, to uſe their own expreſſions; and, on the other, they could find no man either among the Catholics or the Heretics themſelves, who would give his daughter in marriage to a preacher; for it was counted a ſcandalous thing to be the wife of a prieſt, and according to the laws of the kingdom, ſuch marriages are no better than adulteries, and ſuch women have no place allowed them according to the rank or degree of their huſbands, which is directly contrary to the nature of true marriage. Queen Elizabeth, ſays he, does not admit the wives of prieſts into her court: women of quality will not converſe with them; they are not called archbiſhops wives, and their huſbands ſhould keep them at home, as inſtruments and veſſels of their uncleanneſs and neceſſities (37). All the world knows that Sanders wrote this book with ſo much rancour and paſſion, that he deſerves very little credit. But things are in all reſpects changed much for the better ſince thoſe days, as to the article we are now upon: and as to the paſſage of Andreas Muſculus, it is plain his adverſaries have miſrepreſented it. It is eaſy to conjecture that this Lutheran doctor, being big with this hypotheſis, that Germany was going to feel the ſcourge of Divine juſtice, contained in a prophecy of Jeſus Chriſt, exaggerated the contempt that was ſhown to the word of God, and declaimed too vehemently againſt the want of a due reſpect to his miniſters. Being heated with theſe ideas, he repreſented in hyperbolical figures the averſion the people had to the miniſtry; as if a father ſhould rather chooſe to ſee his ſon die in the cradle, than ſee him a preacher; and as if the parents of a young maid, and the young maid herſelf ſhould carefully aſk him who fought her in marriage, have you any thoughts of being a miniſter? In fine, as if to prevent a refuſal in courting a maid a man muſt proteſt upon oath, that he never would enter into holy orders. The enemies of the Proteſtants have not failed to make an advantage of theſe exaggerations (38). But to allow them to make the moſt of it, it may be truly ſaid, that the Proteſtants of France have given no occaſion to ſuch a reproach: they have always obſerved a very good and laudable cuſtom of honouring and reſpecting their paſtors; and it is certain, that they who were miniſters of the goſpel, married to more advantage, than if they had been laymen.

(36) The tenth section of the fifth chapter of the third book of Henry Etti-Sinenſis, pag. 342.

(37) Sanders, Hiſtory of the Schiſm of England, pag. 238.

(38) See the Hypocriſis Marci Antonii de Dominis detecta auctore Fideli Annoſo Veramentano Theologo, pag. 87, where this paſſage of Muſculus is quoted. See alſo Juſtus Calvinus, in Analyſi Tertulliani de Præſcript. adverſ. Hæret. cap. xli, num. 5, pag. m. 132, & Sylveſter Petra Sanctæ Not. in Epiſt. Molinæi ad Balſacium, cap. i, where they ſpeak of the contempt of the miniſtry.

MUSSO (CORNELIO) biſhop of Bitonto, one of the greateſt preachers of his age, was born at Placentia in Italy, in the month of April 1511. He dedicated himſelf to the order of St Francis, to fullfil a vow of his mother [A], and when he was nine years old entered into a monaſtery of that order at Placentia. The vivacity of his wit, the ſtrength of his memory, and his great qualifications for preaching [B], induced Father James Roſa of Candazzo to take him for his diſciple. He carried him to Carpi and other places and made him ſtudy under good maſters. The young man went very well through his Claſſical learning, and preached ſo eloquently, that he ſoon acquired a great reputation, and the friendſhip of Leonello Pio of Carpi (a) who ſent him to Venice with letters of recommendation, to give him an opportunity of preaching before the ſenate, and to obtain a ſettlement in the univerſity of Padua. This affair proved very ſucceſsful.

(a) He had a ſon who became a cardinal.

[A] He dedicated himſelf to the order of St Francis, to fullfil a vow of his mother.] Note firſt, that he was born upon Wedneſday in Eaſter week. His mother, by a ſtrict obſervance of the faſts of Lent, had impaired her health, ſo that it was thought ſhe could not out-live the pains of child-birth. In this weak condition ſhe implored help from on High, and had recourſe to the interceſſion of the holy Virgin, and to that of St Francis, and having a particular devotion for this ſaint, ſhe made a vow, that if her pains went off, and ſhe ſhould bring forth a ſon, ſhe would conſecrate him to God as a member of his ſeraphic order. As ſoon as ſhe had made this vow ſhe found herſelf relieved, and was brought to bed of our Cornelio. He was named Nicolas after his grandfather by the father's ſide; but being entred into a religious order, would be called Fra. Cornelio, becauſe his mother's name was Cornelia. He knew of the vow ſhe had made when ſhe was in labour of him, and thought very much of it after her death, and it was this conſideration which engaged him to become a monk (1).

[B] The ſtrength of his memory, and his great qualifications for preaching.] After he had heard a ſermon he was perfect maſter of it, and could repeat it ſo readily, that one would have thought he had made it. This deſerved admiration. 'Si ſcopri di ſpirito 'coſi gentile, e dotato di memoria coſi eccellente, 'ch' era di gran maraviglia, e di ſtupore à tutti, in- 'tanto che ſtando egli ad udir le prediche che ſi fa- 'cevano tal' hora nella Chieſa, le apprendeva coſi 'bene e le recitava poi con prontezza tale che pa- 'reano veramente coſe ſue (2). - - - - He diſcovered ſo 'fine a genius, and was endowed with ſo excellent a me- 'mory, that he was greatly admired, and wondered at 'by every body, inſomuch that as he ſtood to hear the ſer- 'mons which were preached in the church at the u- 'ſual hour, he remembered them ſo perfectly, and repeat- 'ed them afterwards with ſo much readineſs that they 'ſeemed to be his own.' When he was made to repeat ſuch ſermons, he would perfectly imitate the way and geſtures of the preacher. They tried him this way more than once before the preacher in ordinary to the Conventual Franciſcans, who was very much ſurprized to find himſelf ſo well imitated. 'Queſto commoſſe di 'modo il figlivolo, che oltre il farle vedere più volte 'iſperienza delle ſue prediche, ch' egli recitava in re- 'fettorio, l'immitava talmente con i movimenti e co'. 'geſti, che parea fuſſe ſtato nel predicar aſſiduamente, 'ammaeſtrato e eſſercitato da lui (3). - - - - The youth 'could act him in ſuch a manner, as he made appear by 'frequent

(1) Taken from his Life written by Don Giuſeppe Moſo.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſucceſsful. Cornelio Muſſo, little and lean as he was [C], was admired for his ſermons; and Peter Zeno, Lewis and James Cornaro, eſpouſed him with ſo much zeal, that they procured him an honourable poſt in the convent of the Franciſcans of Padua; where, without neglecting the art of Rhetoric, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, under the famous Zimara, and to that of Divinity under Father Simonetta. He took the degree of Bachelor, and read lectures, and held diſputations which got him the reputation of an uncommon genius. He preached a courſe of Lent-ſermons at Padua with great applauſe, He maintained theſes for ſeveral days together, and was at laſt promoted to the degree of Doctor in Divinity, as a reward of his merit. Peter Bembo, who was afterwards a cardinal, honoured him with his friendſhip, and gave him good advice as to Rhetoric, and concerning the Latin and Italian ſtyle. Lampridius (b) inſtructed him in the Greek tongue, and others in the Hebrew and Chaldee, for the underſtanding of the text of Scripture. He was appointed to preach a whole Lent in the convent of his order at Venice. He performed the ſame office in the moſt illuſtrious pulpits in Italy, and particularly at Milan, where he was much eſteemed by the duke (c). He was made profeſſor in ordinary of Metaphyſics in the univerſity of Pavia, and had this prince ſeveral times for his auditor. This univerſity being diſperſed after the death of that duke, by the confuſions of war, he was called to Bologna, to be profeſſor of Metaphyſics, and had a greater ſalary ſettled upon him, than was ever before given to any Regular; but ſeveral cities contending with one another to have him for their Lent-preacher (d), his academical lectures were diſpenſed with during that ſeaſon. However to make amends, he was obliged to read lectures upon the Scripture on the feſtival days at other times of the year. The epiſtles of St Paul were the ſubject of theſe lectures. A competitor ſtarted up who by explaining the ſame epiſtle after a heterodox manner raiſed great tumults, for he drew after him a great many followers. Cardinal Campegio, biſhop of Bologna, was obliged to employ his authority, to put a ſtop to this diſorder, by expelling the innovators, and impoſing upon this competitor the penance of a public recantation. From this time he conceived a particular eſteem for Cornelio Muſſo, and preſented him to Paul III, who kept him at Rome to preach at St Laurence in Damazo, and to live in quality of Theologer with the cardinal, his grandſon. Not long after, Ochinus, who had preached in this church, retired from Rome, after he had diſputed with our Cornelio, who convicted him of being a falſe brother. The new preacher of St Lawrence drew a great crowd to his auditory, and being about four years after promoted to the biſhopric of Bertinoro, he did not diſcontinue his preaching, except when he was deſired to read lectures upon the Epiſtles of St Paul in the ſame church. They were very well reliſhed, and as the Pope had a mind to hear him ſometimes, but could not, with convenience, out of the Apoſtolical palace, he took him from theſe public exerciſes, and gave him another office, which was to preach in Latin upon the goſpel for the day, in his Holineſs's chamber, or at his table, and immediately after to maintain a diſpute, and anſwer the objections which ſhould be propoſed to him. There was an extraordinary concourſe of Eccleſiaſtics regular and ſecular at theſe exerciſes: ſome cardinals and ſeveral prelates were preſent at them: The Pope himſelf propoſed ſometimes both anſwers and objections; and being very well ſatisfied of the ability of Muſſo, he promoted him to the biſhopric of Bitonto (e), and ſent him to the council as a proper perſon to diſpute among the reſt of the learned Divines upon any matters which might offer [D]. The article about Juſtification paſſed through the

(b) Lampridio Maeſtro, in quei tempi delli illuſtriſſimi Signori Gonzaghi. Gioſeppo Muſſo, ubi infra, citation (b).

(c) This was Francis Sforza.

(d) Accio che poteſſe predicare e ſodisfare alle Cittadi, che a gara l'una dell' altra un' anno ò due avanti lo ricercavano ſempre. Id. ib.

(e) By exchange for that of Bertinoro.

(4) Hinc factum ut funebribus cujuſpiam encomiis inopinato dicendis, vel ſanctorum facta ſtatis diebus præpropero patrum ſuorum monitu celebrandis præter Muſſum ſufficeret nemo. Imperialis in Muſæo Hiſtor. pag. 68.

(5) Gioſeppe, in the Life of Cornelio Muſſo.

'frequent tryals of his ſermons, that he repeated them in 'the hall at dinner time, and imitated him ſo exactly in 'all his motions and geſtures, as tho' he had been conſtantly brought up under him, and inſtructed in his way 'of preaching.' It was eaſy for ſuch a young man to become a good orator. He had nothing more to do than propoſe to himſelf for a model the action of ſome great maſter. Note, that Muſſo had the talent of declaiming without much preparation. A funeral oration, a panegyric upon a ſaint, coſt him but a very little time: whenever his ſuperiors had occaſion for ſuch extemporary diſcourſes they addreſſed themſelves to him (4).

[C] Little and lean as he was.] The firſt time he was ſeen in the pulpit at Venice, the audience expected nothing from one of his little figure; but they were undeceived as ſoon as they began to hear his voice. 'Quivi invitati li primi ſenatori di Vinegia, lo fece ſalire in pulpito, ove veduto da loro coſi giovanetto, 'di picciola ſtatura, languido e eſtenuato nell' aſpetto, ogn' uno fra ſe ſteſſo faceva giudicio ch' egli 'non haveſſe nè ſcienza, nè forze, per negocio tale, 'ma udita c'hebbero la voce, e che furono ſentiti i 'ſuoi alti concetti, con quella ſingular' attione naturale datagli da Dio, tutti all' hora l'eſaltarono (5). '- - - - - The principal ſenators of Venice, being invited to hear him, he mounted the pulpit, where appearing to them ſo very young, of a diminutive ſtature, and of a ſickly and thin viſage, they all immediately judged that he could neither have learning, nor ſpirits, for 'ſuch an undertaking, but as ſoon as they heard his voice 'and obſerved his ſublime conceptions, and the extraordinary natural abilities God had endowed him with, 'they give him great commendations.' There are ſome preachers who may be compared to the nightingale; ſuch as tho' meagre and ſmall, have yet ſo ſounding a voice, that they make all the vaults of a church reſound; ſo that one who hears without ſeeing them, would think they were perſons of a gigantic ſtature. Look at them and you are as much ſurpriſed as if you were to compare the ſmallneſs of a nightingale with the ſtrength of it's notes. There is, if I am not miſtaken, a fable to this purpoſe, and I remember the obſervation of a Lacedemonian, who having plucked off the feathers of a nightingale, defined it to be a thing which was nothing but voice (6). How happy a forerunner in favour of him who ſpeaks in public is a good mein! it diſpoſes the aſſembly to give great attention, and engages their approbation before he opens his mouth. He has not occaſion for half the eloquence which is neceſſary to procure applauſe to a preacher of a mean aſpect. This is a high encomium on the action and ſentiments of our Muſſo. Therefore this remark will not be thought uſeleſs. It deſerves to be remembred, that he is called the Chryſoſtom of the Italians, as Mr Drelincourt obſerves (7).

(6) Plut. in Laconicis apophth. pag. 233. A.

(7) Drelincourt, Demandes à l'Evêque de Belley. pag. m. 37. He cites a ſermon of the biſhop of Bitonto on the Magnificat, in which the preacher invokes the virgin in these words of Terence, Lucina, Lucina ſer ſpem. - - - Help ob Lu-

[D] Paul III ſent him to the council as a proper perſon to diſpute among the reſt of the learned Divines upon all matters which might offer.] Let us here collect all Muſſo's tranſactions at the council of Trent. He was one

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the hands of Muſſo; it was he who digeſted it, and explained it with very great diligence and application. The council being tranſlated from Trent to Bologna, was at laſt interrupted. Paul III died. Julius III ſucceeded him, who ſhewed a great deal of kindneſs to the biſhop of Bitonto, and made choice of him for his domeſtic prelate and aſſiſtant. He would not part with him to go to the council till he was informed by the legate, that the preſence of ſo learned a biſhop was abſolutely neceſſary. After the council was broke up, Muſſo went to ſee his biſhopric, and reſided upon it till the inauguration of Pius IV: then he made a journey to Rome, and was again employed by that Pope after the ſame manner as he had been under Julius III, and Paul III; for Pius IV appointed him to preach, and to maintain diſputes at his table. He remembered, that when he was in minoribus, he had often diſputed with him in the ſame place, under the papacy of Paul III. Some time after (f) he ſent him with his nephew into Germany, which gave him an opportunity of procuring himſelf a great reputation at the court of Ferdinand. He was afterwards employed at Rome in the affairs of the Inquiſition, and in the examination of matters which were treated of at Trent. This prelate departed from Rome after the concluſion of the council, and retired to Bitonto, where he applied himſelf to the reformation of abuſes, and to all the functions of a good biſhop. He had a mind to eſtabliſh a ſeminary, but was forced by the oppoſition raiſed againſt it to give over that deſign. After a reſidence of ten years, he reſolved to go and pay his duty to Pius V, then to viſit his native country, and afterwards to take a journey to Venice, in order to put ſome books in the preſs. He arrived at Rome after Gregory XIII, had ſucceeded Pius V. The new Pope detained him for his aſſiſtant, and would not ſuffer him to continue his journey till the opening of the Jubilee. Muſſo did not live ſo long: he died at Rome January 9, 1574, near ſixty three years old (g). He is very much commended for his

(f) In 1560.

(g) And not 64, as Moreri has it after Ghilini.

one of the firſt who went thither: the legates found only the biſhop of Cava at Trent, but were quickly followed by Thomas Campeggio biſhop of Feltro, and by Cornelio Muſſo (8). This latter preached in Latin at the opening of the council (9). His ſermon, the ſubſtance of which you will find in Father Paul (10), was criticiſed (11). Palavicin has much ado to anſwer and confute this criticiſm, altho' he employs all his learning to do it (12). A ſet of people more troubleſome than cenſurers of a ſermon aroſe againſt the biſhop of Bitonto; for his creditors, I mean thoſe who had penſions out of his biſhopric, proſecuted him in the moſt rigorous manner, of which this account is given by Father Paul: 'In the congregation of the 'fifth of March 1546, the biſhop of Bitonto, who 'had been lately cited to Rome by the auditor, at 'the requeſt of his penſioners, who endeavoured 'to force him by an excommunication, according 'to the ſtile of that court, to pay what was 'owing to them, complained of this way of proceed-'ing, and ſaid, that the demands of his penſioners were 'juſt; but that he was not to be blamed, becauſe he 'could not live at the council, and pay his penſions: 'ſo that he muſt either be diſcharged, or be ſupported 'with an equivalent ſum †. The poor prelates inte-'reſted themſelves for him, looking upon it as a com-'mon cauſe; and ſome ſpoke out plainly, that it was 'an affront to the council, that an officer of the court 'of Rome ſhould proceed by cenſures againſt a biſhop 'who aſſiſted at it: that after ſuch an extravagant 'proceeding the world would have reaſon to ſay, that 'the council was not free: that to vindicate their ho-'nour, they ought to cite the auditor to Trent, or at 'leaſt to give ſuch a demonſtration of their reſent-'ment againſt him as might ſecure the dignity of the 'council. Others ſet themſelves to ſpeak againſt 'penſions, and ſaid, it was very juſt, that the rich 'churches ſhould relieve the poor ones, but in a 'way of charity, and not by conſtraint, nor ſo as to 'deprive themſelves of neceſſaries; and that St Paul 'has taught the ſame thing ‡: that it was unjuſt the 'poor biſhops ſhould be forced by cenſures to re-'trench themſelves of neceſſaries to accommodate the 'rich; and that this abuſe deſerved very well to be 'provided againſt by the council, and the antient 'uſage re-eſtabliſhed. But the legates conſidering 'whither ſuch juſt complaints might tend, put an 'end to them, by promiſing that they would write to 'Rome, to ſtop the proceedings againſt the biſhop, 'and to grant him wherewithal to ſubſiſt at the coun-'cil (13).' Palavicin affirms (14), that the acts of this ſeſſion take no notice of theſe complaints, or of theſe reflexions of the prelates; and he adds, that they would have been ill grounded, ſince it would be very unjuſt to diſpenſe with the payment of debts, under the pretence of aſſiſting at a council. He does not deny that Muſſo being cited before the auditor, repreſented modeſtly to the legates his neceſſities, and deſired their aſſiſtance. He obtained his requeſt. They recommended him to the Pope, who, for that time, readily conſented to relieve him with a preſent of a hundred pieces of gold.

(8) Palavicin, Hiſt. del Concilio, lib. v, cap. viii, num. 9, ad ann. 1545.

(9) Id. ib. cap. xviii, num. 9.

(10) Fra-Paolo, Hiſt. du Concile de Trente, lib. ii, pag. m. 121, ad ann. 1545.

(11) Id. ib. pag. 122.

(12) Palavic. ubi ſupra, cap. xviii.

† Out of 600 crowns which his biſhopric was worth, he paid 200 in penſions.

‡ Veſtra abundantia illorum inopiam ſuppleat. 2 Cor. viii. Unuſquiſque prout deſtinavit in corde ſuo, non ex triſtitia, aut ex neceſſitate. Hilarem enim datorem diligit Deus. 2 Cor. ix.

(13) F. Paul, ubi ſupra, pag. 140, 141.

(14) Palavic. lib. xv, cap. xvii, num. 4, pag. m. 636.

It is obſerved (15), that this biſhop vigorouſly maintained, that the Scripture and traditions deſerved an equal reſpect; but at laſt relaxed, and propoſed, that inſtead of an equal reſpect, it ſhould be ſaid, a like reſpect; but his propoſition was rejected. Palavicini blames his conceſſion. 'Ben è di maraviglia, 'ſays he, che il Muſſo havendo per sè la bontà della 'cauſa, la forza della ragione, e'l numero de'ſeguaci, 'ſi ritiraſſe nella vegnente congregazione, dalla ſen-'tenza felicemente difeſa è proponeſſe che in luogo 'd' uguale, ſi poneſſe, ſimigliante: Il che non ſorti 'approvazione. - - - It is much to be wondered at, that 'Muſſo having on his ſide the juſtice of the cauſe, the 'force of the argument, and the number of followers, 'ſhould yet, in the next congregation, relinquiſh an opi-'nion ſo ſucceſsfully defended, and propoſe inſtead of equal 'to put like: which did not meet with approbation.' This prelate was more orthodox as to the matter of Reſidence, for he maintained, by many arguments, that it was jure divino (16). He practiſed this doctrine tolerably well. 'Finito ultimamente, e chiuſo 'il ſacro Concilio, e deſiderando eſſo Monſignore di 'ritornar alla ſua Chieſa, far la rezidenza, e mettere 'in obſervanza il ſacro Concilio, anzi quello ch' egli 'haveva ſempre predicato al mondo, mantenuto nel 'medeſimo ſacro Concilio, e perſuaſo à ſua Beatitu-'dine in materia della reſidenza, con dire ſpeſſo, ubi 'oves, ibi paſtor; ibi paſtor ubi oves . . . chiefe licenza à 'ſua Beatitudine, e l'hebbe, coſi parti per Bitonto (17). 'At laſt the ſacred council being at an end, and broke 'up, and our biſhop deſiring to return to his church, to 'perform reſidence, and put in practice the rules laid 'down by the council, according to what he had always 'preached to the world, and maintained in the ſame 'council, and perſuaded his Holineſs as to the obligation 'to reſidence, by frequently repeating, ubi oves, ibi 'paſtor; ubi paſtor, ibi oves, where the ſheep are, 'there ought to be the ſhepherd; where the ſhepherd is, 'there ought to be the ſheep . . . . he aſked leave of his 'Holineſs, and having obtained it, ſet out accordingly for 'Bitonto.' His explications of the doctrine of Juſtification were applauded in the council (18). He rejected the rigid hypotheſes as to the point of Predeſtination (19), and made an apology for the court of Rome againſt thoſe who aſcribed the abuſes in the elections of biſhops, and thoſe in the plurality of benefices to the Popes (20). In a word, he was regarded as the right-hand of the council (21). He and the archbiſhop

(15) Id. ib. cap. xiv, num. 3, pag. 639.

(16) Ib. lib. viii, cap. vi, num. 7, pag. 709.

(17) Gloſeppe Muſſo, ubi ſupra.

(18) Palavicin. ubi ſupra, lib. viii, cap. iv, num. 14.

(19) Fra-Paolo, lib. ii, pag. 195.

(20) Id. ib. pag. 231, 232.

(21) Palavicini, ubi ſupra, lib. viii, cap. vii, num. 4, pag. 780.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his chaſtity, his ſobriety [E], his forgetting of injuries [F], his devotion, &c. He compoſed ſeveral books, ſome of which have been publiſhed (b) [G].

(b) Taken from his Life, written in Italian by Gioſeppe Muſſo, ſua creatura. It is printed before the Prediche Quadrageſimali, &c. di Cornelio Muſſo. I make uſe of the Venice edition in 1603.

archbiſhop of Matera were the two to whom the diſpatches from the legates gave the greateſt commendations (22).

(22) Id. ib.

The following paſſage contains both an error and an omiſſion. ‘ Inde Bertinori, mox Bitonti antiſtes ‘ electus: Germaniam ad ſuadendum Ferdinando Impe- ‘ ratori concilium tranſmiſſus: ad id porro Tridenti ‘ illa totius orbis celebritate initum Julii tertii, mox ‘ Pii quarti Pontificum nutu bis profectus, diſputatoris, ‘ arbitri, examinatoris ſuſceptam acriter provinciam ‘ exercuit (23). - - - Being then made biſhop firſt of Ber- ‘ tinoro, and afterwards, of Bitonto, he was ſent to ‘ Germany, to recommend the holding a council to the ‘ emperor Ferdinand, and went himſelf twice to that ‘ which met at Trent with ſuch univerſal ſolemnity, the ‘ firſt time by the order of Pope Julius III; and the ‘ ſecond, by that of Pope Pius IV, where he diſcharged ‘ the office he had undertaken of diſputant, arbiter, and ‘ examiner, with great abilities.’ Muſſo was ſent to the council by Paul III, and was not ſent thither by Pius IV. He has not therefore ſaid that which he ſhould have ſaid, but has ſaid that which he ſhould not have ſaid. If you would have another error, you need only conſider, that it is ſuppoſed here he was ſent to Germany before Julius III deputed him to the council, which is palpably falſe; for it was Pius IV who ſent him to the court of Ferdinand.

(23) Imperia in, ubi ſupra.

[E] He is extreamly commended for his chaſtity, his ſobriety.] It is pretended that he never knew a woman. ‘ Poſcia egli viſſe caſtiſſimo, e continentiſſimo in tutto ‘ il tempo ſuo, e ſi tiene che di quella integrità virgi- ‘ nale, che nacque, ſi moriſſe ancora, poiche non ſi ‘ ſcorſe mai in eſſo nè detto, ne fatto men c'honeſto in ‘ tutta la vita ſua, di che n'hanno fatto fede quelli che ‘ l'hanno ſervito dalla gioventu ſino alla ſua morte. ‘ Nel mangiare, è nel bere fu molto ſobrio, poiche ‘ bevea piu acqua che vino, e di una ò di due ſorte ‘ ſole di cibi, e quelli ſemplici, ſi contentava (24). - - - ‘ Since he lived the moſt chaſte and continent, during his ‘ whole life, inſomuch that he carried the ſame unſpotted ‘ virginity out of the world, which he brought into it, ‘ ſince he never once either in word or deed tranſgreſſed ‘ the rules of virtue as long as he lived, as is teſtified ‘ by thoſe who attended him from his infancy to his death. ‘ In eating and drinking he was extreamly ſober, ſince ‘ he drank more water than wine, and contented him- ‘ ſelf with only two ſorts of meat, and thoſe the moſt ‘ ſimple.’

(24) Gioſeppe Muſſo, ubi ſupra.

[F] - - - - his forgetting of injuries.] He was expoſed to the perſecution and calumnies of envious men, yet never ſhowed the leaſt reſentment. ‘ Come anco pa- ‘ tientiſſimo, e modeſtiſſimo in ſupportar le peſecu- ‘ tioni e le calumnie de' ſuoi emuli e adverſarii che ‘ gli erano fatte, rendendo à ciaſcuno ſempre bene per ‘ male, e pregando il ſignore che a loro perdo- ‘ naſſe (25). - - - - - As alſo the moſt patient and modeſt ‘ in ſuffering the perſecutions and calumnies of envious men, ‘ and his adverſaries, always returning to every one of ‘ them good for evil, and praying to GOD to forgive ‘ them.’ His calumniators, who endeavoured to oppreſs him, did not ſucceed in their deſign; on the contrary, all the confuſion they intended fell upon themſelves (26). Yet they put a ſtop to the advancement of his fortune; they prevented his attaining the dignities (§ α) which he had reaſon to promiſe himſelf (27). If we knew all the particulars of theſe proceedings, we ſhould the better underſtand how far it is to be wondered at, that ſuch a man obtained as a reward of ſo great labours nothing more than the biſhopric of Bitonto.

(25) Id. ib.

(26) See Ghilini, Teatro, Part 1, pag. 39.

(27) Communi literatorum ſito livoris tetrea expertus aculeos deſtinata ſibi honorum faſtigia non attigit. Imperialis, ubi ſupra.

[(§ α) Particularly to that of cardinal, which was refuſed the biſhop of Bitonto by the Pope, it having been whiſpered in his ear, that this biſhop was a baſtard. See the notes on the Confeſſion of Sanci, edition of 1699, pag. 431. REM. CRIT.]

[G] He compoſed ſeveral works, ſome of which have been publiſhed]. His treatiſe de Viſitatione & de modo Viſitandi, was printed under the title of Synodus Bitontina. The author who informs me of this, adds, that the three books de Deo, & de Divina Hiſtoria, would ſoon be printed (28). I find in Ghilini (29), that there are five books of Cornelio Muſſo, de Hiſtoria Divina. But the principal works of this prelate are his ſermons. Several volumes of them were publiſhed after his death. ‘ Scriſſe molti volumi di prediche, ‘ chiamati quadrageſimali, oltre quelle ſtravaganti che ‘ vanno fuori di diverſe materie e ſoggetti (30). - - - - ‘ He wrote a great many volumes of ſermons, called ‘ Lent-ſermons, beſides thoſe which he publiſhed on dif- ‘ ferent ſubjects and occaſions.’ There is prefixed to the firſt volume a diſcourſe of Bernardin Tomitano, concerning the beauty, the method, and the character, of the ſermons of our Cornelio. The Prediche Quadrageſimali, the Lent-ſermons, were dedicated to cardinal Farneſe, in 1586, by Gioſeppe Muſſo. You may ſee in Moreri, that Gabriel Chapuis publiſhed a French tranſlation of the ſermons of this prelate in 1584.

(28) Gioſeppe Muſſo, ubi ſupra.

(29) Ghilini, Teatro, Part 1, pag. 40.

(30) Gioſeppe Muſſo, ubi ſupra.

MUSTAPHA, emperor of the Turks ſucceeded his brother Achmet, who died November the fifteenth 1617 (a). The people ſoon found their miſtake in thinking him more capable of reigning than Oſman the ſon of Achmet. They therefore depoſed him two months after, and placed Oſman upon the throne of his father. We ſhall ſee elſewhere (b) how Muſtapha was reſtored, and then depoſed a ſecond time.

(a) Mercure François, Tom. v, ad ann. 1617, pag. m. 185.

(b) In the article OSMAN.

MUSURUS (MARC), a native of Candia, diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the learned men who appeared in Italy towards the beginning of the XVIth century. He taught Greek in the univerſity of Padua with great reputation, and with ſo much application in the diſcharge of his office, that he ſcarce miſſed reading public lectures four days in a year (a). He read them commonly at ſeven a clock in a morning. He was admirably ſkilled in the Latin tongue, which had ſcarce ever been obſerved before of any Greek tranſplanted into the Weſt (b), and he ſtudied Philoſophy with extraordinary application. This is what is ſaid of him by one who knew him perſonally [A]. Some ſay,

(a) Eraſm. Epiſt. V, lib. xxiii, pag. 1209.

(b) Id. ib.

[A] One who knew him perſonally.] It is Eraſmus I mean; and I am perſuaded a great many will read here with pleaſure what he ſays of Muſurus. ‘ Patavii ‘ neminem vidi celebrem, mortuos tantum comme- ‘ moro, præter Raphaëlem Regium hominem admodum ‘ natu grandem, ſed cruda viro viridiſque ſenectus. ‘ Erat tum, ut opinor, non minor annis ſeptuaginta, ‘ & tamen nulla fuit hyems tam aſpera quin ille mane ‘ hora ſeptima adiret M. Muſurum Græcè profitentem, ‘ qui toto anno vix quatuor intermittebat dies quin ‘ publicè profiteretur. Juvenes hyemis rigorem ferre ‘ non poterant, illum ſenem nec pudor nec hyems ‘ abigebat ab auditorio. Muſurus autem ante ſenectu- ‘ tem periit, poſteaquam ex benignitate Leonis cœ- ‘ perat eſſe Archiepiſcopus, vir natione Græcus, nimi- ‘ rum Cretenſis, ſed Latinæ linguæ uſque ad miracu- ‘ lum doctus, quod vix ulli Græco contigit præter ‘ Theodorum Gazam, & Joannem Laſcarem qui adhuc ‘ in vivis eſt. Deinde totius Philoſophiæ non tan- ‘ tùm ſtudioſiſſimus, vir ſummis rebus natus, ſi licuiſ- ‘ ſet ſupereſſe (1). - - - At Padua I ſaw nobody of note, ‘ I ſpeak only of thoſe who are now dead, but Raphaël ‘ Regius, a man of great age, yet vigorous and ſtrong. ‘ He was then, I imagine, not leſs than ſeventy years ‘ old, and yet the ſevereſt winter did not hinder him from ‘ attending Muſurus, who read Greek lectures every ‘ morning

(1) Eraſm. Epiſt. v, lib. xxiii, pag. 1209.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

say, that the desire of preferment induced him to go to Rome [B], to make his court to Leo X. His journey was not unsuccessful, since he obtained of this Pope the archbishopric of Malvazia in the Morea, but he was scarce dignified with this high title, when he died at Rome in the Autumn of the year 1517 (c). It was of a Dropsy, if we may believe Paul Jovius (d), who adds, that his grief at not being promoted to a cardinal's hat, threw him into a languishing distemper. They add, that he was a good Poet, and that the elogium of Plato, which he wrote in Greek verse, and prefixed to the works of this Philosopher, was received with great applause, and looked on as a piece which equalled the best Poems of antiquity. The same Paul Jovius pretends, that the league which made war against the Venetians, obliged Musurus to quit his professor's place, and to keep himself retired in his study. This is not relating matters accurately (e). Mr Varillas has a very pleasant story upon our Musurus (f); but till he produces sufficient proof of the account he has given, almost all his fine flourishes ought to esteemed no better than a romance [C]. We shall make some

(c) Paulus Bombasius, Epist. ad Erasmum xxiii, lib. ii, inter Erasmianas.

(d) In Elog. cap. xxx.

(e) See the remark [B].

(f) Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 180, 181, 182.

'morning at seven a-clock, without omitting that office 'four times all the year round. The young scholars could 'not bear the coldness of the winter, but neither the 'cold, nor the ill opinion some might have of it, could 'keep this old man from his auditory. But Musurus 'died before he arrived at old age, after having been 'just made an archbishop, by the favour of Pope Leo, 'being a Grecian by birth, namely a Cretan, but sur- 'prizingly skilled in the Latin tongue, which scarce 'ever happened to any other Grecian, except Theodore 'Gaza, and John Lascaris, who is yet alive. Besides 'this, he was not only a great Philosopher, but qualified 'for the highest attainments, if he had lived.' The letter from whence I take these words, was written in 1524. Erasmus says something in it of the father of Marc Musurus, a good old man, who knew only his mother-tongue (2). It is something strange, and very much to the honour of our Greek professor, that so learned a man as Raphaël Regius should frequent all his lectures at seventy years of age. If all the elogiums, which Musurus has received from Cœlius Rhodiginus in an epistle dedicatory (3), be true, it would be unjust to deny him the title of a very great man.

(2) Quodam die cum domi ipsius essemus et adesset pater seniculus, qui nihil nisi Græce sciebat. Id. ib.

(3) Before the fourteenth book of his Antiquæ Lectiones.

I am going to cite an author who ascribes to him great reading, a prodigious memory, a great penetration, an admirable clearness, and an exceeding tenderness for his father. 'Nihil erat tam reconditum, 'quod non aperiret, nec tam involutum quod non 'expediret Musurus, vere Musarum custos & antistes. 'Omnia legerat, excusserat omnia. Schemata lo- 'quutionum, fabulas, historias, ritus veteres ad un- 'guem callebat. Hanc tam consummatam eruditio- 'nem etiam insignis pietas commendabat, dum pa- 'trem Græculum jam grandævum amanter seduloque 'foveret (4). - - - - There was nothing so difficult which 'he did not comprehend, nothing so obscure which he did 'not clear up, being truly the patron and protector of the 'Muses. The phrases, the fables, the histories, the rites 'of the Antients, he had at his fingers end. This con- 'summate knowledge was also set off with as remark- 'able a piety, while he treated his poor Grecian father 'with the most tender instances of filial duty.'

(4) Bert. Rhenan. in Vita Erasmi, pag. m. 33 34.

[B] The design of preferment induced him to go to Rome.] According to Paul Jovius (5), it was the war which forced him to quit his professorship at Padua, when a formidable league was entered into against the republic of Venice (6). He must therefore have left Padua in 1509. Paul Jovius would have Musurus, after this retreat, to live quietly in his study, till he went to Rome, whither Leo X, attracted by rewards the most celebrated genius's. But as I find in a letter written to Erasmus in 1518, that the senate of Venice had given public notice, that at the end of two months they would chuse a professor of the Greek tongue in the room of Marc Musurus (7), I am very much tempted to reject what Paul Jovius says; for I think it by no means probable, that, after the Venetians had in 1509, repulsed the emperor Maximilian who had besieged Padua, and their affairs were settled again in a pretty good condition, they should not think of filling the Greek professor's chair till 1518. But the following passage of Aldus Manutius informs us, that Paul Jovius did not speak with exactness. It shews, that Musurus read lectures in Venice upon the antient Greek authors, at the time when he was invited by Leo X. 'Hæc autem à nobis præstari tibi potuerunt 'suasore adjutoreque M. Musuro, quem nuper heroi- 'carum literarum decus Venetiis propagantem Græciæ 'priscis autoribus partim illustri juventuti enarrandis 'non sine laude, partim emendatione castigationeque 'in pristinum nitorem quoad ejus fieri poterat, resti- 'tuendis, Leo X Pont. Opt. Max. sponte sua nihil 'tale cogitantem admirabili consensu sacrosanctо- 'rum Cardinalium in Archiepiscopalem dignitatem 'evexit (8). - - - But these we might have performed for 'you by the persuasion and assistance of Musurus, who 'as he was promoting learning at Venice, partly by ex- 'plaining to the young illustrious students the antient 'Greek authors, not without great applause, and partly 'restoring them to their original purity, as far as was 'possible, with his corrections and emendations, was ad- 'vanced to the archiepiscopal dignity, which he never 'had once dreamt of, by the sole act of Leo X, with 'the unanimous consent of the sacred college of cardinals.' Aldus Manutius owns there the assistance he had received from Musurus, for the edition of Pausanias. I shall add by the way, that at the beginning of this edition, there is a Greek letter of Musurus to John Lascaris, which Mr Perrault might have made an advantage of, for it refutes those who admire only the antients.

(5) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xxx.

(6) Seva conjuratione externarum gentium afflictis bello Venetis inde exturbatus. Id. ib.

(7) Scias in Senatu Veneto sanctum esse, atque etiam præconio publicatum, eligendum esse successorem Marco Musuro, qui publice Græces literas auditores docet, stipendiumque centenorum aureorum decretum. Epist. Erasm. xxviii, lib. x, pag. 530.

(8) Aldus Manutius, Præfat. in Pausaniam.

To rectify this account of Paul Jovius, we ought to suppose, that Marc Musurus, at his leaving Padua, retired to Venice, and there read lectures till such time as he went to Rome. We ought also to affirm, that the successor, whom the senate of Venice intended to appoint in his place in 1518, was to fill not the professor's chair at Padua, but that at Venice. We shall see hereafter (9) in a passage of Pierius Valerianus, that Musurus taught first at Padua, and afterwards at Venice. He taught at Venice in 1513 and in 1514, as we learn from Aldus Manutius in the Epistle Dedicatory of his Athenæus.

(9) In the remark [F].

[C] All the fine flourishes in Varillas's story on him, ought to be esteemed no better than a romance.] He informs us, that Musurus had already signalized himself in Candia by his criticisms upon the Greek authors when the Republic of Venice gave him a professor's chair at Padua; That the number of his auditors in this last place was so great, that it was found necessary to enlarge the public school, and to give Musurus leave to teach Grammar in the morning and Poetry in the afternoon, to satisfy those who were desirous of hearing him explain those two liberal arts: that he continued professor till the war dispersed his hearers, and obliged himself to provide for his own security: that he retired to Rome, where he wrote a poem (10), which was thought too excellent to be his performance: that it was therefore rather suspected he had found it in some ancient manuscript, and published it under his own name: that this suspicion was founded on an impossibility that any author should in those days compose a work, in which the stile and beauty of the Greek poetry in the age of Alexander the Great were retrieved in their highest degree of perfection: That Musurus himself helped to confirm this opinion, for he would write nothing more of that kind left by some inferior or less finished piece, he might be in danger of forfeiting the high reputation he had obtained all of a sudden, and beyond his expectation: that he contented himself to make it appear, by explaining to his Roman auditories the most beautiful passages of Homer, Hesiod, Theocritus, and Anacreon, that he was able to imitate them, since he understood so perfectly the turn and delicacy of their verse: and to lead so unexceptionable a life, that this suspicion of fraud was insensibly forgotten: that he was in this situation when Leo X, was chosen Pope: that he experienced the earliest liberalities of this

(10) It was the Elogy of Plato.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſome reflexions upon his narrative [D], an Supplement to Moreri [E]. Muſurus ha unfortunate learned men [F]; but he is there that dignities appeared to him an unſupporta we differ from other authors who ſpeak of hi this Pope, and was promoted to the archbiſhopric of Raguſa: that he preſently ſet about canvaſſing to be made a cardinal: that he quitted his books to ſtudy intrigues: that he became ſo great a maſter this way, that the Pope, aſtoniſhed at this change, uſed to teize, and rally him: that he perſiſted however in this way, and took ſuch new meaſures with thoſe whom he ſaw in greateſt favour at court, that they aſſured him of a cardinal's hat the firſt promotion; but that the Pope took a pleaſure in diſappointing them, purely to have the opportunity of laughing to ſee what part Muſurus would act next: that Muſurus did not fail to furniſh his houſe, to increaſe his train, and even prepare his intended ſpeech of thanks: that not being included in the promotion of thirty one, who were added to the ſacred college, his virtue proved too weak to digeſt the affront he thought he had received: that he complained of it as a contempt ſhewn to the whole Greek nation in his perſon, and that, to carry his reſentment as far as it could poſſible go, he fell ſick of a Dropſy and died.

[D] We ſhall make ſome reflexions upon his narrative.] In the firſt place I can hardly imagine, that if it had been neceſſary to enlarge the public ſchool, to make room for a greater number of auditors, Eraſmus, who could not be ignorant of this, ſhould ſay nothing of it in the paſſage above cited (11), where he tells us at what hour, and with what exactneſs, Muſurus read his lectures; how great was the diligence of an old man of ſeventy years of age to be preſent at them, and how much it exceeded that of the young ſtudents during the cold weather. II. I have already ſaid (12), that Muſurus quitting Padua, when the Venetian ſtate was ravaged by the enemy in 1509, did not wholly withdraw himſelf from the ſervice of the republic of Venice. I add, that, according to Paul Jovius, he wrote his panegyric upon Plato before he went to Rome. Where then has Mr Varillas found that this poem was written at Rome? III. If this poem be only one of the epigrams printed before the works of Plato, as Voſſius (13) and Mr Baillet (14) affirm: it is an exaggeration beyond all the bounds of true Rhetoric, to ſay ſo much as Mr Varillas has ſaid of it. He had better have tranſlated Paul Jovius litterally; an author who does not much ſtand in need of a paraphraſe, he himſelf being a paraphraſt upon his own thoughts, ſo greatly does he love to ſpin them out in a great number of affected words. Now ſee what he ſays of this elogium of Plato: 'Extat id 'poëma, & in limine operum Platonis legitur, com-'mendatione publica cum antiquis elegantia comparan-'dum (15). - - - - That poem is extant, and to be 'met with at the head of Plato's works, and is pub-'lickly commended as comparable for elegance with thoſe 'of antiquity.' But once more, if this poem be nothing but an epigram, what can be more childiſh than the remark of Paul Jovius, that the war did not reduce Muſurus to ſuch a ſtate of idleneſs, but that he made verſes in the praiſe of Plato (16). It is indeed a fine proof that a profeſſor who has been forced to quit his place, has not wholly given himſelf to idleneſs to ſay that he has made an epigram. I ſhall not conceal what Voſſius has declared, that it was believed, Leo X promoted Muſurus to the archbiſhopric, chiefly on account of this epigram (17). Conſider the exhortation which I ſhall make below (18). IV. It is a poor way of proving one's innocence as to the ſtealing of other men's thoughts to alledge, that he leads a good life; it never was obſerved that a plagiary is leſs regular, with reſpect to morality than they who cite their authors, and ſcorn to adorn themſelves in borrowed feathers. It is doubtleſs a breach of morals, and an actual ſin to pirate authors; but it is a ſin of ſuch a nature, as prevails neither more nor leſs in one who is ſenſual and debauched, than in one who is chaſte and ſober. V. Muſurus did not obtain the mitre till 1517: and therefore it is not true, that he experienced the earlieſt liberalities of Leo X, who was made Pope in 1513. VI. He was not promoted to the archbiſhopric of Raguſa, but to that of Malvaſia in the Morea. Ar-

(11) In the remark [A], citation (1).

(12) In the remark [B].

(13) Voſſius, de Poët. Græc. pag. 84.

(14) Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, num. 1248. There is nothing of Muſurus in the edition of Plato at Francfort in 1602, tranſlated by Ficinus, nor in that of 1578, of Henry Stephens, tranſlated by de Serres.

(15) Jovius, Elogior. cap. xxx.

(16) Inde exturbatus ita tranquillum otium quæſivit, ut Græco carmine divi Platonis laudes decantaret. Id. ib.

(17) Voſſius, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 84. Konig in relating this, puts Leo XI, by miſtake for Leo X.

(18) In the remark [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Greek verſes, and ſome prefaces in proſe [G]. The public is indebted to him for the firſt edition of Ariſtophanes and for that of Athenæus [H]. We ſhall mention the judgment Eraſmus has given of him [I]. Andreas Schottus ought not to have aſcribed to him the Magnum Etymologicum [K]. Paulus Freherus has committed a groſs miſtake

' by Leo X, on account of his learning, to the archiepiſcopal honour, and received into friendſhip by Julius the brother of that Pope, then cardinal prieſt, and now Pope, and highly reſpected by all, yet languiſhed under I know not what inward chagrin, as one who not only did not reliſh the dignity and advantage of that ſtation of life, which in the opinion of men is eſteemed the moſt honourable, but even looked upon it as diſagreeable and unfortunate to him who was uſed to delight ſo much in the moſt perfect freedom, ſo that falling from thence into a lingring diſtemper, the cauſe of which could not be diſcovered by the Phyſicians, after having long laboured under the ſecret anxieties of his mind, and the grievous ſenſe of his misfortunes, he expired.'

[G] He publiſhed only a ſmall number of Greek verſes, and ſome prefaces in proſe.] Theſe words of Geſner appear to me remarkable: ' Marcus Muſurus Cretenſis ' ſcripſit Epigrammata aliquot, præcipuè in Græcos ' libros per Nicolaum Blaſtum Venetiis impreſſos circa ' annum 1500, quibus ipſe opinor corrigendis præfuit: ' item præfationes aliquas proſa, ut in Etymologicon ' Græcum, &c (25). - - - Marc Muſurus, the Cretan, (25) Geſner. in Bibliot. fol. 495, verſo. ' wrote ſome epigrams, eſpecially on thoſe Greek books, printed by Nicolas Blaſtus at Venice about the year 1500, ' for which I believe he corrected the preſs; alſo ſome prefaces in proſe, as that before the Etymologicon ' Græcum, &c.' They appear to me remarkable for two reaſons; becauſe they give me an opportunity to exhort thoſe who have the advantage of proper libraries, to ſatisfy us in the firſt place, whether the epigram upon Plato is to be found among the others which Muſurus publiſhed towards the year 1500; in the ſecond place, whether he was corrector of Blaſtus's Printing-preſs at Venice, as Geſner believed. Paul Jovius, and ſome others, would very juſtly deſerve to be laughed at, if it ſhould appear that this epigram preceded the famous league of Cambray againſt the republic of Venice.

I was in hopes that the exhortation juſt now mentioned might have procured me all the information I wanted; and yet no body has had the goodneſs to give me any aſſiſtance: however I have found ſomething to my purpoſe in the book of Mr Chevillier. There I find that our Muſurus was really corrector of the Printing-preſs (26), and that it was he who corrected the great Etymologicon, which was printed at Venice, in folio in 1499, by Zachary Calliergus, at the expence of Nicolas Blaſtus (27). I find there alſo, ' that Aldus ' Manutius, by whom he was employed to correct the ' Greek manuſcrips, and reviſe the printed ſheets, inſerted his elogy in theſe words in the Greek Plato of ' 1513. Muſurus Cretenſis, magno Vir judicio, magnâ doctrinâ, qui hos Platonis Libros accuratè recognovit, cum antiquiſſimis conferens Exemplaribus, ut ' unà mecum, quod ſemper facit, multum adjumenti ' afferret & Græcis & noſtris hominibus. - - - - Muſurus, the Cretan, a man of ſound judgment, and great learning, who accurately corrected theſe books of Plato, having compared them with the moſt ancient copies, that together with me, as he makes it his conſtant buſineſs, he may give all poſſible aſſiſtance both to his countrymen and mine.' I was ſtill at a loſs as to the ' poem wherein Muſurus has given Plato's elogium, but am ſet right by the good offices of Mr Villemandi (28), who has taken the pains to conſult the copy in the library at Leyden. He has aſſured to me, that the Plato printed at Venice, in ædibus Aldi & Andreæ Soceri, in 1513, contains after the Epiſtle Dedicatory (29) a Greek poem of two hundred hexameter and pentameter verſes, which take up four pages, compoſed by Muſurus, and is an elogium of Plato. We may conclude from hence, that Voſſius ought not to have called it an epigram: however, it is certain that Paul Jovius has drawn a ridiculous proof from it of the authors not being idle after his departure from Padua. Philip Munckerus publiſhed this poem of Muſurus at Amſterdam, in 1681, cum verſione latina & elegantiſſima Zenobii Acciaioli metaphraſi poëtica. It contains forty pages in 4to.

(26) See, above, citation (28) of the article LASCARIS (John).

(27) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 194.

(28) Who is mentioned above, cita. (4) of the article ARRIANA; and in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Octob. 1685; Art. V. & Auguſt 1686, Art. VI.

(29) Addreſſed to Leo X.

[H] The public is indebted to him for the firſt edition . . . . . of Athenæus.] We have already obſerved in it's proper place (30), that Caſaubon found this edition very defective: yet Aldus Manucius who printed it greatly commends the care of Muſurus. Thus he ſpeaks; ' Muſurus noſter libros hos ſic accurate recenſuit col- ' latos & cum multis exemplaribus, & cum epitome, ut ' infinitis pene in locis eos emendaverit, carminaque quæ ' veluti proſa in aliis legebantur, in ſua metra reſtituerit. ' Adde quod primus & ſecundus liber, qui in aliis dee- ' rant, ex epitome additi ſunt cum bona parte tertii libri: ' erat enim hic ſine capite, quo factum eſt, ut iidem ferè ' hi exiſtimari poſſint, qui erant integri, quoniam ea ' eſt materia, ut non multa ſubtrahi ex eis potuerint ' (31). - - - - - Our Muſurus corrected theſe books ſo accurately, by collating them both with a great many copies, and alſo with the epitome, that he has reſtified almoſt an infinite number of paſſages in them, and reſtored the verſes to their meaſure, which were read for proſe in other editions. Beſides this, he has added from the Epitome the firſt and ſecond book, which were wholly wanting in others, and a great part of the third, the beginning of which was wanting, ſo that by this care, they may all be thought to be very near- by the ſame with the complete originals, for the ſubject is ſuch that it is eaſy to ſee there cannot be much wanting.'

(30) Above, remark [D] of the article ATHENÆUS.

(31) Aldus, in Præfat. Athenæi.

[I] The judgment which Eraſmus has given of him.] See what I have already cited (32) out of one of his letters; and add to it what here follows: ' M. Muſurum propius novi, virum inſigniter eruditum in ' omni diſciplinarum genere, in carmine ſubobſcurum ' & affectatum: oratione proſa præter unam alteramve præfationem nihil, quod ſciam, reliquit. Mirabar hominem Græcum tantum ſcire Latine. Et ' hunc fortuna retraxit à Muſis, dum Leonis favore ' Romam accitus incipit Archiepiſcopus eſſe, fato ' præreptus eſt (33). - - - - Muſurus was my intimate acquaintance, a man eminently ſkilled in all kinds of learning, in his poetry ſomething obſcure and affected; in proſe he left nothing that I know of beſides a preface or two. I have wondred that a Grecian could become ſo great a maſter of Latin. It is preferment interrupted his commerce with the Muſes, and being called to Rome by the favour of Leo as he was juſt made an archbiſhop he died.' Theſe words incline us to believe, that Muſurus renounced the profeſſion of letters from the time that Leo X, did him the favour to invite him to Rome; yet it is certain that he was profeſſor at Rome, as appears by theſe verſes:

(32) Above, remark [A].

(33) Eraſm. in Ciceroniano.

Ce mien Pere (34) Angevin, gentilhomme de race,
L'un des premiers François qui les Muſes embraſſe,
D'ignorance ennemi, deſireux de ſçavoir,
Paſſant torrens & mons juſqu'à Rome alla voir
Musure Candiot: qu'il ouït pour apprendre
Le Grec des vieux auteurs, & pour docte s'y rendre:
Où ſi bien travailla, que dedans quelques ans
Il ſe fit admirer, & des plus ſufiſans.

(34) It is Antony de Baif who ſpeaks of Lazarus de Baif, his father, in a letter to Charles IX; prefixed to his works printed at Paris in 1573, in 8vo.

My Sire, in Anjou born, of no mean race,
Among French ſcholars ſought an early place,
Sworn foe to Ignorance, and Learning's friend,
Where rapid ſtreams, and Alpine hills defend
The tedious way, he bent his ſtudious courſe,
And trac'd the Muſes up to Rome their ſource:
Where great Musurus from the chair explain'd,
Each noble thought in Grecian works contain'd;
Where ſuch a pupil, under ſuch a guide,
Soon with the foremoſt ſons of ſcience vy'd.

[K] Andreas Scottus ought not to have aſcribed to him the Etymologicum magnum.] It is Mr Menage (35) who has taken notice of this miſtake, and refuted it by obſerving that Euſtathius has cited this Etymologicum. This very well deſerved the parentheſis I am now going to quote. ' Auctor magni Etymologi- ' ci quiſquis tandem ille ſit (Nicam eſſe ſcribit amicus ' noſter Iſaacus Voſſius in notis ad Pomponium Me- ' lam: quod an verum ſit neſcio: certe falſum eſſe ' ſcio,

(35) Notis ad Diog. Laërtium, lib. iii, num. 7, pag. 141.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

miſtake [L].

‘ ſcio, quod vir doctiſſimus Andreas Schottus, in præ-
‘ fatione ad proverbia Græcorum, exiſtimabat auctorem
‘ hujus libri eſſe Marcum Muſurum, ſiquidem ab Eu‘ ſtathio Magnum Etymologicum laudatur) Auctor, in‘ quam Etymologici conditorem Academiæ, & Aca-
‘ demum & Ecademum fuiſſe dictum ſcribit. - - - - -
‘ The author of the great Etymologicon, whoever he is,
‘ (our friend Iſaac Voſſius, in his notes on Mela, ſays
‘ it was Nicas, which whether it be true I know not,
‘ but I am ſure what the learned Andreas Schottus ſug- ‘ geſted in his preface to the Greek proverbs is falſe, that ‘ Marc Muſurus was author of this work, becauſe the ‘ Etymologicum magnum is quoted by Euſtathius) the

(a) And not Henry as in Konig.

MUTIUS (HULDRIC) (a) profeſſor at I birth (b). He publiſhed ſeveral works, the m miſtaken, is a Hiſtory of Germany [A], whi

(b) In Villario Stocken proxime Epiſcopicellam urbem Turgoviæ Helv
- - - - - Born in the village Stocken near Biſchoffzell, a town in Turgou
Michael Hertzius, in Biblioth. Germanica, num. 40.

[A] He publiſhed . . . . a Hiſtory of Germany . . . . Mr du Pleſſis Mornai quotes ſome paſſages of it, ... which may ſerve for a ſupplement to the article of Gregory VII.] The title of it is, de Germanorum prima origine, moribus, inſtitutis, legibus, & memorabilibus pace & bello geſtis omnibus omnium ſæculorum uſque ad nenſem Auguſti anni trigeſimi noni ſupra milleſimum quingenteſimum, libri Chronici XXXI, ex probatioribus Germanicis ſcriptoribus in latinam linguam tralati (1). Mr du Pleſſis Mornai undertaking to prove that the ordinance of Gregory VII, on the celibacy of prieſts, was very ill obſerved in Germany, relates among other things what follows. ‘ Huldricus Mutius, who treats ‘ of this hiſtory at large, in his fifteenth book, col- ‘ lected from the moſt approved authors of the Ger- ‘ man Hiſtory, tells us; that the biſhop of Conſtance ‘ not being willing to impoſe this ordinance, Pope ‘ Gregory diſcharged his clergy from their oath to ‘ that biſhop †: That biſhop however, ſays he, as ‘ ſeveral affirm, was an enemy to the fornicating prieſts ‘ tho' a protector of the married ones: that the archbi- ‘ ſhop of Mentz was of the ſame opinion, but diſſem- ‘ bled it for fear of the Pope: that the clergy defend- ‘ ed themſelves on the authority of the goſpel, that of ‘ the apoſtle, and God's inſtitution; and even ſub- ‘ mitted themſelves to the judgment of the church, from ‘ which they would never depart; Modo non apertè contra ‘ Domini inſtitutionem faciat; provided ſhe did not in ‘ any thing apparently derogate from the Inſtitution of our ‘ Lord. The Pope on the contrary threatened them ‘ with his excommunication: Animabus Sathanæ tra- ‘ ditis, corpora ſuplicio afficienda, poteſtati ſæculari tra- ‘ diturum; that after having delivered over their ſouls ‘ to Satan, he would deliver over their bodies to be pu- ‘ niſhed by the ſecular arm. He goes on that, Quo ‘ quiſque vir melior aut ſacerdos ſanctior, hoc pluribus ‘ vehementius repugnabat; That the beſt and moſt pious a- ‘ mong the prieſts were they who formed the ſtrongeſt ‘ oppoſition. So far were the holy miniſters of the ‘ church in thoſe days from thinking this law capa- ‘ ble of adding to their ſanctity! and to come to the ‘ ſucceſs of this council ‡; That a great many oppoſed ‘ and diſputed very loudly againſt the determination of ‘ the ſee of Rome: ſome however, though but few, whe- ‘ ther it was out of fear of being obliged to ſtarve if ‘ they were to loſe their cures, or whether it was from ‘ a deſire of getting rid of wives they did not at all love, ‘ and obtaining concubines in their room, anſwered, that

(1) Geſner. in Biblioth. folio 342.

† P. Huldricus Mutius, lib. xv, pag. 132. Sunt authores qui dicunt Epiſcopum illum Conſtantienſem omnino infenſos habuiſſe ſcortatores, patrocinatumque conjugio Sacerdotum.

‡ Item, pag. 133. Quidam audacioris ſpiritus contra ſententiam Romanæ ſedis, multis magna voce diſſerebant: Nonnulli, pauci tamen, vel timentes famem, ſi eſſent Sacerdotia relinquenda, vel alioqui non amantes uxores, libenter uxores concubinis commutantes, reſponderunt ſe Eccleſiaſticis conſtitutionibus ſacro-ſanctæ Synodi obtemperaturos. Horum quidam poſtea clam uſi ſunt uxoribus ſuis, retinuereque ſic uxores & ſacerdotia. Ii vero qui ſuas uxores non amabant, vel cum ancillis ſuis, vel cum adulteris mulieribus, quas multas ipſi fecerunt, vel cum vulgari immunda meretricum turba conſuetudinem habuerunt loco uxorum. Ii autem qui contra præſtitam fidem uxoribus, & adverſus Dei conſtitutionem, putabant ſalva conſcientia, Dei præcepto deſpecto, hominum conſtitutionibus obſequi non licere, nihil aliud reſponderunt quàm ſententias ex Scriptura, & diſputando, moleſti Apoſtolico Legato fuerunt, qui occluſerat aures ſuas ad eorum argumenta. Itaque mandatum eſt illis, ut relictis ſuis quibus præerant Eccleſiis aliò ſe conferrent, ne turbarent eos qui in eorum locum eſſent mittendi. Si quis aliter faceret, excommunicationem animæ & corporis interitum præſentiſſimum expectaret. Sed ſacerdotum illius Eccleſiæ major pars (neſcio qua fiducia) obdurata, domum reverſa, apud plebem ſuam cauſam ex ſuggeſtu, contra Pontificem Romanum egerunt, & quod diu alius ab alio audierat de matrimonio ex Biblia, finguli plebem ſuam docebant, refellentes opinionem Domini Papæ, quam odioſiſſimis nominibus appellabant. Hæcque prædicarant quamprimum veniebant domum per aliquot dies, continuis quatuor aut quinque horis: nam ſciebant illis non diu fore locum concionandi, niſi populum pararent, ut novam è Roma venientem opinionem non admitterent.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in folio. Mr du Pleſſis Mornai quotes ſome paſſages of it which I ſhall produce below, becauſe they may ſerve as a ſupplement to a remark in the article of Gregory VII (c).

(c) It is the remark [C].

‘ council holden at Rome ††, they watched their un- ‘ married prieſts; and if they found them guilty of for- ‘ nication, they convicted them with proofs out of Scrip-
‘ ture, and the Papal Conſtitutions, and accuſed them ‘ publickly before the people, requiring a compariſon to ‘ be made between a Fornicator, entertaining a common
‘ whore, a member of Satan, and a perſon living chaſt-
‘ ly in marriage, bringing up and inſtructing his chil- ‘ dren, according to God's holy religion. In ſhort the ‘ weſtern church was at this time greatly diſturbed, and ‘ Heaven and Earth confounded together. And this diſ-
‘ cord was the cauſe of great numbers going over to the ‘ eaſtern church.’

†† Ibid. Sacerdotes non uxoratos obſervabant, deprehenſos in fornicatione ſententiâ ex Bullis & Pontificum conſtitutionibus confutabant, & arcuſabant palam eorum populo, conferre jubebant, ſcortatorem meretricis Sathanæque membrum, & maritum caſte viventem, & liberos juxta Dei inſtitutionem educantem. Brevitèr, erat magna illo tempore in Eccleſia Occidentali turbatio, cœlum miſceretur terræ. Atque hæc diſcordia fecit ut multi Orientali Eccleſiæ accederent.

Pronto Ducæus (Fronton du Duc), in anſwer to this book of du Pleſſis, has contented himſelf with this general remark. We pay no manner of regard to what du Pleſſis has heaped up here out of the hiſtory of Hulric Mutius, who is known to have been a Proteſtant by religion, a German by nation, and an impudent liver by profeſſion, and yet he cannot deny but that the emperor at laſt complied with the Pope's opinion; and convening a council at Mentz, gave all poſſible encouragement to the ſeverity of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and ordering the recuſants to be condemned, reſtored the peace of Germany, and the holy celibacy of the church *; which is quite contrary to what du Pleſſis would make us believe of a certain emperor (3).

* Cæſar Rotta reverſus in Concilio Moguntiæ habito, ubi qui Sacerdotum conjugia ſolvere volebant, acceſſit, aliis qui ei opinioni reſiſterent condemnatis: ſic pacem in Germaniam conſtituram. Eſtienneus de Continentiâ, lib. 1, cap. xii, de Mutio.

(3) Fronton du Duc, Refutation de la prétendue Verification de Sieur du Pleſſis, pag. 542.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

N.

NANNIUS (a) (JOHN) a famous Dominican Monk, commonly called Annius Viterbienſis, was promoted to the office of maſter of the ſacred palace in the year 1499. He died on the thirteenth of November 1502, at the age of ſeventy years (b). The city of Viterbo was ſo proud of being the place of his nativity, that in the year 1618 they repaired his epitaph (c). He was a perſon who wanted not learning for the times he lived in: he underſtood even the oriental languages (d), and wrote commentaries on the Scripture (e). He was a long time profeſſor of Divinity: but nothing contributed ſo much to his being talked of, as his publiſhing ſome very ancient authors whoſe works were ſuppoſed to have been loſt [A]. It is true, the learned in general have but little valued this publication [B], as finding all thoſe pieces to be only ſuppoſititious; the world is now more convinced of it than ever; and although there aroſe from time to time certain authors who have vindicated him [C], yet even the Dominicans for the moſt part acknowledge theſe works to be ſpurious. They content themſelves

(a) He is ſo named in his epitaph. Altamura, in Bibliotheca Dominican. pag. 223.

(b) He was not therefore born in the year 1437, as Moreri aſſures us, after Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 609.

(c) Altamura, ubi ſupra.

(d) Leand. Albert. in Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. m. 115.

(e) See the catalogue of them in the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

[A] His publiſhing ſome very antient authors, whoſe works were ſuppoſed to be loſt.] Here follows a catalogue of the pieces contained in this collection of Annius: Archilochi de temporibus Epitome lib. I. Xenophontis de Æquivocis lib. I. Beroſi Babylonici de Antiquitatibus Italiæ ac totius orbis lib. V. Manethonis Ægypti ſupplementa ad Beroſum lib. I. Metaſthenis Perſæ, de judicio temporum, & Annalibus Perſarum lib. I. Philonis Hebræi de temporibus lib. II. Joannis Annii de primis temporibus, & quatuor ac viginti regibus Hiſpaniæ, & ejus antiquitate lib. I. Ejuſdem de antiquitate & rebus Etruriæ lib. I. Ejuſdem Commentarirum in Propertium de Vertumno ſive Jano lib. I. Q. Fabii Pictoris de aureo ſæculo, & origine urbis Romæ lib. II. Myrſili Leſbii de origine Italiæ, ac Turrheniæ lib I. M. Catonis fragmenta de originibus lib. I. Antonini Pii Cæſaris Auguſti Itinerarium lib. I. C. Sempronii de Chorographia ſive deſcriptione Italiæ lib. I. Joannis Annii de Etbruſca ſimul & Italica Chronographia lib. I. Ejuſdem Quæſtiones de Thuſcia lib. I. Cl. Marii Aretii, Patricii Syracuſani de ſitu inſulæ Siciliæ lib. I. Ejuſdem Dialogus in quo Hiſpania deſcribitur. The firſt edition of this work was publiſhed at Rome by Eucharius Silber in 1498. The ſecond was printed at Venice in the ſame year by Bernardino Veneto; but it has not the commentaries of John Annius. It paſſed afterwards thro' a great many other editions, in different places: I make uſe of that of Antwerp, printed in 1552 in 8vo. The author dedicated thoſe books to Ferdinand and Iſabella; becauſe, as he tells them, they were diſcovered at the time their majeſties ſubdued the kingdom of Granada. He pretends to have found them at Mantua, when he was there with his patron Paul de Campo Fulgoſo cardinal of St Sixtus (1). For the reſt, this work is not divided into twenty-ſeven books, as Moreri aſſerts, but into ſeventeen. This miſtake, however, may not be Moreri's, but his Printers.

(1) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Queſtions: it is at pag. 594, edition of Antwerp 1552, in 8vo.

[B] The learned in general have but little valued this publication.] The article Annius of Viterbo in Voſſius, is very well filled, and Mr Moreri has not a little profited by it. From whence it comes, that we find in his Dictionary ſo ample and curious an account of this Dominican. We there alſo meet with the names of ſeveral learned men who have confuted him; but it is much better to have recourſe to Voſſius himſelf, who has alſo named ſome other Critics, and quoted their words. Pineda alſo names ſeveral others (2). Andrew Schot has inſerted in one of his books (3) two learned digreſſions. The firſt, is a ſhort account of the antiquities of Antwerp, publiſhed by Goropius Becanus. The ſecond is a tranſlation of the cenſure which Gaſpar Barreiros publiſhed upon Annius. This was firſt publiſhed by its author at Rome in Latin (4), and afterwards in his mother-tongue, which was the Portugueſe. This cenſure was inſerted, according to the Latin edition, in Annius's collection printed in Germany by the Commelins; but Andrew Schot has given it us from the Portugueſe edition, which he himſelf tranſlated into Latin. Don Nicolas Antonio did not know that Gaſpar Barreiros had publiſhed this cenſure in Latin; he ſpeaks only of the Portugueſe edition (5). Barreiros and Goropius Becanus clearly demonſtrate the forgery of Annius. La Popeliniere has alſo written againſt this author (6), but I know not whether his work was ever publiſhed. The learned Onuphrius Panvinius, declared openly againſt theſe writings (7); and there appeared at Bologna, in the year 1638, a letter of John Baptiſt Agucchi, wherein theſe pretended antient authors are ſtrongly refuted. Father Noris has quoted (8) a perſon (9), who had lately written againſt this work of Annius. I think Volaterranus and Sabellicus were the firſt who declared they looked upon theſe authors to be ſpurious.

(2) Lib. vii, de Solomone, cap. xxvii, num. 4, apud Theophil. Raynaud. de malis & bonis Libris, num. 269, pag. m. 164.

(3) Intituled, Hiſpaniæ Bibliotheca. See there, pag. 354, & ſeq.

(4) Schottus, in Hiſpaniæ Bibliotheca, pag. 355.

(5) Printed in the year 1557. See the Bibliotheca Hiſpan. Script. of Nicolas Antonio, Tom. i, pag. 398.

(6) The Hiſtory of Hiſtories, pag. 209.

(7) In Antiquitatibus Veronenſibus.

[C] There aroſe from time to time certain authors who have vindicated him.] When I ſay the greateſt part of the learned have looked upon theſe pieces, publiſhed by Annius, as ſpurious, I do not pretend to deny, but that ſome very celebrated authors have eſteemed them genuine. Voſſius (10) names among theſe laſt Leander Alberti, Nauclerus, Driedo, Valerius Anſelmus, Joannes Lucidus, Medina, and Sixtus Senenſis. If we believe Altamura (11), Pineda ought alſo to be joined with them: but Theophilus Raynaud (12) reckons him among thoſe that have rejected the writers of Annius. I find that Albert Krantz, and even Sigonius have eſteemed theſe writers genuine. Here follows a paſſage of Sigonius:

'Quibus Epitomis (Catonis) merito tantam ego tribuo auctoritatem, quantam incorruptis veteribus monumentis merito tribuenda eſt (13). - - - To which epitomes (of Cato) I attribute as great an authority, as is juſtly due to the genuine remains of the Antients.'

An Italian Dominican, named Tomaſo Mazza, publiſhed a folio (14) at Verona in the year 1673, whoſe title is, Apologia per Frate Gioanni Annio Viterbeſe. His chief deſign is to prove, that if there were any fraud in that matter, it ought not to be imputed to Annius: but he goes farther, and maintains thoſe writings to be genuine, and endeavours to anſwer all the objections againſt them. This apology having been criticized, Father Macedo fell upon the Critic, not with a deſign to maintain, that the Beroſus, &c. publiſhed by Annius, was the true Beroſus, but to ſhow that Annius had not forged thoſe manuſcripts (15). A more modern apologiſt pretends to prove both the one and the other: his name is Didimus Rapaligerus Livianus. He publiſhed at Verona in the year 1678, a work in folio, intituled, I Gothi illuſtrati, overo Iſtoria de i Gothi

(8) In Cenotaph. Piſanis, pag. 5. This work was printed in the year 1681.

(9) His name is Francis Sparaverius, he is a native of Perusa.

(10) De Hiſt. Latinis, pag. 609.

(11) In Bibliotheca Dominic.

(12) De malis & bonis Libris, pag. 164.

(13) Sigonius, de antiquo Jure Italiæ, lib. i, cap. xxv, fol. m. 54, verſo.

(14) The Italian Journal of the twenty eighth of February 1674 mentions it.

(15) See the Italian Journal of the twenty firſt of January 1675.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

themſelves with affirming, that their Annius acted a ſincere part in them, and was no impoſtor [D], as he is commonly ſtigmatized. A perſon who had ſeen him ſaid he was not in his ſenſes (f).

(f) Staligerana, Voce Annius.

(16) See the eighth Italian journal of the year 1678, pag. 130.

Gothi antichi (16). In which he collects all the reaſons he can, to prove that the writers which Annius publiſhed are genuine, and that they were not however counterfeited by this Dominican. It is very well known, ſays he, that Berоſus was given him at Genoa, by Father George of Armenia a Dominican; and that he found all the reſt, except Manetho, at one Mr Williams's of Mantua. So that, tho' we know not whence he had Manetho, yet ought we not to believe he forged it: his candour with regard to the others ought to ſecure him againſt cenſure in this reſpect. As he had been accuſed of trumping up marble tables, pretending them to be antique, tho' he himſelf had forged them, this author defends him, and proves that accuſation to be calumnious; ſince ſome of theſe tables had been diſcovered before Annius's birth, and others by perſons who preſented them to Pope Alexander VI. 'E tacciato per impoſtore d'alcune tavole di 'marmo dalle quali diede in luce la ſpiegazione. Se 'pero ſi deve ponderare la verita, con ſodi argomenti 'queſt' Autore libera dall' impoſture de ſuoi Auver- 'ſarii Annio, con provar evidentemente eſſer le due 'tavole da lui chiamate Libiſcille dal luogo, ove fu- 'rono trovate, ſtate diſſepellite molto tempo avanti 'che Annio naſceſſe . . . E in quanto alle due Cibe- 'larie, e la Longobarica, furono da altri trovate e 'preſentate ad Aleſſandro VI, per tacere dell' Oſiria- 'na che avanti che naſceſſe Annio, fu reſa alla 'luce (17). - - - He is accuſed of forging ſome tables of 'marble, whereof he has publiſhed an explanation. If 'therefore the truth deſerves examining, this author clears 'Annius by ſubſtantial arguments from his adverſaries 'charge of impoſture, proving beyond contradiction, that 'two of theſe tables called Libiſcillæ, from the place 'where they were found, had been dug up a long time 'before Annius was born. . . . And as to thoſe two 'called Cibelariæ, and that called Longobarica, they 'were diſcovered by others and preſented to Alexander VI, 'to ſay nothing of that called Oſiriana, which was 'brought before the time of Annius.'

(17) Giornale VIII, de Letterati 1678, pag. 221.

[D] The Dominicans . . . . . content themſelves, with affirming, that Annius was no impoſtor.] I have juſt been mentioning ſome authors who undertook to defend him, and I refer my reader to the appendix of Altamura (18), where he will meet with the names of ſeveral other apologiſts. I was ſurprized to find there, that Altamura was not acquainted with any author before Petrus à Valleclauſa who had accuſed Annius of Viterbo of impoſture. We muſt not forget, that this Petrus à Valleclauſa, author of a book, De immunitate Cyriacorum à cenſuris, is no other than Theophilus Raynaud. Now it is certain, that before him an infinite number of authors had accuſed Annius of impoſture. See in Moreri the paſſage of Antonius Auguſtinus. What is moſt to be admired is, that in a book, where Theophilus Raynaud was not in ſo ill an humour with the Dominicans, as when he concealed himſelf under the name of Petrus à Valleclauſa, he declares, that conſidering John Annius, was a Dominican, he was inclinable to believe him innocent (19). Let us conclude with the words of a Lutheran, who believed the authors publiſhed by Annius to be genuine; and, that if there were any faults to be found in them, they were not to be imputed to this Monk, but to the ignorance or inſincerity of the tranſcribers and tranſlators. 'Quod enim, ſays he (20), per Deum 'immortalem, prodigium fuerit clauſtralem illum & mi- 'nimè tam profunde doctum Monachum talia commi- 'niſci poſſe? Ais multa ineſſe ficta, minime pro iis acto- 'ribus. Nec nos negamus interpolatos univerſos illos 'auctores, ruptos, fractos, minime bona aut fide aut 'intelligentia tranſlatos; tamen antiquitus ex legiti- 'mis veriſque auctoribus excerptos, talia argumenta 'ſunt, ut quæ contra afferuntur omnia evaneſcant. 'Vel unum Catonem mihi vide. Cenſe, recenſe, 'damna etiam ut libet, videbis tamen veri illius Cato- 'nis, & fateberis etiam, ingenium ſtilumque hic ſu- 'pereſſe, quos mentiri aut fingere non fuit talium ho- 'minum. - - - For what a prodigy muſt it be in GOD's 'name, for a cloiſtered and not over-learned Monk to 'be capable of contriving ſuch pieces. You ſay, they 'diſcover many marks of forgery, no way reconcileable to 'thoſe authors. Nor do we deny, but that they are all 'of them interpolated, caſtrated, imperfect, and neither 'tranſlated with fidelity nor judgment: and yet, that 'they were antiently extracted from thoſe true and legiti- 'mate authors, there are ſuch arguments as can admit 'of no contradiction. To inſtance only in Cato. Ex- 'amine it again and again, condemn it as you will, 'yet you muſt ſee and confeſs that it diſcovers the wit 'and ſtile of the true Cato, which are not to be imitated 'or counterfeited by ſuch ſort of perſons.

(19) Fortaſſis tamen ab alio quo piam impoſitum eſt ipſi Annio, quem doli expertem fuiſſe malo exiſtimare, cum Religioſum inſtitutum Prædicatorum ſit profeſſus. Th. Raynaudus, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 269, pag. 164.

(20) Barthius, in Animadverſionibus ad Gallum, pag. 62.

(18) Append. Bibliothecæ Dominic. pag. 527.

NAOGEORGUS (a) (THOMAS) a native of Straubingen in Bavaria, lived in the XVI century. He compoſed a great many Latin verſes [A], which did not pleaſe the Roman Catholics, becauſe they deſcribed their irregularities in a ſatirical manner. A doctor of the Sorbonne (b), who, in the year 1670, publiſhed ſome treatiſes againſt the rejoycings of the Twelfth-Day, obſerves that Naogeorgus had not omitted to reproach the Catholics with the ſuperſtitions and exceſſes of that feaſt. The German name of this author was Kirchmaier (c). He was a perſon who underſtood Greek indifferently well [B]. He was born in the year 1511, and died in the year 1578, or thereabouts (d).

(a) And not Naogeorgius, as Borrichius calls him; nor Neogeorgius, as he is named by Konig.

(b) John Deſhyons, dean and theologal of Sens, pag. 139, 241, 242, quoting the fourth book of Regnum Papiſticum.

(c) Epitome Bibliothecæ Geſneri.

(d) Baillet, Judgment on the Poets, num. 1323.

One

[A] He compoſed a great many Latin verſes.] The moſt famous of his poems was that intituled Bellum Papiſticum. He publiſhed it in the year 1553, and dedicated it to Philip landgrave of Heſſe. It is in hexameter verſe, and divided into four books. The author reſided at Baſil when he printed it. He compoſed alſo ſome tragedies which may be ſtiled controverſial. Such is that intituled Pammachius, which he dedicated to Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury; the prologue of which begins with theſe four verſes:

Quid adferamus ſi vacat cognoſcere
Spectatores, paucis exponam ſingula:
Pammachium, qui Romanus eſt Epiſcopus,
Evangelicæ doctrinæ cepit tædium.

Of our intended feaſt, Sirs, by your leave,
We beg you'll firſt a bill of fare receive.
Pammachius, biſhop of Rome's pamper'd ſte,
Is ſurfeited with Chriſtianity.

It came out in the year 1537: ſuch another is this following (1), Incendia, ſive Pyrgopolinices Tragœdia, nefanda quorundam Papiſtarum facinora exponens. His Mercator (2) is of the ſame kind (§ a), whoſe title runs thus, Mercator, ſeu Judicium in qua (tragœdia) in conſpectu ponuntur Apoſtolica & Papiſtica doctrina, quantum utraque in conſcientiæ certamine valeat & efficiat, & quis utriuſque futurus ſit exitus. He compoſed five books of ſatires, An abridgment of Eccleſiaſtical Tenets, and ſome other poems (3).

(1) Publiſhed at Wittemberg in the year 1538.

(2) Publiſhed in the year 1539.

(3) See Bottrichius de Poëtis, pag. 134; or rather the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

[(§ a) There is a tranſlation of this poem in French verſe, of which Criſpin is perhaps the author. The title of it is, Le Marchand converti, The Merchant converted, and among other editions, there is one in 16mo by Francis Foreſt, 1591. REM. CRIT.]

[B] He underſtood Greek indifferently well.] He tranſlated into Latin ſeveral pieces of Plutarch, and Dion Chryſoſtom, and the letters of Syneſius.

[C] One

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

One of his dramatic pieces was represented at Heidelberg under so benign a constellation, that it was pretended the Heavens declared in its favour [C]. This particular deserves to be related.

[C] One of his dramatic pieces was represented, ... and it was pretended that the Heavens declared in its favour.] This dramatic piece of Naogeorgus is intituled Haman. It was represented at Heidelberg on the twenty-fourth of August. The scholars maintained by the Elector (4) were the actors in it. A theatre was erected in a court of the monastery of the Franciscans. There was so great an appearance of much rain, when the first actor was preparing to begin his part, that it was thought it could not be played: but all of a sudden the sky cleared up, the sun appeared, and so continued, not for a moment, but during all the time of the representation. 'Ibi subito qui post nubila latuerat sol, quasi ad spectaculum invitatus ridens prorupit, nec usque dum ludi exacti essent vel minimæ nubeculæ locum concessit (5). - - - Then all at once the sun, who had concealed himself in the clouds, as tho' he had been invited to the entertainment, shone out with a chearful countenance, and would not admit of the least shadow of a cloud so long as the performance lasted.' But the play was no sooner over than the air began to be gloomy again; and so remained for great part of the winter (6). Mr. Fabricius, professor at Heidelberg, relates this in a dissertation, wherein he maintains that a good use may be made of stage-plays. This observation he opposed to a certain popular notion, that whenever plays are acted, there always suddenly arises a tempest. 'Quoniam nuper inaudivi te nescio quas jactare observationes de tempestatibus quoties Comœdiæ edebantur ex improviso obortis, operæ pretium fuerit brevem tibi narrare historiolam qua & imaginaria tua experientia confutetur, & quid olim hic factum sit edocearis. - - - Because, I have lately heard you pretend I know not what observations of the sudden rising of tempests as often as any plays are acted, it will be worth while to produce a short historical fact, which will both confute your imaginary experience, and inform you of what happened here some time ago.' This remark is useful as it shews us that those who condemn any practice, are used to suppose that the celestial prodigies declare in their favour. This they easily make people believe, and thereby keep their minds in slavish subjection. The shortest course will always be to put them upon making good their assertions, or else to oppose them with contrary observations.

(4) It was Frederic the Pious.

(5) Joannes Ludovicus Fabricius, de Ludis Scenicis, pag. 101.

(6) Ipsa vero hora qua spectatores domum redierant, redierunt & nimbi, nec ab illo die (erat autem XXIV Augusti) in adultam usque hiemem cessarunt. Id. ib.

NAPLES (JOAN I. QUEEN OF) descended from Charles of Anjou brother to St Lewis [A] king of France, succeeded king Robert her grandfather in the year 1343. She was already married to her cousin Andrew, son of Charles king of Hungary [B]. They reigned together for the space of three years (a), at the end of which it is pretended that she caused him to be strangled; and, if we believe scandalous reports, the cause was his not being man enough to satisfy that princess [C]. She was soon married again.

(a) Felinus Sandeus, Epitome de Regibus Siciliæ, pag. 34. See the remark [D].

[A] She was descended from Charles of Anjou, brother to St Lewis.] Charles of Anjou, created king of Naples and Sicily by the Pope in the year 1266, did not obtain the peaceable possession of that kingdom till he had defeated Manfred (1) and Conradin (2). He died in the year 1285. Charles, the lame, his son, succeeded him, and married Mary of Hungary, sister and heiress of Uladislaus IV, king of Hungary. From this marriage came several children. The eldest, known by the name of Charles Martel, was king of Hungary: the second, named Robert, was king of Naples: the third, named Philip, founded the branch of the princes of Taranto: and the fourth, named John, founded that of the dukes of Durazzo. Robert king of Naples was father of Charles duke of Calabria, who died the tenth of November 1328, and had two daughters, namely Joan, who is the subject of this article, and Mary married to Charles of Durazzo her cousin. Robert was therefore grand-father to Joan, he made her his heir, and died at Naples the nineteenth of January in the year 1343 (3). Pandolphus Collenuccio is mistaken, when he says, that Charles duke of Calabria, left three daughters (4). Tomaso Costo has corrected this mistake in his supplements to the history of that author (5).

(1) The twenty sixth of February 1266. Anselme, Hist. Genealog. pag. 336.

(2) The twenty third of August 1268. Id. ib.

(3) Taken from Father Anselm's Genealogical History of the House of France, chap. xiv.

(4) Pandolphe Collenuccio, Hist. del Regno di Napoli, lib. v, fol. m. 82. verso.

(5) Tomaso Costo, Cittadino Napoletano, Annotazioni e Supplementi, fol. m. 111.

[B] She was already married to Andrew son of Charles king of Hungary.] Here we have another mistake of Collennuccio: he pretends, that Joan married Andrew after the death of Robert, and that in obedience to the will of her deceased grandfather (6). He should have said that Robert, a little after the death of the duke of Calabria, thought of marrying his grand-daughter to one of the sons of Charobert king of Hungary, his Nephew. The proposal he made to the king of Hungary was accepted. Charobert set out for the kingdom of Naples in the year 1333, with Andrew his second son, aged about seven years. The nuptials were solemnized at Naples with great pomp on the twenty fixth of September 1333. The year following the king of Hungary returned to his dominions, leaving his son at Naples with king Robert (7). I never could yet find, in what year the marriage was consummated: perhaps, this happened too early, which might probably be the cause of that weakness which was so fatal to the husband. I have read in an Italian author, that he was but seven years old when he married the princess Joan: but I find in Father Anselm (8), that he was born the thirtieth of November 1327. He could not therefore be full six years old at the time of his marriage. There is a great deal of probability that he consummated it too early, and that having an Italian wife, something elder than himself, and consequently more ripe for marriage, he could not be able to perform the duties of matrimony without weakening himself; which gave occasion to those reproaches of effeminacy we shall take notice of in the following remark. Spondanus says, that it is reported that queen Joan began to dispise her husband, because being but nineteen years of age, he could not content her. 'Sunt porro qui dicant Joannam in contemptum viri devenisse, tum ob barbaros mores Hungariæ, tum ob ignaviam, & quod usu Veneris libidini ejus non sufficeret adolescens tunc annorum undeviginti (9). - - - - There are some also who affirm Joan's contempt of her husband, to have risen both from some of his barbarous Hungarian customs, and from his inactivity and inability to answer her desires, tho' he was then a youth of nineteen years of age.' If she complained of him when he was nineteen years old (10), could she be satisfied with him when he was but fifteen? However it be, they lived together on very ill terms in the year 1343. The queen of Hungary, the mother of Andrew, made a journey to Italy this same year, and returned much dissatisfied with the behaviour of her daughter-in-law, and the unfortunate condition in which she found her son. 'Elizabeth Regina mater Ludovici visitavit fe- (11) Felinus Sa
'dem Apostolicam, transivit per Apuliam, cui fuit ob- deus, Epitome
'vius Andreas filius suus cum Johanna Regina con- Regibus Sicilia
'forte sua: & ex Neapoli veniens fuit valde honorata pag. 69. Spo
'etiam a populo Romano. Ex Neapoli rediit in Hun- danus speaks of 'garian male contenta de moribus Johannæ nurus suæ, this journey, a
'quam vidit male tractare Andræam filium suum in ann. 1343, n
'regno Apuliæ (11). - - - - - *Queen Elizabeth, the mo- 6, quoting Th
'ther of Lewis, made a visit to the Apostolical See, she ref. part III, c
'passed through Apulia, where she was met by Andrew iv. Benfin.
'her son with queen Joan his consort; and going from Dec. 10.
'Naples to Rome, she was received in this place with (12) Brantom
'great honours. She returned thro' Naples to Hungary, Lives of Illus
'not at all pleased with the conduct of Joan her daughter- trious Women
'in-law, who she found behaved very ill to her son pag. 347.
'Andrew in the kingdom of Apulia.

(7) Tomaso Costo, Annotaz. e Supplementi, fol. 108 verso. He quotes Michael Ricci, and the two Johns Villani, the Neapolitan, and the Florentine.

(8) Hist. Genealog. de la Maison de France, pag. 343.

(9) Spondanus, ad ann. 1345, num. 4.

(10) Note, he never arrived at this age.

[C] . . . it is pretended that she caused him to be strangled . . . because he was not man enough to satisfy her.] Let us see how Brantome relates this (12) 'Joan the eldest (13) He shou
'daughter (13) of king Robert . . . had for her first hus- have said gra
'band Andrew, her first cousin (14); of whom, after daughter.
'having reigned some time together, she began (14) He is n
'to grow tired: and being both of them in the taken, he sh have said the were second cousins.

'city

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

again [D], and took for her husband Lewis son of Philip prince of Taranto (b). But she did not peaceably enjoy the pleasures of her second marriage: for Lewis king of Hungary, resolving to revenge the death of his brother, marched into the kingdom of Naples with a considerable army in the year 1348, and forced the queen to retire for safety into Provence (c), where she sold Avignon to the Pope for a very inconsiderable sum (d). Her husband, who followed her, did not observe a necessary moderation in his caresses [E], for he thereby destroyed his health, and died very soon, if we may believe Collenuccio. But it is certain this author is too hasty; for the second marriage of Joan lasted fifteen years. She was recalled into her kingdom as soon as the king of Hungary who had subdued it in few days, was returned home (e), after his having caused to be hanged Charles of Durazzo, the principal promoter of the tragical end of Andrew, and who was violently suspected to be the queen's galant (f). This princess, accompanied by her husband, re-entered Naples in the month of August 1348, and recovered part of her towns; but the king of Hungary returning in the year 1350, distressed her. The Pope ended this war to the advantage of Joan: for he obliged the king of Hungary to leave her in quiet possession of her dominions. Both she and her husband were afterwards crowned at

(b) Id. ib.

(c) Tomaso Costo, in his Supplements to Collenuccio, fol. 113, &c.

(d) Id. ib.

(e) Boche's Hist. of Provence.

(f) Era stato consapevole & consentiente alla morte d' Andreasso, e era opinione che ancor' egli havesse havuto comercio venereo con la Regina. Pandolfo Collenuccio, Historia del Regno di Napoli, lib. v, fol. m. 83.

'city of Aversa, she sent for him one night, under 'pretence of wanting to consult him about some affairs 'which had newly happened; and as he was going to 'her, and passing under a beam, he was taken and 'hanged up to the same, by order of the queen. 'It is the opinion of several, that this was occasioned 'by his not being able to satisfy her inordinate lust, 'though he was young, brisk, and in good health. 'It has also been reported, both at Naples and elsewhere, that the same lady making one day a gold 'string of more than ordinary size, her husband Andrew asked her what she was making it for; she answered, to hang him with. It seems she made so 'little account of him, that she cared not what she 'said to him; whilst he, poor easy man, took no 'notice of her threats; tho' the event proved she was 'as good as her word.' Montagne, speaking against those who so much complain that wives are not satisfied with their husbands, says, among other things, (15): Inconstancy is, perhaps, more pardonable in them than in us: they may alledge, as well as we, a common inclination to variety and novelty, and even in the second place, more than we can, that they are forced to purchase a pig in a poke. Joan queen of Naples, caused her first husband, Andrew, to be strangled at the grates of her window, with a gold and silk string twisted with her own hand, because in the matrimonial exercise, she did not find his shape, beauty, youth, and disposition, answer the expectation she had conceived of them. A little after he quotes some verses out of Martial, which are applicable to this princess (16); yet he does not say all that a modern author seems to ascribe to him. These are the words of this modern (17). 'Andrew king 'of Naples .... never saw either the rising or setting 'of the sun: that planet always found him in bed: he 'went to bed betimes, and alway rose very late: his 'wife also had but little kindness for him, because 'he could not satisfy her, says Michael Montagne, book 'III.' Note, Bramtome has only translated Pandolphus Collenuccio, whose words are these: 'La cagione per 'molti si dice che fu, perche detto Andreasso, ancor che 'fusse molto giovene, non era si bene sufficiente alle 'opere veneree, come lo sfrenato appetito della Regina haveria voluto (18).---The reason assigned by many 'was, that this same Andrew, though he was very 'young, yet he was not so well provided for venereal encounters, as the queen's loose inclinations expected to 'have found him.' Tomaso Costo (19) observes, that Collenuccio is too little versed in affairs to deserve any credit. He adds, I. That Villani the Florentine, has not related the story of the death of Andrew, but on the report of an Hungarian, who was then in the service of that unfortunate prince; II. That Petrarch has given a description exceedingly disadvantageous to the Hungarian barons, who governed the kingdom under Andrew. III. If we join this with the hatred they had for queen Joan, we shall easily conceive how much the relation of Villani may be suspected of falsity. IV. That Boccace has not said that this queen had any hand in that execution. 'Il Boccacio ne' casi 'de gli huomini illustri da tutta la colpa a congiurati, e niente alla Reina (20). - - - - Boccace, in his 'Misfortunes of Illustrious Men, charges the whole guilt on 'the conspirators, and nothing at all on the queen.' Mr Mezerai seems to me to have made choice of a much more probable medium. 'Andrew not being much 'in the good graces of Joan, and having caused himself to be crowned king by the Pope, as pretending 'the kingdom belonged to him; some conspirators 'took him away from her in the night-time, and 'hanged him at a window. Charles prince of Durazzo, who was also of the blood of the kings of 'Sicily, and had married Mary the sister of Joan, 'was the adviser and author of this infamous action. 'Joan her self was not wholly innocent. She might 'express as much sorrow as she pleased, but her tears 'and lamentations were not such strong proofs of her 'innocence; as her subsequent marriage with Lewis 'her cousin-german, a fine prince, and agreeable to 'her appetite, was of her guilt (21).'

(11) Montagne's Essays, book iii, chap. v.

(16) Deinde experta latus, mediloque simillima loro
Inguina, nec lassa flare coacta manu;
Deserit imbelles thalamos molleque maritum.
Martial. Epigr. LVII, lib. viii.

(17) Cæsar de Rochefort, Dictionaire General & Curieux, pag. 130, col. 1.

(18) Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 82, vers. Edition of Venice 1601. in 4to.

(19) Annotaz. e Scriptem. fol. 111.

(20) Ibid.

[D] She was soon married again.] King Andrew was strangled the eighteenth of September 1346. Queen Joan was big with child, and brought to bed of a son the twenty-sixth of December following (22). She married her second husband the twentieth of August 1347 (23). This is according to the calculation of Tomaso Costo. He does not make the queen's widowhood continue a full year: but it is necessary to observe, that he has falsely set down the year of king Andrew's death, and it is a matter of great wonder, that in cases of this nature, Historians are not more exact as to the circumstance of time. Villani (24) assures us, that king Andrew was strangled the eighteenth of September 1346. They who pretend that this prince was nineteen years old (25), and that he lived three years with his wife after the death of Robert (26), ought to suppose that he died in the year 1346. It is nevertheless certain, he was murdered in the year 1345. This is a demonstrative proof of it. Queen Joan his widow, some few days before her lying-in, requested the Pope to stand godfather to her child (27), to which his Holiness returned a favourable answer (28), dated from Avignon the first day of February, in the fourth year of his pontificat. Now he was created Pope the seventh of May 1342. His answer therefore must have been dated the first of February 1346; and consequently this princess, who was brought to bed on Christmas-day, as appears by another letter from the same Pope (29), was brought to bed the twenty-fifth of December 1345: her husband therefore could not be murdered in 1346. See the Acts and the Lives of the Popes who resided at Avignon; which Mr Baluze has published and embellished with very fine notes.

(21) Mezerai's Chronological Abridgment, Tom. iii, pag. 30.

(22) He died an infant in Hungary, whither king Lewis, brother of Andrew, had sent him. Tomaso Costo, ibid. fol. 112 verso.

(23) Taken from Tomaso Costo, ibid. fol. 112.

(24) Apud Tomaso, ubi supra, fol. 111.

(25) See, above, citation (9), the passage of Spondanus.

(26) See Felinus Sandeus quoted in the body of this article.

(27) See the Lives of those Popes who have resided at Avignon, published by Mr Baluze; printed at Paris in 1693, Tom. ii, pag. 689.

[E] Her second husband .... did not observe a necessary moderation in his caresses.] 'She afterwards married, and 'that very quickly, one of her cousins, son of the prince 'of Taranto, with whom she had been in love during 'her husband's life: she used him well, and lived 'with him three years in great affection; but he died 'wholly exhausted, as it was thought, by his excess 'five and too frequent engaging with the queen in 'venereal combats (30)'. The author from whom I have these words, declares himself an apologist for the queen on this head; and this is the turn he gives it (31): As for her cousin, son of the prince of Taranto, who died by exhausting himself in her service, it was no fault of her's, since it is impossible to prevent a man from getting drunk with his own wine: and if this wine must afterwards necessarily inspire a hot fit, the liquor is not to blame, but the drinker of it. I make no doubt but the great beauty of this queen, her air, her majesty, her behaviour,

(28) It is related by Mr Baluze, ibid.

(29) It is given ibid. pag. 690.

(30) Brantome, Vies des Dames Illustres, pag. 348, 349.

(31) Id. lib. pag. 353.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

at Naples on Whitſunday 1352 (g). Having loſt her huſband in the year 1362, ſhe quickly married again to the Infant of Majorca, whoſe head ſhe cauſed to be cut off as ſoon as ſhe came to know he had a miſtreſs [F]. At length in the year 1376, ſhe married again to a German prince; with whom ſhe lived very happily; but Charles of Durazzo, general of the Hungarian troops, conquered and took him priſoner: ſoon after which ſhe was forced to ſurrender herſelf. Some ſay ſhe was hanged [G], and others that ſhe was ſtifled with a cuſhion. This happened in the year 1382 (b) [H] She.

(g) Id. ib.

(b) Mezerai, Abrég. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 119.

behaviour, her charms and allurements, her bewitching embraces, and ſoft touches, might make this young man endeavour at performing more than nature would allow: but ſtill this effort was owing to himſelf, and not to her; for in theſe caſes a man is not to be forced, not even with a cudgel, as one may ſay, for all muſt come from the humour of the perſon himſelf, from his ability, his own act, and, above all, from the ardency of his paſſion. And ſuppoſe it were not ſo, how could he die better, than in the ſervice of his queen and lady, in ſhowing the heighth of his affection for her, ſince he neither ſpared pains, vigour, nor exceſs to content her, and to give her pleaſure fell a ſacrifice to love on the amorous field of battle, her bed, where he had ſo valiantly fought and expoſed his life under the banner of Venus. We read how Medor and Claridan, when they ſo furiouſly aſſaulted the camp of Charlemagne, killed a certain lord, Albert, in his tent, in the arms of his miſtreſs, where he had been entertained that night, nor could e'er a one of them forbear envying him ſo delicious a death: how much more then ought this prince to be envied, who died ſo happily in the ſervice of his queen, his wife and couſin. Collenuccio obſerves, that Lewis did not enjoy above three years, the royalty he acquired by his marriage. 'Da 'tre anni ſtette il Re Lodovico Tarentino in ſignoria, 'e eſtenuato per lo inordinato e frequente uſo delle 'coſe veneree con la Regina, che di quella ſola era 'vaga, finalmente mori; ne molto ſtette la Regina 'poi la ſua morte, che preſe il terzo marito, chia- 'mato Giacomo Tarraconeſe infante di Majorica, il 'quale era tenuto il più leggiadro e bell' huomo, che 'in quel tempo ſi trovaſſe (32). - - - - Lewis of Tarento 'continued king three years, and then died quite emaciated, 'by his inordinate and too frequent commerce with the 'queen, who was infinitely fond of him: nor did ſhe 'ſtay long after his death without taking a third huſband, 'called James of Tarragon, Infant of Majorca, who 'was eſteemed the genteeleſt and handſomeſt man in his 'time.' But Tomaſo Coſto ſhows, on this ſubject, the malice or ignorance of the author juſt mentioned (33). Lewis married Queen Joan in the year 1347: he was crowned with her at Naples in 1352, and he did not die till the year 1362: and there happened in his reign a great many conſiderable affairs wherein he acquitted himſelf like a brave prince, the particulars of them you may find in Tomaſo Coſto.

(32) Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 83, verſo.

(33) Tomaſo Coſto, ubi ſupra, fol. 115, & ſeq.

[F] She cauſed the head of her third huſband to be cut off, as ſoon as ſhe knew he had a miſtreſs.] Collenuccio does not affirm this poſitively; he contents himſelf with ſaying, it is the opinion of ſome Hiſtorians. 'Mori queſto Giacomo infra pochi anni, chi ſcrive 'per morte naturale, e chi dice che la regina li fece 'tagliar la teſta per havere uſato con un' altra femina. 'Come ſi ſia egli mori, e la regina tolſe il quarto 'marito (34). - - - - - This James died in a few years, 'ſome ſay of a natural death, others that the queen had 'his head cut off, for having kept company with another 'woman. However it be, as ſoon as he was dead, the 'queen took a fourth huſband.' Let us ſee what Brantome ſays (35) 'She married afterwards, for her third 'huſband one James of Tarencen (36), Infant of Majorca, who was one of the moſt prudent and handſomeſt perſons that country had produced: yet ſhe 'would not ſuffer him to aſſume the title of king, but 'made him content himſelf with that of duke of Calabria; for ſhe had not a mind to part with the ſupreme authority, nor could endure any rival in it: 'but both exerciſed it, and made him feel it, for 'being informed of his familiarities with another woman, unhappy as he was, ſince he could not enjoy 'a finer than his queen, ſhe cauſed his head to be ſtruck 'off; and ſo he died.' The beſt is, that though Brantome was perſuaded the queen had not put her third huſband to death (37); yet he has made a long apology for the ſuppoſed murther. As for her third huſband, ſays he (38), the Infant of Majorca, whom ſhe cauſed to be beheaded for violating her bed, and forſaking her for another woman, though ſome hiſtorians ſay he died a natural death; ſuppoſing it be true, had ſhe not reaſon to puniſh the adultery, ſince he had no more right or authority to commit it againſt her, than ſhe had againſt him? For the law of God is equally binding to both, and no leſs ſevere to the huſband than the wife: Moreover, if he had ſurpriſed her in ſuch an act, what would he not have done to her? I appeal to the jealous, and ſuch perſons as are nice in that particular. Although he was not abſolute king, nor had any power, but what he derived from her, yet I do not doubt but in ſuch a caſe he would have murthered her; and therefore ſhe was in the right to uſe her royal and abſolute authority, in executing that juſtice on him, which ſhe herſelf muſt have ſuffered, had ſhe been the offender. And if we ſhould lay aſide all theſe reaſons, what judge could be ſo favourable, as not to condemn this unfortunate delinquent, for violating his faith to the moſt beautiful queen and greateſt princeſs in her time; and to forſake her for another, who was not in the leaſt particular to be compared with her? Wretch that he was, like one who might drink his fill out of a clear and pure fountain, yet chooſes to quench his thirſt in a naſty and muddy pond.

(34) Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 83, verſo.

(35) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 349.

(36) The Italian words of Collenuccio, chiamato Giacomo Tarraconeſe, ſhould have been rendered called James of Tarragona, that is, of Arragon.

(37) He relates, as a fact, which he believes, what Froiſſard ſays concerning the natural death of the infant of Majorca.

(38) Brantome, ibid. pag. 355.

[G] Some ſay ſhe was hanged.] Charles Durazzo, having made himſelf maſter of the kingdom, and of the perſon of queen Joan, informed the king of Hungary of the ſtate of affairs, and deſired to know his pleaſure, what he ſhould do with the queen. The king of Hungary, 'ſent to Charles two of his barons to con- 'gratulate him upon his victory: and to let him know 'his pleaſure was, he ſhould carry the queen to the 'place where ſhe had ſtrangled her huſband Andrew; 'and there, in the ſame place, and after the ſame manner, to cauſe her to be hanged and ſtrangled; which 'was accordingly done: and her dead body, being carried to the nunnery of St Clara at Naples, after it had 'remained there three days, was buried; and the two 'barons having ſeen this execution performed, returned to carry the news to their maſter. Afterwards was beheaded Mary, the queen's ſecond ſiſter, 'a leud woman, and charged with having a hand in 'the death of Andrew. This Mary, was wife to Robert of Artois, and beloved by Boccace, who flouriſhed 'at that time: upon whom he wrote thoſe two excel- 'lent books in his mother-tongue, intituled, Flam- 'metta and Philocopo (39).' This is the tranſlation which Brantome gives of the Italian of Collenuccio: but Tomaſo Coſto obſerves, I. That Collenuccio is the only author who ſays the queen was hanged (40). II. That the name of the earl of Artois's wife was Joan, and not Mary; III. That ſhe was niece, and not ſiſter to this queen; IV. That ſhe who was celebrated, and beloved by Boccace, was neither niece nor ſiſter to Joan, but natural daughter of king Robert. 'La Maria per cui ſcriſſe il Boccac. fu figliovola ba- 'ſtarda del Re Ruberto avanti ch'ei fuſſe Re: vedilo 'chiaramente eſpreſſo nel principio del Filocopo (41). 'That Mary of whom Boccace writes, was the baſtard- 'daughter of king Robert, before he was king: You 'may find this clearly expreſſed in the beginning of the 'Filocopo.'

(39) Ibid. pag. 351.

(40) In quanto al morire della Reina Giovanna chi dice ch' ell' fu ſtrangulata, e chi affogata: ma impercara le dice ſolo il Collenuccio. Tomaſo Coſto, ubi ſupra, fol. 121.

(41) Tomaſo Coſto, ubi ſupra.

[H] This happened in the year 1382.] This cannot be denied: it is therefore a little ſtrange her obſequies were not celebrated in Avignon, by order of the Pope, before the fifth of May 1385; and that the notification of her death was not ſent to the inhabitants of Marſeilles by the ſame Pope before that time. Mr Baluze had reaſon to wonder at this. I inſert the extract which he gives us of the journal of John Le Fevre, biſhop of Chartres, with his obſervation upon it. 'The fifth day the Pope cauſed a maſs of ſolemn Re- 'quiem to be ſaid for Joan queen of Sicily, put to death 'by Charles de Durazzo. The maſs was ſaid by the 'cardinal of Coſenza; who, at the ſame time, preached 'an excellent ſermon upon the occaſion. The king was 'preſent, and was afterwards conducted home by the 'cardinals of Coſenza and Ambrun. Sed mirum eſt 'tum

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

She was about fifty eight years of age. There are ſome Hiſtorians who give her great commendations, and deny moſt of the facts I have been relating. See her Elogium in one of the books of Father Maimbourg (i). Conſult alſo Brantome who has done all he could to excuſe her [I], though he faithfully relates the ſatirical reports which were ſpread of her: he makes mention of a book wherein ſhe is compared to Mary Stuart queen of Scotland [K]; nor has he forgot to inſert the ſhort, but thundering, anſwer ſhe received from the king of Hungary [L]. No great ſtreſs ought to be laid on the favourable ſentence it is pretended ſhe obtained of the Pope [M]; for if ſhe obtained it of Clement

(i) Schiſm of the Weſt. Lib. ii, pag. 150, Edit. of Holland.

' tum primum in his regionibus auditum nuntium de ' morte iſtius Reginæ quam conſtat anno ſaltem mille- ' ſimo CCCLXXXII. occiſam fuiſſe die XXII. menſis ' Maji. Et tamen primum auditum hinc liquet, quod ' paulo poſt verba quæ mox deſcripſimus ex diario ' Epiſcopi Carnotenſis ſequitur: - - - But it is ſurpri- ' zing that this ſhould be the firſt account in theſe parts of ' the death of that queen, who was undoubtedly put to ' death on the twenty-ſecond of May, in the year, at the ' lateſt, 1382. And yet that this was the firſt account is ' evident from hence, that a little after the words I have ' quoted out of the journal of the biſhop of Chartres, there ' follows: alſo it was determined to ſend a ſolemn meſ- ' ſage to Marſeilles to ſignify the death of the queen; and ' that there ſhould be a ſermon (42).'

(42) Stephanus Baluzius, in Notis ad Vitas Paparum Avenionenſium, pag. 1257, 1258.

[I] Brantome has done all he could to excuſe her.] See (43) what he ſays concerning the death of the ſecond and third huſband; and add to it what he obſerves concerning that of the firſt, and her many marriages. For as to reproaching her with having four huſbands, and on that account to believe her unchaſte, it cannot be, we ought by no means to do it, ſince marriage is good and holy, having been ordained of GOD: and farther, it was much better for her to marry than to burn, or what is worſe, to proſtitute and abandon herſelf to firſt one, and then another, as a great many queens, princeſſes, and Ladies of quality have done, and ſtill do, both maids and widows, who are continually purſuing amours and intrigues with thoſe in their kingdom they like beſt, in preference to matrimony, chuſing to ſly this allowed and holy ordinance, rather than whoredom, tho' prohibited; which queen Joan never practiſed; for how much ſoever ſhe might burn with a deſire after the fleſh, yet ſhe always ſatiſfied it lawfully with her huſbands. As for Andrew, her huſband, whom ſhe put to death, it was ſaid, he was a drunken, malicious, and dangerous Hungarian, while he acted the part of a ſimple and weak man, as ſuch ſort of people are ſooner inclined to be, than thoſe of greater ability and reputation, and that he would have murdered her, to ſecure the throne to himſelf; but ſhe was before-hand with him, and did that kindneſs for him, which he had deſigned for her, as the law of nature allows, that it is better to get the ſtart than to be overtaken, and eſpecially in matters where life is concerned (44).

(43) Above, remark [E], citation (31); and remark [F], citation (38).

(44) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 352, 353.

[K] Brantome makes mention of a book, wherein ſhe is compared to Mary Stuart.] ' I have ſeen a book printed ' in England, intituled, A Defence of the lawful Sen- ' tence, and moſt juſt Execution of the deceaſed Mary ' Stuart, late queen of Scotland. In this book there ' are ſeveral compariſons made between queen Joan of ' Naples, and the queen of Scotland, as well in re- ' gard to their lives, manners, and amours, as to ' the manner of their deaths. They are to be ſeen ' painted by the ſame Crayon, ſo that nothing is ſo ' like as theſe two, according to this author (45).' He gives an abſtract of the parallel of theſe two queens, which is divided into twelve heads.

(45) Ibid. pag. 380.

[L] The . . . . anſwer ſhe received from the king of Hungary.] It was this: ' Thy former diſorderly life, ' the ſovereignty of thy kingdom, which thou haſt ' always kept to thy ſelf, thy not proſecuting the ' murderers of thy huſband, thy marrying ſoon af- ' ter to another man, together with the excuſe thou ' afterwards ſenteſt me, are to me plain indications ' that thou wert an acceſſary and accomplice in thy ' huſband's murder (46).' They who have a mind to ſee it in the Latin, may read what follows: Johanna, inordinata vita præcedens; retentio poteſtatis in regno; neglecta vindicta: vir alter ſuſceptus; & excuſatio ſub- ſequens; necis viri tui te probant fuiſſe participem & conſortem (47).

(46) Id. ib. pag. 348.

(47) Felinus Sandeus, de Regibus Siciliæ, pag. 35. Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 83.

[M] The favourable ſentence . . . . ſhe obtained of the Pope.] We ſhall cite the words of Father Maimbourg; ' As to the death of her firſt huſband, Andrew ' of Hungary, which many have imputed to her, ' ſhe has fully acquitted herſelf of it, as well by ' the ſevere juſtice ſhe made the murderers undergo, ' not one of whom offered to accuſe her while under ' the greateſt torments, as by her eloquent apology ' which ſhe made in a full conſiſtory before Pope ' Clement VI, all the ambaſſadors from the Chriſtian ' princes being preſent, with that energy and force, ' that the holy Father afterwards declared her, in an au- ' thentic act, not only innocent of that crime, but that ' there could not be the leaſt ſuſpicion of her having ' any hand in it (48).' This Hiſtorian quotes nobody as to this particular fact. Obſerve that Brantome, who copies from Froiſſard the harangue which this queen made to the Pope (49), with the Pope's anſwer, ſays not a word of the ſentence of abſolution. I ſhall give you the reaſon preſently; he contents himſelf with ſaying (50), that the Pope engaged himſelf to protect the heir of this princeſs. Obſerve likewiſe, that the harangue, which Froiſſard puts into the mouth of queen Joan, contains divers falſities. I. That Joan was daughter to Robert. II. That ſhe was not married to Andrew of Hungary, till after the death of Robert. III. That ſhe had never a child by that prince. IV. That Andrew died young at Aix in Provence. V. That her ſecond huſband became a priſoner to the king of Hungary, and died in that kingdom, being carried thither by that king. And, VI. That the daughter which ſhe had by her ſecond huſband, and whom ſhe married to the earl of Artois, died in priſon with her huſband; and that afterwards queen Joan, and her fourth huſband, Otho of Brunſwic, entered into a treaty of peace, whereby they recovered their liberty, and the kingdom of Naples, by giving up Apulia and Calabria to prince Charles of Durazzo, their conqueror. All theſe are very great falſities, as may appear by what I have already ſaid in my former remarks, and what I am going to ſay. The two daughters which queen Joan had by her ſecond huſband, died infants. The wife of the earl of Artois was niece to this queen, being the daughter of Charles of Durazzo, whom the king of Hungary put to death, and of Mary ſiſter of Joan. This Mary had been a long time dead, when her ſiſter was ſtrangled, ſo that Mr Mezarai is miſtaken, when he aſſures us, that queen Joan and her ſiſter Mary, ſurrendered themſelves to Charles of Durazzo, who ordered them both to be ſtrangled in priſon (51). The earl of Artois, and Joan his wife, died the twentieth of July 1387, as their epitaph (52) ſhows, and conſequently they muſt have ſurvived queen Joan. It is alſo falſe, that this queen enjoyed either her liberty or kingdom, after ſhe had ſurrendered herſelf to the duke of Durazzo. We muſt conclude therefore, that her harangue to Pope Clement, is a mere forgery of Froiſſard; and that Brantome laid a ſnare for us, into which he fell firſt himſelf, when he ſays, Let us then believe Froiſſard, who has made this queen confeſs herſelf to the Pope, and who has been curious to collect her own words, pronounced from her own mouth, by which he plainly deſigned to make her life known (53), we ſhall conclude by relating what he ſays preſently after: I do not ſay but Froiſſard touches on ſome paſſages of her life, as the death of Andrew, and ſome other little matters, as her amours, and the like; but however ſhe was by no means ſo wicked and debauched as that fine fooliſh Neapolitan Hiſtorian would make her.

(48) Maimbourg, Schiſm of the Weſt. Lib. ii, pag. 151, 152, ad ann. 1382.

(49) She humbled herſelf greatly before Pope Clement at Fondi, confeſſing herſelf to him, and diſcovering to him all her exploits and tricks fairly and without reſerve. (Theſe words raiſe a great many wanton ideas). Froiſſard makes uſe of theſe very words, and diſcovered her ſecrets to him, and afterwards began her harangue; which I ſhall deliver in the ſame terms as the author preſents them, without altering them. Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 359.

(50) Ibid. pag. 363.

(51) Mezerai, Chronol. Abridg. Tom. iii, pag. 119. Brantome is in the ſame error: ſee, above, remark [G], citation (39).

(52) It is to be ſeen in a chapel of the church of St Laurence at Naples, in theſe words: Hic jacent corpora Illuſtrium Dominorum Domini Roberti de Artois, & Domine Johanne Duracii, conjugum, qui obierunt anno Domini MCCCLXXXVII, die XX menſ. Julii. Tomaſo Coſto, Annotaz. & Supplem. fol. 121.

The better to comprehend the confuſed relation of Froiſſard; we muſt obſerve that he ſuppoſes queen Joan went to wait on the Pope at Fondi; and that it was there ſhe made him that harangue. But it is certain Clement VII left Italy in the year 1379, to go and reſide at Avignon. How then could queen Joan make an harangue to him at Fondi, after ſhe was made a priſoner, which was in the year 1381. For the reſt, it is not to be wondered at, that we ſhould not find the ſentence of abſolution in Froiſſard, ſince it is plain, he pretended only to ſpeak of ſuch matters as paſſed

(53) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 363.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ment VI, it may be objected ſhe gave him A obtained it of Clement VII, it may be ſaid l for the good reputation of thoſe princes wl neither condemn her himſelf not ſuffer her t Pope did not treat her ſo kindly, he declai crimes (k), and principally for taking the with whom Boccace was in love [N], as they are miſtaken; and that Froiſſard has following article may be ſeen who were th revenged in Hungary, if we may believe

(k) In the year 1379. Per ſententia privè del regno di Napoli la Regina Giovanna per molti delitti, e maſſimamente per haver preſtato luogo e favore alla ſciſma, & havere preſtato obedientia a Clemente VI. Collenuccio, ubi ſupra, fol. 84, verſo.

paſſed between Clement VII, and queen Joan. Now it was by Clement VI that ſhe was abſolved, as you may find hereafter: but all this is very confuſed. Brantome ſays, we may read in the hiſtory of Anjou, that in the great ſchiſm of the church . . . among other princes who declared for Clement, were the king of France, his brothers, and good queen Joan . . . . who went to viſit Pope Clement; by whom, and all the Cardinals, ſhe was honourably received . . . . And that after ſhe had remained ſome time at his Holineſs's court, ſhe requeſted he would be pleaſed to hear her confeſſion, and abſolve her from her ſins, which the good Pope willingly and kindly granted, as it is certain ſo very agreeable a requeſt was not to be denied to one who ſo highly deſerved a ſecret, auricular, and ocular, confeſſion, and a penance light and eaſy to be born. After this confeſſion made in preſence of his Holineſs, and the ſacred college of cardinals, the ſaid queen . . . . . remonſtrated the many ill turns, and inſtances of ingratitude ſhe had met with from her nephew Charles of Durazzo; and that he had many times ſought her life to enjoy her kingdom. She therefore deſiring to obſerve the laſt will of her father and grandfather, did, in preſence of all the nobility there aſſembled, reſign and yield up into the hands of his Holineſs, as well her kingdoms of Sicily and Naples, as her duchies of Apulia, Calabria and the earldom of Provence. All this agrees with the words of Froiſſard. The Pope having accepted this, thro' the ill advice of his council, ſhe adopted Lewis of Anjou for her ſon; to whom were given charters and authentic letters; but the Pope, however, had a deed of conveyance of the county of Avignon from her to himſelf . . . . This being done, the queen took her leave of his Holineſs, and returned to her kingdom, where Charles of Durazzo, having ſome time after taken her priſoner, cauſed her to be ſecretly ſtifled between two feather-beds, being informed of the adoption ſhe had made (54). If this relation were to be allowed, it would incline one to believe, that the fact which Father Maimbourg ſpeaks of, belongs to the pontificate of Clement VII, and not to that of Clement VI. But I would not adviſe any body to rely either on the account Brantome has taken from Froiſſard, or that which he borrows from the hiſtory of Anjou. It is impoſſible to reconcile them, they are full of confuſion and uncertainty: let us therefore hold to what I am going to ſay. It is certain that queen Joan having made her apology, in the year 1348, before the Pope and cardinals, was declared innocent of the murder of her huſband (55), yet this declaration was but ſlightly expreſſed, and there is great probability it proceeded from the paſſion the Pope had to acquire Avignon. In ſhort, the ſame affair having been brought in queſtion in three years after, the queen was obliged to confeſs ſhe had been induced by witchcraft not to love her huſband, which gave encouragement to ſeveral perſons to conſpire againſt him. The judges being remarkably inclined to mercy, declared that ſhe ought not to be eſteemed guilty of this unhappy enchantment, nor of it's conſequences. When recourſe is had to ſuch ſort of contrivances in accuſations of this nature, it is a ſign the criminal has but a very bad cauſe. It is plain, the Pope, who was choſen judge in this matter, had a mind to preſerve to her, at all events, the kingdom of Naples, which he could not have done, unleſs he had found her innocent; for the truce he had mediated between her and the king of Hungary, in the year 1350, imported, that if Joan were found guilty, ſhe ſhould ſurrender her kingdom to that monarch, and that he ſhould quit all pretenſions to it, if ſhe were declared innocent (56). Conſider well this whole paſſage of Spondanus. ' Cum remiſſa ex pacto Cauſa Johannæ Re- ' ginæ ad judicium Sedis Apoſtolicæ, ægre inveniretur ' modus aſſerendæ ejus innocentiæ, nec tamen juſtum

(54) Ibid. pag. 365, &c.

(55) See Spondanus, ad ann. 1348, num. 3. He quotes John Villani, lib. xii, cap. cxiv. Matthew Villani, cap. xviii, and Summonte, lib. iii, cap. iv.

(56) Spondanus, ad ann. 1350, num. 6, pag. 505. He quotes Matthew Villani, lib. i, cap. lxxxix, xci, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google falls into some errors [O]. To conclude, the barbarity committed upon the unhappy Andrew, was a plain indication he had rendered himself odious to others besides his wife [P].

'authors, poets, and courtiers; to boast those favours 'they have never enjoyed, tho' I have known some Poets, 'who have had favours conferred on them (63), which 'I design to speak of hereafter.'

(63) See the Continuation of the General Criticism upon Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, Letter xxvii, pag. 590, & seq.

[O] When Brantome speaks of the revenging of the death of Joan, he falls into some errors.] This is what he says, 'also God, the just avenger of innocent 'deaths, revenged her's, both upon the Hungarian, 'and upon Charles of Durazzo, whom Margaret, 'eldest sister of queen Joan, and grand-daughter of 'king Robert, whilst he was at Buda, where the 'queen invited him to a banquet, with much dissem-'bled kindness, during his drinking a glass of wine, 'caused to be struck in the nape of the neck with a 'hatchet, which thus dispatched him (64).' The confusion in this sentence, does not prevent our seeing clearly, that Brantome affirms four things: 1. That Charles Durazzo was killed by order of the queen of Hungary. 2. That this queen's name was Margaret. 3. That she was eldest sister to queen Joan. 4. That she was grand-daughter to king Robert. Now these are four falsities; besides, in the last, Brantome contradicts himself (65). When Charles of Durazzo went into Hungary, after he had put queen Joan to death he there found these two queens, namely, the widow and daughter of the deceased king Lewis. Now the widow's name was Elizabeth, daughter of the king of Bosnia, and the daughter's Mary (66). They had both consented, that Charles should be crowned king of Hungary; but some time after, the widow gave orders to have him murdered. 'Fu coronato in 'Alba Regale di volonta della Regina Isabetta, & 'del Re Maria sua figliovola, le quali ogni loro ra-'gione li rinuntiarono; ma poi andato a Buda, e con 'finte blanditie della Regina invitato ad un convito, 'mentre bevea li fu dato d'una secure nella coppa per 'ordinatione della Regina, e fu morto dell' anno 1386, 'a di 3 di Giugno (67). - - - He was crowned in Stul 'Weissenburg, or Alba Regalis, by the consent of queen 'Elizabeth, and of king Mary, her daughter, who 'both of them renounced all their right to him; but 'afterwards going to Buda, and being invited to an 'entertainment by the dissembled kindness of the queen, 'while he was drinking he received a blow of a hatchet 'on his neck, of which he died the third day of June, 'in the year 1386.' This is what we learn from the author, whom Brantome follows. From whence we may infer another falsity of Brantome; for it was by no means to revenge the death of Joan, that the queen of Hungary caused Charles of Durazzo to be murdered. She proposed only to gratify her own ambition, and that of king Mary. Let us observe by the way, that Urban VI, who had many ill offices done him on the part of Charles, and who, for that reason, excommunicated and deposed him in the year 1385, was wonderfully pleased with the news of his death. It is said he contemplated with a great deal of pleasure, the instrument just newly stained with the blood of that prince (68). His death did not long remain unrevenged; for a lord of his party having surprized the two queens in the country, caused queen Elizabeth to be thrown into the river (69). It is an error to believe the world grows every day worse and worse (70); since, it is certain, the age, wherein we live (71) has not been able to furnish us in the West a series of enormities in a few years, comparable to those which were committed, between the years 1345 and 1390.

(64) Brantome, ubi supra, pag. 364, 365.

(65) He had said, that queen Joan was daughter of king Robert.

(66) It was she whom the Hungarians called king Mary. Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 88, verso.

(67) Collenuccio, ibid. fol. 89.

(68) Exultasse ferunt Urbanum ad nuncium mortis, cultrumque quo ictus fuerat ad se delatum, recenti sanguine rubentem, saevissimæ confectissimæ. Papirii, apud Pithœum Scriptores de Regibus Siciliæ, pag. 36.

(69) Maimbourg, Schism of the West. Lib. iii, pag. 223. Hegesippus Thuringus and Bonfinius.

(70) Rampalea composed a discourse in opposition to this crime.

(71) That is to say, the XVIIth.

[P] Andrew . . . . . had rendered himself odious to others besides his wife.] There are some Historians, who say, that his threatning to punish severely some lords of his court, who had ill behaved themselves; to punish them, I say, severely, as soon as he should be crowned, caused those offenders to conspire against him. Occasio autem hujus sceleris specialiter fuisse dicitur, quia ipse, tanquam virtuosus & audax, verbo & facto monstrabat se velle punire aliquos quos videbat criminosos & malè se habentes, quam primum per coronationem plenum dominium dicti regni ad ipsum pervenisset. De quo malè sibi conscii & merito formidantes cogitaverunt adversus eum modo præmisso sibi ipsis præcavere (72). But these conspirators must needs have been animated by a personal hatred, besides the desire of preventing their own punishment, by their proceeding to such a heighth of inhumanity. They tormented him barbarously in all his members, and were so far from sparing those we forbear to name, that they exercised their greatest cruelties upon them. The informations Clement VI, caused to be exhibited against the murderers, contain so many barbarous particulars, that they cannot be read without horror. 'Statim cùm 'per eos vocatus venit ad gayphum vel deambulato-'rium quod est ante cameram, aliqui posuerunt ma-'nus ad os, ut clamare non posset, & ita impresserunt 'illos ganteletos ferreos circa os ejus, quod etiam 'vestigia & characteres apparebant post mortem. Alii 'vero funem in collo posuerunt ut strangularent eum, 'sicut etiam characteres post mortem ostendebant. 'Alii vero receperunt eum per genitalia, & adeo 'traxerunt quod multi qui dicebant se vidisse retule-'runt mihi quod transcendebant genua. Alii capillos 'de capite evulserunt. Alii eum in pratum trahendo 'projecerunt. Alii dicunt quod cum fune cum qua 'eum strangulaverant eum quasi suspensum in pratum 'projecerunt. Alii super cum cum genibus ascende-'runt, & eum usque ad compassionem cordis oppres-'serunt. Et audivi quod etiam de hoc vestigia exte-'rius apparebant. Fuit etiam nobis dictum quod vo-'lebant eum projicere in puteum profundum, sicut 'projectus fuerat ille sanctus Jeremias in foveam, & 'postea dicere quod iverat extra regnum de consilio 'aliquorum fidelium sibi, qui disposuerunt postea ca-'pere & mittere Regi Ungariæ captivos ac si scirent 'ubi esset. Et perfecissent, nisi nutrix dicti Regis 'ociùs occurrisset (73). - - - - *As soon as he was come, 'according to their message, as far as the gallery leading 'to the chamber, some clapped their hands before his 'mouth to prevent his crying out, and pressed his face 'so hard with their steel gauntlets, that the marks and 'impressions of them remained visible after his death. 'Others put a rope about his neck, and strangled him; 'the marks of which, were also to be seen after his 'death. Others laid hold of his genitals, and pulled 'them with such violence, that, as I have been in-'formed by several who say they saw them, they hung 'down below his knees. Others tore the hair from his 'head. Others dragged him out and threw him into a 'field. Others say, that he was thrown into the field 'with the rope he was strangled with, as if he had 'been hung up. Others got upon him with their knees, 'and bruised his breast with all their force. And I 'have heard, there also appeared external marks of this 'violence. It has been likewise reported to us, that they 'intended to have thrown him into a deep well, as the 'prophet Jeremiah was into a pit; and afterwards, to 'give out that he was gone out of the kingdom by the 'advice of his favourites, who they determined afterwards 'to take and send captives to the king of Hungary, as 'if they had known where he was. And that they had 'executed this design, if the nurse of the said king had 'not surprized them.'

(72) Prima Vita Clementis VI, pag. 246, Edit. Baluzianæ 1693.

(73) Clem. VI, in Collatione facta contra interfectores Andreæ, apud Baluzium, Notis ad Vitas Paparum Avenionensium, pag. 860.

NAPLES (JOAN II QUEEN OF) descended from Charles of Anjou, brother of St Lewis [A], was the daughter of Charles of Durazzo, who caused queen Joan I, to be

HISTORY of the Branch of Durazzo.

[A] She was descended from Charles of Anjou, brother of St Lewis.] The relation was thus. She was daughter of Charles of Durazzo the third of that name, who was son of Lewis of Durazzo, count of Gravina, whose father was John of Durazzo, brother of Robert king of Naples, and son of Charles the Lame, son and successor of Charles of Anjou, brother of St Lewis (1). It is easy to apprehend by this Genealogical account, that John of Durazzo, brother of Robert, founded the branch of Durazzo: he died the fifth of April 1335, leaving three sons, Charles, Lewis, and Robert.

(1) See Father Anselme's Genealogical History of the House of France, pag. 354, &c.

Charles married Mary sister of Joan, the first of that name, queen of Naples: he was both adviser and actor

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(e) Corrafi Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Geneal. de la Maiſon de France, pag. 358, who calls him duke of Auſtraſia.

be put to death. She was born in 1371, and the year 1403. She became a widow in 1406 (b).
dying without lawful iſſue in 1414, ſhe ſucce following was married to James of Bourbon.
her ſcandalous life, deprived her both of he actor in the death of king Andrew (2). He was made lieutenant-general, and governour of the kingdom of Naples, when Joan retired into Provence, upon the coming of Lewis king of Hungary into Italy (3). He was not able to oppoſe the Hungarians, but was vanquiſhed, taken, and beheaded (4). Others (5) ſay, that he made no reſiſtance but went over with other lords, to pay homage to the king of Hungary; and, that the king having convicted him of the death of Andrew, firſt put him to death, and afterwards hanged him. The greateſt evidence againſt him was a letter he had written to the count of Artois: 'Dicendo al Duca 'di Durazzo che gli moſtraſſe il luogo, dovè fu 'morto ſuo fratello. E benche il Duca negaſſe di 'ſaperlo il Re lo convinſe con moſtrargli una lettera 'ſcritta da eſſō Duca a Carlo d'Artois, intorno al 'trattato della detta morte, e chiamandolo traditore 'lo fece in quell' inſtante occidere e buttar dal me-'deſimo verone, ond'era ſtato buttato Andrea (6). '- - - - - The king commanding the duke of Durazzo, to 'ſhew him the place where his brother was killed, which 'the duke pretending to be ignorant of, he convicted him 'by producing a letter under his own hand to Charles of 'Artois, containing the particulars of that murder, and 'calling him traitor, ordered him that inſtant to be put 'to death, and expoſed in the very ſame place where An-'drew had been thrown.' Charles of Durazzo left no ſon, whatever Collenuccio pretends, but only four daughters.

(2) Mezerai's Chronological Abridgment, Tom. iii, pag. 30.

(3) Anſelme, ubi ſupra, pag. 355.

(4) Collenuccio, lib. v, fol. 83.

(5) Tomaſo Coſto, in his Supplements to Collenuccio, fol. 112, verſo, who quotes Matthew Villani.

(6) Id. ib.

Lewis of Durazzo, his brother, count of Gravina, was impriſoned in the caſtle dell' Ovo at Naples, by order of queen Joan I, on a ſuſpicion ſhe had, that he intended to invade her dominions, and had poiſon given him of which he died in the year 1362. He was buried in the monaſtery of the Nuns of Santa Croce at Naples. Some place his death in the month of June, and others on the twenty-ſecond of July (7). He left one ſon named Charles, who retired to the court of Lewis king of Hungary; to whom he did very great ſervices, being general of his army againſt the Venetians. He happily ended that war, which procured him the honourable ſirname, de la Pace. It was he who was ſent to Naples to expel queen Joan, when the king of Hungary was ſollicited by Pope Urban to take poſſeſſion of that kingdom. Charles was under infinite obligations to this queen; ſhe had brought him up tenderly in her court, as her own ſon; ſhe had married him to the princeſs Margaret her niece; ſhe deſigned him for her ſucceſſor, and even at that very time had his children with her. Yet the execrable ambition of reigning made him ungrateful, and broke thro' all thoſe ties. He was crowned king of Sicily at Rome, in the beginning of the year 1381. He afterwards marched for Naples; where, having been received without reſiſtance, he beſieged the queen in the caſtle dell' Ovo, and forced her at laſt to ſurrender herſelf, after having defeated and taken, Otho of Brunſwic, her huſband, and cauſed her to be ſtrangled in priſon in the year 1382 (8). In the mean time Lewis of Anjou, brother of Charles V, king of France, had been adopted by queen Joan, and crowned at Avignon by Pope Clement VII. The news of the tragical death of this queen, did not hinder him from leading a fine army into the kingdom of Naples, to drive Charles thence; but he was ſo unfortunate, that famine deſtroyed his troops, and he died of grief in the year 1384 (9). Charles, by this means, remained in quiet poſſeſſion of that kingdom. He afterwards fell out with the Pope; but having been invited by the Hungarians, who were diſſatisfied with the government of the daughter and widow of their king, he went into Hungary, and was crowned by the archbiſhop of Gran. He was ſoon after taken off by the contrivance of the queen-dowager, as has before been ſaid (10). His ſon, Ladiſlaus, ſucceeded him, and vanquiſhed Lewis II, duke of Anjou, who endeavoured to maintain his father's right. This Ladiſlaus was a brave and bold prince, and had he lived longer might have done great things. He died the ſixteenth of Auguſt in the year 1414, aged thirty-eight years (11). We ſhall ſee hereafter (12), how he was put to

(7) Father Anſelme, ubi ſupra, pag. 356, 357.

(8) Mezerai's Chronological Abridgment, Tom. iii, pag. 118.

(9) Ibid. pag. 128.

(10) In the remark [O] of the foregoing article.

(11) Anſelme, ubi ſupra, pag. 359.

(12) In the remark [E], in the paſſage of Mezerai.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

But he was not politic enough to maintain himself against the stratagems of this princess [C]: for she got the better of him, and prosecuted her advantage so closely, that she obliged him to return to France, where he turned Monk (c). The queen having rid her self of such a husband, soon found her self involved in new troubles; for she had so far disobliged the brave Sforza of Cotignola, that he sollicited Lewis of Anjou to make a conquest of the kingdom of Naples, and he put himself at the head of the malecontents. Pope Martin V favoured Lewis of Anjou, who laid siege to Naples both by sea and land, and had certainly made himself master of it, had not Alphonsus of Arragon sent a powerful succour to the queen. He gave her this assistance on account of her having promised to adopt him. She was as good as her word; but she was so ill treated by this ungrateful prince that she revoked her adoption, and transferred it to Lewis of Anjou (d). This prince reduced all the cities which held for Alphonsus, and behaved himself so well towards the queen, that when he died in the month of November 1434 (e), the grief she conceived for the loss of him was the occasion of her own death not long after (f) [D]. She appointed for her heir Renatus of Anjou (g), who had not a force sufficient to possess himself of the kingdom. And therefore left his descendants only a bare title. He was better qualified to make a quiet state happy, than to reduce a rebellious one; and spent more time in painting than in preparing for an expedition [E]. The true

(c) Brantome, in his Lives of Illustrious Women, pag. 388, & seq. rallies him severely.

(d) See Father Maimbourg's History of the great Schism, lib. vi.

(e) And not 1431, as Mezerai says in his Chronological Abridgment, ad hunc ann.

(f) The second of February 1435.

(g) He was brother of Lewis.

queen was married to a very handsome and virtuous knight of the blood royal of France, and of the house of Bourbon, both by name and arms, called Messire James of Bourbon, Count de la Marche (18). The latter says, 'elesse Giacomo di Narbona Provenzale, Conte della 'Marca, e di stirpe regale di Francia ancor' egli (19). '---She pitched upon James of Narbonne in Provence, 'count de la Marche, and also of the blood royal of 'France.' They both speak of the same man, and draw his character in a very plain manner; all the difference consists in this, the Italian author makes him of Provence, and calls him James of Narbonne. He was certainly mistaken in the first respect; but as to the last, I believe it is only an error of the press, in putting Narbona for Borbone. If the Printer of Collenuccio did not make this mistake, it might very probably be found in the authors which Collenuccio copied, and that either thro' the negligence of the Transcribers or Printers. We must not quit this subject without rectifying two mistakes of Mezerai. Although Joan, says he (20), was first married to James of Bourbon, son of John count de la Marche, yet was she nevertheless governed by the counsels of Pandolfo Alopo, and Mutio Sforza, the stock of the Sforza's dukes of Milan, who were said to be her friends. This is to suppose, 1. That Joan had never been married before she was wife to James of Bourbon; and, 2. That she married another husband, after she had lost this. Now these suppositions are false. If I were to take notice of the incorrectness of his stile, I should make a third remark on this Historian; for the order of his words would incline us to believe, that the Sforza's dukes of Milan were esteemed friends of queen Joan.

(18) Olivier de la Marche, Memoires, lib. i, cap. i, pag. m. 76.

(19) Collenuccio, ubi supra, fol. 93, vers.

(20) Mezerai, History of France, Tom. ii, pag. 627.

[C] He was not politic enough to maintain himself against the stratagems of this princess.] 'She played 'her part so well, that one Giulio Cesare of Capua, 'who had formerly offended her, to make his peace, 'offered to kill her husband James; she, not less 'crafty than malicious, took hold of this occasion, 'as well to revenge herself on Giulio, as to regain 'the confidence of her husband, and to recover her 'former liberty. Seeming therefore to hearken to 'the proposal, she bid him consider well the business, 'and do it discreetly and safely, and put him off for 'eight days. In the mean while, acquainting the 'king with the whole matter, she concealed him 'with some of his most faithful domestics well 'armed in her closet; and the eighth day being 'come, she ordered Giulio to come privately into 'her chamber, where she made him repeat to her 'loud enough to be heard, his whole contrivance, 'and the manner of executing it; all which James 'having understood rushed out upon him, and had 'him publickly beheaded, and at the same time took 'occasion from hence to express the highest opinion 'and regard for the queen, as the most loyal of 'wives. Così si pigliano le volpe, says the Italian 'proverb, This is the way to catch the fox. Soon after therefore he set the queen at liberty, and gave 'her leave to keep her court as formely, and enjoy 'herself, and govern every thing at her pleasure; 'by which means, being one day at a banquet pre-'pared for him on purpose; she seeing her opportu-'nity, contrived the matter so well, by the assistance 'of her friends and accomplices, that she grew the 'strongest, and, with great acclamations of the people, 'and of some of the grandees, she caused the French 'officers to be seized, put to death and plundered, 'and the king her husband to be imprisoned in the 'castle dell' Ovo, where he found means to embark 'in a Genoese ship, which happened to be then in 'in the port; and was hired to carry him to Taranto, 'where the queen ordered him to be besieged, but 'he not being able to hold out long against her sur-'rendered it, and got away into France, where he 'turned Monk, and passed the remainder of his days 'in a monastery (21).'

(21) Brantome, Dames Illustres, pag. 386.

[D] The grief she conceived at the loss of Lewis of Anjou, deprived her of life.] Her concern was the more afflicting, in that she had not answered by a like treatment, the respect he had all along paid her (22).

(22) Sero nimis exiguæ tam patientis & obsequentis filii habitæ curæ, mortisque ei summâ ingratitudine conciliatæ ingentibus gemitibus sese incusavit. Spondan. ad ann. 1434, num. 16.

[E] Renatus of Anjou . . . . spent more time in Painting, than in preparing for an expedition.] See what an Italian author says on this head. 'Qualis avorum memoria Renatus Neapolitanus Rex fuit. Hic enim 'pictura maxime delectabatur, & ob ejus studium res 'maximas conficere negligebat. Illum & familiares, '& propinqui reguli admonebant, è dignitate regia 'non esse dies noctesque in pingendo consumere, semperque tabellas contemplari, & de figuratione corporum disceptare. Ad quos respondebat se 'non minus pictorem quam Regem natum esse. 'At quàm melius consuluisset sibi & posteris 'suis, si tantam curam non egisset artis illius 'pulcerrimæ quidem, sed Regibus nunquam admodum 'necessariæ, profecto ex illo regio solio non excidisset, 'nec privatus in Galliam Narbonensem navigasset (23).

(23) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato post eriore de Exilio.

'-----Like what Renatus, king of Naples, was in 'the memory of our ancestors. For he was mostly delight-'ed with Painting, and for the sake of that neglected 'matters of the greatest consequence. His friends and 'neighbouring princes advised him that it was below 'the regal dignity to waste the day and night in Painting, 'and to be always contemplating pictures, and disputing a-'bout the proportion of figures. To whom he answered 'that he was as much born a Painter as a King. But 'how much better would he have consulted both him-'self and his posterity, if he had bestowed less application 'upon an art which is very engaging indeed in itself, 'but very unnecessary to kings; he certainly would never 'have lost his crown, nor have sailed in a private sta-'tion into Provence.' Let us add to this testimony another of a French Historian. 'He spent his time 'in drawing pictures so excellent * that they are yet 'to be seen in the city of Aix. He was painting a 'partridge when news was brought him of the loss of 'the kingdom of Naples, yet would not give over 'his work; so much pleasure did he take in it (24).' Balzac, having said that Lewis XIII, did not misspend his time in exercises unbecoming a king, adds these words (25): I do not doubt but he had read with a great deal of indignation the story of king Renatus, last earl of Provence, who was found finishing the picture of a partridge, by the person who brought him news of the loss of his kingdom of Sicily; and I likewise assure my self that if Selim, emperor of the Turks, had not in that picture

* Michael de Montagne in his Essays, book ii, chap. xvii, upon presumption, says, that being at Bar le Duc, he saw a picture which Renatus king of Sicily had drawn of himself, presented to king Francis II.

(24) Matthew's History of Lewis XI, lib. ix, pag. m. 503.

(25) Balzac, in his Prince, ch. 126, pag. m. 88, 89.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google true succeſſor of this princeſs was Alphonſus of A article. None deny but the queen diſhonoure Brantome vindicates her very poorly [G].

 This was the battle he gained over Iſmaël king of Perſia.

picture he drew and made public, repreſented a battle  he had gained, this king would not eaſily have pardoned him the diſcovering to the world that he was a Painter. Mr de Scuderi obſerves, that Selim ſent this battle, painted with his own hand, to the Venetians, who preſerve it to this day in their treaſury (26). This employment of Selim did no injury to his memory, becauſe it did not hinder him from conquering; but a like application diſhonoured the good king Renatus, who loſt almoſt all his dominions. 'A certain 'Painter having ſeen a picture of this king Renatus at Aix, ſaid, after having admired it, that it 'was a great pity Renatus was a king, and that he 'had not been a Painter by profeſſion (27). Note the inhabitants of Provence were very happy under this painting king (28), who lived a long time (29).

(26) Scuderi, Illuſtre Baſſa, Tom. i, pag. 326.

(27) Le Pays, Nouvelles Oeuvres. Part ii, livr. i, Letter xxxv, pag. m. 71, 72.

(28) See Matthew, Hiſt. of Lewis XI, pag. 503; and Ruffi, Hiſtory of Marſeilles, Tom. i, pag. 269, & ſeq.

(29) He died in the year 1480.

[F] No body will deny but this queen diſhonoured herſelf greatly by her laſciviouſneſs.] Let us alledge firſt, the words of Pandolfo Collenuccio: Fama Laſcio di ſe inſtabile e impudica, dicendoſi di lei, che nella inſtabilita ſola fu ſtabile, e che ſempre era ſtata innamorata, havendo in piu modi e con molti la ſua laſcivia macchiata; ma ſopra tutto con Pandolfello Alopo, e Urbano Auriglia, e M. Giovanni Caracciolo gran Siniſcalco, tutti tre Gentilhuomini, e molto deſtri, virtuoſi, e coſtumati; ma ſopra ogni coſa di perſona e effigie belliſſima (30). Brantome (31) has tranſlated this after the following manner. 'Now the hiſtory of Naples ſays, this queen 'left behind her the character of a woman of great 'lewdneſs and inconſtancy; inſomuch, that it was 'ſaid of her, that ſhe was conſtant in nothing but in 'inconſtancy, and that ſhe was always in love with 'ſome body or other, indulging herſelf in carnal plea'ſures with various perſons, and in various ways.' Thus far Brantome: Collenuccio concludes thus, 'but 'above all, with Pandolf Alopo, Urban Auriglia, and 'John Caracciolo high-ſteward, all three gentlemen, 'and of great abilities, virtues, and accompliſhments, 'but more particularly remarkable for their handſome'neſs.' Collenuccio is ſo well known for partiality againſt the houſe of Anjou, that not only the French Hiſtorians, but alſo ſome Italians (32) have cenſured his virulency and calumnies, and principally in regard to queen Joan, the firſt of that name. But they paſs over and even follow his account of Joan II. Is not this a plain ſign that the irregularities of the former are doubtful, and that thoſe of the latter are inconteſtable? The paſſage I am going to quote is very curious: As Ladiſlaus '(33) was very much given 'to women, and exceedingly hated for his cruelties; 'he was this year poiſoned after a baſe manner, receiving his death from the very ſource of pleaſure and 'life. A Phyſician perceiving his familiarity with his 'daughter, gave her a poyſonous drug to rub herſelf withal, which ſhe thought was a philtre to raiſe a greater deſire in her lover, but it proved the cauſe 'of both their deaths (34). The king's ſiſter Joan II, 'relict of William of Auſtria, ſucceeded him. She 'was then four and forty years old; and yet this age 'far from abating her paſſions, had inflamed them to 'the greateſt degree.' See what I quote from Spondanus (35); and alſo obſerve, that tho' the Jeſuit Maimbourg played ſo much the panegyriſt and apologiſt in favour of the firſt Joan, yet he confeſſes of this, that ſhe diſhonoured her reign by her exceeding ſcandalous life; and that ſhe at length abandoned both her perſon and kingdom to John Caracciolo, whom, of all her favourites, ſhe loved moſt tenderly (36).

(30) Collenuccio, lib. ult. ſub fin. fol. 100, verſo.

(31) Dames Illuſtres, pag. 395.

(32) Tomaſo Coſto, Summonte, &c.

(33) Mezerai, Chronolog. Abridg. Tom. iii, pag. 190, in the year 1414. See alſo his great Hiſtory, Tom. ii, pag. 627.

(34) Collenuccio relates this at large, lib. ult. fol. 93, and Brantome after him, ubi ſupra, pag. 404.

(35) In the remark [H], citation (45).

(36) Maimbourg, Hiſtory of the great Schiſm of the Weſt. Book vi, pag. m. 284.

[G] . . . . Brantome vindicates her very poorly.] Theſe are his words: 'The hiſtory of Naples ſays, that 'this queen . . . . . was always in love with ſome 'body or other, indulging herſelf in carnal pleaſures, 'with various perſons, and in various ways; 'but as to this it is the moſt excuſable and inconſiderable fault a great and fair princeſs can be guilty 'of, whereas that is the moſt ſhocking, when ſhe is 'wicked, revengeful, and tyrannical, as ſome are, to 'the very great damage of their poor ſubjects, who 'ſuffer little or nothing from their amours; which 'is an argument I have known publickly urged by 'a certain great man (37).' It is much after the

(37) Brantome, Dames Illuſtres, pag. 395.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſhe was liberal to the church, and that ſhe permitted Capiſtran to oppreſs the Jews [H]. I have elſewhere (b) ſpoken of Caracciolo, one of her galants. What Brantome has ſaid of her is taken from Collenuccio. I muſt here add a word or two concerning Bartolomeo Coglione [I].

(b) Above, in the article of the firſt CARACCIOLO.

A Civilian who lived at that time, made this quibble in Italian againſt the firſt Joan. She has been, ſays he (39), not the Regina, but the Rovina (40), of the kingdom of Naples, there was alſo a prophetic verſe made on the ſecond Joan, importing that ſhe ſhould be the deſtruction of her country. Della quale un verſo profetico per il reame ſi diceva:

Ultima Durazzi fiet Deſtructio Regni (41).

Of whom was made this prophetical verſe, which was current in that kingdom.

Under the conduct of this royal whore,
Durazza's realm ſhall fall to riſe no more.

This Civilian was for the Salique law: he was not for admitting women to the throne (42) All things duly weighed and conſidered, one ſhould be obliged to confeſs that the laws which permit kingdoms to fall to the diſtaff, have not been wiſely eſtabliſhed. It is not that women have leſs wit or leſs capacity than men: there have been ſome who have reigned with ſo much glory, and who have aſcended the throne, with ſuch courage, wiſdom, and ability, that the greateſt of kings have ſcarce deſerved to be compared with them: but then it happens accidentally that thoſe ſtates which obſerve not the Salique law, are expoſed to ſeveral inconveniences for want of it; of which this is not the leaſt, that he who marries the heireſs of the crown, is almoſt always at variance both with his ſubjects and with his queen. They, for the moſt part, look upon him only as the huſband of their queen and not their king, while ſhe is not diſpleaſed to have them do ſo, but even ſometimes refuſes to allow him the title of king. It is from hence that infinite diſorders aroſe in the kingdom of Naples, during the reign of the two Joans. Conſult the Hiſtory of England under the reign of queen Mary, wife of Philip II. The father and grand-father of this latter under-went a like tryal, the one in Spain, and the other in the Low-Countries.

Father le Moyne furniſhes me with a ſupplement: he has refuted by very good arguments the looſe morality of Taſſo: he ſuppoſes that this famous Poet being in love with the princeſs Eleonora d'Eſt, ſacrificed the intereſts of virtue to thoſe of his paſſion, in maintaining that chaſtity was not neceſſary to any but women of low rank (43). This wicked Philoſophy was vigorouſly attacked, and among other remarks on it with this. 'The honour of the public is inſeparable from that of private perſons, contrary to this new morality of Taſſo. Immodeſty is not only more baſe and odious in perſons of figure: but alſo more contagious and of more dangerous conſequence. An ill example is like an infected air, which is always to be dreaded, from what quarter ſoever it comes, and by what wind ſoever it is ſpread. But it is attended with a more ſubtle poiſon, and a more penetrating malignity when it comes from great families; when it is blown from a mouth of authority; when it is propagated in rich and golden robes: and if at this very day princeſſes, and thoſe who approach their quality, ſhould declare for Taſſo's wicked doctrine; to morrow every body would believe it honourable to copy after their amours, and the licentiouſneſs of theſe ladies would come into faſhion, as well as their cloaths and head-dreſſes (44).'

[H] It was perhaps to attone for her leudneſs, that ſhe was ſo kind to the church, and that ſhe permitted . . . . . to oppreſs the Jews.] Spondanus ſays thus much expreſsly, in relation to the ſmall pomp ſhe ordered for her own funeral. 'Sepulta eſt, ſays he (45), 'in Eccleſiâ Virginis Annunciatæ ignobili ſepulturâ, 'ut ipſa juſſerat, in pœnitentiam luxurioſæ vitæ quâ 'vehementer infamata eſt. - - - - She was buried in 'the church of the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, 'without any pomp, as ſhe herſelf had commanded, by 'way of penance for her proſligate life, which had been 'extremely ſcandalous.' See what he adds in reſpect to the care ſhe took of the concerns of religion. 'Inter vitia quibus fœdata eſt, egit & multa pia opera, 'tam in Eccleſiarum quàm in ſtatus regni utilitatem, 'quæ Summontius Neapolitanus enumerat. Inter quæ 'fuit, quod poteſtatem fecit Fr. Joanni Capiſtrano inſigni Ordinis S. Franciſci profeſſori, interdicendi Judæis uſuras & alia ab Eccleſia prohibita; & cogendi ferre ſignum Thau, ut dignoſcerentur à Chriſtianis (46). - - - - Among her many vices, ſhe alſo did 'a great many pious works, as well for the benefit 'of the church as the ſtate, which are enumerated by 'Summontius a Neopolitan. Among which one was her 'impowering John Capiſtran, an eminent monk of the 'order of St Francis, to prohibit the Jews, their uſury 'and other practices condemned by the church, and to ob'lige them to be marked with a Thau, to diſtinguiſh 'them from Chriſtians.' So furious a zealot as was this Franciſcan, being appointed inſpector of the conduct of the Jews, and who made them wear the letter Thau, to diſtinguiſh them, was like enough to make them undergo a great many troubles.

[I] I muſt here add a word or two concerning Bartolomeo Coglione.] He was one of the moſt celebrated captains of his time. 'He was born in the neighbourhood of 'Bergamo, and his family had been entirely deſtroyed 'in the quarrel between the Guelphs and Gibelins. 'He had begged till he was eighteen years old, when, 'coming to Naples, and no body daring to diſpute with 'him the prize in wreſtling or running, by reaſon of his 'prodigious ſtrength, and incomparable agility, queen 'Joan II, who valued men only for their vigour, 'made him her minion: but he was quickly weary 'of this infamous employment, and ſtealing from the 'court, went to learn the exerciſe of arms, under 'the famous Braccio (47).' It will not be amiſs to acquaint the reader, that this ſtory is to be met with among the Elogies of Paul Jovius, ſince the bare authority of the French Hiſtorian would not be ſufficient to hinder us from doubting the truth of it. See the words of the original he has made uſe of. 'Fuit 'coleo corporis ſtatura erecta atque habili, adeoque 'formoſus atque agilis ut Regina Joanna, ingenio pro'caci mulier, avidaque virorum fortium Coleonis amore 'caperetur, quum ea ſpectante cunctos in palæſtra 'jactuque ferrei vectis & ſaltu curſuque certantes cum 'magno ſpectantium plauſu ſuperaret (48). - - - - Cog'lione was of a very ſtrait and ſtout habit of body, 'and ſo handſome and nimble, that queen Joan, a diſ'ſolute woman and fond of ſtrong men fell in love with 'him, when ſhe ſaw him exceed every body in wreſtling, 'caſting the iron bar, leaping, and running, to the great 'ſatisfaction of the ſpectators.' You may know by this the nature of this queen. During the ſolemnity of publick games, ſhe ſpies an adventurer of a good figure and complexion, who bore away the prize of of wreſtling, running and jumping, from all thoſe who contended with him, and who threw the javelin farther than all of them. She enquires no farther of him, but immediately chuſes him for her favourite. To her therefore may be applied the fable of the mare, related in the Mercure Galant of the year 1673, which, if I remember right, concludes with this moral.

Maintes conois qui trompent à leur mine,
Et ſont du goût de la jument:
Il n'importe qui ni comment,
Pourveu qu'il ait bon rable & bonne échine.

Truſt no features tho' ever ſo fine,
But follow the taſte of the mare,
Do but chuſe a ſtrong back and ſtout chine,
This only will anſwer your care.

(39) Collenuccio, Hiſt. fol. 86.

(40) This is to ſay, not the Regina, but the Ruina.

(41) Collenuccio, Hiſt. fol. 92, verſo.

(42) Pontedera cita due verſi latini del ſeſſo governo. Femina regnat, &c. Væ tibi terra cui femina præeſt! Et Fœmineo regni ſtat mobile regno. I cui verſi in vulgar noſtro ſuonano coſi, 'La vulva regge, ohime grida le lingue, 'Il feminil governo verſo il regno 'eſtinguе.' Hiſt. fol. 86, verſo.

(43) Father Le Moyne, Galer. des Femmes fortes, pag. m. 192.

(44) Id. ibi. pag. 193.

(45) Spondanus, annal. 1435, num. 3, pag. 811. He had ſaid in the year 1414, num. 6, pag. 734. Sororem regnorum ejus Joannam ejus nominis Secundam, Guillelmi Andegavi, annum agentem 44, ſic amante cuiuſdam Petrotalli Aversi Neapolitani conſilio formâ juvenis a multo tempore infamis,

(46) Id. ib. ad ann. 1435, num. 3.

(47) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 35.

(48) Jovius, Elogior. Virorum bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. iii, pag. m. 237.

NAPLES (ALPHONSO I, KING OF) by his valour and conduct joined the kingdom of Naples to the dominions he inherited from his father Ferdinand king of Arragon, who died in the year 1416. Joan II, queen of Naples, being beſieged in her capital

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google capital city by Lewis of Anjou, had recourſe to c for her ſucceſſor, in caſe he ſhould deliver her fr juſt then ſignalized himſelf in Sardinia, did not dizing himſelf; he ſent his fleet to Naples, raiſec by the queen in September 1420. This frien her adopted ſon, did not laſt long; for the ado ſome great quarrels, which were at laſt conver of Anjou, was adopted by the queen, and Alph embarked at Naples, in October 1423, and toc of his was owing to the good counſel which had he had poſſeſſed himſelf of the harbour, and to the inhabitants time to recover out of their firſt of Anjou got the upper-hand again at Naples; great conſideration, and beſides was ſurrounded ſupplant one another, and whoſe paſſions were faction of Arragon recovered its ground again w then found himſelf earneſtly ſollicited to return.

1434, and queen Joan followed him ſome f favoured Alphonſo, although the people of Na
Anjou king, for he was no formidable rival. I
But notwithſtanding all theſe favourable appearar unſucceſsful. He firſt beſieged Gaeta, but was with the Genoeſe (a), who were come to relieve there are ſome people over whom misfortune ha for them even in the midſt of adverſity (b). Th of Alphonſo's advancement to the throne of N priſoner Alphonſo was, did not content himſelf furniſhed him with troops for the conqueſt of th the work of a day: the preſence of Renatus o time; but at laſt the city of Naples fell into t and thus the difference was decided. This prin manner of the antient Romans, the twenty-ſixth of Eugenius IV very favourable to him. He as fortune had forborn declaring for him, b ſentence againſt France, Eugenius did not prete diately acknowledged Alphonſo to be the law in conſideration of a certain annual tribute. T reputation, and gave him an opportunity to ſtates of Italy, feel the force of his victorious by all the princes who were under apprehenſior ſo many charms in Italy, that he had no thou a prince of great accompliſhments, and a ver great lover of letters and learned men [B], an

(a) The fifth of Auguſt 1435.

(b) See Jovian. Pontanus, de Principe, fol. m. 62.

(c) He arrived at Naples in the month of May 1438.

(d) Victrix cauſa Diis placuit; Sed victa Catoni. Lucan. lib. i, ver. 128.

(e) Princeps ſua ætate clariſſimus, nulli veterum poſthabendus, Hiſpanæ gentis lumen decuſque perpetuum. Mariana, lib. xxii, cap. xviii. See Varillas's Hiſtory of Charles VIII, lib. ii, pag. 178, Edit. of Holland.

[A] France was very unfortunate at that time.] If we might be permitted to ſpeak of Fortune as the the Heathens did, who, for want of evidence which we now have, never rightly underſtood that word to mean a direction of the moſt wiſe and juſt hand of Providence, we ſhould be apt to accuſe her of too great partiality towards Spain, in oppoſition to France; for it is impoſſible to read the hiſtory of the XVth and XVIth centuries, with regard to the affairs of Italy, without obſerving the aſcendant and ſuperiority the former had over the latter; which is enough, even at this day, to cover the French with confuſion and to ſwell the Spaniards with pride. In all this management, the finger of God is moſt evidently to be admired. He is the common Father of all people, and thoſe temporal bleſſings he affords one nation in one century, he deprives them of in another. The XVth and XVIth centuries gave a turn to Spain to be uppermoſt, and the XVIIth, to be undermoſt. The aſcendant and ſuperiority of France was reſerved for that century. I only explain and paraphraſe on the Text of Mariana (1): ‘ Sic fortuna ludit in rebus humanis: ſic nos noſtraque verſamur. Aragonio nimirum cœlum viam ad regnum ‘ ſtruebat cui nihil eſt arduum. . . . . Multum ei familiæ (Andegavenſi) ſuperi per hæc tempora adverſati videntur, Gallorum genti infenſi, ac Aragoniis propitii. Sed eſt fere ut aliarum rerum ſic felicitatis orbis: per varias gentes atque familias inerrat, nulli propria (2). - - - - Thus Fortune diverts herſelf with human affairs: thus do we with our appurtinences take our turns. The Arragonian, for inſtance, had his way to the throne paved by Heaven, to which nothing is difficult. The Gods ſeem to have been at this time on ill

(1) Mariana, lib. xxi, cap. vii.

(2) Conſer quæ Horatius, Od. XXIX, lib. iii. Fortuna ſævo læta negotio & Ludum inſolentem ludere pertinax, Tranſmutat incertos honores, Nunc mihi nunc alii benigna. Fortune but ſports with human pain, To ſtop her game is all in vain. While ſhe revolves her various wheel, Now you, now I, by favours ſeal.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him on that account [C]. He died at Naples the twenty-seventh of June 1458, aged sixty-four years (f), leaving his dominions in Spain to his brother, and the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand, his natural son (g). What Mr Moreri says is not true, 'that 'Antony of Palermo wrote a very compleat History of king Alphonso, intituled, De 'Factis & Dictis Alphonsi Regis:' for the work which bears this title is only a collection of judicious repartees, witty sayings, and some extraordinary actions of this prince: and altho' the circumstances wherein he is mentioned to have said or done those things, may inform us of several particulars of his life, yet such a work cannot properly be called the complete History of this king. Paul Jovius is guilty of a strange negligence, he was ignorant that Alphonso was eldest son of Ferdinand king of Arragon [D], and that he had

(f) Jovius Pontan. de Bell. Neapol. lib. i.

(g) Taken from Mariana's History of Spain.

'hormita, Georgio Trapezuntio immortali laude viris. 'Bartholomæum Faccium cujus extant de rebus Al- 'fonsi commentarii, mense Novembri superiori (6) 'extinctum tulit ægerrimè. - - - He admired learning; 'and had such a fondness for learned men, that he put 'himself again under their tuition, tho' in the decline 'of his age. He was very intimate with Laurentius 'Valla, Antonius Panhormita, Georgius Trapezuntius, 'men of immortal fame. He lamented extremely the 'death of Bartholomæus Faccius, in the month of No- 'vember last past, whose Commentaries on the transf- 'actions of Alphonso are now extant.' Philelphus having brought him his satires, returned loaden with presents, and honoured with the order of knighthood. Philelphum Poëtam ad se satyras diutissime evigilatas deferentem illasque canentem ac prope agentem, non prius quàm militiæ honore decoratum præmiisque auctum remisit (7). He held a correspondence by letters with Leonard Aretin, and endeavoured to bring him to his court: but the old age and bad health of that learned man, would not permit him to accept of those offers. Poggius, a Florentine, translated the Cyropædia of Xenophon, by king Alphonso's order, and was considerably rewarded for it. In a word, this prince invited from the most remote countries, a great number of learned Divines, and advanced some of them to the most considerable employments. His court was full of all sorts of learned men, who all shared in his liberality. He was at the expence (8) of maintaining a great number of scholars in their studies (9), who were of a promising genius, but in mean circumstances. I had almost forgot Bracellius, who was one of the learned men of his court, and has left a History of the wars of this monarch (10).

[C] . . . . and many extraordinary things are related of him on that account.] During an indisposition he laboured under at Capua, every one strove to bring him such things as they thought might divert him. Antonius Panormita (11) made choice of books, and among others of Quintus Curtius. This prince listened with so much pleasure to the History of Alexander the Great, that he almost intirely recovered the very first day it was read to him, to the great surprize of the Physicians. He continued this exercise thrice every day, till such time as Panormita had read the book thro': and then rallied the Physicians, bantering their Avicenna, and infinitely commending Quintus Curtius. Having heard, that there was to be seen near Formium, the tomb of Cicero, with an epitaph in antique characters, he could not rest for joy till he had seen it: but immediately hastened to the place, and tore away the bushes that grew about the sepulchre with his own hands: but instead of the name of Cicero, he found that of one M. Vitruvius. Quod rex ut primum accepit lætitia pene perditus ire nihil cunctatus est, & sentibus rubisque primo tumulum purgans, mox legere inceptans, non M. Tulli, sed M. Vitruvii epigramma esse comperit (12). At the siege of Gaeta, when he was told there were no more of those large stones, with which he loaded his mortars, to be found, except at an old country seat, which, according to antient tradition, had once been Cicero's; he answered, he would rather chuse to let his artillery remain useless, than to profane any thing that had belonged to so great a man (13). We shall see elsewhere (14) the respect he had for Livy, and the honour he paid to the remains of that great author, and to the country of Ovid (15). He collected with great care the medals of the Roman emperors, and above all those of Julius Cæsar, preserving them almost as carefully as reliques in a cabinet of ivory (16). He always carried with him in his travels, Cæsar's Commentaries, and never passed a day without reading some part of them attentively (17). He took for his device, An open Book (18). His soldiers were so well acquainted with his passion for books, that whenever they plundered any place, they strove who should first carry him all those they could meet with (19). One day, upon mention made of the loss of some things of value, he protested he had rather lose his jewels, how much soever the world might esteem them, than the meanest of his books (20). He always caused several to be laid by his bed-side; and whenever he waked, would order one of them to be given to him to read (21). He would sometimes go on foot to the lectures of professors, though never so distant from his palace (22). He esteemed that day lost which he had spent without reading (23); and would not suffer the time set apart for reading to be any otherwise employed, let whatever business happen. 'Antonio poetæ incredibili 'quadam voluptate operam dabat, aliquid ex prisco- 'rum annalibus referenti, quinetiam veterum ab eo 'scriptorum lectiones singulis diebus audiebat, ac licet 'multis magnisque interim gravaretur curis, nunquam 'tamen passus est horam libro dictam à negociis auferri (24). - - - - He attended to Antony the Poet with in- 'credible pleasure, while he read to him something out 'of the Annals of the Antients, nor did he pass a day 'without hearing a lecture from him out of some old 'author; and tho' affairs of state might happen to in- 'terfere, yet he would never permit any appointment 'made for books, to be interrupted by business.' He had read the Bible, with the Glosses and Commentaries upon it, fourteen times, and could repeat a great part of it by heart (25). Finding one day the door of his library locked, and not having patience to wait his library-keeper's return, he took some instruments himself to break open the lock; and being asked by one of his attendants with some surprize, If his majesty would condescend to do that with his own hands? He answered him with this other question, What! do you think GOD and Nature has given hands to kings for nothing (26)? He read with so much attention, that he did not not seem to be sensible, that they either danced before him, or played upon the Music (27). The following particular will shew with what pleasure and attention he could listen to a piece of oratory. Jannot Manetti envoy from Florence, making him one day a learned and long harangue, the king not only kept his eyes all along fixed upon him, but also continued so fixed and immoveable that he did not so much as drive away a flie which had placed itself on his nose at the very beginning of the speech: the orator could not forbear admiring at his patience; but as soon as he had done speaking Alphonso drove away the flie, which he had suffered to be at rest during all that long discourse (28). Such a thing at this time of day would be esteemed ridiculous; and I imagine, there might be some persons, who, at that time, treated this as such.

[D] Paul Jovius was ignorant, that Alphonso was the eldest son of Ferdinand king of Arragon.] This is what Mariana observes in express terms; I shall repeat his words, because they contain something relating to the life of our Alphonso. 'Interea, says 'he (29), Valentiæ Rex Aragonius Alfonsi MAJORIS 'filii nuptias insigni celebrabat apparatu . . . Sponsam 'è Castella Sanctius Rogius deduxit . . . . nuptiæ con- 'fectæ pridie Idus Junii. - - - The king of Arragon cele- 'brated the nuptials of his ELDEST son Alphonso at Va- 'lencia with great pomp . . Sanctius Regius conducted the 'bride from Castile . . . the marriage was consummated 'on the twelfth day of June.' In the following chapter he speaks after this manner. 'Alfonsum NATU 'MAXIMUM regni hæredem scripsit. - - - - He ap- 'pointed his ELDEST SON Alphonso successor to his 'dominions.'

(7) That is to say, in 1457.

(8) Anton. Panormit. de Dict. & Fact. Alphonsi, lib. iii, num. 11.

(9) Ibid. lib. ii, pas sim.

(10) Ibid. num. 52.

(11) Et qui bellorum ejus Historiam non illepide perscripsit Bracellius Ligur. Jovius, Elog. lib. iii.

(12) See his book, de Dictis & Factis Alphonsi, lib. i, num. 43.

(12) Ib. lib. i, num. 47.

(13) Ib. num. 48.

(14) In the article TITUS LIVIUS.

(15) In the article of that Poet.

(16) Id. Anton. Panormit. de Dictis & Factis Alphonsi, lib. ii, num. 12.

(17) Ib. num. 13.

(18) Ib. num. 14.

(19) Ib. num. 15.

(20) Id. lib. iv, num. 34.

(21) Cum libris sub sponda solitum dormire regem scimus experrectum illos cum lumine poscere ac lectitare. Ibid. num. 31.

(22) Ib. lib. i, num. 39.

(23) Diem illam in qua nihil legeret se perdidisse dicebat. Sed & cum audisset Vespasianum Cæsarem (he should have said Titum) eam diem se perdidisse solitum dicere in qua nihil quicquam alicui donasset, egisse gratias rex dicitur immortali Jesu Christo, quod eo modo nec diem ipse perdidisset. Ib. num. 16.

(24) Jovian. Pontanus, de Principe, fol. m. 63.

(25) Panorm. ubi supra, lib. i, num. 17. Graziani, de Cæsibus Viror. pag. 19, says quadragies, forty times: but he is mistaken.

(26) Panorm. ibid. num. 37.

(27) Id. lib. iv, num. 15.

(28) Ib. lib. i, num. 46.

(29) Mariana, lib. xx, cap. xvii, ad ann. 1415, pag. 223, Edit. Mogunt. 1619, in 4to.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

had been married [E], and had reigned a good deal longer than two and twenty years. Mr Varillas, without doubt, intended to ſpeak of this prince in the preface to his Anecdotes, though he has falſely deſcribed him in point of Chronology. What he ſays of him is very curious [F]. It is not true that our Alphonſo ſent ſuccours to Scanderbeg for

' dominions.' The words of Antonius Panormitanus deſerve alſo a place here, becauſe they contain a very remarkable particular. ' Ferdinandus pater & ipſe ' inclytus rex, moriens Alphonſum filium iis pene ' verbis allocutus fertur: optime fili, quoniam regna ' quæcunque dum Deo placuit obtinui, ad te ÆTATIS ' PRÆROGATIVA deferri & ſcio & volo, optarim ' eas modo terras quas ea parte Hiſpaniæ quam Caſtellam ' vocitant habemus, Joanni fratri tuo, ſi modo per te ' liceat, reliquere. Quod ne moleſtè feras abs te peto, & ' ſi pateris etiam rogo.' Ferdinand deſires to leave ſome lands to his younger ſon, and entreats in a manner Alphonſo to conſent to it: Alphonſo anſwers like a hero, that if ſuch is his father's pleaſure he conſents with all his heart, that his brother ſhall inherit the crown; and that, for his part, he does not pretend to ſucceed to it any otherwiſe than thro' grace and favour. Ego, mi pater ac domine, ſatis intelligo iſthæc regna & tua ferè omnia ad me quidem pertinere, ſed non aliter quam beneficio tuo. Idcirco & pluris ſemper voluntatem tuam & feci & facturus ſum, quam ætatis privilegium. Imo vero ſi pro tua ſingulari prudentia regnis ita demum proſpicis iri conſultum, ſi Joannem regni ſucceſſorem reliqueris, nihil recuſo, quin ipſum vel ad omnia inſtituas hæredem: non aliter (mihi credas velim) voluntati per me tuæ uſque ad poſtremum ſpiritum parebitur, quam divinæ (30). Muſt it not be acknowledged, that Paul Jovius took a great deal of care to inform himſelf of all particulars relating to thoſe whoſe elogies he compoſed. ' Ad ' magnum imperium novumque regnum .... vehe- ' mentiſſimè contendebat, poſtquam ipſum naturæ jus ' ad Joannem fratrem majorem natu paterni Tarraco- ' nenſis imperii hæreditatem detuliſſet (31). --- After ' he had reſigned to his elder brother John what was in- ' deed his birthright, and paternal inheritance, the king- ' dom of Arragon, he puſhed his way with all poſſible ' expedition to new and very conſiderable dominions.' I ſhould not be backward to believe, that it appeared to him a nobler thing for a younger ſon to become a king, than for one king to conquer the kingdom of another.

[E] .... and that he had been married.] We have already quoted Mariana on this head; and here is a ſecond teſtimony, which will inform us that Alphonſo had met with an excellent wife. ' Acceperat ali- ' quando à Maria ſingularis exempli uxore literas quas ' cum ſemel atque iterum attentiſſimè perlegiſſet, mox ' inquit, inſtitueram olim nihil de uxore extra thalamum ' dicere, ne benedicens uxorius aut immodeſtior haberer. ' At nunc mihi prorſus mutandum conſilium, & quidvis ' homines obloquantur quocunque in trivio cuique ob- ' vio, ſine modo & modeſtia de uxoris virtute atque ' conſtantia prædicandum (32).' He once reſolved never to ſpeak any thing of the merit of his wife, leſt he might be thought too fond of her, a thing perſons of his rank have no great reaſon to fear; but after having read a letter he had received from her, he changed his mind, and reſolved to publiſh her virtues on all occaſions. This deſign was both juſt and honourable, but then he ſhould have remembered her in his will, where he never once mentioned her; which has given occaſion to ſay, he would have divorced her, in order that he might marry his miſtreſs. Reginæ nulla mentio: fama fuit & magni viri teſtantur ea repudiata Lucretiam Alaniam pellicem ducere cogitaſſe (33). This miſtreſs was in hopes the Pope would have conſented to her marriage, and therefore took a journey on purpoſe to Rome, with the equipage of a queen, but ſhe did not obtain her deſire (34). Others ſay only, that Alphonſo would have married her if his queen had died. This Lucretia was a fair Neopolitan, who knew ſo well how to cajole the good old king, that he granted every thing ſhe requeſted. ' Hæc eſt illa Lucretia, cujus ' per orbem terrarum amores fuere quàm notiſſimi. ' Eam Alphonſus adamatam propter formæ qua præ- ' ſtabat excellentiam, ſuaviſſimis etiam puellæ illecebris ' ſenex ipſe delinitus, divitiis, opibus, authoritate ita ' extulerat, ut plerique arbitrarentur, ſi Maria vita ' exceſſiſſet, legitimæ uxoris eam loco habiturum (35). ' --- This is that Lucretia, whoſe amours were ſo no- ' torious to all the world. Alphonſo doated on her for ' her beauty, and ſhe ſoothed the old man in ſuch a manner ' by her bewitching behaviour, that he advanced her to ' ſuch height of riches, grandeur, and power, as to ' make moſt people believe he would certainly have mar- ' ried her, in caſe his wife Mary had died.' I do not well know by what woman Alphonſo had thoſe two daughters, who were married advantageouſly by their father, one to the duke of Ferrara, and the other to the duke of Seſſa (36). Mariana agrees that Alphonſo was guilty of incontinence (37). Ferdinand, who ſucceeded him in the kingdom of Naples, was a natural ſon he had in Spain (38), and who had no great reaſon to be pleaſed with Lucretia, the laſt miſtreſs of Alphonſo, becauſe ſhe embraced the faction of Anjou (39). I repeat it again, is it not ſtrange that Paul Jovius ſhould ſpeak of the celibacy of this prince? ' In cælibatu ſingularem eamque paucis incompertam ' liberi & tranquilli animi felicitatem repoſuit, ſic ut ' eum nunquam pœnituerit connubia rejeciſſe, quum ' filium Ferdinandum regiæ indolis ex nobili concu- ' bina in ſpem regni ſuſcepiſſet (40). --- He found in ' a ſingle life the particular ſatisfaction of a free and ' eaſy mind, known but to few, ſo that he never repented ' of his having declined matrimony, when he had brought ' up Ferdinand, a ſon of a very noble diſpoſition, whom ' he had by a miſtreſs of quality, with a deſign to make ' him his ſucceſſor.' Antonio Maria Gratiani has been almoſt as much miſtaken as Paul Jovius. He believed Alphonſo ſoon became a widower. ' Ex uxore quam ' juvenis duxit Caſtellæ Regis propinqui ſui filia libe- ' ros non tulit, eaque brevi amiſſa cælebs inde per- ' manſit (41). --- He had no children by the daughter ' of the king of Caſtile his neighbour, whom he married ' in his youth, but loſing her ſhortly after, he remained ' a widower all the reſt of his life.'

[F] What Mr Varillas ſays of him is very curious.] ' There never was a king ſo concerned about what ' ſhould be ſaid of him after his death, as the laſt ' Alphonſo, who wore the crown of Naples. He ' not only laboured to win battles, and to perform ' ſuch actions as border upon the romantic, but alſo ' made it his buſineſs to find out ſuch pens as were able ' to record and embelliſh them. There was not a writer ' of any note, whom he did not attempt to gain or ' corrupt, and all thoſe who were famous, received ' from him penſions or preſents in whatſoever country ' of Europe their birth or fortune had fixed them. ' And yet there never was any monarch whoſe faults ' have been more particularized than his. The leaſt ' of his foibles is not unknown, and one may read as ' long as one will in Pontanus, Panormitanus, Bene- ' dicti, and in ſixty-four other Hiſtorians, that he poſ- ' ſeſſed all the great qualities which can form a hero, ' yet people will not believe it, but rather chuſe to ' rely on Bernardino Cerico, who allows him only very ' common abilities, tho' this Cerico was otherwiſe ' but a very pitiful Hiſtorian (42).' I cannot perſuade myſelf that this relates to the laſt Alphonſo, who was ſon of Fardinand the baſtard; for on the one hand his reign was ſo ſhort (43), that it could not allow him time to make all thoſe enquiries for writers which Mr Varillas ſpeaks of; and on the other, this prince was ſo notoriouſly vitious, and deſtitute of thoſe great qualities, which cover or counter-balance great vices, that he was not a ſubject proper for ſo many flattering Hiſtorians to diſplay for an hero. It muſt therefore be Alphonſo the grand-father, who is to be looked upon as the perſon deſcribed in ſuch ſort of hiſtories. See what Mr Varillas has ſaid (44) of the laſt Alphonſo, after having given a terrible account of the life of Ferdinand. ' It remains only to be obſerved that his ſon, ' Alphonſo II, imitated, and even ſurpaſſed, him, by ' uſing leſs precaution to conceal his vices: he read ' no ſort of laws, either divine or human; nor had he ' any other claim to be called a Chriſtian, but becauſe ' he had been baptized: the raviſhing ladies of the ' greateſt quality and virtue, paſſed with him for ga- ' lantry: he called violence and extortion the prero- ' gatives of royalty; and it is believed, for certain, ' that it was he who adviſed his father to maſſacre ' the

(30) Anton. Panormitanus, de Dictis & Factis Alphonſi, lib. ii, num. 30.

(31) Jovius, Elog. bellica virt. illuſtr. lib. iii.

(32) Panormit. ubi ſupra, lib. ii, num. 39.

(33) Mariana, lib. xxii, cap. xviii.

(34) Mariana, ibid.

(35) Pontanus, de Bello Neapolit. lib. ii, fol. m. 145, verſo.

(36) Gratianus, de Caſibus Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 23.

(37) Id maxime intemperantiæ vitium in Alphonſi moribus accuſare licet. Mariana, ubi ſupra.

(38) Alfonſo mortuo Ferdinandus ſuccevit quem hæredem in regno Neopolitano Pater inſtituerat natum Valentiæ in Hiſpania citeriore, atque ex muliere ſuſceptum quam Valentiæ cum ageret in deliciis habuiſſet. Pontanus, ibid. lib. i, fol. 108.

(39) Id. fol. 145

(40) Jovius, in Elogiis, ubi ſupra.

(41) Gratian. ubi ſupra.

(42) Varillas, Preface to the Anecdotes of Florence.

(43) It laſted bout a year.

(44) In the L of Charles VI lib. iv, par. 2 Edit. of Holl

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

for the ſiege of Belgrade; and if he did once ſend him word that the Italians were not leſs formidable as gueſts than as enemies, it was not however at the time of that ſiege [G]. He had more of the character of a great king than a good huſband; and in his old age he kept a miſtreſs, whom he would have married [H], if he could have obtained his point in divorcing his wife.

I have juſt met with a fact which ſeems to me very curious, and informs us of the cauſe of the miſunderſtanding between Alphonſo and his queen [I]. It is neceſſary to ſay ſomething of his deſcendants [K], and of the pretenſions of the houſe of Trimouille [L].

'the ſenators of Naples in the church of St Leonard.' Would any one ſay of ſuch a prince, as Mr Varillas does of him he ſpeaks of in the preface to his Anecdotes, that an Hiſtorian, who was no flatterer, has particularized his faults, has informed us of the leaſt of his foibles, and has only allowed him very common abilities? Without doubt the author of the Anecdotes intended to ſpeak of the king of Naples, treated of in this article; but then he ſhould not have deſcribed him by theſe words, the laſt Alphonſo who wore the crown of Naples; for if Alphonſo II, his grandſon, ſhould be reckoned as a cypher, then there could have been but one Alphonſo king of Naples, and conſequently it would be needleſs to call him the laſt.

[G] It was not however at the time of that ſiege.] The moſt ignorant of my readers will be apt to gueſs there may be Hiſtorians who affirm what I deny in the text of this remark: but as every one is not able to diſcover thoſe Hiſtorians, it would be neceſſary for me to point them out. See then what I find in a quotation out of Barlet, in the Hiſtory of Mahomet II (45). 'Scanderbeg undertook the ſiege of 'Belgrade, a city of Albania, which the Turks had 'taken from him. The better to ſucceed in his deſign, he beſought the aſſiſtance of Alphonſo king 'of Naples, the moſt zealous of his allies, and ſent 'an expreſs to deſire of him, among other things, 'Miners and Engineers, telling him, by way of mirth, 'and with the freedom of an old friend, that the 'Albanian ſoldiers were only fit to fight with men, 'but that he very well knew the Italians were able 'to force ſtone-walls. Alphonſo ſent him a ſupply 'of men, money, and artillery, adding, by way of 'anſwer, agreeably enough, that the Italians who were 'come to join him, were not only qualified to engage 'with men and walls, but alſo to make conqueſts of 'the ladies of Albania; and therefore adviſed him to 'let his countrymen take care they did not entertain 'domeſtic conquerors, inſtead of foreign friends. Scanderbeg ſhewed this anſwer to his army, and laughed 'heartily at it as well as his ſoldiers. But he repented 'his having beſieged Belgrade, and never was any 'enterprize of his ſo unfortunate.' It is plain, here muſt be one prince, or one time miſtaken for another; for in 1465, when this letter is ſaid to have been ſent, there was no king of Naples of the name of Alphonſo.

(45) By Mr Guillet, Tom. ii, pag. 83, ad ann. 1465. He quotes Barlet. lib. vii, & viii.

(46) In the remark [E], citation (33).

(47) Antonius Panormitanus diſcharged this office to king Alphonſo: now he values himſelf for it in article 41, of his fourth book. Ab ore Alphonſi nunquam omnino verbum obſcenum excidiſſe ſcimus, nunquam interiora membrorum ejus quempiam vidiſſe.

(48) In the 4th page we read theſe words; Le ſerment & contraint à leur honte coutume de revoler ce voyageux ſecret de mariage; quod reſte facium ſic appetet ſciri, ut tamen erubeſcat videri. And at the fourth page ibid. Si la loy divine defend à la femme de ne jetter les yeux ou les mains perſuadantes aux parties où la honte de ſon mary ſe cache, à moindre raiſon doit il eſtre permis à l'inthimée de divulguer qu'elle n'ait ce reſſentiment de celles de ſon eſpoux. Non eſſe (ſays Quintilian) ſatisfactionem cuique ſuorum adeo injicitur, ut omnes non habeat aliquod ſecretum.

(49) Panorm. lib. iv, num. 8. que à las Damas ſuele quitar el juicio, y à los Principes darle en lo concerniente à ſu imperio (50). Donna Juana of Caſtile, adds he, loſt her prudence by giving way to a jealouſy of her huſband, Don Philip, one of the firſt gentlemen in the world. The queen, Donna Maria of Arragon, was a woman of extraordinary judgment, yet a like jealouſy made her commit a thouſand extravagancies. She cauſed Donna Margarita de Ixar, one of her maids of honour, and who was ſuppoſed to be the mother of Ferdinand I, king of Naples, to be ſtrangled; as alſo Lopez de Concut, whom ſhe ſuſpected to be manager of the amours of her huſband king Alphonſo V, and by this ſtep occaſioned that king to go from her to Naples, where he died without ever ſeeing her more (51). This therefore furniſhes us with a reaſon why he made no mention of her in his will. We muſt conclude, that the reciprocal diſguſt to each other muſt have been very great, ſince it could make him rather abandon his kingdom of Arragon, than live with his wife; and her to chuſe rather to have no part in the crown of Naples than to go home to her huſband. It was very fortunate for Alphonſo, to find in Italy what might make him amends for the dominions he quitted on the other ſide of the Pyrenees; but, perhaps, if he had not met with ſo good a reception at Naples, he would rather have choſen to turn knight-errant all the reſt of his days, than ever think of reigning in Arragon with his queen. The neceſſity of living under the bonds of wedlock is ſometimes ſo irkſome, that a man to free himſelf from them would go to the end of the world.

(50) Vitriari, Notes upon Philip de Comines, chap. i, letter E; pag. 2.

(51) Le hizo irſe à Napoles, y morir ſin jamas verla. Id. ibi. pag. 3.

Ultra Sauromatas fugere hinc libet & gracialem Oceanum (52).

(52) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 1.

To ſhun this plague, with all my ſoul,
I'd fly far as the icy pole.

[K] It is neceſſary to ſay ſomething of his deſcendants.] Ferdinand I, his natural ſon, ſucceeded him, and was married twice, firſt to Iſabella of Clermont, and afterwards to Joan ſiſter to the king of Spain. The children by his firſt wife were Alphonſo duke of Calabria; Frederic prince of Altamura; John who was a cardinal; Francis duke of St Angelo; Donna Beatrix wife of Matthias king of Hungary; and Donna Leonora ducheſs of Ferrara. He had only one daughter by his ſecond wife, namely, Donna Giovanna, who was married to king Ferdinard II, his nephew. He had likewiſe ſome natural children, and reigned thirty five years, dying in the beginning of the year 1494, aged ſeventy-one years.

Alphonſo II, duke of Calabria, his eldeſt ſon, ſucceeded him, and married Hippolita Maria, daughter of Francis Sforza duke of Milan, by whom he had two ſons and one daughter, Don Ferdinand, Don Pietro, and Donna Iſabella ducheſs of Milan. His three natural children were Don Alphonſo duke of Biſegli, Don Cæſar, and Donna Sancia wife of Geofrey Borgia. The fear he was under on account of Charles VIII of France, made him reſign his dominions to his eldeſt ſon Ferdinand. He did not reign above a year.

(53) Taken from Tomaſo Coſto, in his book, intituled, Nomi delle Provincie citta .... del regno di Napoli, de Reche vi regnarono con le lor diſcendenze figurate in alberi, &c.

Ferdinand II ſucceeded by the abdication of his father Alphonſo II, and was driven out of his kingdom by the French; he was re-eſtabliſhed at laſt by the aſſiſtance of the Great Captain; but died ſoon after in 1495. He left no children: he had married his aunt Donna Giovanna.

Frederic ſon of Ferdinard I, ſucceeded Ferdinand II, and was deprived of his dominions in the year 1501, without ever being able, either he, or any of his children, to recover them (53).

(54) It is commonly ſpelt thus, in conformity to the pronunciation; but the true and antient Orthography is Tremoille.

[I] The cauſe of the miſunderſtanding between Alphonſo and his queen.] Don John Vitrian, who has added a great many notes to his Spaniſh tranſlation of the Memoirs of Philip de Comines, maintains, that a very jealous humour in ladies turns their heads, and is of very great ſervice to kings. Paſſion es eſta de los celos y ſoſpechas,

[L] ... and of the pretenſions of the houſe of Trimouille (54).] To ſhew the foundation of theſe, I need only produce

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google produce the extract of a memoir, which informs us of the fate of king Frederic and his family.

(55) A Memoir containing the right of Mr de la Tremoille to the kingdom of Naples, pag. 2, & seq.

'(55) This prince, after having reigned some years, 'had the misfortune to find Lewis XII of France, and 'Ferdinand king of Arragon, firnamed the Catholic, 'entered into a confederacy to dispossess him: their 'armies invaded his kingdom, made themselves 'masters of it, and divided it.

'The king seeing himself dethroned, chose rather 'to trust to Lewis XII, whose probity was universally 'known, than to Ferdinand the Catholic; and retired 1504. 'into France, where he died.

'Frederic was twice married, first to Anne of Savoy, 1478. 'daughter of Amadeus IX, duke of Savoy and of 'Yolande of France, sister of Lewis XI. By this first 'marriage he had only Charlotte of Arragon, who, 'in her father's life-time, and during his peaceable 'possession of the kingdom of Naples, was married in 1500. 'France to Guy XVI, count of Laval, one of the 'greatest lords of Europe, and one of the most illu-'strious families.

'King Frederic married for his second wife Isabella 'de Beaux, by whom he had three sons, Alphonso, 'Cæsar, and Ferdinand; and two daughters, Isabella, 'and Julia. Of these five children there were but 'two married, namely, Ferdinand and Julia: this 'last to George Marquis of Montferrat, but she died 1533. 'the very day her nuptials were to have been con-'summated.

'Ferdinand duke of Calabria, defended the city of 'Taranto against the Spaniards, who took it after a 'long siege; and, notwithstanding the capitulation, 'which gave this prince leave to retire whither he 'pleased, they carried him into Spain, and forced him to 'marry two old princesses: the first, Mencia de Men-'doza, widow of Henry of Nassau; and the second, 'Germaine de Foix, relict of Ferdinand the Catholic. 'He had no children by either of these two wives, 'and died in 1559.

'Alphonso, called the infant of Arragon, came 1512. 'from Naples into France; where, after having re- 1515. 'ceived the honours due to his birth, he died with-'out issue, as well as Cæsar and Isabella.

'Of all the children of the unfortunate Frederic, last 'king of Naples, there was not one except Charlotte 'of Arragon, his daughter, by the first venter, who 'left any posterity: she had by Guy XVI, count of 'Laval, one son, who was killed in a fight at Bicoque 1522. 'without having ever been married; and two daugh-'ters, Catharine, and Anne of Laval.

'Catherine was married to Claudius de Rieux, who 'took the name of Laval, and whose family has been 'entirely extinct by the decease of Guy XX, count of 'Laval, dying without having ever been married, in 'the year 1605.

'Anne of Laval, second daughter of Charlotte of 'Arragon and of Guy XVI, was married to Francis 1521. 'de la Tremoille, son of Charles de la Tremoille, 'prince of Talmond, killed at the battle of Marignan, 'and grand-son of Lewis II de la Tremoille, killed 'at that of Pavia.

'It is certain, that the daughters and their descen-'dants succeed to the kingdom of Naples; and there-'fore Mr de la Tremoille has an unquestionable right 'to that kingdom, as descendant in a right-line from 'Frederic of Arragon, last king of Naples; and that 'with so much the more reason, because by Charlotte 'of Arragon's marriage-contract with Guy XVI, 'count of Laval, that princess had expresly reserved 'to herself and her heirs, all the right to the succes-'sion of king Frederic, and his children, for want of 'heirs male. It was on this foundation, the house of 'Tremoille thought proper to send their plenipoten-'tiaries to the congress of Munster and Nimeguen, 1678. 'to set forth their right, and desire justice from the 1678. 'mediators: which having been refused them, they 'entered their protests.' This is what I have taken from a Memoir printed in France, with the necessary proofs. It was shown to the mediators at the peace of Nimeguen in the year 1678, and of Rysvick in the year 1697, by Monsieur Sanguiniere, counsellor of the Chatelet at Paris, and deputy from the duke of Tremouille. You may see, in the beginning of the fourth tome of the Acts and Memoirs of the Negotiation of the peace of Nimeguen (56), all that relates to the commission of this envoy.

(56) Printed at the Hague, by Adrian Moetjens in the year 1680.

NARNI, an Italian Capuchin, and a great preacher, flourished at the beginning of the XVIIth century. Some think Balzac spoke of him in the passage which will be seen below [A]. He had admired him in the pulpit, but did not so when his sermons were printed (a): see the judicious criticisms he has made on the sermons of this Capuchin (b). I have elsewhere said (c) that they have been published in French; and that d'Ablancourt, who translated them, has yielded the whole honour and profit of them to Father du Bosc. I have also (d) said that our Narni and Balzac's father were like one another. I have just now consulted an author, who tells me the name of this monk was Jerom Mautini of Narni (e); that, after having made himself famous in several cities of Italy, and even at Rome itself, he was made choice of to preach before the Pope and cardinals; and that he had all the qualifications required in an excellent preacher, a good figure, fine languague, great purity of manners, and so vehement a zeal in censuring the vices of mankind, that he rendered himself odious to impenitent sinners. When he saw he could gain

(a) Balzac, letter xxvii, book iii, to Chapelain.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Above, remark [A] of the article DU BOSC (N). See Colomiés, Bibliotb. Choisie, pag. 171.

(d) Above, citation (e), of the article BALZAC (JOHN LEWIS).

(e) It is the na of his country Narni is a city Italy.

[A] Some think that Balzac spoke of him in the passage which will be seen below.] 'And when that excellent 'Capuchin of Pope Gregory, preaching one day at 'Rome, concerning the obligation of residence, struck 'so great a terror into thirty or forty bishops who 'heard him, that they all hurried away to their re-'spective dioceses. And when at another time, he 'converted a whole city with one of his Lent-sermons; 'and that the people going out of the church cryed 'out Mercy, as they passed through the streets; and 'that it was computed two thousand crowns were ex-'pended in the holy-week in cords for discipline; 'though these are no very dear sort of goods; pray 'tell me, did this poor Christian Philosopher fall short 'of any thing essential to Monarchy, and of that per-'fect submission it requires from it's subjects? Did not 'he triumph in his rags, and tattered cloaths? Was 'not his mean condition full of grandeur, and envi-'roned with majesty. Was not he lord, and almost a 'tyrant over those who gave him alms (1)?' It is a great fault to describe people by such indeterminate characters. There were fifteen Popes of the name of Gregory; how therefore should one guess in what time this Capuchin of Pope Gregory performed such wonderful exploits by his eloquence? Ought not Balzac, who intended no doubt to write not only for the time present, but for that to come, to have managed matters so, that after his death his readers might understand who the persons were whom he had commended? Father Rapin has avoided this fault. '(2) We are 'told of a certain Capuchin, says he, named Philip (3) 'de Narni, who, under the pontificate of Gregory XV, 'preached at Rome with so much force, action, and 'zeal, that he never spoke in public, but he made the 'people cry out Mercy, all thro' the streets, as they 'went home from his sermon (4). It is also said, that 'as he was one day preaching before the Pope, con-'cerning the obligation of bishops to residence, he 'so frightned, by the vehemence of his discourse, thir-'ty bishops who were his auditors, that they hurried 'away next morning to their respective dioceses.'

(1) Balzac, Miscellaneous Works, discourse VI, intituled, Paraphrase ou de la grande Eloquence, pag. m. 164.

(2) Rapin, R flexions on th Eloquence of Pulpit, num. of the first c tion, pag. 1 and num. 18, pag. 83, Du Edit. 1686.

(3) Nicius E thræus, call Jerom.

Peter de St Romuald seems to make a wrong use of the testimony of Balzac, for he applies it not to Father Narni but to another Capuchin. Nay, he does worse, he falsifies it, and pretends to find things in it which are really not there. This will easily be discovered, and needs nothing more than comparing the words of Balzac, with these following. 'About this time Fa-'ther Alphonso le Loup, a Capuchin, and a native of 'the city of Medina Sidonia, died. It was said of

(4) Balzac i this only of Lent-sermo and does no mention it's ing preache Rome.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google gain nothing upon the corruption of his auditors [B], he reſolved to appear no more in the pulpit; and having obtained leave for that purpoſe, he ſhut himſelf up in a cell, where he applied himſelf to writ the Hiſtory of the Capuchins: but the granting him this diſpenſation was ſoon repented of, and he was forced to reſume his function of a preacher. He appeared again in the pulpit, and had the ſame uneaſineſs as before; to ſee the fruitleſſneſs of his cenſures and exhortations; and that people came to hear him only to gratify their curioſity. His ill ſtate of health, procured him at laſt an entire diſcharge. As his good life had raiſed his reputation, no leſs than his eloquence, he was interred with greater pomp than had ever been before beſtowed on any monk of his order. His ſermons were printed as ſoon as he was dead but did not at all come up to the expectation of the public [C]: which had entertained too advantageous a notion of them. This turned very much to their prejudice, and beſides they were deſtitute of the advantages of action. This is what I have learnt from Nicius Erythræus (f).

(f) In Pinacoth. I, pag. 135, 136.

‘ Father Tollet a Jeſuit, that he taught well, and of ‘ Panigarolus, another great preacher, that he pleaſed; ‘ but of this Capuchin, that he touched the heart, and ‘ that very juſtly, for Balzac aſſures us in his Miſ- ‘ cellaneous Works, that having preached one day be- ‘ fore Pope Gregory, concerning the reſidence of bi- ‘ ſhops, he ſtruck ſuch a terror into thirty or forty ‘ biſhops, his auditors, that they hurried away the next ‘ morning to their reſpective dioceſes: as likewiſe that ‘ upon his preaching at Salamanca, the chief univer- ‘ ſity in Spain, eight hundred ſcholars renounced all ‘ the honours, riches, and pleaſures of this world, to ‘ profeſs a religious life in ſeveral orders, and eſpecial- ‘ ly in that of St Francis (5).’

(5) Peter de St Romuald, Abridgment of the Chronological Treaſury, Tom. iii, pag. m. 385, ad ann. 1600.

[B] He could gain nothing upon the corruption of his auditors.] This is very different from the relation Balzac has publiſhed, and which you have juſt now read. I leave it to thoſe who have leiſure to reconcile theſe matters, I ſhall content my ſelf with producing the following paſſage of my voucher. ‘ Vitio- ‘ rum incuſatio & querela ita acris ac vehemens, ut ‘ iis, qui eiſdem adhæreſcerent, cum nollent extrahi ‘ gravis & moleſta accideret: quamobrem ille, cum ‘ intelligeret aliquando, ſe operam perdere, & ſurdis, ‘ ut dicitur, fabulam canere, valetudinis excuſatione, ‘ eo ſe munere abdicandi & in ſolitudinem aliquam ‘ abeundi poteſtatem ſibi fieri poſtulavit: qua impe- ‘ trata, totum ſe ad hiſtoriam ſui ordinis ſcribendam ‘ contulit: ſed rurſus, ad eandem provinciam revoca- ‘ tus, cum, non minore libertate, in corruptos eorum ‘ mores, apud quos diceret, inveheretur; ita ab ali- ‘ quibus audiebatur, ut qui delectationem ex eo quæ- ‘ rere, non autem vitiorum, quibus laborabant, me- ‘ dicinam aliquam petere, aut oblatam accipere velle, ‘ fixum ac deliberatum haberent. Itaque in perpetuum ‘ (præſertim infirma valetudine cum eſſet,) ejus vaca- ‘ tionem muneris obtinuit (6). - - - - He reproved and ‘ complained of vice with ſo much ſharpneſs and vehemence ‘ that he became diſagreeable and troubleſome to thoſe ‘ who were ſo far gone in it, as to reſolve not to be re- ‘ formed: when therefore he came to underſtand, that ‘ his labour was all loſt, and that he was only preach- ‘ ing to the winds, he deſired leave, under pretence of ‘ ill health, to quit that function, and to retire into ‘ ſolitude: which having obtained he applied himſelf ‘ wholly to write the hiſtory of his order: but being ‘ again called to the office of preaching, and inveighing ‘ with as great freedom as before againſt the corrupt ‘ manners of his auditors, he found the attention of ſome ‘ of them, was only grounded on the view of being pleaſ- ‘ ed with his diſcourſe, without any deſire to ſeek a reme- ‘ dy for their vices, or accepting one when offered, againſt ‘ both which they appeared obſtinately fixed and deter- ‘ mined.’ A great many people will give more credit to Nicius Erythræus than to Balzac.

(6) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 136.

[C] His ſermons were printed, but did not come up to the expectation of the public.] I have obſerved the ſame thing with regard to Mr Morus (7), to whom we may apply this paſſage of Nicius Erythræus, as well as to Father Narni: ‘ Liber ejus concionum, ſi- ‘ mul ac diem obiit, ſtatim impreſſus apparuit; cui ‘ nihil tam obfuit, quam expectatio, quæ de ejus in- ‘ genio & eloquentia habebatur; quæ efficiebat, ut ‘ omnia quantumvis magna, minora expectatione vi- ‘ derentur. In quo etiam factum eſt palam, quanta ‘ in actione vis inſit, & quam jure primas illi Demoſt- ‘ henes, ſecundas, & tertias dederit, cum ea deficiente ‘ oratio eadem alia eſſe exiſtimetur (8). - - - - - His ‘ ſermons, which were printed, immediately after his ‘ death, laboured under no diſadvantage ſo great as the ‘ high opinion which had been conceived of his wit and ‘ eloquence, for this made every thing, how fine ſoever ‘ in itſelf, fall ſhort of expectation. Hence alſo it is ‘ evident, how much depends upon the force of action, ‘ and how juſtly Demoſthenes has aſcribed to it the firſt ‘ ſecond, and third parts of Oratory, when without it ‘ the ſame oration ſhall appear quite different.’

(7) Above, remark [I] of the article MORUS.

(8) Nic. Erythr. ubi ſupra.

NAVAGIERO (Andrew), in Latin Naugerius, a noble Venetian, was one of the illuſtrious men in the XVI century. He rendered himſelf conſiderable, not only by his eloquence and learning, but alſo by the ſervices he did his country in affairs of ſtate. He ſtudied the Latin tongue under Marcus Antonius Sabellicus at Venice, and the Greek under Marcus Muſurus at Padua (a). He propoſed for his model the ſtyle of Cicero, and by his funeral orations on Bartholomew d' Alviano, and on the Doge Leonard Loredano, he diſcovered himſelf to be an exellent Orator. He met with no leſs ſucceſs in Latin, and Italian poetry. His taſte for epigram was very different from that of Martial (b). I have taken notice elſewhere (c), of the averſion he had againſt that antient poet. He had no leſs averſion againſt Statius [A]. It is pretended that a too cloſe application to the ſtudy of the antients ſomething diſordered his head, and that he prevented the ill conſequences of this diſorder by going to the wars with Bartholomew d'Alviano; for he broke off by this means his attachment to books. It

(a) Jovius, in Elogiis doctorum Virorum, cap. lxxviii, pag. m. 180.

(b) Ex eodem, ibid.

(c) In the remark [C] of the article OVID.

[A] He had no leſs averſion againſt Statius.] Having read in an aſſembly of the Poets, ſome poems of his called Sylvæ, they told him the ſtyle was very much after the manner of Statius. This ſo diſturbed him, that he threw them into the fire, as ſoon as he got home; and his fancy being warmed at the ſight of this ſpectacle, he compoſed ſome extemporary verſes in Latin. Which excellently well expreſſed his indignation. He read it to the next poetical aſſembly (1). Famianus Strada relates it (2): Cum Sylvas aliquot ab ſe conſcriptas legiſſet, ut ſolebat, in Concilio Poetarum, audiſſetque Statiano Charakteri ſimiles videri, iratus ſibi, quod à Martiale fugiens, alio declinaſſet à Virgilio, cum primùm domum ſe recepit, protinus in Sylvas conjecit ignem; ejuſque calore ſuccenſus, Verſiculos propè extemporarios fudit, quos in eodem Conventu, qui proxime coactus eſt, ſub Ruſtici Acmonis perſonâ recitavit in hunc modum:

(1) Strada, Prolusione V, lib. ii, pag. m. 335.

(2) Ibid.

Has, Vulcane, dicat Sylvas tibi villicus Acmon,
Tu ſacris illas ignibus ure, Pater.
Creſcebant ducta è Stati propagine Sylvis,
Jamque erat ipſa bonis frugibus umbra nocens.

Ure

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It is added, that this remedy did not reſtore to him that ſtrength he had occaſion for, to diſcharge an employment the republic had conferred on him with a very great ſalary. It was that of compoſing a Hiſtory of Venice. Others ſay he began it very happily, but quitted it upon finding that the reſearches it required were too troubleſome and fatiguing (d). Others aſſure us (e) that he continued it, and that having begun it from the irruption of Charles VIII into Italy, he brought it down to his own time: but that not being able to put the finiſhing hand to it, he gave order, a little before his death, that it ſhould be burnt, together with his other works; for not having leiſure to reviſe them, he was afraid they might not anſwer what his character had given the world reaſon to expect from him [B]. He was ambaſſador from the republic to the emperor Charles V; and was ſcarce returned from this long embaſſy, when he was diſpatched to the court of Francis I. He performed this journey with great expedition; but ſoon after his arrival, was ſeized with a ſpotted fever, and died of it in a few days. This happened at Blois, the eighth day of May 1529. He was but forty-ſix years of age. Francis I. ordered him a magnificent funeral. His corps was carried to Venice, and buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors. BARTHOLOMEW and PETER NAVAGIERO, his brothers, were his heirs (f). BERNARD NAVAGIERO, the ſon of Bartholomew, is, if I miſtake not, the Cardinal Navagiero, whoſe article you will find in Moreri (g). You will there alſo meet with one ANDREW NAVAGERO eſteemed for his capacity and eloquence, who died in 1516, on his return from an embaſſy into Spain. I believe he has pretended to deſcribe the ſame perſon, whoſe article I here give, and conſequently has committed a great miſtake in the time of his death. Vianoli obſerves, that the funeral oration of Andrea Gritti, Doge of Venice, who died the ſeventeenth of December 1538, was pronounced by Bernardo Navagiero apice degl' ingegni eruditi di quei tempi (b). - - - - The top wit of his time. Nothing can more fully demonſtrate the eſteem Andrew Navagiero met with among the learned in Italy, than what is to be found concerning him in Pierius Valerianus (i).

(d) Ex Jovio, in Elogiis doctor. Virorum, cap. lxxviii, pag. 180.

(e) Fracaſtor. de Morbis contagioſis, lib. ii, pag. m. 158. See the remark [B].

(f) Ibid. pag. 156, & ſeq.

(g) At the word Navagero.

(b) Vianoli, dell' Hiſtoria Veneta, Tom. ii, pag. 191.

(i) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterat. Infelicitate, lib. ii, init.

Ure ſimul Sylvas, terra ſimul igne ſoluta,
Fertilior largo fœnore meſſis eat.
Ure iſtas, Phrygio nuper mihi conſita colle,
Fac, Pater, à flammis tuta ſit illa tuis.

Vulcan to thy dread fire, ſo will the Fates,
His Sylvæ, ruſtic Acmon dedicates.
From Statius's, their ill ſtarr'd birth they drew,
And thence luxuriant and unfruitful grew.
But may thy flames, while they devour the ſpoil,
For kinder harveſts warm the barren ſoil.
Rage on my Sylvæ, but oh! ſpare the crop,
Which late I choſe to plant on Ida's top.

This is giving a great looſe to prejudice.

[B] He gave order . . . . that his hiſtory ſhould be burnt, together with his other works; for . . . . he was afraid they might not anſwer what his character had given the world reaſon to expect from him.] Fracaſtorius, his friend (3) and admirer, acquaints us with all theſe particulars. Vir ſummi ingenii, ſays he (4), ſummique etiam ſpiritus, aſſiduis Patriæ occupationibus diſtentus, ut nullum ferè ſpatium Literarum ſtudiis ſupereſſet, ut qui ſe ipſum probè noſceret, quæ feciſſet, cum non eſſe hujuſmodi putaret, ut evulgari citra ſui nominis jacturam poſſent, dum tantæ exiſtimationi, quanta jam ipſe apud omnes eruditos omnium ferè Nationum agebat, utpote nec polita ſatis, nec unquam recognita, non uſquequaque reſponderent, quæcumque apud ſe habuit, paulo ante mortem igne delevit. Quare ejus Libri de Venatione duo pulcherrimi, in Bartholomæi Liviani gratiam Heroico Carmine eleganter ſcripti, & unus de ſitu Orbis eodem ſtylo confectus, quos alias legimus, periere: atque ut omittam Laudationem illam, quam in funere Catharinæ Cypriæ Reginæ, Marci Cornelii Senatoris ampliſſimi filiæ, de Veneta Corneliorum Gente nobiliſſima, ad Leonardum Lauretanum, Venetiarum Principem & Senatum publice habuit, & alia multa, quæ eodem igne concremata ſunt, quo piaculo dixerim luculentiſſimam Hiſtoriam, ab ingreſſu Caroli VIII, Gallorum Regis, in Italiam, ad ea uſque tempora tot vigiliis, tantoque labore ampliſſimorum Decemvirum juſſu deductam concidiſſe. He adds that nothing could be preſerved, but two funeral orations (5), and ſome verſes, of which ſome copies had been taken. Theſe were printed at Venice in 1530 in folio, as we learn from Geſner (6). See in the remark [M] of the article BEMBUS, a confirmation of what relates to the burning the works of our Naugerius.

(3) See Fracaſtorius's dialogue, intituled, Naugerius, ſive de Poetica.

(4) Fracaſt. de Morbis contagioſis, pag. m. 157.

NAVARRE (MARGARET DE VALOIS QUEEN OF) ſiſter to Francis I, was born in the city of Angouleſme the eleventh of April 1492 (a). She was a princeſs of extraordinary merit, and much admired for her virtue, piety, wit, and the productions of her pen. She was educated at the court of king Lewis XII, with very particular care, and married to the duke of Alençon in the month of December 1509 (b). She became a widow in April 1525 (c). Her affection to her brother king Francis I, was extraordinary. She went into Spain, when he was priſoner there, and did him all the good offices a kind and prudent ſiſter was capable of [A]. She was very ſerviceable to

(a) Anſelme, Hiſt. Geneal. pag. 183.

(b) Hilarion de Coſte, Elogy of Illuſtrious Ladies, Tom. ii, pag. 269.

(c) Id. ib.

[A] She did Francis I, all the ſervices a kind and prudent ſiſter was capable of.] Brantome's words will ſerve for a comment on this text. 'When the king 'was ſo very ill in Spain, being a priſoner there, ſhe 'went to viſit him, as a kind ſiſter and friend, with 'the leave and paſſ-port of the emperor; and found 'her brother in ſo wretched a condition, that had 'ſhe not come he had died; becauſe ſhe underſtood 'his temper and conſtitution better than all his Phy'ſicians could do, and cauſed him to be treated accor'dingly, which entirely recovered him: ſo that the 'king would often ſay, that without her he muſt have 'died; and that he was ſo much obliged to her for 'it, that he ſhould for ever acknowledge it, and love 'her (as he did) to his dying-day: and ſhe ſo well 'returned this love, that in his laſt ſickneſs, I have 'heard, ſhe ſpoke to this purpoſe. Should the cou'rier, who brings me the news of the king my bro'ther's recovery, be never ſo tired, haraſſed, and dir'ty, I would embrace and kiſs him as the fineſt prince 'and gentleman of France: and ſhould he want a bed 'and not be able to find one to repoſe himſelf, I would 'give him mine, and gladly lie on the hard ground 'for the ſake of the good news he would bring: 'but, when ſhe heard of his death, ſhe fell into ſo 'great lamentations, and ſuch an extreme of ſorrow, 'that ſhe never after recovered it, nor took any far'ther care of her affairs; as I have heard from my 'relations. At the time of her being in Spain, ſhe 'ſpoke ſo courageouſly and handſomely to the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to him in the affairs of government [B]. He had alſo an inexpreſſible friendſhip and regard for her; whereof he gave proofs even before the recovery of his liberty [C]. He married her in 1527 to Henry d'Albret II, king of Navarre, and gave him great advantages in the marriage contract [D]. She diligently applied her ſelf in conjunction with her huſband to all the meaſures which were capable of raiſing their dominions to a more flouriſhing condition [E], and there was a time when ſhe would gladly have introduced into them the reformation of the clergy. She very much inclined to what they called the new opinions, and protected thoſe who were perſecuted on that account [F]. She wrote a book which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, and found herſelf

' emperor, concerning his ill treatment of the king her ' brother, that he was amazed at her . . . . Theſe ' words pronounced ſo gravely, and with ſo much ' paſſion, brought the emperor to conſider the matter ' ſo well, that he moderated himſelf, and viſited the ' king, and promiſed him a great many fine things, ' which, he did not however perform for that time. ' But if this queen ſpoke ſo well to the emperor, ſhe ' did much more ſo to thoſe of his council, where ' ſhe had audience, and where ſhe triumphed with ' her fine ſpeaking, and graceful manner in which ſhe ' was not wanting (1). . . . . She prevailed ſo far at ' laſt, that her arguments were allowed to be good ' and to the purpoſe; and ſhe continued in great e- ' ſteem with the emperor, his council and court (2).

(1) Brantome, Memoirs of Illuſtrious Ladies, pag. 313, 314.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 5.

[B] . . . ſhe was very ſerviceable to him in the affairs of government.] We ſhall here again make uſe of the words of Brantome. ' Such was her diſcourſe, ' that the embaſſadors, who addreſſed her, were ex- ' tremely taken with it, and gave a high character ' of it to their countrymen at their return, and by ' this ſhe became a good aſſiſtant to the king her bro- ' ther; for they always waited on her after their ' principal audience, and frequently, when he had ' affairs of importance, he referred them intirely to ' her determination, ſhe ſo well knowing how to ' entertain and engage them with her fine ſpeeches, ' and being very artful and dextrous in pumping out ' their ſecrets: theſe qualifications the king would ' often ſay, made her of great uſe to him, in the ' eaſing his affairs. So that I have heard there ' was an emulation between the two ſiſters, who ſhould ' ſerve their brother beſt; the one, the queen of Hun- ' gary, her brother the emperor, the other her bro- ' ther king Francis; but the former by war and force, ' the latter by the activity of her fine wit and compli- ' ſance (3).' Add to this, another paſſage in the ſame author. During the impriſonment of the king her brother, ſhe was greatly aſſiſtant to the regent her mother in governing the kingdom, in keeping the princes, and grandees, eaſy, and gaining upon the nobility; for ſhe was of a very eaſy acceſs, and won the hearts of all people by the fine accompliſhments ſhe was miſtreſs of (4).

(3) Id. ib. pag. 312.

(4) Id. ib. pag. 316.

[C] Francis I, gave her proofs of his friendſhip for her . . . . even before the recovery of his liberty.] He ſubſtituted her after his mother to be regent and governeſs of Dauphiné . . . . . with the ſame honours and powers as he declares in theſe words, in his edict made at Madrid in November 1525. ' And if it happen that ' our ſaid lady and mother by ſickneſs, and indiſpo- ' ſition, or other impediment, or by death (which ' God of his mercy and goodneſs prevent), ſhall not ' be able to exerciſe the ſaid command, with reſpect ' to our ſaid ſon, and other children: WEE, in that ' caſe, will and ordain, that our moſt dear, moſt be- ' loved and only ſiſter, Margaret of France, ducheſs ' of Alençon and Berry, ſhall, in all things reſpect- ' ing the ſaid command, ſucceed in the room of our ' ſaid lady and mother; and do all that is above-ſaid, ' and have the like power, command and authority, as ' our lady and mother aforeſaid (5).'

(5) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloge des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. ii, pag. 271.

[D] And gave him great advantages in the marriage contract.] ' By the treaty of this marriage, concluded ' in the caſtle of St Germain en Laye, king Francis, ' promiſed and agreed, that he would demand the empe- ' ror to reſtore to this prince his kingdom of Na- ' varre, with it's antient juriſdictions; and, upon his re- ' fuſal, furniſh him with a ſufficient army to make ' himſelf maſter of it. Beſides this, the king gave ' him for her portion, the duchies of Alençon and Ber- ' ry, and the county of Armagnac, intailing this fine ' county on his deſcendants, whether males or females ' proceeding from this marriage (6).'

(6) Id. ib.

[E] She applied herſelf . . . . to all the meaſures which were capable of raiſing their dominions to a more flouriſhing condition.] Let us go on with the words of the Minim, who has furniſhed us with the commentary on the two preceding remarks. This new married couple deliberated . . . . how to put Bearn in a quite different condition from what it then was. This country, naturally good and fruitful . . . . lying in a bad ſtate, uncultivated and barren, through the negligence of it's inhabitants, quickly changed it's face by their management. They invited huſbandmen out of all the provinces of France, who occupied, improved, and rendered the lands fruitful: they cauſed the towns to be adorned and fortified; ſeats and caſtles to be built; that of Pau, amongſt others, with the fineſt gardens which were then in Europe. After having fitted up a handſome place of reſidence, they gave order about laws and good government; they eſtabliſhed, for the differences of their ſubjects, a court to determine them without appeal; and they reformed the common law of Oleron (7), which was made uſe of in that country, and which, ſince it's laſt reformation in 1288, had been greatly corrupted. By their converſation and court they civilized the people. And to guard themſelves againſt a new uſurpation from Spain, they covered themſelves with Navarrins, a town upon one of the Gaves, which they fortified with ſtrong ramparts, baſtions, and half-moons, according to the art then in uſe (8). This is one of the fineſt encomiums, that can be given on this queen of Navarre.

(7) The original has it le Fort d'Oleron; it ſhould be le Fors. The word is derived from the Latin Forum: where the courts were kept in Rome.

[F] She very much inclined to . . . the new opinions, and protected thoſe that were perſecuted for them.] Neither Catholic nor Proteſtant writers diſpute this point, both ſides confeſs it. The teſtimony of Beza ſhall be firſt alledged: I take it from the place where he relates the firſt perſecution which the reformed ſuffered in France, which was that of Meaux in 1523. And ſuch was the iſſue of this perſecution, that the biſhop of Meaux deſiſted from going any farther: Martial publicly retracted . . . . . Fabri (9) retired to Blois, and from thence at laſt to Nerac in the duchy of Albret by the favour of the king's only ſiſter, afterwards queen of Navarre, a princeſs of excellent underſtanding, and at that time raiſed up by God, to break, as much as was poſſible for her, the cruel deſigns of Antony Duprat, chancellor of France, and others who incenſed the king againſt thoſe they called Heretics (10). The ſame author having given an account of ſome perſons who ſuffered martyrdom and carried on his narrative to the year 1533, procedes thus (11): ' During theſe tranſactions, Mar- ' garet queen of Navarre, only ſiſter to king Francis, ' did all that was poſſible for her to mollify the king ' her brother; wherein ſhe did not wholly loſe her la- ' bour, making uſe of William Parui, doctor of the ' Sorbonne, biſhop of Senlis, and confeſſor to the ' king; who, to gratify her, and not out of any true zeal ' he had for religion, printed the Primmer in French, ' after having firſt ſtruck out ſome part of that which ' was moſt ſuperſtitious. After this impreſſion ſhe ' herſelf publiſhed a tract of her own in French rhime, ' called The Mirrour of the Sinful Soul, which was com- ' poſed in a ſtrain very unuſual in the church of Rome, ' there being no mention made in it either of male ' or female ſaints, or of merits, or of any other pur- ' gatory, than the blood of JESUS CHRIST; and even ' the prayer, commonly called Salve Regina, is there ' applied in French to the perſon of JESUS CHRIST ' . . . . . (12). The queen of Navarre, purſuing her ' point, had ſucceeded ſo well that Paris was furniſhed ' with three excellent preachers (13), declaring the ' truth with a boldneſs ſomething greater than uſual.

(8) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, Tom. ii, pag. 272, 273.

(9) That is James Faber Stapulenſis.

(10) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. book i, pag. 5.

(11) Id. ib. pag. 13.

(12) Id. ib. pag. 14.

(13) Viz. Gerard Rouſſel, doctor of the Sorbonne, and Bertault and Courault Auguſtin monks.

We ſhall now ſee all this more particularly in the following account of Florimond de Remond (14): The queen of Navarre, a good, but too eaſy, a princeſs, lends an ear to them, receives their books, at firſt by the hands of her ladies, cauſes the Latin prayers of the church to be tranſlated into French, by the biſhop of Senlis, the king's confeſſor. She talks to him of the Lutherans, and diſcourſes

(14) Flor. de Remond, Hiſtory of the Birth and Progreſs of Hereſy, book viii, chap. iii, pag. m. 848.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google herſelf expoſed to the indignation of the Divines [G], ſo that the king, her brother, was forced to employ his authority to reſtrain their inſolence. She had taken ſuch meaſures, as would perhaps have induced him to favour the Reformation (d), if the extravagance of ſome hot-headed people, who poſted up ſome placarts in the year 1534, had not exaſperated him to ſuch a degree, as to make him become afterwards a violent perſecutor of Lutheraniſm (e). She was obliged from that time to act with caution, and to conduct herſelf in ſuch manner as the Calviniſts have highly condemned, and which gave occaſion

(d) See Beza, Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Churches, book 1, pag. 15.

(e) n: of fi vi

diſcourſes with him of the articles of their religion, hoping to make him more ſoft and complying; out of commiſeration ſhe opens her houſes to ſuch as were baniſhed and proſcribed, and commands that they ſhould be their retreat and ſanctuary. This is particularly obſerved by all the Hiſtorians of both parties, that this princeſs was the ſole cauſe, without deſigning any ill, of the preſervation of the French Lutherans, and that the church, which afterwards took the name of Reformed, was not ſtifled in the cradle: for beſides that ſhe lent an ear to their diſcourſes, which at firſt were ſpecious, and not ſo bold as afterwards; ſhe, with a good intention, maintained a great many of them in ſchools at her own expence, not only in France, but alſo in Germany. She took a wonderful care to preſerve and ſecure thoſe that were in danger for the Proteſtant religion, and to ſuccour the Refugees at Straſburg and Geneva. Thither ſhe ſent to the learned, at one time, a benefaction of four thouſand livres . . . (15). I have read in the private regiſters of our parliament (16), that coming into court as governeſs, in the abſence of the king her huſband, ſhe made it her earneſt requeſt, that the court would releaſe one Andrew Melancthon, accuſed of Hereſy, and priſoner in the court-goal, which Philip Melancthon, ſhe ſaid, counſellor to the duke of Saxony, had ſtrongly ſollicited of her by his letters: this Andrew was he, who under the pretence of teaching ſchool, came to propagate his kinſman's doctrine in the Agenois; ſettling in the town of Tonneins, where he ſo ſucceſsfully ſowed his Hereſy, according to the Auſburg confeſſion, that the roots of it could never ſince be extirpated. In ſhort, this good-natured princeſs had nothing more at heart for thoſe nine or ten years, than to procure the eſcape of ſuch as the king expoſed to the rigour of juſtice. She frequently talked to him of it, and by little touches endeavoured to impreſs on his ſoul ſome pity for the Lutherans. This Hiſtorian gives alſo this account (17).

(15) Id. ib. pag. 849.

(16) That is, the parliament of Bourdeaux.

(17) Ubi ſupra, pag. 849.

'Rouſſel being returned from his travels, and received 'at Bern by this good princeſs, and entertained in 'her houſhold, pleaſed her with his diſcourſes on the 'Proteſtant religion. He perſuades her to read the 'Bible, then rudely turned into French; which ſhe 'did with ſo much pleaſure, that ſhe compoſed a 'tragi-comical tranſlation of almoſt all the New-'Teſtament, which ſhe cauſed to be repreſented in 'the hall before the king her huſband; having for that 'end obtained the beſt Comedians who were then in 'Italy. And as theſe buffoons are only to make 'ſport, and, like apes, to be pleaſant imitators of the 'humours and deſires of their maſters; ſo they, per-'ceiving the queen's inclination, intermingled in their 'playing ſeveral ſtanzas and roundelays upon the ſub-'ject of Eccleſiaſtics. Some poor Monk or Friar had 'always ſome part in the comedy or farce. It ſeemed 'they could not be merry without laughing at GOD, 'and his miniſters. But theſe laughings will be turned 'into tears. The king her huſband, a prince as good-'natured as the queen, went from the comedy to 'ſermons, which they called exhortations, which 'were delivered in his chamber, both by Rouſſel, and 'a fugitive Carmelite of Tarbe, called Solon. Theſe 'ſermons, particularly thoſe of Solon, who was more 'ſharp and violent than his companion, abounded 'with abuſes againſt the Pope and church-men. A 'brave and courageous monk, who, before he died, 'diſpatched five wives. They mingled ſome appear-'ance of piety and devotion, with an oſtentation of 'the true underſtanding of the Goſpel. This occa-'ſioned the Cardinals de Foix (18) and Gramont, 'being no longer able to bear theſe extraordinary 'proceedings of the king, who went to church only 'for form ſake, to retire from his court. But, as 'from the comedies in his hall, he was led to the ex-'hortations in his chamber; ſo from theſe prayers 'he was made to deſcend to the manducations in the 'cave, or at leaſt in the ſecret places of the mint; which 'is upon the deſcent of the terras of the caſtle of Pau. 'This was the name they then gave their ceremonies, 'which at preſent they call the Supper.' He added (19), that Francis I, being informed of this fine trade which was driven at Pau, was angry, and ſent for his ſiſter; that ſhe came to him, conducted by the lord de Burie, governour of Guienne, who was ſeized with the ſame folly: that at her coming the king reprimanded her, tho' he loved her infinitely; that ſhe anſwered like a Catholic; that ſhe nevertheleſs propoſed to the king the introduction of a reformed Maſs, which was called the Maſs in ſeven points; that ſhe cauſed him to hear the ſermons of three Lutheran preachers; that at her requeſt Rouſſel, one of them, who had been put in priſon, was releaſed; that the king was ſomething ſhaken upon the propoſal of a Maſs of ſeven points (20), and had it not been for the placarts, it was to be feared his ſiſter's addreſs would have made a great progreſs.

(18) Florimond is here miſtaken; there was no Cardinal de Foix: others ſay the Cardinal d'Armagnac. See Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 273.

(19) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra, pag. 849.

[G] She wrote a book which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, and found herſelf expoſed to the indignation of the Divines.] This book was intituled, The Mirrour of the ſinful Soul, and was printed in 1533. I have ſpoken of it above (21). The contents of it 'exceamly provoked the Sorbonne, and eſpecially Beda, 'and others of his humour; ſo that they could not 'forbear attacking her in their ſermons; and in 'particular, a comedy was acted in the college of Na-'varre, wherein ſhe was transformed into a Fury of 'Hell; what is more, they condemned her book: of 'which, ſhe having complained to the king her brother, 'ſome of the actors of this comedy were impriſoned; 'and the king demanding upon what reaſons the con-'demnation of this book was founded, the univerſity, 'who then had Nicolas Cop for their rector, expreſsly 'diſowned the cenſure of the Sorbonne; which, in 'ſome meaſure abated the fury of our maſters, and 'greatly ſtrengthened the ſmall number of the Faithful. 'At that time alſo John Calvin, upon his return from 'his ſtudies of the Law, came to Paris, where he 'greatly promoted the work of the LORD, not only 'by teaching the truth, but alſo by oppoſing Heretics, 'whom the Devil endeavoured to thruſt into the 'church, particularly that wretched monſter Michael 'Servetus, who, among other blaſphemies, denied the 'Holy Trinity, and the Eternity of the SON of GOD; 'which Servetus having appointed to diſpute with 'Calvin at a certain day and hour, durſt not however 'appear. It was then alſo that he firſt repulſed the 'Libertines, who, in our time, have renewed the 'abominable ſect of the Carpocratians, removing all 'diſtinction between good and evil. It happened at the 'ſame time, that it being the cuſtom of the univer-'ſity of Paris to aſſemble at All-Saints in the church 'of the Mathurins, where the rector is to harangue; 'Cop, whom we have before-mentioned, ſpoke 'an oration, which had been made for him by Calvin, 'in a quite different ſtile from what was uſual. This 'being reported to the parliament, the rector was ſent 'for with a deſign to detain him, and ſerjeants were 'alſo ſent to the college of Forteret, where Calvin 'then reſided (22).' This we learn from Beza. You will find a fine account of this, with all the particular circumſtances, in a letter written by Calvin to Francis Daniel in 1533 (23). There, among other things, you will find, that after the ſatisfaction, which was made by the rector of the univerſity, the king commanded that the biſhop of Paris ſhould appoint the preachers in the pariſhes. This was in order to hinder the Sorboniſts from continuing to manage them, according to their caprices, and to make choice of the moſt outrageous preachers. Allatum eſt regium diploma, quo Pariſienſi Epiſcopo permittitur præficere quos velit ſingulis parochiis concionatores, qui prius pro libidine illorum eligebantur, ut quiſque erat clamoſiſſimus & ſtolido furore præditus quem illi zelum vocant (24). We have ſeen in another place (25), the furious inſolence with which a guardian of the Franciſcans preached againſt this queen.

[H] She

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google occasion to the Papists to say that she perfectly renounced her errors [H]. There are proofs

[H] She conducted herself in such a manner, as the Calvinists have highly condemned, and which gave occasion to the Papists to say that she perfectly renounced her errors.] Beza, relating the consequences of the rigorous prosecution to which the Faithful were exposed, after the affair of the placarts, says, 'that the greatest misfortune was, that most of the grandees began to suit themselves to the humour of the king; and by degrees grew such strangers to the study of the Scriptures, that at last they became worse than all others; nay, even the queen of Navarre began to behave her self in a quite different manner, falling into Idolatry like the rest; not that she approved such superstitions in her heart, but because Ruffi, and others like him, persuaded her they were indifferent things: the consequence of which was such, that at last she was blinded with a spirit of error, having admitted into her house two desperate Libertines, Quintin and Pocques, whose blasphemies and errors, with an ample confutation of them, are to be seen in John Calvin's works (26).' He speaks more favourably of her in his Icones; for having, in a few words represented the good services she had done the Reformed, he contents himself to add, that she a little eclipsed her glory by her credulity in her later years. Quamvis ipsius gloriæ nonnullam in ultima tandem ipsius ætate credulitas labem asperserit (27). Many are persuaded, that in complaisance to the king her brother, she observed all the externals of Popery, with an exactness which deceived this great monarch. Read the following passage: The constable of Montmorenci discoursing . . one day with the king, made no difficulty or scruple to tell him, that if he would quite exterminate the Heretics of this kingdom, he must begin with his court, and with his nearest relations, naming the queen his sister; to which the king answered, Let us not speak of that; she loves me too much; she will never believe but what I believe, nor take up a religion to the prejudice of my state (28). Brantome had been saying (29), that this queen was suspected of Lutheranism, but out of respect and love to the king her brother, who loved her entirely, and always called her his darling, she never made any profession or appearance of it; and if she believed it, she always kept it to herself with very great secrecy, because the king violently hated it, declaring that this, and every new sect, tended more to the destruction of kingdoms, monarchies, and dominions, than to the edification of souls. Others believe, that it was not possible for Francis I, to be ignorant the queen of Navarre was a Lutheran in her heart; her attachments to the party, and the protection she gave the fugitives for this cause, were not such things as could be concealed from the king of France: he only seemed not to know them, and was satisfied with the exterior of a princess whom he loved and was not willing to make uneasy. But if she inwardly adhered to the Roman communion, it was not however till towards the conclusion of her life; for it is certain that Roussel (30), whom she made bishop of Oleron, was nothing less than a Papist (31), tho' he did not come to an open rupture. However it be, let us see what a Catholic writer says of the end of this queen. But not, says he (32), to obscure the honour and glory of so great a princess . . . . it is certain that some years before her death, she acknowledged her error, and withdrew from the precipice from which she was falling, resuming her former piety and catholic devotion, protesting to her death, that she had never departed from it; that what she had done for them, proceeded more from compassion, than any ill-will to the antient religion of her fathers . . . . Lying upon her death-bed, she received the body of her Creator, and resigned her soul, embracing the cross she had upon her bed, as I have heard it related by Giles Caillau, a good Franciscan, who gave her the extreme unction, and assisted her in her last moments. The lady de Riberac, a good and virtuous woman, of the family of Candalle, who was educated with her, told me, that Calvin . . . . frequently exhorted her, both by letters and messages, to maintain the truth; and that she desired him to come to her, to make her see and acknowledge her error, and to place her in the way of salvation. Hilarion de Coste says, 'that in her later years she frequented the sacraments of confession, and of the altar, in the church of the White-Friers at Paris, where . . . . she confessed to Francis le Picard . . . . doctor of Divinity . . . communicated from the hand of this holy person, after having heard his mass and sermon (33). He adds, that she built, and founded at her own expence, towards the conclusion of her life *, churches and hospitals, among others that of the red-coat boys at Paris, for the maintenance and education of orphans, whom she ordered to be called the Children of GOD the FATHER. Here is yet a stronger testimony: 'She died a good Christian and Catholic, against the opinion of many: but as for my own part, I can affirm myself, being a little boy in her court, with my grand-mother and mother, never to have seen her do any contrary act; so that when she retired into a nunnery, in Augoumois, after the death of the king her brother, which was called Tusson, where she performed her quarantine, and resided a whole summer, and built a fine house, she was often seen to do the office of the abbess, and to chant with the nuns at their masses and vespers (34).'

From all this we may infer, that Mezerai did not much examine things, when he writ (35), that the queen of Navarre, being censured by the king her brother, in 1535 (36), protested to him, that she would never more depart from the Catholic religion, and even declared herself an enemy to it's opposers; nevertheless, towards the end of her days, in 1549, she seemed to repent of her repentance, and desired Calvin by letters, to come and instruct and comfort her. Such strange falsehoods raise great prejudices against this author; and if ever his histories should happen to be criticised by some able pen, I am certain it will be wondered, how they came to be so much esteemed. We shall observe, by the by, two other faults of his. He says, that after the recantation of Briçonnet (37), James le Fevre retired to Nerac to queen Margaret (38), and that Roussel was bishop of Oleron at the time she was reprimanded by Francis I (39). All this is false. Briçonnet recanted in 1523, and our Margaret was not married till 1527 to the king of Navarre, lord of Nerac: Roussel was not made bishop till a long time after the reprimand here in question.

Beza's words, which we have seen at the beginning of this remark, greatly want to be explained. He gives us plainly to understand, that the queen of Navarre suffered her mind to be corrupted by two wretched libertines, whose illusions and blasphemies Calvin confuted. This should not have been so expressed; for Beza himself has owned, in another book, that this queen did not follow the mystical doctrines of these men (40); and that she was deceived no farther by them, than to believe them honest men. What he there says rectifies the former passage, and stands in need of a farther softening; for the term of fascinating or bewitching is too strong on this occasion. 'Offensa est isto libro in Libertinos edito Navarrena, quod ab illius horrendæ sectæ Antesignanis duobus Quintino & Pocqueso, quos nominatim Calvinus arguerat, (rem pene incredibilem) eo usque fuisset fascinata, ut quum alioquin illorum mysterium non teneret, pro bonis viris illos haberet, ac proinde sese quodammodo per eorum latus confossam arbitraretur (41).--The queen of Navarre was displeased at this book published against the libertines, because she was so incredibly bewitched with Quintin and Pocques, two ringleaders of that horrid sect, whom Calvin had confuted by name, that tho' she did not profess their opinions, yet she took them to be good men, and therefore, in some measure, thought herself wounded through their sides.' He ought not to have made it such a wonder, that this queen, tho' not conforming to the spiritualities of these devotees, and mystical people, believed them however to be honest men, sincerely convinced within themselves of the truth of what they delivered, and possessed with a true desire of serving GOD, according to the best of their understanding. Her charity induced her to protect them, and it was not difficult for her to make a good use of their maxims, which tended to quicken the inward man. It was much less to be wondered that she was provoked against Calvin, who with that cutting stile, peculiar to him, had severely handled the persons, whom she had protected and maintained. She complained to him of it, and he wrote a respectful letter to her to justify his conduct (42). Note, that at the time he wrote to her, that is, on the twentieth of April, 1545, she was still acknowledged as the

(33) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 275.

* I. Du Breuil in his Antiquities of Paris.

(34) Brantome, ubi supra, pag. 318.

(35) Mezerai, Chronological Abridgment, Tom. vi, pag. 409.

(36) He should have said in 1533.

(37) Bishop of Meaux.

(38) Mezerai, ubi supra, pag. 406.

(39) Id. ib. pag. 408.

(40) It is thus I interpret these words, illorum mysterium non teneret, in the passage of Beza, cited below, citation (41). Those who would have them signify, that she did not discover their hypocrisy, seem to me to be mistaken; and if they would have them mean, that she understood nothing of the jargon of these Fanatics, they come up to my sense of them.

(41) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1544.

(42) It is Calvin's sixty-second Letter.

(26) Beza, ubi supra, pag. 22.

(27) Idem, in Icones, folio T ij.

(28) Brantome, Illustrious Ladies, pag. 310.

(29) Id. ib. pag. 309.

(30) The same whom Beza calls Ruffi.

(31) See Florimond de Remond, ubi supra, pag. 850, 851.

(32) Id. ib. ch. xv. pag. 855, 856.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google proofs that she took a very great pleasure in reac mortification from her husband, and did not lov curiosity which induced her to an attentive observa her ideas concerning the nature of the soul w phical [L]; though there have been some very who have thought no better than she upon that im is a book after the taste of Boccace's novels, ha

the protectress of the Reformed. 'Cum acceptis illis 'literis statim ad hanc responsionem me contulerim, 'qua eo tibi nomine à me satisfactum curarem, ne 'quid de eo affectu remitteres, quem erga pios hactenus 'abunde præ te tulisti & reipsa exhibuisti (43). - - - - 'When immediately on the receipt of those letters, I dis- 'patched this answer, that I might give you full satis- 'faction on this account, lest you should abate any thing 'of that zeal, which hitherto you have made profession 'of, and in reality expressed.'

(43) Calvin. Epist. 62, pag. m. 151.

[I] There are proofs that she took very great pleasure in reading the Bible.] See in the remark [F] (44) of this article, the words of Florimond de Remond, and in the remark [O] of the article Marot, what was written to Catherine de Medicis, and confirm all this with the testimony of Peter Olhagaray. Bern, says he (45), was the sanctuary of the persecuted, and king Henry would not permit them to be disturbed. James Faber Stapulensis, the light of his time, as his Philosophical writings witness, was very welcome there, and received an honourable pension from Margaret, that learned queen, the greatest in the world; that happy instrument, who retrieved king Francis, her brother, from prison, and is always attentive to reading, particularly the holy Scriptures; which our Elias (46), in his collection declares to have observed of her, in her city of Appamyers, where he received this grave advice from that brave and wise princess: that he should never let pass a day, without applying some part of an attentive reading of some pages of this holy book, which, watering our souls with a celestial liquor, serves us, says she, for faithful preservatives against all sorts of mischiefs and temptations of the Devil. The author relates Bertrand Elias's words; which I doubt not a great many readers will be glad to meet with. Cujus etiam manibus sanctissimum illud veteris novique Test. volumen, quod Bibliam appellant, nunquam vel raro exit, semper divinis ut verè Christianam decet intenta libellis: nihil unquam nisi divinum cogitat, suadetque adeo ut ipse etiam meminerim me aliquando ab ea cum Appamyam venisset humanissime submonitum, jussumque partem aliquam vel veteris vel Novi Testamenti maximo affectu, orationis instar quotidie legere, quo sane, ut ipsa ajebat, nosque etiam postea experti sumus, nostra mens à vitio averteretur, & ad virtutes facilius accederet (47).

(44) Citat. (17).

(45) Peter Olhagaray, History of Foix, Bearn, and Navarre, pag. 502.

(46) This is an author who has writ the History of the affairs of Foix in Latin.

(47) Elias, folio 103, quoted by Olhagaray, ibid.

[K] She met with some mortifications from her husband, and did not love to hear any mention of death.] Hilarion de Coste says (48), that Henry II, king of Navarre, 'having been informed, that there was used in 'his wife's chamber some form of prayer and instruction contrary to that of his fathers, entered it, 'with a resolution to punish the minister, but finding 'they had contrived his escape, the weight of his anger fell upon the queen, to whom he gave a box 'of the ear, saying to her, Madam, you want to be 'too knowing, and immediately gave advice of it to 'king Francis.' Brantome having given some instances of matrimonial discord betwixt princes, adds this (49): 'And lately king Henry d'Albret with queen 'Margaret of Valois, as I have it from good hands, 'who treated her very ill, and would have done still 'worse, had it not been for king Francis her brother, 'who spoke home and rough to him, and charged 'him with threatnings to honour the queen his sister 'in regard to the rank she bore.' Note, by the way, what little reliance there is upon an epitaph. That of this princess says in great characters, that her husband lived, with her in the most perfect unity, CONCORDISSIMUS. I have said something elsewhere (50) concerning falsities of this kind.

(48) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 274. He cites P. Matthieu.

(49) Brantome, ubi supra, pag. 242.

(50) In the remark [G] of the article HERLICIUS.

As for the other part of the text of this remark, I am going to cite a passage out of Brantome: 'this 'queen used to reply, to those who discoursed to her 'of death and happiness, all this is true, but we re- 'main such a long time dead in the earth, before we 'come at it: insomuch that I have heard my mo- 'ther say, who was one of her ladies, and my grand-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google surprizing. She died in the month of December 1549 [M], and was honoured with an infinite number of panegyrics (f). Out of four children, which she had by her second marriage, one son and three daughters, only one daughter survived her. (g). I speak of her in the following article. The two others were born before their time, and died on the day of their birth. The son died at the age of two months (b). I design a remark for what concerns this queen's writings [N], and I will not forget the base attempt curiosity, and humbly submitted herself to the light of revelation.

(g) Hilarion de Coste, ibid. pag. 272.

(b) Id. ib.

[M] She died in the month of December 1549.] These words are from Brantome (55), and he adds that she died in Bearn in the castle Dandaus (56), and that she took her illness looking at a comet, which then appeared upon the death of Pope Paul III, and she herself was of that opinion, but possibly it appeared for her and immediately her mouth was a little distorted, which her Physician, Mr d'Escuranis, seeing, had her removed and put to bed, and took care of her, for it proved a catarrh, and she died within eight days after (57). Brantome is mistaken as to the place, but does not mention the day. She died in Bigorre and not in Bearn. Olhagaray calls the place Eudos (58), and others Odos (59). Odosii Bigerronum decessit. - - - She died at Odos in Bigorre, says Thuanus (60). Fato functa est Odosii Tarbellorum. - - - She died at Odos in Guienne, says Scevola Sammarthanus (61). Thuanus's words have not been well translated by du Rier, nor Sammarthanus by Mr Teissier. The former makes it Ortez in Bigorre the latter Tarbes in Gascogne (62). Peter de St Romuald is the most mistaken of all, for he will have it that this queen died in Bretagne (63). I believe Spondanus, who was of those parts, is more to be relied on, than all the other writers as to the name of the castle where she died. He calls it Audos. Apud Audossium castrum in Bigerronibus vitam finivit (64). - - - - - She departed this life at Audos in Bigorre. I have said elsewhere (65) that the Parisians pronounce the dipthong au like o; which might perhaps deceive Thuanus. There is some variation, as to the day of her death. Father Labbe has fixed the twenty fourth of December (66) : du Tillet the fourteenth (67). Thuanus the twenty first. This last is the account we must hold to, it being the date in queen Margaret's epitaph. It is there also said that she lived fifty nine years, but this cannot agree with the Historians, who all say she was born in April 1492.

[N] I design a remark for what concerns this queen's writings.] She composed several works of poetry ; the titles whereof we have in du Verdier Vau-Privas (68). They were collected into one body by John de la Haye, her Valet de Chambre, and published in the year 1547, under the title of Marguerites de la Marguerites des Princesses, tres illustre Royne de Navarre. Du Verdier gives this title very exactly ; but he has made some gross mistakes upon other points ; for he says that this queen's poetical works, were collected and put together after her decease, by the diligence of Simon Sylvius, called de la Haye, her Valet de Chambre, who printed them in 8vo at Lyons, by John de Tournes 1547. I have seen this edition, and observed that the privilege granted by the parliament to J. Sylvius, called de la Haye, is of the year 1546. This then is one mistake of du Verdier Vau-Privas to call him Simon, whose name was John : but this is not so gross as the following. He pretends that a book printed in 1547, came out after the death of the queen of Navarre. If he had read the epistle before the book (69), he would have known that this queen was still alive, when John de la Haye, the author of this epistle, printed Margaret de Valois's Poems. Mr Moreri has committed some errors. He says, that this queen published amongst other works, ' La Marguerite des Marguerites, which contained some ' poems and several other Comedies. The Mirrour of ' a sinful Soul. The Triumph of the Lamb. The Hep- ' tameron.' There is nothing exact in this. This title, la Marguerite des Marguerites is false : the true one is Marguerites (70) de la Marguerite des Princesses. Pasquier (71), and a great many other writers, have been guilty of the same fault. These words, contained some poems and several other comedies, are quite wrong : and I wonder Moreri's revisors have not yet perceived it. There is no opposition betwixt poems and comedies ; for comedies are generally in verse, and there were hardly any other seen among the French in that age. He should not then have made a distinction between the queen of Navarre's poems and comedies. Much less ought he to have said other comedies ; since this supposes, that other pieces had been specified which were comedies ; which had not been done. But the most considerable mistake is to say, that the Mirrour of the Sinful Soul, and the Triumph of the Lamb, are two different works from the pretended Marguerite des Marguerites. When one of them is the first work which appears in that collection intituled Marguerites de la Marguerite, &c : and the other is to be met with from folio 182 verso, to folio 212 in the same collection (72). Note, that du Verdier Vau-Privas, by saying that Simon Sylvius collected the poems of the queen of Navarre, has occasioned another error in Mr Moreri ; for this made him believe that Simeon Bosius (73), whose learned notes we have upon Cicero's epistles to Atticus, was called de la Haye, and had been Valet de Chambre to Margaret queen of Navarre. He might have avoided this mistake, had he considered, I. That this princess's Valet de Chambre was old (74) when he published the Marguerites, &c. II. That Simeon Bosius died young, as Sammarthanus, cited by Mr Moreri, informs us. Note, that there was printed at Pau in 1552 in 4to, an eclogue which had not appeared in the collection of the Marguerites ; and which was composed by the same queen (75). Dr Silvestre in 1693, sent me from London a copy of the Tombeau de Marguerite Royne de Navarre, &c. Some body had written in it, that this princess was the author of a book, intituled, the pious Meditations of a Christian Soul, which was translated into English by queen Elizabeth, and printed at London in 8vo, in 1548.

We shall now speak of the Heptameron, and first cite Brantome : ' She wrote in her gay hours a book, ' intituled The Novels of the queen of Navarre, in a ' stile so soft and flowing, and so full of excellent lan- ' guage and fine reasoning, that I have heard say the ' queen-mother, and the duchess of Savoy, when they ' were young, undertook to write novels separately, ' in imitation of this queen of Navarre, well knowing ' that she was writing some ; but when they had seen ' her's, they were so disgusted with their own, which ' were not to compare to them, that they threw them ' into the fire, and would not publish them . . . She ' composed most of these novels in her litter, as she ' travelled ; for her hours of retirement were employ- ' ed in affairs of importance. I have heard this account ' also from my grand-mother, who always went with ' her in her litter, as her lady of honour, and held ' her standish for her ; and she wrote them down as ' quick and as readily, or rather more so, than if they ' had been dictated to her (76).' This confutes the uncertainties of la Croix du Maine : you will find them at the end of the following passage. The Heptameron, says he (77), or the queen of Navarre's seven days, is a book full of various histories, for the most part fabulous, in imitation of John Boccace, a Florentine. This book has been methodized by Claude Gruget of Paris, and intituled the Heptameron, or the history of Fortunate Lovers ; Novels of the most illustrious and excellent princess Margaret de Valois queen of Navarre, &c. Printed at Paris by Giles Robinot in the year 1567 (78). I question whether this princess composed this book ; forasmuch as it is full of bold discourses, and tickliſh expressions. If la Croix du Maine had read the epistle dedicatory of Claude Gruget's edition, he could not have formed the least doubt ; for this Gruget, addressing himself to Jane d'Albret, only daughter to queen Margaret, declares, that he had restored the book of this queen's novels to it's first state ; because the first edition had, as it were, totally transformed it, and omitted or concealed the name of this princess. Wherefore, adds he, to make it worthy of it's author, as soon as it was published, I collected from all parts, the manuscripts which could be recovered, and collated them with my copy ; and I have taken care to reduce them to the true order, in which she wrote them. Since that, by the king's permission, and your consent, they have been put to the press to be published, (72) In the Paris edition by Stephen Grouleau 1552, in 16mo.

(73) See Moreri in the article BOIS (SIMEON DU).

(74) This appears by the Epistle Dedicatory.

(75) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoise, pag. 844.

(76) Brantome, Dames Illustres, pag. 320, 321.

(77) La Croix du Maine, French Biblioth. pag. 309.

(78) When he speaks of Claude Gruget, pag. 58, he only mentions the edition of 1561, by Giles Robinot. And note, that du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Françoise, pag. 844, only quotes the edition of 1578, by the same, in 4to.

(f) Hilarion de Coste, Eloges Historiques, Tom. II, part. 2. pag. 268. Thuan. lib. VI, pag. 117.

(55) Brantome, ubi supra, pag. 318.

(56) I believe, that Brantome had writ d'Audaux, or rather d'Audos ; and that the translators or Printers have corrupted this word.

(57) Id. ib. pag. 318.

(58) Olhagaray, ubi supra, pag. 603.

(59) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 275.

(60) Thuan. lib. VI, pag. 117.

(61) Sammarth. Eleg. lib. I, pag. m. 28.

(62) See Mr Teissier, Eloges, Tom. I, pag. 17, & 19, Edit. 1696.

(63) St Romuald, Accidement of the Treas. of Chron. ad ann. 1549, pag. m. 306.

(64) Spondanus, ad ann. 1549, num. 6.

(65) Above, remark [A] of the article LOGNAC.

(66) Labbe, Chron. Tom. II, pag. 761.

(67) Du Tillet, Chronicle of the Kings of France, abridged, pag. m. 190.

(68) In pag. 843, 844, of his French Biblioth.

(69) It is addressed to Madam, the princess of Navarre, daughter to queen Margaret.

(70) It must be observed, that Marguerite is the name of a flower-de-luce ; and thus, by metaphor, Rich collection, consisting of a rich and studied stile, were formerly called Marguerites.

(71) In the Searches of France, book VIII, ch. 3, pag. m. 614.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google attempt of admiral de Bonnivet [O]. It wc here, that the Hiſtory of Margaret de Valois que

(i) According to the Paris edition. at Amſterdam (i), in two volumes in 12mo, romantic chimeras from the beginning to th
It had been much better that the perſon, whc fables, had employed it in giving the true and Such an Hiſtory had been more for the hono
(k) The conſtable de Bourbon. heroine of a romance in love with a prince (k), and to whom ſhe never was married. There i as they ought. Such a preſent, continues he, will not be new to you, you will only recognize it, as your mother's heireſs: however I perſuade my ſelf, that it will be acceptable to you to ſee it by this ſecond impreſſion reſtored to it's primitive ſtate: for (as I have heard) the firſt diſpleaſed you; not but that he who undertook it was a learned man, and had taken pains in it; and, as is eaſy to believe, would not have thus diſguiſed it without ſome reaſon for it; yet his labour proved diſagreeable. Theſe paſſages of Claude Gruget's epiſtle dedicatory may ſerve for two purpoſes: they acquaint us with ſomething of the hiſtory of the Heptameron, and invincibly confute all thoſe who believe the queen of Navarre, did not compoſe theſe novels. Would any one have ventured to talk to the princeſs, her daughter, as he does in the epiſtle dedicatory, if this book had been ſuppoſititious, or if the liberty had been taken to add to it thoughts or expreſſions too free and licentious? Thuanus does not doubt, but that queen Margaret was the author of this work; he does not think it becoming the gravity and later conduct of this heroine; but he excuſes her upon the time and youth in which ſhe writ it. Ejus nomine & fabellarum volumen imitatione Joa. Bocatii editum circumfertur, ſi tempora & juvenilem ætatem, in qua ſcriptum eſt, reſpicias, non prorſus damnandum, certe gravitate tantæ heroinæ, & extrema vita minus dignum (79). The Sieur Sorel denies that this princeſs was the author of the Heptameron. I relate his words, becauſe they contain a bad reaſoning, which ought to be refuted. 'We have the novels of the queen of Navarre; in which there is a ſtory of a gentleman, 'who lay with his mother, and afterwards married 'the daughter that he had by her, who was at 'once his ſiſter, his wife, and his daughter. There 'are alſo in it a great many execrable ſtories of prieſts 'and Franciſcans; all which things never had exiſtence, but were the inventions of a Huguenot, who 'was the author of the book (80).' The argument this writer alledges, has two great defects. In the firſt place it proves too much; for if it were juſt, we muſt ſay that Boccace, and ſeveral other Italians, who have written novels, and filled them with an hundred bad actions of the Monks, were Lutherans. In the ſecond place; if it were peculiar to a Huguenot to write ſuch ſtories, the queen of Navarre might do it; for ſhe was a good friend to the party, ſecretly at leaſt, for a great many years together.

(79) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. 117, col. 2. D.

(80) Sorel, Remarks upon the thirteenth book of the Extravagant Shepherd, pag. 720.

Note, that the Heptameron was grown very ſcarce; which cauſed the Bookſellers of Amſterdam to reprint it in 1698. They publiſhed two editions of it, one by that of Claude Gruget, the other metamorphoſed into new French: the latter will pleaſe foreigners, who only underſtand the modern language, and many ignorant and lazy Frenchmen, who care not to be at the pains of informing themſelves, how they ſpoke in the reign of Francis I. I ſhall ſay ſomething elſewhere (81) againſt the falſe and ſhameful delicacy of theſe people. The other edition is the only one which will be uſed by Frenchmen of good taſte and Judgment.

(81) In the remark [E] of the article OSSAT.

But we ſhall not conclude without making a more conſiderable obſervation. Behold here a prudent, very virtuous, and moſt pious queen, who nevertheleſs compoſes a book of ſtories pretty free and ſmutty, and yet would have the world to know her to be the author. How many ladies are there actually plunged in the diſorders of a filthy gallantry, who would not, for all the world, write in that ſtrain? What they write, and even what they ſpeak, has the air of an extraordinary modeſty: one would ſay, their imagination durſt not approach within a hundred leagues of obſcenity; diſcourſes never ſo little free, which a man ſhould offer in their preſence, would put them to the bluſh, and make them aſſume a gravity, which would have all the appearances of an extream indignation. It is not impoſſible but they might be inwardly ſhocked,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google invented by the writer (l), than in the generoſity, wherewith our Margaret de Valois actually protected ſeveral perſons of merit preſecuted for the ſake of religion [P].

(l) Note, that, according to the ordinary courſe of human actions, virtue is compatible with the love of a maid for a man, though ſhe knows not whether ſhe ſhall ever be married to him. But according to the idea of perfection, ſuch a love is contrary to virtue. It ought not then to be found in a lady formed at pleaſure to ſerve for a model of perfection. This is what the writers of romances cannot conform to, for they take it for a rule, that love is the ſoul of their works.

queen of Navarre's novels, but he adds, he will not publiſh the name of the princeſs, whom this favourite had endeavoured to ſurprize.

[P] The generoſity wherewith our Margaret . . . protected ſeveral perſons of merit perſecuted for the ſake of religion.] I do not examine whether Florimond de Remond has it from good authority, that ſhe proteſted at her death, that what ſhe had done for the followers of the new opinions, proceeded rather from compaſſion, than from any ill will to the antient religion of her fathers (92). But granting her proteſtation to be ſincere, I maintain, there was ſomething more heroical in her compaſſion and generoſity, than there would have been, had ſhe been perſuaded that the fugitives ſhe protected were orthodox. For a princeſs, or any other woman, to do good to thoſe, whom ſhe takes to be the houſhold of faith, is no extraordinary thing, but the common effect of a moderate piety. But for a queen to grant her protection to people perſecuted for opinions which ſhe believes to be falſe; to open a ſanctuary to them, to preſerve them from the flames prepared for them, to furniſh them with a ſubſiſtence, liberally to relieve the troubles and inconveniencies of their exile, is an heroical magnanimity, which has hardly any precedent: it is the effect of a ſuperiority of reaſon and genius, which very few can reach to: it is the knowing how to pity the misfortune of thoſe who err, and admire at the ſame time their conſtancy to the dictates of their conſcience: it is the knowing how to do juſtice to their good intentions, and to the zeal they expreſs for the truth in general: it is the knowing that they are miſtaken in the hypotheſis, but that in the theſis they conform to the immutable and eternal laws of order, which require us to love the truth, and to ſacrifice to that love the temporal conveniencies and pleaſures of life: it is, in a word, the knowing how to diſtinguiſh in one and the ſame perſon, his oppoſition to particular truths which he does not know, and his love for truth in general; a love which he evidences by his great zeal for the doctrines he believes to be true. Such was the judicious diſtinction the queen of Navarre was able to make. It is difficult for all ſorts of perſons to arrive at this ſcience; but more eſpecially difficult for a princeſs like her, who had been educated in the communion of Rome, where nothing has been talked of for many ages, but faggots and gibbets for thoſe who err. Family prejudices ſtrongly fortified all the obſtacles which education had laid in the way of this princeſs; for ſhe entirely loved the king her brother, an implacable perſecutor of thoſe they called Heretics, a people whom he cauſed to be burnt without mercy, wherever the indefatigable vigilance of informers diſcovered them. I cannot conceive by what method this queen of Navarre raiſed herſelf to ſo high a pitch of equity, reaſon, and good ſenſe: it was not through an indifference as to religion, ſince it is certain ſhe had a great degree of piety, and ſtudied the Scriptures with a ſingular application. It muſt therefore be the excellency of her genius, and the greatneſs of her ſoul, that diſcovered a path to her, which ſcarce any one knows. It will be ſaid, perhaps, that ſhe needed only conſult the primitive and general ideas of order, which moſt clearly ſhow, that involuntary errors hinder not a man who entirely loves God, as he has been able to diſcover him after all poſſible enquiries, from being reckoned a ſervant of the true God, and that we ought to reſpect in him the rights of the true God. But I might immediately anſwer, that this maxim is of itſelf ſubject to great diſputes; ſo far is it from being clear and evident. Beſides, that theſe primitive ideas hardly ever appear to our underſtanding without limitations and modifications, which obſcure them a hundred ways, according to the different prejudices contracted by education. The ſpirit of party, the attachment to a ſect, and even zeal for orthodoxy, produce a kind of ferment in the humours of our body; and hence the medium through which reaſon ought to behold thoſe primitive ideas, is clouded and obſcured. Theſe are infirmities which will attend our reaſon, as long as it ſhall depend on the miniſtry of organs. It is the ſame thing to it, as the low and middle region of the air, the ſeat of vapours and meteors. There are but very few perſons who can elevate themſelves above theſe clouds, and place themſelves in a true ſerenity (93). If any one could do it, we muſt ſay of him what Virgil did of Daphnis:

(92) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, lib. 8, cap. 12, pag. m. 856.

(93) Munita tenere Edita doctrina ſapientum templa ſerena. Lucret. lib. II, ver. 7.

Candidus inſuetum miratur lumen (94) Olympi,
Sub pedibuſque videt nubes & ſidera Daphnis (95).

(94) Moſt editions ſay limen.

Daphnis, the gueſt of Heav'n, with wondring eyes,
Views in the milky-way the ſtarry ſkies:
And far beneath him, from the ſhining ſphere,
Beholds the moving clouds, and rolling year.
DRYDEN.

(95) Virgil. Eclog. V, ver. 56.

And he would not have ſo much the appearance of a man, as of an immortal Being, placed upon a mountain (96) above the region of winds and clouds, &c. There is almoſt as much neceſſity for being above the paſſions to come to the knowledge of ſome kind of truths, as to act virtuouſly. Now we know that this mountain is the emblem of a good man, whom no paſſion can withdraw from the paths of juſtice.

(96) That of Olympus. See Apuleius, in Libro de Mundo, pag. m. 73, and Homer's verſes, which he cites.

- - - - - - Sed ut altus Olympi
Vertex, qui ſpatio ventos hiemeſque relinquit,
Perpetuum nulla temeratus nube ſerenum,
Celſior exſurgit pluviis, auditque ruentes
Sub pedibus nimbos, & rauca tonitrua calcat:
Sic patiens animus per tanta negotia liber
Emergit, ſimiliſque ſui; juſtique tenorem
Flectere non odium cogit, non gratia ſuadet (97).

(97) Claudian. de Mallii Theod. Conſulatu, pag. m. 6, col. 2.

But as Olympus' towring ſummit knows,
Nor diſcompoſing ſtorms, nor hoary ſnows,
And in ſuperior region is ſeen
Far above clouds, eternally ſerene;
While at it's ſteady foot the ruſhing rain,
And rattling thunder ſpend their force in vain:
So the juſt man, diſdaining all controul,
In perfect peace preſerves his conſtant ſoul;
Always himſelf, enjoys his ſeat above,
Nor chill'd by hatred, nor inflam'd by love.

I think I have given a fine view of the queen of Navarre's heroiſm.

NAVARRE (JOAN D'ALBRET QUEEN OF) daughter of the preceding queen was one of the moſt illuſtrious princeſſes of her age. She was not yet eleven years of age when Francis I, married her to the duke of Cleves (a). This marriage, celebrated at Chatelleraud with an extraordinary pomp [A], the fifteenth of July 1540 (b), was declared null ſome time after. And indeed it had been concluded in oppoſition to the proteſtations of the young lady, and againſt the conſent of Henry d'Albret, and Margaret de

(a) Spond. ad ann. 1541, num. 5.

(b) Olhagaray, Hiſtory of Foix, Bearn, and Navarre, pag. 504. Spondanus is miſtaken about a year: he hath placed this marriage in June 1541.

[A] Her marriage was celebrated with an extraordinary pomp.] Spondanus obſerves that the coronation of Charles V, did not coſt ſo much as this wedding; and he juſtly condemns the laviſh humour of Francis I, in regard to theſe vain magnificences (1). William Paradin has deſcribed the juſts which were performed at that time, and the triumphal palaces, and after the antique manner, in which were armed knights, who ſtood each

(1) Spond. ad ann. 1541, num. 5.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

de Valois her father and mother [B]. She was married at Moulins in October 1548, to Antony de Bourbon, duke of Vendome. They had in the three or four first years of their marriage, two sons who both died in the cradle by extraordinary accidents (c) [C]. She found herself with child again the third time in the year 1553, being in Picardy with her husband, who was governour of that province, and commanded an army against Charles V (d). As soon as Henry d'Albret her father, understood that she was with child he recalled her home to him (e). She departed from Compiegne the fifteenth of November, and arrived at Pau the fourth of December, and was brought to bed of a son (f) the thirteenth of the same month (g). She discovered under the pains of childbirth an extraordinary courage and resolution [D]. She became queen of Navarre, by the death of her father, the twenty fifth of May 1555 (h), and had, as well as her husband, much indulgence for the reformed religion (i); and it is very probable, they would not have been backward in professing it publickly, if the menaces of the king of France, and those which cardinal d'Armagnac alarmed them with of the Pope's indignation, had not restrained them (k). The design of preventing the ill intentions of Henry II, obliged them to make a journey to the court of France in 1558 (l). They passed through Rochelle, and there happened an adventure, during their stay there, which is very curious [E]. It

(c) Perefixe, Hist. of Henry the Great, pag. m. 13.

(d) Id. ib. pag. 14.

(e) Id. ib. pag. 15.

(f) Who was afterwards Henry IV, king of France.

(g) Perefixe, ubi supra.

(h) Olhagaray, ubi supra, pag. 508.

(i) See the remark [G].

(k) Olhagaray, ubi supra, pag. 517.

(l) Id. ib.

each of them in honour of their ladies, &c (2). See also William du Bellai's Memoirs (3).

(2) William Paradin, Hist. of our Time, book iv, pag. m. 406, & seq.

(3) In book viii, ad ann. 1540, pag. m. 909.

[B] . . . . . was declared null some time after. And indeed it had been concluded in opposition to the protestations of the young lady, against the consent of . . . . . her father and mother.] Olhagaray (4) tells us, that Francis I, caused Joan d'Albret to be educated at Plessis in Tours, and suffered her not to go from thence; for he feared that her father would marry her to Philip the son of the emperor. He adds, that she was tired to death in this place, and filled her chamber with complaints, and and sighs: Which king Francis hearing, married her to the duke of Cleves, without the consent either of her father or mother . . . . Upon which she protested, and caused her protest to be made in form, in the presence of John Sieur d' Abere, &c. . . . Hence this forced marriage, continues this author, produced no other fruit than ceremonies . . . . and our prince Henry (5) caused this marriage to be condemned, together with the form which had been used, by the Pope's authority; so that quickly after, on an Easter-day, it was declared null, in the cathedral-church of Tours, and both parties were left at liberty to marry whom they pleased. Whereupon the duke of Cleves married the daughter of Ferdinand king of the Romans, the emperor's brother. Note, by the way, an error of Spondanus: he will have Joan to be disengaged from her contract, only because the duke of Cleves had married Ferdinand's daughter.

(4) Olhagaray, Hist. of Foix, Bearn, and Navarre, pag. 503, 504.

(5) That is, the king of Navarre, father to the bride.

Brantome relates a fact, which proves, that the queen of Navarre, the bride's mother, was present at the marriage: the thing is curious. 'The day on 'which Madam the princess of Navarre was mar- 'ried to the duke of Cleves at Chastelleraud, as she 'was to be led to church, being so heavily laden 'with jewels, and cloth of gold and silver, that by 'reason of the weakness of her body she could not 'walk, the king commanded the constable to take 'his little niece in his arms, and carry her to the 'church; at which the whole court was very much 'surprized, as being an office not suitable or honou- 'rable enough in such a ceremony for the constable, 'and which might have been given to some other: 'wherewith the queen of Navarre seemed not at all 'displeased; and said, there is a man who would ruin 'me with the king my brother (6), who serves, at 'present, to carry my daughter to church. I have 'this story from the person I have mentioned; 'and also that the constable was much displeased with 'this office, and greatly mortified to be made such a 'spectacle to all the company; and said, there is an 'end of my favour, farewel to it; as it happened: 'for after the entertainment, and the wedding-dinner, 'he was dismissed, and departed immediately. I 'have this also from my brother, who was then 'page at court, who saw this mysterious transaction, 'and remembered it very well; for he had a very 'happy memory (7).'

(6) See the remark [H] of the foregoing article, citat. (28).

(7) Brantome, Memoirs of Illustrious Ladies, pag. 311.

[C] She had two sons, who both died in the cradle by extraordinary accidents.] 'The first was stifled with 'heat, because his governess, who was chilly, kept 'him too hot. The second lost his life by the foolery 'of a nurse; for one day, as she and a gentleman 'were playing with the child, and throwing it one 'to another, they let it fall to the ground, from which 'accident it languished, and died (8).

(8) Perefixe, Hist. of Henry the Great, pag. m. 13.

[D] She discovered an extraordinary courage and resolution.] The king of Navarre her father promised to put his will into her hands, as soon as she should be delivered, but upon condition that in her delivery she should sing a song; to the end, says he, that you may not bring me a crying and ill-humoured child. The princess promised him she would, and had so much courage, that, in spite of the great pain she suffered she kept her word, and sung in her Bearnish language as soon as she heard him enter her chamber [illegible]. These are the words of the song. Noste Donne deou cap deou pon, adjouda mi en aqueste houre; that is, Our lady at the end of the bridge, assist me at this hour (10).

(9) Id. ib. pag. 16.

(10) Hilar. de Coste, Eloges of Illustrious Ladies, Tom. i, pag. 614. He cites A. Favin in his History of Navarre.

[E] During their stay at Rochelle, there happened an adventure, which is very curious.] Mr Vincent has found in Peter Pacteau's journal a large account of the Magnificent Reception the Rochellers gave the king and queen of Navarre in 1558. He has there also met with these very words: 'whilst the king of Navarre was 'in this city, the word of God was ministered to us 'in St Bartholomew's church by his preacher Mr Da- 'vid, who was a wise and good preacher (11).' But here follows the adventure mentioned in this remark. 'Whilst the king and queen of Navarre staid at Ro- 'chelle, there came a company of comedians. One 'day that they had a notable Comedy to represent '(as they had publickly given out) the king and queen 'came with their court; and there was also an ex- 'traordinary affluence of people: they represented a 'woman a-dying, who fetched deep sighs and groans, 'and demanded immediately to be confessed. The 'curate of the parish was sent for; he came with all 'his equipage, and did all he could; but the sick wo- 'man continued still in great uneasiness, saying she was 'not well confessed. Other Ecclesiastics came after the 'curate, and had no better success than he. After them 'came the Monks of the several orders in their turn, and 'spared neither for relics nor indulgences, executed in 'due form, whereof they had sack-fulls, and which they 'read one by one to the sick, who, for her last re- 'medy, was cloathed in St Francis's habit. All this 'operated nothing towards the giving her conscience 'any repose; she said, lamenting herself, that none of 'them all understood the business of confession. Here- 'upon one of her acquaintance came upon the stage, 'and looking about on all sides, as having a secret 'to tell, which he would not have any body to hear, 'he acquainted the sick person, that he knew one 'who would confess her as he ought, and restore her 'to her health; but that appearing in public being 'prejudicial to him, he only came out by night: the 'sick woman prayed and pressed he should be sent for. 'After having waited some time, this person came 'in an ordinary habit, and approaching her bed-side, 'he spoke to her without letting those present hear 'what he said; they only observed by the woman's 'gestures that she appeared to be very well satisfied. 'At last he drew a little book out of his pocket, which 'he gave her saying aloud, that this book contained 'infallible receipts against her distemper, and that if 'she would use it, she should in a few days find her 'health perfectly restored. When the man was 'gone, the woman arose found and entirely cured; 'and, having taken two or three turns upon the 'stage, she told the spectators, that this unknown

(11) Philip Vincent, Enquiries into the Beginning and Progress of the Reformation in the town of Rochelle, pag. 31.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It is remarkable that queen Joan ſhewed her ſelf more luke-warm than her huſband [F], both whilſt, they were at the court of France, and after they returned to their dominions; but that at laſt he totally renounced Calviniſm, and became its perſecutor; and that ſhe made open profeſſion of it, and declared herſelf it's protectreſs [G], with all imaginable

'perſon had done what was impoſſible for all the reſt; 'and that it muſt be confeſſed his book contained admirable receipts, as might be ſeen from the ſpeedy 'effect ſhe had found from it; that if any of them 'was ſeized with the ſame diſtemper, ſhe would adviſe them to have recourſe to this book; which ſhe 'would gladly lend them, but admoniſhing them with'al, that in touching it, they would find it ſomewhat 'hot; and that there proceeded an ill ſcent from it, 'favouring of the faggot: that, for the reſt, if the aſſiſtants deſired to know her name who ſpoke, and 'the name of the book, thoſe were riddles, which 'ſhe left to their own ſolution. The king and queen 'of Navarre ſhewed that they were pleaſed with this 'comedy, and ſo did all the court; and after their 'example a great number of the ſpectators, many of 'whom were already diſguſted with the Romiſh reli'gion. They did not find it difficult to diſcover that 'this ſick perſon was truth; That the firſt who had 'not well confeſſed her, were ſuch as took the title of 'doctors and paſtors; and who, inſtead of confeſſing 'the truth of GOD, held it in unrighteouſneſs: that 'this laſt comer was one of the pretended Heretics, 'who, by the ſeverity of the times, were obliged to 'hide themſelves; and who alone, when they were 'called, duly confeſſed the truth, which they had un'derſtood: laſtly, that the hot book, which ſmelt 'of the faggot, was the New Teſtament, which they 'were forbidden to have and read in the vulgar tongue, 'upon peril of being burnt. But that which ſo well 'pleaſed ſome, as much diſpleaſed others. Eſpecially 'the eccleſiaſtics were offended, and went to make 'their complaints to the king of Navarre himſelf, and 'afterwards to the magiſtrates of the town, who al'ready talked of drawing up an information. So that 'the Comedians thought it their beſt way to depart 'as ſilently and as ſuddenly as poſſible; and they 'would not have come off ſo, had it not appeared 'that they belonged to this prince, and to his queen '(12).' See the margin (13).

We muſt ſay a word or two of the preacher David, who followed the court of Navarre in their progreſs to Paris. He was a monk who came into Guienne with the mareſchal de St Andre in 1555, when this mareſchal came to conſult that excellent Phyſician Julius Cæſar de l'Eſcale [Scaliger] (14), about his health. This Monk's ſermons awakened the minds of many, who began to meet ſecretly. This cauſed the biſhop of Agen to force him to be gone: but God made uſe of this abſence for the benefit of the city of Nerac, where preaching was allowed in the great hall of the caſtle, by the king and queen of Navarre, who began to have ſome reliſh, which, from hence took ſuch root in that country (though there was no mention as yet of any ſettled miniſter) that it could never ſince be extirpated (15). You ſee here that in the year 1555, the king and queen of Navarre clearly manifeſted their inclination to the Reformation. We ſhall ſee divers facts of this nature in the remark [G].

[F] She ſhewed herſelf more luke-warm than her huſband.] Brantome relates (16) that the king of Navarre cauſed his miniſter David to preach in the towns he paſſed through; and that he brought him to the court which was then at Fontainbleau; and that king Henry did not like his bringing with him this miniſter. The queen of Navarre at that time, continues Brantome (17), who was young, handſome and a moſt worthy princeſs, and who loved a dance as well as a ſermon, was not pleaſed with this novelty of religion, not ſo much as has been ſaid; and this I have from good hands, that ſhe remonſtrated one day to the king her huſband, and roundly told him, that if he had a mind to ruin himſelf, and have his eſtates confiſcated, ſhe would not loſe her's, nor the little which remained to her of the kings her predeceſſors dominions, who for hereſy had loſt the kingdom of Navarre. Theodore Beza agrees well enough with this. See his words in the following remark (18).

[G] She declared herſelf the protectreſs of Calviniſm.] We ſhall here give a ſhort account of the progreſs the Proteſtant religion made in Bearn under this queen. We have ſeen (19) what was done at Nerac in 1555 I find that in 1557 (20) the Sieur de St Martin went to Geneva to provide a miniſter (21) for the king of Navarre's court, to preach to all the houſhold. The court of France having notice of it, threatened the king of Navarre to make war upon him (22) if he continued to give the Proteſtants liberty to preach publickly in Bearn. This made him deſire in a very obliging manner, the miniſter Boiſnormand to retire elſewhere. The miniſter retired, but he continued to preach ſome time after, being prevailed on by the entreaties of the courtiers at Mazeres les Pau, one of the moſt antient families of Bearn, and moſt faithful to the Proteſtant intereſt. The king and queen of Navarre going into France in the year 1558 took with them Peter David; and made him generally preach in a prieſt's habit without a ſurplice (23). We have ſeen above that he preached at Rochelle; and it appears by the prayer (24) at the beginning and end of his ſermon, that his language was that of a miniſter. This king having ſeen Henry II at Fontainebleau, returned to Paris (25) and took courage, ſo as to appear in ſome meetings amongſt people of mean condition. Which is more, it happening that two miniſters of Paris were ſurprized in their chamber; one of whom was diſmiſſed by the ſerjeants, upon dropping ſome crowns into their hands; the other named Antony Chandieu . . . was impriſoned in the Chaſtelet: this king went himſelf the next day to own him as one of his family, and brought him off ſafe and ſound (26). He aſſiſted at the public field-aſſemblies of the Pre aux Clercs, where David's pſalms were ſung (27). The cardinals of Bourbon and Lorrain, having promiſed a large benefice to Peter David, he undertook to reſtore his maſter and miſtreſs to the Roman communion more firmly than ever. This coming to his maſter's ears, he turned him a-drift (28). When this prince left Bearn with this queen, he put his ſon under the direction of Suſanne de Bourbon wife of John d'Albret, and under that of Lewis d'Albret biſhop of Leſcar (29). the abſence of the king and queen, by the protection of the regents tho' Roman Catholics, encouraged the Proteſtants: inſomuch that they held conſiderable aſſemblies in the country, by the permiſſion of the governors; a thing, ſays the original, very remarkable. That by means of a child, a biſhop, and a woman, the principal foundations of religion were laid in Bearn. This news was ſpread every where; the king of Navarre pretended to be ſorry, though he had given his conſent; ſo that he permitted, that George Cardinal d'Armagnac ſhould come to Bearn, and made him lieutenant-general with his highneſs the prince. Being arrived there, he was ſo far from hindring the pretenſions of the Proteſtants by a conference, which he ſaid he would hold at Bearn; that, on the contrary, they reſolved amongſt themſelves not to give way to the violence of their lieutenant, who began with impriſoning Henry de Barran, their miniſter, who had been a Dominican, but reſerved, without any injury, to be preſented to the king at his return; who commanded him to go on with the faithful exerciſe of the office, which God had given him (30). The king of Navarre was retired from the French court, much diſcontented; and that, amongſt other reaſons, becauſe no care was taken of his intereſts at the treaty of Cateau. He returned to Paris after the death of Henry II. It is true, he did not uſe that haſte, which the conſtable of Montmorenci adviſed him to: he arrived a little too late, and could not maintain his privileges during the minority of Francis II. Let us hear Theodore Beza: 'at laſt he ſet 'out on his journey, and made wonderful promiſes to the 'miniſters of the churches, through which he paſſed, 'who remonſtrated his duty to him, both as to the ſtate 'in general, and to the poor churches, which he knew to 'have been ſo long ill treated, by thoſe who abuſed the 'late kings: but upon his coming to court, though he 'was very ſufficiently attended to have aſſumed the 'authority due to his rank; in which he would have 'been aſſiſted with the countenance and principal forces 'of the kingdom; yet ſuffering himſelf to be governed by 'two of his train, namely the Sieur d'Eſcars, and the biſhop of Mande, who were dealt with by his enemies, 'after he had ſuffered a thouſand indignities, he ſeemed 'not ſo much as to reſent them; and after he had aſſiſted at the coronation of the king at Reims the 'eighteenth of September the ſame year, he was ſent 'back

(12) Id. ib. pag. 36, & ſeq.

(13) Mr Vincent, ibid. p. 42, conjectures that Joan d'Albret calling to mind the outrage done to the queen, her mother, (ſee, above, citation (12) of the preceding article), was willing, in her turn alſo to make uſe of the liberty of the ſtage, to cauſe ſuch things to be told, as the Romiſh doctors had juſtly diſproved; but by what was ſaid above, citation (17) of the preceding article, it appears that ſhe only imitated her mother in making uſe of like comedies.

(14) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. book ii, pag. 102.

(15) Id. ib.

(16) Brantome, Life of French Captains, Tom. iii, pag. m. 237.

(17) Ib. p. 238.

(18) Citation (36).

(19) In the remark [E], citation (15).

(20) Olhagaray, ubi ſupra, pag. 517.

(21) Named Francis le Guay, otherwiſe Beaumont (Beza calls him Boiſnormand) and commonly La Pierre. Id. ib.

(22) Id. ib. See alſo pag. 362.

(23) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 1054.

(24) You will find them in Mr Vincent's book, pag. 31, & ſeq.

(25) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 1404.

(26) Id. ib.

(27) Above, citation (114) of the article MAROT.

(28) Beza, ubi ſupra, pag. 103.

(29) Olhagaray, ubi ſupra, pag. 518.

(30) Id. ib.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dominions, but alſo aboliſhed Popery, and ſeized the effects of the Eccleſiaſtics (q) and applied them for the ſupport of miniſters and ſchools (r). The Pope cited her to Rome in 1563, and cauſed the citation to be fixed on the gates of St Peter, and thoſe of the Inquiſition, declaring that if ſhe did not appear, all her lands and lordſhips ſhould be confiſcated, and that her perſon would incur all the pains appointed for Heretics; but the court of France thought this procedure ſo contrary to the liberties of the Gallican church, that they cauſed the citation to be revoked (s). This queen met with much diſobedience from her Catholic ſubjects; they frequently rebelled, and it is even ſaid, that they formed a horrid conſpiracy to put her and her children into the hands of the king of Spain [K], who would have delivered them up to the Inquiſition; but ſhe defeated all their conſpiracies, and never complied nor abated any thing of the prerogatives of ſovereign authority. She left her dominions in 1568, in order to go and join the chiefs of the Proteſtant religion. She had a conference at Cognac with the prince of Condé, her brother-in-law, and preſented to him her ſon the prince of Navarre, whom ſhe devoted, as young as he was, to the defence of the cauſe, with her rings and jewels, which were afterwards mortgaged to raiſe money for the charges of the army, and ſhe wrote to foreign princes; and, retiring to Rochelle, ſhe ſent to the queen of England, an ample account of the deſolations of France, and it's great miſeries, praying her to have compaſſion on ſo many people, unjuſtly oppreſſed in the midſt of the Kingdom of France, and to believe, that ſhe was not induced to take up arms, but upon great and extreme neceſſity. She wrote to her by the Sieur de Chaſtelier the fifteenth of October 1568 (t). The Chatholics of Bearn took advantage of her abſence; and, with the ſuccours they received from Charles IX, they ſeized on the greateſt part of the country; but the count de Montgomery, whom ſhe ſent thither, re-took the places, and fully reſtored the queen's authority. He put ſome leaders of the rebellion to death, though they had obtained the promiſe of their lives in their capitulation. The queen would not have that article of the capitulation obſerved, in which, without doubt, ſhe was to blame, and gave occaſion to Monluc to make a great ſlaughter at Mont de Marſan [L]. If any thing could excuſe her, it would

(q) Gramond. Hiſtor. Galliæ, lib. vi, pag. m. 316.

(r) Mezerai, Abridgment of the Hiſtory of France, Tom. vi, pag. m. 425.

(s) Spond. ad ann. 1563, num. 50, pag. m. 652.

(t) Olhagaray, ubi ſupra, pag. 578.

being purſued by the Sieur de Monluc, who had undertaken to arreſt her at Nerac; of which being adverti ſed, ſhe gave advice of it to her ſubjects of Bearn, who, under the conduct of the Sieur d'Audaux went to receive her upon the bank of the river Garonne (68). Theodore Beza tells a circumſtance, which ſhews Monluc's animoſity, and is expreſſed in terms that ſavour more of the ſoldier, than a reaſonable gentleman. I will cite the hiſtorian's words ſomewhat at large, becauſe they contain a fine elogy upon this queen (69). GOD raiſed up to the poor people, afflicted for the ſake of his name . . . . . three ladies, amongſt others, whoſe memory ought to be precious for ever for their great charities. One (70), and the firſt of them, was the queen of Navarre, verifying in effect the ſaying of the prophet, that queens ſhould be the nurſing-mothers of the church of GOD, though at that time ſhe was menaced and terrified, as much a queen as ſhe was, all manner of ways, ſo far as to let her underſtand that ſhe ſhould be divorced by the Pope, deprived of her kingdom and eſtates, and condemned at leaſt to perpetual impriſonment. What is more: Monluc, puffed up with the victory obtained againſt Duras, and, forgetting that he was a little muſhroom, ſtarted up of a ſudden, had the aſſurance to ſay publickly, that he hoped when he had made an end in Guienne, the king would command him to go to Bearn, where he had a great deſire to try, whether it was as good to lie with queens, as with other women; a ſaying truly becoming ſuch a man, but wholly unworthy of ſuch a queen and princeſs, whom GOD reſerved from that time for the preſervation of his poor children, and for yet greater things, as ſhe ſhewed afterwards, even to the time of her death; being very juſtly to be eſteemd a precious jewel in the world, and one of the moſt accompliſhed queens and princeſſes, in good ſenſe, piety, and all extraordinary virtues, that ever was ſeen. Olhagaray relates (71), that in 1568, the cardinal de Lorrain ordered Loſſec, that if he could not perſwade the queen of Navarre, to come to France, he ſhould uſe force, and take the prince her ſon from her; in which the Sieur de Monluc was to aſſiſt him. This deſign miſcarried: the queen having received the ſacrament the ſixth of September, paſſed the river Garonne, the eighth . . . . . (72) under the noſe of the Sieur de Monluc, whom ſhe knew how to lull aſleep, accompanied only with fifty gentlemen, and almoſt all her own domeſtics. And this old and ſkillful warriour formed his troops at Villenabe d'Agenois les Toneins. See in Monluc's Memoirs (73) how he excuſes himſelf for not hindering her paſſing this river.

(68) Olhagaray, ibid. pag. 530.

(69) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ix, pag. 795, 796, ad ann. 1562.

(70) The other two were Madam d'Affier, daughter to Meſſire Galliot, grand-maſter of the artillery of France, and mother of the Sieur de Curſol; and the third Madam de Biron. Id. ib. pag. 796.

(71) Olhagaray, ubi ſupra, pag. 574.

(72) Id. ib. pag. 575.

(73) Monluc's Memoirs, Tom. ii, pag. m. 242, & ſeq.

[K] It is ſaid that her Catholic ſubjects . . . . formed a horrible conſpiracy to put her . . . . into the hands of the king Spain.] The author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes (74) delivers this fact as very certain, and applies it to the year 1564. Thuanus relates all the particulars of it very circumſtantially (75). Spondanus looks upon it as a thing ſomewhat doubtful, or rather as a fable, invented by the Huguenots (76). He ſays (77) nevertheleſs, that he had ſeen letters written by the king of France to Monluc, which ſhewed that this monarch had an account, that the king of Spain made certain offers to the ſubjects of the queen of Navarre, from which it might be concluded, that there was ſome conſpiracy on the anvil. This hiſtorian had been ſaying, that the king of Spain being advertiſed by the court of France of what the Pope had done againſt the queen of Navarre, anſwered, he was ſo far from approving this conduct of the court of Rome, that he offered his protection and aſſiſtance againſt all who ſhould ſeize Joan d'Albret's dominions. This anſwer of Philip II was communicated by Catherine de Medicis to the queen of Navarre; who, in conſequence thereof, ſent a gentleman to thank his Catholic majeſty, and to deſire the continuance of his friendſhip. Spondanus declares, that he ſaw the letters of theſe two queens (78) and he concludes with theſe words, Quam dubia ſunt Regum Conſilia! How hard is it to judge of the conduct of kings! Here you ſee one of them offers to oppoſe who ſhould attack the queen of Navarre; and in the mean time the court of France is informed, that he is contriving ſomething againſt her dominions.

(74) At pag. 35, of the firſt Tom.

(75) Thuan. lib. xxxvi, pag. 728.

(76) Spondan. ad ann. 1564, num. 8.

(77) Id. ad ann. 1563, num. 51.

(78) Videtur de his literis eorundem Reginarum, & Navarræ quidem propria ejus manu ſcriptas quæ id diſerte teſtentur. Spondan. ibid.

[L] The queen would not have that article of the capitulation obſerved; in which, without doubt, ſhe was to blame, and gave occaſion to Monluc to make a great ſlaughter at Mont de Marſan.] If I had only read this fact in the libel of the furious Lewis Dorleans, I ſhould not believe it; for this author has added to it a calumny ſo manifeſtly falſe, as to render himſelf unworthy of all credit. He affirms in the ſame page, where he alledges this action of Montgomery, that the queen of Navarre was perfectly inhuman. What honour, ſays (79), did ſhe do to the memory of king Henry d'Albret, her father, in ſuffering his tomb at Caſtelgeloux to be broken open? and after the Huguenots had plundered it of that golden collar wherewith it was buried, to leave his body to be devoured by dogs? Who knows not in that country, that the Catholics gathered up her father's bones, and buried them ſecretly, to preſerve them from the barbarity of his cruel daughter, and her pretended Reformers?

(79) Advertiſement of the Engliſh Catholics, pag. m. 53.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

would be to say, that at this time, the violation of capitulations was so frequent, that it was looked upon only as a sort of diversion. There are two things in this princess's life, which are a sort of prodigy; the one is, that she had a sufficient courage to abolish the mass in her dominions; the other is, that she so well succeeded in it that the regulations she made against Popery, subsisted either in the whole or in part till Lewis the thirteenth's personal expedition to Bearn in 1620. I believe indeed that an Amazon, the brave Penthesilea (u), would have ventured to have abolished a religion she believed to be false; but in those ages they did not know, what our Joan d'Albret could not be ignorant of. They did not know, that the people, whose altars are destroyed, have directors of their conscience, who encourage them to rebellion, and find an hundred ways to conspire against the lives of kings. If it be strange that the queen of Navarre was so undaunted as not to fear such dangers, which she was perfectly acquainted with; it is still more surprizing that she maintained herself surrounded as she was by two powerful princes, the king of Spain on the one hand and the king of France on the other, both possessed with such a cruelty against the Sectaries, as has but few examples, both animated and pushed on by the strong sollicitations of the court of Rome (x). But if she had all the necessary vigour to quell the seditions of her subjects, and to triumph over the forces sent to their assistance by the court of France, she had not a sufficient foresight to discover the treachery which was contrived against her, under the specious proposal of the marriage of the prince, her son, with the sister of Charles IX. She consented to it, and came to Paris, where she was poisoned, as it is believed (y), while she was making preparations for the marriage. She died the tenth of June 1572 in the forty-fourth year of her age (z). That death could not but be very seasonable to this princess, who would have been inconsolable, had she seen the Paris massacre on St Bartholomew's day, and heard the reproaches which would have been cast on her, for being the innocent cause of the loss of so many brave people, by the misfortune of her falling into the snare. She could not have found much comfort in the answer she might have made, that it was not probable, the wickedness of Catherine de Medicis would run such lengths, or that Charles IX, whose passion had no bounds, should be capable of so long, so profound, and artful, a dissimulation; and that after all, the treachery could not be very discoverable (aa), since the wise admiral de Coligni was likewise deceived by it. The virtue of this queen was very great; and had we no other testimony of it than her desire to draw her future daughter-in-law immediately out of the corruption of the court of France [M], we must conceive a very high opinion of it. Her last will contained some things which displayed the generosity of her soul, as well as her prudence and ardent zeal for the religion she professed (bb). I will examine below (cc) what Moreri says, that she composed several pieces both in prose and verse. She left a son, of whom I have spoken in his place (dd), and a daughter, who perfectly imitated her example in virtue and religion; for her conduct was most prudent and regular in (u) Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis Penthesilea furens, mediisque in millibus ardet. Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 494.

(x) See Spond. ad ann. 1568, num. 26.

(y) See d'Aubigné, Tom. ii, book i, chap. ii, pag. m. 531, and Olhagaray, ubi supra, pag. 627.

(z) Thuan. lib. li, pag. 1058.

(aa) Mezerai, Abr. Chron. Tom. v, pag. m. 149, pretends, that if God had not blinded the eyes of the Protestants, they would easily have perceived the knives which were sharpened to cut their throats.

(bb) Vide Thuanum, lib. li, pag. 1058.

(cc) In the remark [Q], at the end.

(dd) In the article HENRY IV.

Reformers? This is the answer that Mr du Plessis has given to that passage of the English Catholic: King Henry d'Albret was buried at Lescar in Bearn, with his predecessors, where his body and his tomb are still entire; and thereby judge either of the ignorance, or the notorious malice of the petitioner (80). Notwithstanding this, I must say, that Lewis Dorleans does not lie, in what he immediately relates concerning the murder of Montgomery's prisoners; for if he had misrepresented that matter, he would have been confuted by du Plessis, as well as in the other falsehoods which he has asserted. But it is certain, that du Plessis observed a profound silence in this particular; and we find that Thuanus expressly notes, that the capitulation obtained by Terride imported, that the garrison should have their lives, and particularly Sainte Colombe, and others, who were afterwards put to death (81). La Popeliniere (82), a Protestant Historian makes the same confession without exception or reserve. D'Aubigné makes use of some shifts and evasions (83), but it is easy to perceive, that he does not believe they will avail any thing. I have found in Thuanus a gross mistake in Geography, which I shall occasionally take notice of. He says (84), that Montgomery having crossed the county of Foix, passed the Garonne at St Gaudens, and a little after, the Ariege, and made great marches towards Bigorre. We need only cast our eyes upon the meanest map of France, to see plainly, that Montgomery could not pass the Garonne till after he had passed the Ariege. Here is Monluc's passage, which will serve me for a proof of this fact (85). 'Hereupon arrived 'Monsieur de Savignac, and captain Fabien, and some 'other gentlemen with them, to tell me, that the 'garrison (86) would surrender, and to see whether I 'would give them quarter, and capitulate with them: 'perceiving Monsieur de Savignac, and captain Fabien 'had a mind to save Favas, and to act honourably 'by him, as he had the reputation of a good soldier, 'I told them they might make what capitulation they 'thought fit, I would sign it, tho' I had a great de- 'sire to dispatch them out of the way. For this 'reason, when they were gone, I sent after them a 'gentleman, with secret orders to the soldiers, and 'some captains, that as they were parlying, they should 'be sure to enter on one side or other, and put all 'to the sword: for the death of those gentlemen 'was to be revenged, who had been so miserably 'massacred at Navarreins; because, contrary to the 'faith of capitulation, they had stabbed the Sieur de 'Sainte Colombe, and seven or eight others, who 'had yielded at Orthez, upon condition of life, when 'Monsieur de Terride was taken. This execution 'was made upon pretence that they were the queen of 'Navarre's subjects.' The thing succeeded very nearly according to Monluc's desire. The soldiers scaling the walls on one side, whilst they were parlying on the other, entered, and put all to the sword they could meet with (87).

(87) Monluc, ibid. pag. 371.

[M] Her desire to draw her future daughter-in-law out of the corruption of the court of France.] Here is an extract of a letter she writ to her son, whilst she was at the court of France, to marry him with Margaret de Valois. 'She is handsome and prudent, and 'of a good mien, but bred in the most cursed and cor- 'rupt company in the world; for I see nobody with- 'out a tincture of it. Your cousin, the marchioness, 'is so changed by it, that she has no appearance of 'religion . . . This messenger will tell you how licen- 'tious the king is; it is great pity. I would not 'for any thing in the world that you should make 'any stay here. You see the reason why I desire you 'to marry, and that you and your wife should get 'out of this corruption: for, tho' I believed it very 'great, I find it still greater. The men here do not importune

(80) Du Plessis Mornai's Memoirs, Tom. i, pag. 638.

(81) Capitibus interTerridam & Montgomerium pactaque comprehensis Sancolombus, & VI, alii torquati equites, qui vita salva dimitti debebant. Thuan. lib. xlv, pag. 913, ed. i. D.

(82) See his History of the Troubles, book viii, fol. m. 244.

(83) In Tome I, of his History, book v, ch. xiv, pag. m. 420.

(84) Thuan. ubi supra.

(85) Monluc's Memoirs, Tom. ii, book viii, pag. 369, 370.

(86) That is, of the castle Mont de Marsan.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in the midſt of the bad examples of that time; and no match with the condition of going to maſs was ever agreeable to her [N]. Henry IV, her brother, who had a moſt particular affection and eſteem for her, in vain exhorted her to turn Catholic. He married her to the duke of Bar, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Lorrain in 1599. She found no great ſatisfaction in that alliance [O], and was forced to go and receive the ſacrament out of the 'importune the women, but the women importune 'the men (88).' Mr Jurieu (89) uſes theſe words (90) to ſhew the corruption of the court of France at that time.

[N] No match, with the condition of going to maſs, was ever agreeable to her daughter.] There are very few princeſſes who had more offers than Madam Catherine de Navarre, only ſiſter of Henry IV. Here follows a long detail upon this ſubject; I have it from a perſon of good authority, for he was miniſter to this princeſs. He ſays, that there were great difficulties in the negotiation of the duke of Bar's marriage, both becauſe ſhe would not depart from the religion ſhe was bred in, and becauſe ſhe could not prevail with herſelf to go out of France (91). And indeed, continues he (92), 'to 'ſay the truth, ſhe had been courted by many great 'princes; to whom, for one or other of theſe two 'cauſes, or for both together, ſhe would not give 'her conſent. Firſt, to trace this as high as poſſible, 'as ſoon as ſhe was born, which was the ſeventh of 'February, 1558, there was a talk of marrying her 'to Francis, who was afterwards duke of Alençon, 'and earl of Flanders; and that by the kings their 'fathers, Henry II, moſt Chriſtian king of France, 'and Anthony I, moſt Faithful * king of Navarre ... 'Which Francis endeavoured to bring to effect, by 'ſolliciting Catherine's conſent, in the year 1582: 'but the difficulty was then too great in point of reli- 'gion, there being at that time an attempt made on 'the king of Navarre, her brother, to reduce him to 'the Catholic religion, by force of arms. Alſo before 'this, king Henry III returning to Poland, had 'thoughts of her: and it is believed, that if ſhe had 'been on her journey to Lyons at his return, and the 'king had ſeen her, he would infallibly have married 'her; but the queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, 'repreſented her as a dwarf, and crooked, which was 'very falſe; for ſhe was of a middle ſize, and finely 'ſhaped: it is true, ſhe had one leg a little ſhorter than 'the other (which is a mark of the family of Albret, 'and was obſervable in Alain Sire d'Albret, father of 'king Dom Joüan, great-grand-father of this princeſs 'Catherine). The queen-mother, did that ill office 'to her god-daughter to prejudice the king of Na- 'varre .... This great match failing, the duke of 'Lorrain (who was afterwards her father-in-law) would 'have married her with the king's conſent, but found 'the king of Navarre very much averſe to it. Upon 'her departing from court, after the king of Navarre, 'her bother, ſhe was much loved by the late prince 'of Condé. King Philip of Spain ſent alſo in the 'year 1580 to ſee her; promiſed the king of Na- 'varre great advantages on his part, ſo far as to ad- 'viſe him to make himſelf king of Gaſcogny, to 'which purpoſe he would aſſiſt him with men and 'and money; and even kept for a long time eight 'hundred thouſand ducats in Ochagavy, a village of 'the upper Navarre, above Roncevaux, if the ſaid 'king of Navarre would have accepted them to make 'war againſt France. This failing, the duke of 'Savoy, in 1583, ſent twice to her, with a promiſe 'no ways to diſturb her religion: his agent arrived 'at Vifezenſac in Bigorre; from whence, being re- 'fuſed, he went to Spain, and there concluded a 'match between the infanta Catherine Michelle and 'this duke. In 1586, the king of Scotland ſent 'Mr Melvin, a Scotchman, the Sieur de Iſle Groſſlot, 'a Frenchman, and the Sieur de Barthas, with ſuch 'importunity, that the queen of England wrote to her 'in theſe terms; That if ſhe would come over into 'her iſland, for her ſake, (addreſſing her by the ſtile of 'her ſiſter of France, as a lucky omen) ſhe would, 'in her life-time, ſecure her being queen of England after 'her deceaſe. The prince of Anhalt coming to the 'aſſiſtance of the king, her brother, upon his ad- 'vancement to the crown of France, deſired her him- 'ſelf in perſon; but, by reaſon of the war, which 'was ſo very general in France, he returned as he 'came, not without diſcontent. During theſe ſame 'wars, two princes of the blood fought her likewiſe, 'the count of Soiſſons (93), and the duke of Mont- 'penſier (94); but the nearneſs of relation, the diffe- 'rence of religion, and the unſettled poſture of af- 'fairs, would not ſuffer their inclinations to take ef- 'fect.' The ſame Hiſtorian relates, that after the ceremony of the marriage, the princeſs Catherine (95) ſhewed all poſſible ſatisfaction .... coming to that which ſhe was uſed to ſay, Grata ſuperveniet, quæ non ſperabitur hora (96). For this lady underſtood Latin very well; and remembered this Latin verſe, the rather becauſe ſome people had ſaid, ſhe would never be married: others one day had placed a hemeſtich oppoſite to another, which ſhe had written with her own hand in her houſe of Caſtelbeziat at Pau (which the queen her mother had built on purpoſe for her) namely, upon a certain commotion happening there, during theſe latter wars: finding herſelf obliged to go to her brother, (which the Bearnois did not eaſily conſent to) ſhe wrote theſe words, Quo me fata vocant. Immediately waſhing her hands to ſit down to the table, ſhe found the verſe filled up thus, Ne quo te fata vocarent. Now this was an ambiguity by way of antiperiſtaſis, to diſſuade her from her journey, yet they who did it got nothing by it, for ſhe was fully reſolved to go into France to her brother, when he ſhould order it.

If we may believe Clement VIII, what I have ſaid is liable to ſome exception: there was a time when the princeſs Catherine was ready to change her religion, provided ſhe could have the huſband ſhe had a mind to. We will quote a paſſage out of the 348th letter of cardinal d'Oſſat, written from Rome the ſixteenth of June, 1603. 'One of the greateſt objections which 'he (97) put to me, was, that when that mar- 'riage (98) was in treaty, Madam, the king's ſiſter, 'cauſed his Holineſs to be told, that in caſe he would 'uſe his intereſt with the king to get her married to 'the count of Soiſſons, ſhe would be a Catholic: from 'whence his Holineſs ſaid he had good reaſon to judge, 'that it was not conſcience which kept her to her 'ſect, but a certain oſtentation and preſumption, 'which ſhe had, that the holy See, and all things 'elſe, ought to accommodate themſelves to her de- 'ſires. And becauſe that objection was put very 'home, I waved it, and made uſe of it, to ſhew him, 'that the princeſs would be ſo much the eaſier to 'convert; the hopes of which I had reckoned as one 'of the ten cauſes of the diſpenſation which we 'deſired (99).'

[O] ... ſhe found no great ſatisfaction in that alliance.] If ſhe was a good Huguenot, her huſband was as zealous a Papiſt. This different zeal for religion had made them very indifferent as to the propoſals of marriage, and had raiſed ſome difficulties which had ſpun out this affair for above two years together ..... Both the parties were uneaſy to be ſacrificed by their relations to the intereſts of ſtate, againſt the ſentiments of their conſcience (100). The huſband's zeal abated for the firſt ſix months of the marriage; but then it grew ſo warm, that the duke of Bar looked upon the conjugal act as a great ſin, and religiouſly abſtained from it. Let us make uſe of Mr Mezerai's expreſſions (101): 'he ſuffered his confeſſor to raiſe ſo 'many ſcruples in his conſcience, that he ſeparated 'himſelf from her company, and took the opportunity 'of the Jubilee to go and aſk the Pope's abſolution, 'and diſpenſation for the future. The Pope flatly re- 'fuſed him this laſt point, without Catherine's con- 'verſion; and for the other, he put his ſcrupulous 'conſcience ſo much upon the rack, that he promiſed 'to return to his wife no more but to divorce her, 'unleſs ſhe turned Catholic. By means of this pro- 'teſtation he was ſecretly reſtored to the communion of 'the Faithful; for in order to be received into it pub- 'lickly, the fault being public, he muſt have undergone 'penance for the ſame. A ſharp word or two from 'the king would have obliged the court of Rome to 'remove all thoſe difficlties, and ſuffer the huſband to 'return to his wife: for want of this reſolution the 'poor princeſs remained a widow for ſome time in the 'midſt of marriage.' Can any thing be more tyran- nical than the yoke ſo many Chriſtians have ſuffered to be impoſed upon them by the court of Rome? Here is a prince married by the duke, his father, to a lady authorized by her ſuperiours: the marriage is ſolemnly celebrated,

(88) Le Laboureur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 903, 904.

(89) Jurieu, Apology for the Reformation, Tom. i, pag. 413, 414. He cites le Laboureur's Additions, book iii.

(90) He hath changed ſome words, but without changing the ſenſe: this is nevertheleſs a want of exactneſs.

(91) Cayet, Septennial Chronology of the Hiſtory of the Peace, fol. 50, verſo, ad ann. 1598.

(92) Id. ib. fol. 51.

* Moſt Faithful is a title given to the kings of Navarre, as Moſt Chriſtian is to the kings of France.

(93) See, above, the remark [L] of the article CAYET.

(94) See the Memoirs of Du Pleſſis, Tom. ii, pag. 295.

(95) Cayet, Chronologie Septenaire, fol. 63, ad ann. 1599.

(96) It is a verſe of Horace, Epiſt. IV, lib. i, ver. 14. See in the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Calviniſm, pag. 663, what was ſaid of a marriage ſhewn at a diſtance, and as the empire was ſhewn to Galba, by theſe words, & tu Galba quandoque deguſtabis imperium.

(97) That is, Clement VIII.

(98) That is, the marriage of the duke of Bar, and the princeſs Catherine.

(99) Lettres du Cardinal d'Oſſat, Tom. ii, pag. 625.

(100) Mezerai, Chron. Abridgment, Tom. vi, pag. 194.

(101) Id. ib. pag. 222.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the city of Nanci, and was allowed only preaching and prayers in her houſe for her ſelf and domeſtics (ee). She died in the beginning of the year 1604, with the falſe opinion of her being with child. The duke of Lorrain, and the duke of Bar, conjured her in the extremity of her ſickneſs to think of her ſalvation; but ſhe told them, that ſhe was reſolved to die as ſhe had lived; and ſo ſhe departed not, at the laſt moment of her life, from the conſtancy ſhe had always ſhewn for her religion, which had reſiſted the ſtrongeſt temptations, and the moſt obſtinate importunities in the world. She had had for her preceptor the ſon of Salmonius Macrinus (ff), and underſtood the Latin tongue very well. (gg) Du Verdier Vau-Privas (hh) calls her a princeſs of a high ſpirit: ſhe began ſo early, adds he, to imitate thoſe two learned queens of Navarre, Margaret of France, and Joan d'Albret, grand-mother and mother . . . to produce at one and the ſame time both the flowers and the fruit which the Muſes ſow, that ſhe compoſed garlands of them of all the colours that could be required, when ſhe was ſcarce twelve years of age: nay (which is more wonderful) ſhe made verſes in her ſleep, as it is affirmed in an ode made on that occaſion, and addreſſed to her Excellency by one of her preceptors. He recites ſome ſtanzas of it. We ſhall examine a thought of Scaliger [P]. It is a baſe falſehood to ſay, as has been done in a public work, that queen Joan d'Albret contracted a marriage of conſcience with a man, whoſe name is not told; and that d'Aubigné the Hiſtorian was the fruit of that marriage [Q]. It is ſaid, that in ſome tapeſtry, which ſhe wrought with her own hands, ſhe (ee) Matthieu, Hiſtory of the Peace, Tom. ii, pag. m. 677, ad ann. 1604.

(ff) Sammarth. Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 21.

(gg) See the remark [N], citation (95).

(hh) Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 144.

celebrated, and bleſſed by an archbiſhop; and yet you ſee the huſband go to Rome ſix months after, only to beg pardon for having ventured to enjoy his wife, and leave to do it for the future: he obtained favour upon very harſh conditions on the firſt point, but the ſecond was rigorouſly and abſolutely denied him. See in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes (102) the whole train of diſcontents and diſguſts which the princeſs Catherine was obliged to put up with. It had been much better if thoſe who foretold, that ſhe would never be married, had proved true prophets: the anſwer ſhe made them that this time coming, when it was leaſt thought on, would occaſion a moſt agreeable ſurprize (103), was not ſo juſt as ingenious. This maxim could not be better applied, generally ſpeaking; for commonly an old maid, who is paſt all hopes of marriage, receives with joy the news of a huſband: ſhe receives, I ſay, the news with ſo much the more joy, as being unexpected. But the particular fate of the princeſs Catherine contradicted the general rule.

(102) Hiſt. of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. i, pag. 268, &c.

(103) See, above, the citations (95) and (96).

For the reſt, I ſhould be deſirous to know, whether her huſband would have been expoſed to the ſame ſcruples with reſpect to the enjoyments of a handſome concubine, and whether his confeſſor would have been able to govern him in the caſe of adultery, as magiſterially as he governed him in a marriage contracted with an heretical wife. We ſeldom find, that a confeſſor's authority has the ſame effect with reſpect to the gallantries of princes, as was obſerved in the conduct of the duke of Bar. Not but that the miſtreſſes of princes are very liable to be diſcharged, but the confeſſors are very rarely the cauſe of it. Diſguſt, the diſcovery of an unfaithful conduct, or of ſome intrigue, the charms of a new object, commonly produce all the diſgraces of a miſtreſs.

Since the printing of what I have been ſaying, I have diſcovered a thing which confirms the ſuſpicions I had, and which I durſt not declare. It ſeemed to me that the duke of Bar, acted not ſo much out of a ſcruple of conſcience, as out of a deſire he had to be unmarried, becauſe he was grown weary of his wife. This was his true motive, as I have learned from the new edition of cardinal D'Oſſat's letters. That duke's confeſſor inſiſted on the alternative either of a diſpenſation, or of an order to ſend the ducheſs back again (104). Now Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie comments on it thus: 'the duke of Bar covered with the veil of religion and conſcience, the diſlike he had for his wife, whom he did not love, nor was beloved by her. And as he durſt not ſend her back for fear of drawing upon himſelf the diſpleaſure of the king, his brother-in-law; he endeavoured cunningly to engage the Pope to command him to divorce her, that he might lay all the odium on him, and be at liberty to marry another princeſs. But the Pope was wiſer and more cunning than either the duke of Bar, or the Franciſcan, his confeſſor, who, according to the uſual ſaying of his Holineſs would catch a ſerpent with another man's hand (105)'. This author has given a more ample account of it in the life of cardinal D'Oſſat (106), and refutes Mezerai, who, as we have ſeen before, did not believe that the affair of the diſpenſation was ſo difficult.

(104) Letters of Cardinal d'Oſſat, Tom. ii, pag. 221, Paris edition 1698.

(105) Amelot de la Houſſaie, Notes on the 247th Letter of cardinal d'Oſſat, pag. 251, Tom. ii. See alſo pag. 273, of the ſame tome.

(106) Pag. 30, 31.

[P] We will examine a thought of Scaliger.] 'Madam 'Catherine, ſiſter to king Henry IV, was very vain; 'ſhe deceived me, I did not think ſhe would have 'been ſo conſtant in her religion as ſhe proved to 'be (107)'. Theſe are Scaliger's words; his diſtruſt was founded upon his having obſerved this lady to be conceited with her grandeur, and entertaining high and lofty thoughts; and it is certain, this might give ſome reaſon to conclude that ſhe would turn to that ſide, where moſt worldy grandeur and advantages appeared; that is to ſay, that ſhe would imitate Henry IV, who, in caſe ſhe would have abjured her religion, would have raiſed her to the higheſt pitch of glory, and have married her to the greateſt advantage in the world; but finding her to perſiſt in Calviniſm, he was obliged, by maxims of ſtate, to neglect her (108). However, as there are different kinds of vanity, or of fondneſs of grandeur, Scaliger's argument might be turned to a quite contrary ſenſe. There are ſome proud and ambitious people, who, to ſatisfy their vanity, ſtoop to an hundred mean actions; but there are others who find no readier way to gratify their paſſion, than to appear inflexible, whatever ill conſequence their ſtiffneſs may draw after it. It is not unuſual to ſee perſons of quality very virtuous, and very zealous for their religion, and at the ſame time ſo jealous of their rank, and ſo fond of receiving a great deal of honour, that they are always upon their punctilios on that account. Madam de Turenne is an example of it. Her virtue and piety are not more memorable, than her exact precautions to preſerve the privileges of highneſs, and the precedence ſhe pretended to above the ducheſſes. Madam Catherine de Navarre might very well be ſeized with this kind of infatuation, as virtuous and pious as ſhe was. How could ſhe, who was deſcended from ſo many kings, who was the only daughter of a queen adored by the Proteſtants, who was ſiſter to their leader, afterwards king of France, forbear aſſuming a ſtrain of grandeur and loftineſs, which Scaliger, and ſeveral others, thought too vain? It ſhould not however have been concluded, as a thing certain, that ſhe would change her religion; for beſides the conſiſtency of this character with a ſtrong perſwaſion of the truth of her party, and an averſion to a religion which perſecuted that ſhe profeſſed, an averſion which, to take it right, very frequently makes up three fourths of the love we have for our religion: beſides this, I ſay, is not pride ſometimes the cauſe of our doing nothing which may expoſe us to the reproaches of inconſtancy? I ſay this, without eſpouſing the narration of Peter Victor Cayet (109): Madam Catherine . . . . . would not change the pretended reformed religion, in which ſhe was bred, for the ſake, as ſhe ſaid, of her deceaſed mother queen Joan of Navarre, to whom ſhe owed her life and the original of her actions: this was one of the cauſes that moſt ſtrongly retained her in that religion, as ſhe many times declared. Beſides, ſhe was apprehenſive of being accuſed of levity in her age, as ſhe ſaid, if ſhe changed her religion, having returned to this, after ſhe had been for ſome time a Catholic.

(107) Scaligerana, pag. m. 46.

(108) See the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, Tom. i, pag. 267.

(109) Cayet, ubi ſupra, fol. 62.

[Q] It is a baſe falſehood to ſay . . . . . that queen Joan d'Albret contracted a marriage of conſcience . . . . whereof d'Aubigné, the Hiſtorian, was the fruit.] I have read

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

she affected to shew the monuments of that liberty, which she esteemed herself to have acquired by shaking off the yoke of the Pope [R]. We will conclude with the words of Peter Matthieu (ii): 'She would have the safety of conscience preferred before the assurances 'of honours, grandeur, and life itself; and was used to say to those of her party, 'that arms ought never to be laid down, but upon these three conditions, either of a 'safe peace, or an entire victory, or an honourable death (k k).

(ii) Matthieu, Ibid. Tom. i, pag. m. 198, ad ann. 1599.

(k k) Here follows Peter Matthieu's marginal note, Joan d'Albret, queen of Navarre, caused twelve medals to be struck at Rochelle with this inscription, Safe Peace. Intire Victory. Honourable Death. See the Journal of Trevoux, Jan. 1702, Art. XI, pag. 122, Edit. of France.

read in a book printed more than once (110), that a Genealogist had orders to make Madam de Maintenon descend from Joan d'Albret queen of Navarre, who, after the death of the king her husband, married secretly to one of her gentlemen, who was, as is pretended, the father of Mr d'Aubigné, grand-father of Madam de Maintenon. To confute this story undeniably, we need only attend to these two points of Chronology; one is, that the king of Navarre, Joan d'Albret's husband, died not till November 1562: the other, that Mr d'Aubigné was born in 1550, as appears by his epitaph (111), which every one may read in the Cloister of St Peter's church at Geneva. He made this epitaph himself a little before his death, at eighty years of age, and died the twenty-ninth of April 1630; whence it follows, that he was born in 1550. He says so himself in express words, at the beginning of his History (112). It is not therefore possible that he should be the son of Joan d'Albret, and of a man married to this queen after the death of Antony king of Navarre. There is in the Mercure Galant for the month of September 1688, a Genealogy of the d'Aubignés. If you consult it, you will find no shadow nor foot-step of this pretended extraction, related by the author, whom I am confuting. If, in his excuse, it should be said, that it ought to be Margaret instead of Joan, this would be as gross a mistake; for Margaret queen of Navarre, Joan's mother, died (113) before the king her husband, and before d'Aubigné was born. If we take the thing by another handle, and suppose him to be the natural son of the king of Navarre, Joan's father, this could not be confuted by Chronological arguments, since it is certain this prince died not till 1555, and that he had a mistress (114). But it might be overthrown, by what d'Aubigné has written concerning his father (115).

(110) Galantries of the Kings of France, Tom. ii, pag. 293. Brussels Edit. 1694, and pag. 84, of the Cologne edition 1695.

(111) It is in Spon's History of Geneva, pag. 504, 505, of the Utrecht edition 1685.

(112) In the middle of the XVIth century, the year from which both the book and the author take their birth. D'Aubigné, pag. 1.

(113) In December 1549.

(114) Mr de Perefixe, Hist. of Henry IV, pag. m. 15, observes, that in 1553, Joan d'Albret had a great desire to see her father's will, because it had been told her, that it was made to her disadvantage in favour of a lady, the good man had been in love with.

(115) See his History, in the places marked in the table, under the word Aubigné, the author's father.

Having confuted the falsities inserted in the Galantries of the kings of France, it is necessary to touch upon a sort of tradition, which makes Joan d'Albret to be clandestinely re-married, but not without the approbation of her ministers; to whom she confessed, as it is said, that she could not contain. I never heard this affirmed but by such as had no sort of proof to alledge: This made me one day ask an advocate, very well versed in the Historians of the XVIth century, whether he had met with any thing relating to this fact in the libels spread about by the Catholics against this queen of Navarre: he answered, he had not; but that he had not read all the pieces of that kind, nor the greatest part of them; but otherwise, he found nothing in it improbable, nor injurious to the memory and honour of Joan d'Albret; that continence and incontinence, being rather qualities of constitution, than of morality, it was not the acknowledgment of a vice, to confess she was incontinent, and resolved only to make use of lawful remedies; that such a resolution joins chastity and incontinence together; and whereas many ministers of that time, the better to manage their disputes against the vow of celibacy, had treated of continence as of a very particular, and even extraordinary, grace of the spirit of GOD, it was no more a shame for the queen of Navarre to acknowledge her incontinence, than for a primitive Christian to confess he had not the gift of tongues or prophecy; and that, lastly, it was to the glory of this princess to have had so tender a conscience, as not to suffer her to satisfy the necessities of nature by ways which the word of GOD prohibits. I answered him if he had no other reasons to alledge, he could not deliver me from my doubts; and that I only consulted him to know whether he had any printed or manuscript authorities; and that since he had none, it was to no purpose to talk any more upon the subject. I have not from that time found any light, and I confess, that, in composing this article, I have not been able to consult any work, in which Joan d'Albret's actions are censured. However it be I much doubt the truth of that tradition, or rather believe it to be false.

I have found no foot-step of it in Mr le Laboureur, who is one of the French Historiographers best acquainted with such sort of particulars. He knew that this queen made an extempore stanza the twenty first of May 1566, when she went to see Robert Stephens's press (116). He gives it thus:

(116) Le Laboureur, Additions to Castelnau, Tom. i, pag. 901.

Art singulier, d'icy aux derniers ans,
Representez aux enfans de ma race,
Que j'ai suivi des craignans Dieu la trace,
Afin qu'ils soient les mesmes pas suivans.

Egregious art! thou wonder of our age!
Shew my descendants in thy printed page,
How boldly in religion's path I trod,
That they from me might learn to fear their GOD.

He also gives us the sonnet, which Robert Stephens (117) who was a Protestant, made in answer to it in the name of the press. He has likewise published at length a long letter this lady wrote to the prince, her son, the eighth of March 1572 (118). I have cited some part of it in the remark [M]. He observes that, among other languages, she spoke Latin and Spanish (119). But he says nothing of this clandestine marriage. For the rest I doubt not but this stanza, and the letter he has inserted in his book, were the occasion of Mr Moreri's saying, that Joan d'Albret composed several pieces in prose and in verse. This is making an author of her and misleading us; for the letters that a prince writes, let them be never so fine, are not looked upon as the composition of an author (120), unless they receive the form of a book, designed for the Republic of letters.

(117) This could not be Robert Stephens, Henry's father, but Henry's brother.

(118) Addit. à Castelnau, Tom. i, pag. 902, & seq.

(119) Ibid. pag. 901.

(120) Confer above, remark [C] of the article CHARLES V.

[R] It is said that in some tapestry . . . . she affected to shew the monuments of that liberty, which she esteemed herself to have acquired by shaking off the yoke of the Pope.] I have no other commentary to give besides the words of a Jesuit. As she naturally had a fine, curious, and intelligent mind, says he, (121), she desired to shew not only with her pen in printed books, which are intituled the Tales of queen Joan (122), the liberty which she pretended to take according to her own belief; but also with the point of her needle on canvas and in tapestry; for as she very much loved devices, she wrought with her own hand fine and large pieces of tapestry, among which was a suit of hangings of a dozen or fifteen pieces, which were called THE PRISONS OPENED; by which she gave us to understand that she had broken the Pope's bonds, and shook off his yoke of captivity. In the middle of every piece is a story of the Old Testament which favours of liberty; as the deliverance of Susannah; the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt; the setting Joseph at liberty, &c. And at all the corners are broken chains, shackles, racks, and gibbets, and over them in great letters, these words of the third chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians, UBI SPIRITUS IBI LIBERTAS. And to shew yet more fully the aversion, she had conceived against the Catholic religion, and particularly against the sacrifice of the mass, having a fine and excellent piece of tapestry, made by her mother Margaret, before she had suffered herself to be cajolled by the ministers, in which was perfectly well wrought the sacrifice of the mass, and a priest, who held out the holy Host to the people, she took out the square in which was this history; and instead of the priest, with her own hand, substituted a fox, who, turning to the people, and making an horrible grimace with his paws and throat, delivered these words, DOMINUS VOBISCUM. The same thing is found in the continuator of Florimond de Remond (123) at the fifth and sixth pages of the ninth book.

(121) Garasse, Curious Doctrin pag. 225, 226.

(122) I believe that it is a fal ty, and that Joan d'Albret queen of Navar is mistaken for Margaret de V lois, sister of Francis I.

(123) Claud Malingre, C ral History the Progress Fall of Mo Heresy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NAVARRE (MARGARET DE VALOIS QUEEN OF) daughter-in-law to the preceding, and daughter to Henry II, was born the fourteenth of May 1552 [A]. She was a princeſs of infinitely more wit and beauty than virtue. Her violent zeal for Popery, whereof ſhe gave very ſtrong proofs from her infancy [B], was of no ſervice to her, as to good morals. She was married to the king of Navarre the eighteenth of Auguſt 1572, a few days before the horrid maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day. They attempted ſoon after to diſſolve this marriage; for they who had formed the conſpiracy of butchering the Proteſtants, were diſpleaſed at the the ſaving the lives of the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé (a): they found by this that they had failed in their principal deſign, which was not ſo much againſt the Huguenots as the princes of the blood; and knowing that the king of Navarre, being married to Charles the ninth's ſiſter, no body would attempt any thing againſt him, they contrived another plot, and perſuaded Catherine de Medicis that the princeſs Margaret ought to be unmarried (b). This deſign miſcarried by the anſwer the new bride made when ſhe was aſked, whether her marriage had been conſummated [C]. Her

(a) Memoirs of queen Margaret, pag. 66, Paris edition 1628.

(b) Ib. pag. 67.

[A] She was born the fourteenth of May 1552.] Hilarion de Coſte, citing du Tillet, makes this her birth-day: and ſo does Father Labbe, Father Anſelme, and many others. There is reaſon therefore to believe that ſhe was above ſeven years old in June 1559, and yet ſhe affirms (1); that ſhe was but about four or five when ſhe made a repartee to the king her father, who held her in his lap to make her prattle, a few days before that fatal blow which gave him his death (2). She ſuppoſes the ſame thing when ſhe ſays, that in 1561, at the time of the conference of Poiſſi, ſhe was but ſeven or eight years old (3). It is very ſtrange that a daughter of a king of France ſhould be miſtaken two years in the account of her age: can princeſſes be ignorant of what every body knows, when their birth-days are noted in the almanacks, in the copper-cuts of the picture-ſellers, and in adundance of common books; or dare they make themſelves younger than they are? this little piece of coquetry may be of uſe to citizens daughters, who cannot eaſily be contradicted; but it can be of none to the daughters of kings. It ſeems however, that our queen of Navarre was ſo uſed to leſſen her age, that by habit ſhe obſerved the ſame ſtile in compoſing her Memoirs.

(1) Memoirs of queen Margaret, p. 5, 7.

(2) He received this blow in a tournament the tenth of June 1559.

(3) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, pag. 12.

[B] She gave very ſtrong proofs of her zeal to Popery from her infancy.] The particulars ſhe gives us of it are very curious, and contain a ſample of the whimſical inconſtancy of Henry III. Never man had more averſion for the Huguenots than this monarch, and yet he had zealouſly imbibed their notions, and endeavoured to make them reliſhed by others. Our Margaret thinks (4) that among her childiſh actions, there were ſome, as worthy to be recorded, as that of the childhood of Themiſtocles (5) and of Alexander; the one expoſing himſelf in the midſt of the ſtreet to the horſes feet of a carman, who would not ſtop at his requeſt; the other deſpiſing the honour of the prize at the race, if he did not diſpute it with kings. To prove this, ſhe alledges amongſt other things, the reſiſtance I made, ſays ſhe (6), 'to preſerve 'my religion at the time of the conference of Poiſſi, 'when all the court was infected with Hereſy, to the 'imperious perſuaſions of many court lords and la'dies, and even of my brother of Anjou (7), who 'was afterwards king of France, whoſe infancy could 'not eſcape the contagion of wretched Huguenotiſm, 'who importuned me continually to change my reli'gion, often throwing my Primmer into the fire, 'and inſtead of it giving me the Huguenots pſalms and 'prayers, and forcing me to take them; which, as 'ſoon as I had received, I immediately gave to Ma'dam de Curton, my governeſs, whom GOD of his 'mercy to me had been pleaſed to preſerve a Catho'lic, who took me often to the good man, cardinal 'de Tournon, who adviſed and encouraged me to ſuf'fer all things for the maintenance of my religion, 'and ſupplyed me with a primmer and beads, inſtead 'of thoſe my brother of Anjou had burnt. And his 'other particular friends, who had endeavoured to 'ruin me, finding them about me, paſſionately re'proached me, ſaying, it was folly and childhood 'made me do ſo; that it was plain I had no un'derſtanding; that all people of ſenſe, of whatever 'age or ſex, upon hearing charity preached had forſa'ken the corruptions of this bigottry: but that I was 'as fooliſh as my governeſs. And my brother of 'Anjou adding threatnings, ſaid, the queen, my mo'ther, would have me whipped. This he ſaid of 'his own head, for the queen, my mother, knew not 'of the error he was fallen into. As ſoon as ſhe 'underſtood it, ſhe ſeverely reprimanded him and his 'governors; and cauſing them to be inſtructed, con'ſtrained them to reſume the true, holy, and antient re'ligion of our fathers, from which ſhe had never 'once departed. I anſwered theſe his menaces, melt'ing into tears, as the age of ſeven or eight years 'which I was then of is but tender, that he might 'cauſe me to be whipped, and killed, if he pleaſed; 'that I would ſuffer all that could be inflicted on me, 'rather than damn myſelf.' Add, that, by reaſon of the difference of religion, ſhe was very much averſe to the marrying Henry IV. We ſhall prove this by a very curious paſſage: I take it from a letter written to this prince. She told me, it is Joan d'Albret who ſpeaks concerning our Margaret, that when theſe propoſals were ſet on foot, it was known that ſhe was a Catholic, and a zealous one. I told her that thoſe who had engaged in it, did not ſay ſo; and that the buſineſs of religion was repreſented very eaſy, and that ſhe herſelf had ſome affection for it; that otherwiſe I ſhould not have proceeded ſo far, and I deſired her to conſider of it. At other times that I ſpoke to her, ſhe did not anſwer me ſo abſolutely, nor ſo roughly. I believe ſhe ſpeaks as ſhe is prompted, and alſo that the declarations that have been made to us, concerning her liking to the Proteſtant religion, were only to make us agree to it (8).

(4) Ib. pag. 7.

(5) It is of Alcibiades, and not of Themiſtocles, that this was ſaid. See Plutarch in Alcibiade, pag. 192. D.

(6) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, pag. 9, &c.

(7) See the remark [B] of the article CLAUDE DE FRANCE.

(8) Le Labourer, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 904.

[C] The anſwer the new bride made when ſhe was aſked whether her marriage had been conſummated.] We ſhall make uſe of queen, Margaret's own relation. 'They would perſuade the queen, my mother, that 'I ought to be unmarried. With this reſolution, as 'I was one holy-day at her levee, where we were to 'perform our Eaſter devotions, ſhe preſſed me upon 'oath to tell her the truth; and aſked me whether 'the king, my huſband, was a man, ſaying, if he was 'not, ſhe had it in her power to unmarry me. I 'beſeeched her to believe, that I was not ſufficiently 'ſkilled to give her an anſwer. (For I could then ſay, 'as that Roman lady, whom her huſband chid for 'not acquainting him with his ſtinking breath; that 'ſhe thought all men had the ſame, having never come 'near any other than himſelf.) But be it as it would, 'I would abide where ſhe had placed me; very much 'apprehending, that the deſign of taking me away, 'was to do him an ill turn (9).' It is not probable, that this princeſs could ſincerely hold ſuch diſcourſe. She was above twenty years old; ſhe had been bred in a court every way corrupt, and particularly in the article of immodeſty (10). Obſerve how a man of wit (11) characterizes this court, Saint André . . . maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, is of ſo traſtable a virtue, that the prince of Joinville will teach her nothing new in marrying her. This is not a thing, continued he, which ought to ſurprize you; ſhe is handſome, educated amongſt the great ones, where example is ſome ſort of authority; ſhe is almoſt ſixteen years of age: this is an age, in which the honour of a maid begins to enjoy it's rights: we ſee even very few who carry their continence ſo far; and good ſenſe will not ſuffer you to wonder at a thing that cuſtom has rendered ſo familiar. But, couſin, here is ſomething that ought to ſurprize you, &c. Judge whether our Margaret was like to remain in an ignorance, which the chaſteſt of all the veſtals, and the holieſt of all the nuns, in the moſt ſimple and innocent ages, could hardly boaſt, conſult what has been ſaid above (12). But to prove that her account is unfaithful, and that ſhe has retrenched ſeveral circumſtances; it is ſufficient to ſay, that her

(9) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, pag. 67, 68.

(10) See, above, the remark [M] of the preceding article.

(11) The author of a romance, intituled, The Prince of Condé, pag. 32, Holl. Edit. 1681.

(12) Remark [A] of the article GONZAGUA (LADY).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Her anſwer is very different from the calumnies that are to be met with in printed books [D]. She was advertiſed by a Catholic gentleman named Mioſſans (c), that her huſband, and her brother, the duke of Alençon, deſigned to eſcape, and put themſelves at the head of ſome troops, whilſt the court, who had accompained the duke of Anjou king of Poland as far as Beaumont, were on their return to Paris. She diſcovered this deſign to Catherine de Medicis, and Charles IX, and made them promiſe to be contented with preventing their eſcape without doing any injury to theſe two princes. They kept their word with her till the conſpiracy was known, for which la Mole and the count de Coconas loſt their lives; but after this diſcovery they arreſted them, and commiſſioners were deputed to try them (d). Margaret drew up in writing what her huſband was to anſwer. She was at very ill terms with Henry III, and at very good with her other brother the duke of Alençon. This duke and the king of Navarre were in love with Madam de Sauve, which very much weakned the union there was between them. Buſſy, the duke's favourite, grew ſuſpected of being Margaret's galant, and this princeſs was her mother was not a woman to be ſatisfied with ſo ambiguous and oblique an anſwer. Catherine de Medicis being reſolved to diſſolve the marriage, in caſe it had not been conſummated, would have put, or cauſed to have been put, a ſecond queſtion, which would have capacitated her daughter to explain the matter, and ſufficiently inſtructed her for it, in ſpite of that profound and very extraordinary ignorance ſhe intrenched herſelf in. She would have taught her the definition of a man, not by the attributes of a rational creature, as in the books of Philoſophers, but by the particular attributes, belonging to the individual or ſpecifical relation of a huſband; and afterwards would have exactly compared with this definition, all the paſſages which had happened in her nuptial-bed. You ſay, you do not underſtand what a man is, be it ſo; but you very well remember whether, &c. Has the king of Navarre, &c? anſwer ay, or no. Thus Catherine de Medicis would have preſſed, or cauſed to have been preſſed this pretended ignorant lady; and, though her daughter had continued to declare that ſhe did not know how the affair in queſtion could be known by ſuch ſigns or marks, yet ſhe would not have failed to reſolve the queſtion, and give full ſatisfaction to the queen-mother. But as lame as her narration is, we may infer from it, that Catherine de Medicis was fully convinced by her daughter's anſwer, that there was not the leaſt ground to commence a proceſs of impotence againſt her ſon-in-law. I do not think that any one ever ventured to ſay, that the marriage was not conſummated; and yet this reaſon would have been one of the ſtrongeſt among thoſe that were ſo carefully collected, when they proceeded to declare the marriage null. Let us here ſet down a paſſage of the Satirical Divorce. This manifeſto (it is Henry IV, who is made to ſpeak) (13), will one day inform the lovers of truth what I was willing to conceal, out of modeſty to our holy Father, and cardinal Joyeuſe, his commiſſioner, deputed to hear me upon the ſubject of our divorce; not having on the twenty two articles of his interrogatory anſwered any thing that might look like ſcandal or diſhonour, unleſs perhaps on that wherein he enquired, whether ever, during the marriage, we had any commerce together: to which I anſwered, conſtrained by truth, that we were both ſo young, when we were married, and ſo laſcivious, that it was impoſſible to forbear. That which is ſaid of Margaret's conſtitution very well agrees with the hiſtory of her adventures. Now there is nothing more proper than that ſort of complexion to awaken a certain curioſity, which very ſoon expels the ignorance ſhe pretended to boaſt of: it is a curioſity which has ſuch ſudden effects as to amaze the whole world. Read theſe words of the count de Buſſi: you have heard of the paſſion of . . . . for her huſband when ſhe married him. This they ſay is much changed. The little lady can no longer bear him. It is ſaid in her excuſe: that which appears of the man, is not the man. And this makes every body inquiſitive, how a young maid of thirteen or fourteen years of age, came to learn what was requiſite to make a man, to be a man (14).

(c) Ib. pag. 69.

(d) Ib. pag. 74.

(13) Satirical Divorce, among the pieces printed with the Journal of Henry III, pag. m. 206, 207.

(14) Buſſi, Letter 316, of the fourth part, pag. 421, of the Holl. Edit.

[D] Her anſwer was very different from the calumnies that are to be met with in printed books.] What a vaſt difference there is betwixt Margaret's own relation of her conduct, and what others have publiſhed of it. She pretends to the ignorance of a child, upon the theory of marriage; and might have been impoſed upon, according to her own ſtory, and ſhe never the wiſer. But caſt your eyes a little upon theſe words of the Satirical Divorce; in which, as I have already ſaid, Henry IV, is introduced ſpeaking. 'I 'was not able to avoid my misfortune, tho' king 'Charles, who reigned at that time, who well knew 'his ſiſter's temper, gave me ſome intimation of it 'under this prophecy, when aſſuring the Huguenots 'of a pretended peace, to allure and deceive them, 'he proteſted with a thouſand oaths, that he gave not 'his Marget for a wife only to the king of Navarre, 'but to all the Heretics of his kingdom. Oh the prophecy, too full of truth and worthy a holy and 'divine inſpiration! If it had been general inſtead of 'particular, and in the room of the Huguenots only: 'had comprehended all mankind; for there is no 'ſort nor quality of men in all France, with whom 'this wretch has not exerciſed her laſciviouſneſs; no-'thing comes amiſs to her pleaſures, and ſhe values 'not age, greatneſs, nor extraction, provided her luſts 'be ſatisfied and ſatiated; and never ſince ſhe was e-'leven years old, has ſhe denied any body: at which 'age Antragues and Charins (for they both of them 'thought they had firſt obtained this favour,) had 'the firſt-fruits of her heat; which augmenting daily, 'and they being unable to extinguiſh it, tho' Antra-'gues made an effort, which afterwards ſhortened his 'life, ſhe caſt her eye on Martigues, and fixed it 'there ſo long, as to liſt him under her banner, and 'they were both ſo public in it, that it was the com-'mon diſcourſe and converſation of all the ſoldiers 'in the army, where Martigues was known as 'well as his valour, as colonel of foot (15).' It is added, that after Martigues's death, the duke of Guiſe was obliged to go through her hands, by the mediation of Madam de Carnavalet, a young, brave, and ambitious prince, who already beginning to build that machine, which being too ſuddenly ſhaken, will fall upon him, expected from his laſcivious embraces to have procured a marriage, and thereby fortified his pretences and deſigns, having dexterouſly broke off her treaty of marriage with the king of Portugal, already far advanced . . . . She quickly after added her young brothers to her ſalacious conqueſts; one of whom, namely Francis, continued this inceſt all his life; and Henry grew ſo out of conceit with her, that he could never love her afterwards, having at length perceived, that years, inſtead of cooling her deſires, augmented her fury, and that, being moveable as Mercury, ſhe ſhook at the leaſt object that approached her. Here is a virgin for you! which my relations and the public good obliged me to take for good and virtuous, to the great mortification of herſelf and her favourites; amongſt whom Antragues, as the marſhal de Retz formerly told me, was like to dye of grief, or of a loſs of blood, which the violence of his anguiſh to ſee us married forced out in ſeveral places (16). If you would ſee another teſtimony, read the firſt dialogue of Euſebius Philadelphus Coſmopolita, where you will find this paſſage at the forty-fourth page of the Edinburgh edition 1574 (17). Hereupon the king pretended to be vexed with ſo many delays, blaſpheming and raging, ſwore, that he would have the marriage conſummated without more ado: that if cardinal de Bourbon would not marry them, he would lead them himſelf to a Huguenot, meaning to have them married by a miniſter; and that, by Chriſt, he would not have his Marget (for ſo he called his ſiſter) kept any longer in this languiſhing condition:

Ali. The good lady took care not to ſtay ſo long: her brother very well knew that he had her maidenhead.

(15) Satirical Divorce, pag. 123.

(16) Ibid. pag. 190.

(17) Reveille-matin des François & de leurs voiſins, pag. 4. the two laſt are Publiſhers Alike, and the Hiſtorio-pher.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was obliged to send away Mademoiselle de Torigni her confident [E]. She took this very heinously, as what might bring a great scandal on her reputation (e), and declared her resentment to her husband, who for his part had but little regard for her (f). They neither lay together, nor conversed with each other. She knew the resolution her husband and brother had taken to depart from court. Her brother was the first who made his escape (g): her husband did the same soon after without taking leave of his wife (b). Henry III, imagining that she would go and join them, or that if she was left at liberty at court, she would be their spy, arrested her. She received very obliging letters from her husband, and some civilities from the king her brother, who was obliged to act in that manner, because the duke of Alençon would not disarm, unless she was satisfied. She accompanied the queen, her mother, to the conferences, that were held near Sens, and where was concluded (i) the treaty of peace with the duke of Alençon. After this she desired to retire to the king her husband, who earnestly demanded her, but Henry III, refused to give her leave (k). Under the false pretence of an indisposition she took a journey to the Spaw waters, in order to favour the design that had been put into the duke of Alençon's head of getting himself elected sovereign of the Netherlands. Being returned into France, she testified afresh her desire to go to her husband. It was consented to at last, and the queen, her mother, conducted her to the king of Navarre (l). Who came to receive them at la Reolle (m), and paid great regard to his wife during the stay of Catherine de Medicis in Gascogny (n). They attended her as far as Castelnaudarri, on her return; and afterwards went to reside at Pau in Bearn, where they quickly fell out, both on account of Margaret's pressing her husband to disgrace a secretary, and also on account of the Galantries he engaged in [F]. The reason of her demanding this secretary's

(e) Ib. pag. 119.
(f) Ibid.
(g) In 1576.
(b) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 129.
(i) In 1576.
(k) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 157, 162.
(l) In the year 1578.
(m) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 313.
(n) Ib. pag. 315.

Hist. I did not know that; but I have heard say, that she was ready to lye-in, when the queen was at Xainctes.

Ali. It is so, I assure you.

[E] She was obliged to send away Mademoiselle de Torigni her confident.] Le Guast, Henry the third's favourite, represented to him, that he ought not to suffer young princesses to have maids, with whom they had such a particular friendship (18), and so fully convinced him of that maxim, that this prince declared to the king of Navarre, that he would never love him him more, if Mrs Torigni was not removed the next day (19). The king of Navarre was therefore forced to desire his wife, and even to command her to dismiss this maid. The queen of Navarre did not obey without the greatest reluctance. Mrs Torigni departed the same day, and retired to her cousin, Mr Chastelas (20). The king, some time after, to give his sister the cruellest mortification imaginable, sent some people to Chastelas's house, under pretence of taking Mrs Torigni, and bringing her to court, to drown her in a river hard by (21): but some gentlemen, who went to join the duke of Alençon, delivered her (22). We may affirm, generally speaking, that the principle which Guast reasoned upon, is good; for princesses could never succeed in any intrigue of galantry, if they had not their chamber-confidents: and it is a ground of suspicion to see much intimacy between them and their waiting-maids. A great lady desires to be waited on in form, and is uneasy, and chides, if the the least punctillio be wanting. This is the way to be little beloved by her domestics. Liberality itself is not a very certain means of procuring their affection, unless it be attended with caresses and civilities. But a lady seldom stoops so low, unless in some certain cases of necessity, in which she has occasion for the discretion and mediation of her women. Caresses are not then spared; opening the heart to them, and treating them with respect and familiarity then dispose these inferiors to love their superiors, Facinus quos inquinat, æquat (23), - - - An ill design levels the undertakers. Those ladies must be excepted from this rule, who, by a prudent conduct, have obtained an unexceptionable reputation: but as our queen of Navarre was none of those, it cannot be thought strange, that her intimacy with Mrs Torigni were suspected by Henry III. It is a point of nice policy in a king to place about his children not such persons as aspire to be confidents, but such as are contented with being honest spies. And therefore such people are generally made use of, and others removed who answer not those intentions. Once more, Henry III would not have been to blame in following the counsel which was given him, if he had only aimed at reforming his sister, and removing from her some evil instruments; but the violence he used was inexcusable: he would have drowned the confident; and from thence it may be suspected that his motives were criminal. He was willing to satisfy his jealousy; he was enraged that his brother possessed the heart of queen Margaret. Common fame makes them both to love her criminally, and to have been beloved by her one after the other; but, that at last, she gave the preference to the younger, and not to the right of eldership: a right, that loose women pay very little regard to (24).

(18) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 117.
(19) Ibid. pag. 118.
(20) Ibid. pag. 119.
(21) Ibid. pag. 131.
(22) Ibid. pag. 135.
(23) Lucan. Phars. lib. V, ver. 290.

[F] She and her husband fell out . . . on account of the galantries he engaged in.] The passion he had for Dayelle, maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis (25), did not embroil him with his wife. But when queen Catherine was gone, he began to seek out Rebours, who was a malicious young creature that could not abide Margaret, but did her all the ill offices she could with her husband (26). She remained sick at Pau, when the king of Navarre left it; and, as with this prince, it was, out of sight, out of mind, he began to engage with Mrs Fosseuse (27). The Duke of Alençon also fell in love with her (28). This had like to have excited the king of Navarre to break with his wife: for he believed, that she did good offices to her brother against him; which, when she understood, she was so importunate with her brother to desist, that he spoke no more to Fosseuse. The later, to remove from the king of Navarre, whom she extreamly loved, his jealousy of the duke of Alençon, gave herself up so entirely to oblige him in every thing he desired, that she had the misfortune to prove with child. Finding herself in this condition, she quite altered her behaviour to me, (it is queen Margaret who speaks) (29); and whereas she used to appear without any reserve, and to do me all the good offices she could with my husband, she began to conceal herself from me, and do me as many bad offices as good ones she had before done. She so possessed the king, my husband, that in a little time I perceived him quite altered. He grew out of humour, and reserved, and my presence was no longer so agreeable to him, as it had been for the four or five happy years I had spent with him in Gascogny, whilst Fosseuse behaved herself there with honour. She relates afterwards, that Fosseuse put it into the king of Navarre's head, for a cloak to her big belly, or at least to get rid of it, to go to the hot-well waters at Bearn. This prince earnestly pressed his queen to go thither, telling her, that his daughter (for so he called Fosseuse) had occasion to drink the waters for a disorder she had in her stomach, and that there was no probability she would go thither without her mistress, and that this would occasion suspicion where there was no reason for it. All that he could obtain, was, that two of her companions should go with her, Rebours, and Villesavin, and the governess. They went with her; and I, says queen Margaret (30), staid at Baviere (31). I heard every day from Rebours, (who was a corrupt and deceitful creature, that he had loved, and only desired to exclude Fosseuse, in hopes to succeed her in the favour of the king my husband) that Fosseuse did me all the ill offices she could, commonly abusing me, and persuading herself that if she had a son, and could make away with me, she should marry the king . . . . At a month or five weeks end, we returned

(24) The author of the romance, intituled, The Prince of Condé, supposes, pag. 120, that this prince being beloved by the mareschal de St André's lady, who had refused the heart of the king of Navarre, the king told that lady, I plainly see that the being my younger brother by seven or eight years, is a considerable recommendation to your favour.
(25) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 314.
(26) Ib. p. 321.
(27) Ib. p. 322.
(28) Ib. p. 346.
(29) Ib. p. 347.
(30) Ib. p. 350.
(31) It should be at Bagnieres.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ſecretary's diſgrace, deſerves to be known, and extravagance of thoſe who allow no toleration Proteſtants, and proved not very advantageous t wife obtained, that the city of Nerac, where f that no hoſtilities ſhould be committed within three lea returned to Nerac, where finding that every body talked of Foſſeuſe's being with child, and that it was not only the common converſation in our court, but all round the country; I was reſolved to try if I could ſuppreſs this rumour, and ſpeak with her about it (32) The queen made her the offer of her aſſiſtance, and to do her the office of a mother (33), that is, to remove her to ſome remote lodging; and whilſt the king ſhould go a hunting another way, not to ſtir from her till ſhe was delivered. She, inſtead of thanking me, with an extream arrogance ſaid, ſhe would make all thoſe liars, who had reported it; that for ſome time I had not loved her, and only ſought a pretence to ruin her: And, ſpeaking as high as I had ſpoke low to her, ſhe flies in a paſſion from my cloſet, and went to fetch thither the king my huſband; ſo that he was very angry with me for what I had mentioned to his daughter, ſaying, ſhe ſhould make all her accuſers liars; and kept his countenance with me a long time, even for ſome months, till the time of her delivery. As ſhe was taken in the morning at break of day, lying in the chamber of the maids of honour, ſhe ſent for my Phyſician, and deſired him to go and acquaint the king my huſband; which he did. We lay in the ſame chamber, in different beds, according to our cuſtom. As the Phyſician told him this news, he was in great trouble, not knowing what to do, fearing on the one hand that ſhe would be diſcovered, and on the other, that ſhe would be ill aſſiſted, for he loved her very much. He reſolved at laſt to confeſs the whole to me, and prayed me to go to her aſſiſtance (34) . . . I told him . . . that I would go, and do as much for her as if ſhe was my daughter; that in the mean time he ſhould go a hunting, and carry all the people abroad, that no body might hear of it. I quickly got her removed out of the maid's chamber, into a diſtant one, with my Phyſician and women to aſſiſt her, and had her well taken care of. As GOD would have it, ſhe brought only a daughter, and that ſtill-born. Being delivered, ſhe was carried back to her chamber; where, tho' all poſſible diſcretion was uſed, the report could not be prevented from being ſpread all over the caſtle. The king my huſband returning from hunting, went to ſee her, as he uſed to do. She deſired him that I would come and viſit her as I uſed to do all my maids when they were ſick, thinking by that means to ſtifle the report. The king coming into my chamber, found me laid upon the bed, being weary with riſing ſo early, and with the pains I had taken to aſſiſt her. He deſired me to riſe and go and ſee her. I told him, that I had done this when ſhe had occaſion for my help, but that at preſent there was nothing more to do for her; that if I went, I ſhould rather diſcover than conceal the matter, and that all the world would point at me; he was very angry with me, and what diſpleaſed me moſt was, that I thought I did not deſerve this recompence for what I had done in the morning. She often put him into ſuch humours as theſe againſt me (35).

(32) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, pag. 352.

(33) Ib. p. 353.

(34) Ib. p. 354.

(35) Ib. p. 356.

We have ſeen elſewhere (36), that Andromache, the valiant Hector's wife, was ſo complaiſant and obliging, as to give ſuck to her huſband's baſtards. But here you ſee a queen of Navarre, who was almoſt as good-natured; ſhe almoſt did the office of Midwife to her huſband's miſtreſſes. We muſt confeſs, that thoſe who have ſo much blamed this prince's conjugal patience, ſhould have conſidered that he of all men leaſt deſerved a faithful ſpouſe, and that his conduct would have been able to ſpoil the beſt diſpoſitions to virtue in his wife. A certain author has ſaid, that in the ordinary cauſes of ſeparation, the blame is laid upon the wife, but that the huſband is often the cauſe of the wife's being to blame (37). This may be ſaid in part of Henry IV. How little is he in this place of queen Margaret's Memoirs! He is here much more little, than he is great on ſome other occaſions. For a king, for the leader of a great party, making head againſt the Guiſes, and the whole court of France, to go away to the bath with a young lady he has got with child; to be angry with his wife, who was willing to inform herſelf of this big belly, the better to conceal it; to cry it is a calumny againſt a maid, whoſe innocence time would diſcover; to go a little while after, and humbly entreat his wife to aſſiſt

(36) Above, citation (1) of the article ANDROMACHE.

(37) Amuſemens ſerieux & comiques, pag. 56, Amſterdam Edit. 1699.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google condition that the king her husband was not in the town (o). This exception caused the marshal de Biron to cannonade the town one day when the king of Navarre came into it. This extremely displeased the queen of Navarre [H]. She met with yet farther mortifications from that time till the journey she made to the court of France in 1582. It is with this journey she ends the Memoirs she has left us of her life, and from which I have taken what we have just now seen. There was reason to say, that she addressed them to Brantome [I], and not to Charles de Vivonne, Baron de la Chastaigneraye, or to Monsieur de Rendan. It is a work which deserves to be read, containing some things very curious; and it is to be wished that it had extended to the last years of the author's life. A great many omissions are to be found in it, but could it be expected that queen Margaret would confess such things as might stain her reputation? Those acknowledgments are reserved for the tribunal of confession; they are not designed for History. We need not wonder then not to find in her work any shadow of the galantries, in which she engaged both herself, and her maids of honour, in order to oppose Catherine de Medicis by way of countermine (p). But to resume the thread of our narration, I must take notice, that in leaving the court of France in 1583, she received a cruel affront by order of king Henry III [K]. It may be very justly said, that and the most reasonable reflexion that could offer itself, was the only one she never once made. She ought, above all things, to have considered from thence, how blameable the injustice of her grand-father, her father, and her brothers, had been, in their barbarous edicts against the Protestants; and this is what, without doubt, she was far from thinking on. It is even very probable, that the Catholics of Bearn, who had been beaten and imprisoned, persisted in believing, that it was just to persecute the Huguenots, and to deprive them of the exercise of their religion; for it is likely, they said, the court of France is orthodox, and that of Navarre heretical; the former therefore ought to persecute, and not the latter (39). But they might be answered, go, and state your fine arguments to the Sieur du Pin, he will only convert the propositions: the court of Navarre is orthodox, that of France is heretical; the former therefore ought to forbid going to mass, and the latter ought to permit going to sermons. Wretched persecutors! Your disease must needs be extravagant, which cannot be cured by retaliation.

(o) Ibid. pag. 332.

(p) See the remark [O] of the article HENRY IV.

(39) See the Philosophical Commentary upon Compel them to come in, Part I, pag. 187, & seq. & Part III, pag. 122, & seq.

[H] The marshal de Biron cannonaded the town .... This displeased the queen of Navarre.] I would make no comment upon these words, did I not find here an occasion to shew, that the best Historians deceive us. This is the queen of Navarre's account: The marshal de Biron discharged seven or eight vollies of cannon upon the town, one whereof reached even to the castle; which having done, he retires, sending me a trumpeter to excuse himself to me, saying, that if I had been alone he would not for all the world have done this; but that I knew it had been concluded in the neutrality, &c (40). Margaret was not satisfied with these excuses, but answered the trumpeter, that she was highly affronted with the marshal de Biron's conduct, and that she would complain of it to the king (41). The duke of Alençon went into Guienne some time after, and having ended the civil war, induced the marshal de Biron to take the command of his army in Flanders (42). He reconciled the king of Navarre and the marshal de Biron, and would have this marshal at the first interview give queen Margaret satisfaction by a modest excuse for what was done at Nerac, and commanded this queen to treat him with all the rude and contemptuous expressions she could think of. I executed this passionate command of my brother, says she, with the discretion requisite in such cases, as very well knowing that he would one day be sorry for it, since he might have great expectations from the assistance of so brave a gentleman. This is the rule by which we ought to compare the accounts of other Historians, which can be true only in proportion to their conformity with this of queen Margaret; for she knew the affair better than any body, and could have no manner of reason to disguise it. Let us see what Brantome says: 'For the greater bravado, the 'marshal discharged some vollies of cannon against 'the town; so that the queen who had run thither, 'and stood upon the walls for her diversion, had 'like to have had her share of them; for a ball hap'pened to fall hard by her, which extreamly pro'voked her, both for the little respect the marshal 'had shewn her, to come to brave her in her own 'town, and because he was commanded by the king 'not to commit hostilities within five leagues round 'the place where the queen of Navarre was, which he 'did not then observe; for which she conceived such 'a resentment and enmity against the marshal, that 'she resolved to resent it, and to be revenged of him. 'A year and a half after, she came to court, where 'the marshal was, whom the king had re-called 'from Guienne, for fear of new commotions; for 'the king of Navarre threatened to arm, if he did not 'remove him. The queen of Navarre still resenting the 'marshal's affront, paid him no respect, but treated 'him with contempt, every where villifying him, 'and reciting the injury he had done her. At last 'the marshal, fearing the fury and hatred of the 'daughter and sister of the kings, his masters, and 'knowing the temper of this princess, bethought him'self of waiting on her, and begging her pardon, ac'knowledging and repenting of what he had done, 'which, as she was of a generous temper, she did not 'refuse, but received him into her favour and friend'ship, and forgave all that was past (43).' The first fault of this author is the saying, that the queen of Navarre ran the risk of her life upon the ramparts: she would not have omitted a circumstance of this nature had it been true. The second fault is, to extend to five leagues what was but three. The third is a fault of omission, charging Biron with having most injustly exceeded his orders. He did nothing but what he might do, conformably to the instructions he had received from Henry III. For the neutrality granted the queen of Naverre had no place, but in her husband's absence. Brantome's last error is a fault of Chronology: the marshal de Biron made his peace in Guienne. It is therefore false that queen Margeret used him ill at the court of France eighteen months after; and that he then pacified her by his humiliation. Mezerai is mistaken in two things. The marshal de Biron, says he (44), discharged some vollies of canon against the walls, upon which the queen was beholding the skirmish, which so offended this princess, that she never afterwards pardoned him.

(40) Queen Margaret's Memoirs, pag. 336.

(41) Ibid. pag. 338.

(42) Ibid. pag. 343.

(43) Brantome, Memoirs of Illustrious Ladies, pag. 264, 265.

(44) Mezerai, Chron. Abridgment, Tom. v, pag. 246, ad ann. 1580. He says, pag. 493, Tom. iii, of his great history, that a canon-ball fell at the feet of this princess within the distance of a yard.

[I] The memoirs she left us of her life ..... she addressed them to Brantome.] Auger de Mauleon, Sieur de Granier, published them at Paris, in 1628, in 8vo (45). There were some other editions of them afterwards. He affirms, in the preface, that the baron de la Chastaigneraye is the person, queen Margeret addressed them to; and that those who believe they were addressed to Mr Rendan, have no probable grounds for their opinion. Mr Colomiés has very plainly proved (46), that they were addressed to Mr Peter de Bourdeille, abbot de Brantome. You will see his reasons in Moreri's Dictionary.

(45) See Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choisie, pag. 173, of the second edition.

[K] She received a barbarous affront, by the order of king Henry III.] It is thus Mezerai relates it: 'The 'king ..... banished from her presence two 'ladies her confidents, writing to the king of Na'varre with his own hand, that he had expelled them 'as most pernicious vermin, and not to be suffered 'near a lady of such extraction: And some days after 'he commanded her to return to her husband, with'out permitting her to come to take leave of him. His 'hatred went still much farther: he sent after her a cap'tain of guards, with sixty archers, who having stop'ped her retinue beyond Palaiseau, and rummaged her 'litter, so as to make her pull off her mask, he seized 'her gentleman of the horse, her Physician and Apothe'cary, whilst Larchant went to seize those two ladies 'upon another road. He caused all these persons to be

(46) Idem, Historical Miscellanies, pag. 86, & seq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that her husband had so little delicacy upon the point of domestic honour, that he was not content to shut his eyes, but proceeded even to the approbation of his wife's galantries. The practice she made of love was not at all concealed; pretending by this, that a public profession bespoke some virtue, and that secrecy was the sign of vice. Henry IV quickly learned to caress his wife's galants, and she to caress her husband's mistresses (q). But if he was blameable in a thousand instances for this base complaisance, he discovered, upon the occasion we are now speaking of, a great deal of spirit and sensibility. He pressingly required of Henry III, either that his wife should receive satisfaction for the affront given, or that he might be at liberty not to receive her [L]. He obtained neither of these two demands, (q) D'Aubigné, Universal Hist. Tom. ii, book iv, chap. v, pag. 988, 989, ad ann. 1579.

' be brought to him in the abbey of Ferrieres, near ' Montargis, separated them into different chambers, ' questioned each of them apart concerning the life, ' morals, and conversation, of his sister, and would ' have their depositions in writing; upon his depart- ' ing from thence, he sent some to the Bastile, who ' were examined before the provost-lieutenant, and let ' his sister go (47).' Varillas (48) has related this adventure with all the same circumstances, as Mezerai. I am surprized that a Hugenot Historian, who lived in that time, and could let nothing of this nature escape, has given a much shorter account, than that which may be read at the beginning of this remark. Consider, I pray, the Sieur d'Aubigné's brevity, and the little agreement between his narration and that of others, in respect to the circumstances of place. The queen of Navarre, says he (49), returning to court with the queen, her mother (50), it happened that her restless spirit remained not long without offending the king her brother, and his minions; combining at court, with those who defamed this prince, imputing to him most filthy pleasures, in which, it seemed, the ladies were concerned. Hereupon this princess received some affronts; the last of which was, that Salern, captain of the guards, made her unmask at St James's gate, as she left Paris, to return to Gascogny, with her husband; with whom, at the same time, she was at very ill terms.

(47) Mezerai, Hist. of France, Tom. iii, pag. 546, 547.

(48) Varillas, Hist. of Henry III, book vii, pag. 232, 233, Holl. Edit. ad ann. 1584, wherein he is mistaken, for the thing happened in August 1583. See the Memoirs of du Plessis Mornai, Tom. i, pag. 275.

(49) D'Aubigné, Universal Hist. Tom. ii, book v, ch. iii, pag. 1083.

(50) D'Aubigné is mistaken, Margaret went thither alone, and without her mother. See her Memoirs towards the end. It is true her mother came to meet her.

[L] Henry IV pressingly required of Henry III, either that his wife should receive satisfaction for the affront given her, or that he might be at liberty not to receive her.] See what d'Aubigné relates immediately after the passage I have just quoted (51). ' The king of ' Navarre, taking advice of his council in that affair, ' they all unanimously agreed, that he ought to re- ' sent it; and for that end to send and demand of ' the king a notable satisfaction, with a clause some- ' thing bidding defiance, or at least a separation of ' friendship in case of refusal: all advised this, and ' all refused the execution, except Aubigné; who, ' after he had remonstrated how he was accused of ' having saved his master, and of some free writings ' and offensive discourses; and that what might be ' born with from another, would become mortally ' odious in his mouth; yet perceiving the passion of ' this offended prince, he resolved to undertake the ' journey. He finds the king at St Germains, who, ' having given the messenger all the appearances of ' terror, heard him harangue upon the consequences ' attending the injuries of princes: how this act of ' infamy had been played before the most magnifi- ' cent company, and upon the most exalted stage in ' Christendom ..... However, at last, not ' upon the refusal of justice, but upon the delay which ' bespoke a refusal, the messenger renounced the ' honour of the king's alliance and friendship.' He afterwards relates the menaces contained in the king's answer, the vigorous reply he made to them (52), his answer in the same strain to the queen-mother, and the diligence wherewith he returned, and prevented the assassins of the court of France. This being so, it cannot be denied, that Henry IV, expressed his indignation with all the resolution of a brave and magnanimous prince. But we are going to see another account, where he does not show so bold a resolution, ' (53) The king of Navarre having received this ' news (54) at Nerac, concluded that he ought not to ' receive her (55), till he knew the cause of this af- ' front, which being offered and received at noon-day, ' could not be dissembled: in order, therefore, to ' have it fully explained or repaired, he resolved to ' send Mr du Plessis to the king, who was gone to ' Lyons, whither he went after him, riding post. ' This negotiation, so thorny and full of precipices on ' all sides, where the honour of a husband and wife ' were concerned, of such a quality; and between ' two kings, one his master, and the other his prince, ' is found entire in his Memoirs: but this is the sum ' of it. Having represented to the king the heinous- ' ness of the fact, he demanded two things, in the ' name of the king of Navarre. One was, that he ' would please to declare the cause of his displeasure, ' which had carried him to such indignities against his ' wife, who had the honour to be his sister; since the ' meanest woman in the world meets with no attempt ' against her honour, till she has first lost it, which he ' could not believe, suspending, in the mean time, his judg- ' ment with his usual prudence and moderation. The ' other was, that at least, as the head of the family, ' he would do justice; and, as a good master, advise him ' what was to be done in so perplexed an affair. The ' king shuffled, and perhaps finding himself guilty of ' too much precipitation, was willing to throw the ' cause upon the ladies abovementioned, whom he ac- ' cused of a bad life: but Mr du Plessis replied to him, ' that it was not his business to plead their cause, that ' the king his master did not do him so much wrong, as ' to send him in their favour: that the question was con- ' cerning the queen his sister, if she had committed a ' fault deserving such an affront, he demanded justice ' on her; if not, he desired him to do her justice upon ' those, who were the authors of this ill advice to ' the dishonour of the royal family, and his own . . . (56). ' That he was commanded, in brief, to tell his ma- ' jesty, that he had done too much or too little; Too ' much, if the fault was less than extreme; Too ' little, if esteeming her to deserve the loss of honour, ' he suffered her to survive it. To this the king an- ' swered, that he was obliged to the king of Navarre ' for the steps he had taken; that he had a mother ' and a brother interested in this affair, as well as ' himself, to whom he would communicate it ..... ' Mr du Plessis plainly perceived, that he could draw ' nothing more from him: but there remained one ' scruple, that, in the mean time, the queen, his sister, ' continued her journey. Upon which he said: But ' what will Christendom say, Sir, if the king of Na- ' varre receives her, embraces her without scruple, thus ' returned to him stained and dishonoured? To which ' the king replied, What? but that he will receive ' the sister of his king; what can he do less? But ' of a just and equitable king, says Mr du Plessis, who ' would not require this obedience from such a subject at ' the expence of his honour and courage. Hereupon the ' king resolved to write to the queen, his mother, ' that she should cause her to stay by the way in some ' town.' The issue of all this was, that Bellievre deputed to the king of Navarre, obliged him, at last, to receive his wife, without giving any satisfaction at all to his demands. Read the letter which was written to Mr de Montagne (57), by Mr du Plessis Mornai, in 1584. It begins thus: ' Sir, we have heard Mr de ' Bellievre. To tell the truth, he has proposed no ' other satisfaction for the indignity done to the queen ' of Navarre, than the authority (58) and liberty ' which a king has over his subjects. A reason, as ' you know, that has more vinegar than oil in it, ' and very improper for so sensible a wound, and in ' so nervous a part: and I know not whether I may ' venture to say, little suitable to the grandeur of our ' French princes, who have always tempered their ' sovereign power with a gracious equity, and have ' never disposed of the honour of the least of their ' subjects, but with their approbation. However, the ' king of Navarre has resolved to shew, that he ' chose rather to give the king satisfaction than him- ' self. And to this purpose he is determined to make ' his honour submit under the respect to his com- ' mands: being come to a resolution to visit and re- ' ceive the queen, his wife, at his house at Nerac (59).

(51) Ubi supra.

(52) He relates it also in Sanci's Catholic Confession, book ii, ch. vii, pag. 447, Edit. 1699.

(53) Mr du Plessis Mornai's Life, pag. 71.

(54) That is, that queen Margaret had received the affront mentioned in the preceding remark.

(55) That is to say, the queen his wife.

(56) Vie de Du Plessis Mornai, pag. 72.

(57) Michael de Montagne, author of the Essays.

(58) There is an error of the press in this passage of the French.

(59) Du Plessis Mornai's Memoirs, Tom. pag. 297, 29

But

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google demands, but was obliged to receive Margaret in Nerac with all her disgrace [M]. Henry IV being some time after excommunicated by Pope Sixtus, she made use of this pretence to leave him, and make war upon him (r). She possessed herself of the Agenois, which was given her in dowry (s); but she found very little satisfaction in that war, and was obliged to leave Agen precipitately [N], and to fly into Auvergne, where she (r) Mezerai, Hist. of France, Tom. iii, pag. 596.

(s) Ibid.

But behold here a very perplexing riddle. D'Aubigné positively affirms, that he was the only person employed to demand reparation for this insult, all the others having refused to undertake such a commission. Du Plessis Mornai, affirms as strongly, that he was the only person sent to the court of France on this affair. D'Aubigné makes no mention of du Plessis, nor du Plessis of d'Aubigné; but contents himself with saying, that the king of Navarre spoke first of sending the Sieur de Frontenac (60). It cannot be supposed that there are two affairs in question; for though we may speak in the plural number of affronts received by queen Margaret, it can by no means be pretended, that d'Aubigné demanded satisfaction for an affront before or after that, which obliged the king of Navarre to depute Mr du Plessis. Both these authors, who relate their commission, have in view the action of the captain of the guards, who stopped queen Margaret's litter, &c. He is called Saliers in the life of du Plessis (61), and Salern in the history of d'Aubigné (62). This shews that they mean the same man; but that, by an error of the press, or by some little slip of memory, his name is differently written or ended. I confess, that, according to Mr du Plessis, the exploit of this captain of the guards, happened four leagues from Paris (63), between Palaiseau and St Cler (64), and, according to d'Aubigné, at St James's gate. I confess also, that in d'Aubigné's account, the complaint and demand of satisfaction was made to the king at St Germains, but at Lyons, according to du Plessis. And yet I cannot conceive, that on this occasion the king of Navarre sent two deputies to Henry III, since Mr du Plessis affirms, that he was the only person charged with this negotiation. If I were to distrust either the memory or probity of one of these two, it would be Mr du Plessis I should suspect. However, I will not determine to the prejudice of the other. I chuse rather to suspend my judgment (65), and I am not sufficiently satisfied in my conjectures to give them a place here. For the rest, I am not the first that has been perplexed with the account of this adventure (66). Note, that d'Aubigné, when he published the second edition of his book (67), might have known what is related contrary to his narrative in du Plessis's Memoirs (68).

(60) Ibid. pag. 273.

(61) Ib. pag. 71.

(62) Ib. pag. 1083.

(63) Du Plessis's Life, pag. 71.

(64) Du Plessis's Memoirs, Tom. i, pag. 275.

(65) See, below, remark [R].

(66) See the Notes upon Sanci's Catholic Confession, book ii, chap. xvi, pag. 409, Edit. 1699.

(67) In 1626.

(68) Printed in 1624.

[M] He was obliged to receive Margaret in Nerac with all her disgrace.] Here we may apply to the king of Navarre, Parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus. ---- Mountains in labour will bring forth a mouse. If it be true that he sent a challenge to the king of France, as is related above by d'Aubigné (69); but if the matter be reduced to the terms of Mr du Plessis's negotiation, the fall will appear much less inglorious. The ill state of his affairs did not permit him to be so unseasonably haughty. Bellievre, deputed from Henry III, spoke with so much the more loftiness, as the garrisons placed round about Nerac made him believe the king of Navarre durst refuse him nothing. This prince therefore was forced to submit whether he would or no: and to ask, as a favour, that at least the garrisons might be sent away, here follows the sequel of the passage we have seen above (70), I mean the words of the letter from Mr du Plessis Mornai: 'Resolving to visit and receive the queen, his wife, in his 'house at Nerac, on condition only, that the garrisons 'might be removed which were placed round about, 'both that this reception might have no appearance 'of force, and for the security of their stay. You 'know whether it be civil to receive her in a borrowed house, or incivil to demand liberty in his own. 'Mr de Bellievre notwithstanding made a very great 'difficulty of it: hereupon, this day, Mr de Clervant was dispatched to the queen of Navarre; and 'from thence will proceed to their majesties, who, in 'my opinion, considering the matter past, and considering in it the person of the king of Navarre, will 'not refuse him so trifling a circumstance, since in a 'thing of such importance he has granted the principal. Judge in what streights these people put us. 'We had reduced the matter almost to the best point 'that could be hoped for; and now they stand upon 'a meer trifle, and would make us lose all our 'credit, if our sincerity towards our master was not 'very well known (71).' Let us therefore excuse for this once the king of Navarre, and not suffer this particular passage of his life to lye under the censure related by a modern Historian: The malicious, says he (72), 'spared not his domestic affairs. They highly 'blamed his conduct in abandoning queen Margaret 'to her gallanting humour; more patient than the emperor Claudius, said they, he suffered this new Messalina, known to be his lawful wife, to dishonour him 'publickly. Had he a mind, at his own cost, to teach 'those, whose wives he debauched, to become contented 'cuckolds?' If he had with marks of esteem received his wife, dishonoured by the public affront the king her brother had put upon her, we might reasonably accuse him of the most cowardly tameness: but he took not that method; he plainly gave her to understand, that he despised her; and this was one of the motives that induced her to break with him. Read these words of Mr du Plessis's Life: Queen Margaret, whether she could not bear to be despised, or whether she returned to her old practices, threw herself into Agen, and there made war for the League (73). After all, it must be remembered, that there are princes, who are much more at a loss than other men, what resolution to take when they are dignified with horns. It is a very difficult part to act: patience and impatience are equally the object of laughter; and it is not easy to find a just medium between the severity of Henry VIII, and the good-nature of Henry IV. Let every one in cases of this nature, remember the old maxim,

(69) In the remark [L].

(70) In the remark [L], citation (59).

(71) Du Plessis's Memoirs, Tom. i, pag. 298.

(72) Le Vassor, Hist. of Lewis XIII, book i, pag. 54.

(73) Du Plessis's Life, pag. 90.

Il est bien aisé de rependre,
Mais mal aisé de faire mieux.

'Tis easy to find a fault,
But difficult to do better.

[N] Being obliged to leave Agen precipitately.] 'She 'was very ill served there, by means of Madam de 'Duras, who had a great command over her, and 'under her name authorized heavy exactions and contributions: the people of the town were exasperated 'with them, and, under-hand, contrived their liberty, 'and the means of expelling both their lady and her 'garrisons; upon which discontent, the marshal de 'Matignon took occasion to make an attempt upon 'the town; as the king, being acquainted with the 'opportunity, commanded him, with great joy, to 'oppress his sister, whom he did not love, with more 'and more mortifications: wherefore the enterprize 'which miscarried the first time, was so dextrously 'managed the second, by the said marshal and the 'inhabitants, that the town was taken and forced in 'such a manner, and with that suddenness and alarm, 'that all this unfortunate queen could do, was to get 'behind a gentleman, and Madam de Duras behind 'another, and to save themselves by flight, riding 'twelve leagues the first day, and as many the next, 'and to escape into the strongest fortress of France, 'which is Carlat (74).' Queen Margaret observes, in the beginning of her Memoirs, that this account of Brantome is wrong; but we do not know how she would have rectified it. Let us see how the author of the Satirical Divorce makes Henry IV speak: She suffered herself again to be carried away by her lasciviousness and excessive leudness, leaving me without saying a word, and going to Agen, a town opposite to my interest, to set up her trade there, and to continue her disorderly life with greater liberty: but the inhabitants presaging as ill success from so ill a life, occasioned her to depart in so much haste, that she could scarce find a horse that would carry double, to take her up behind,

(74) Brantome, Illustrious Ladies, pag. 254, 255.

nor

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

she consumed the rest of her youth in adventures more becoming a woman, who had abandoned her husband, than a daughter of France (t). Lignerac, conducted her with some gentlemen in great disorder, to the town of Carlat, where his brother was Chastelain (u). Henry III took such measures that the inhabitants prepared to betray her (x). She had some notice of it and escaped; but she was taken by the marquis of Canillac, and caried to the castle of Usson. He fell in love with her, and suffered himself to be so bewitched with her fine discourses, that she secured the place to herself, and expelled him thence (y). In this fortress she lived a recluse till she came to the court of France in 1605. She had been sollicited to consent to the dissolution of her marriage; but she refused it, during the life of the duchess of Beaufort (z); but afterwards she gave her consent, and herself began the process by a petition presented for this purpose to Pope Clement VIII. The best reason she alledged was the want of consent, and that was good for nothing; for besides, that this was declaring that she was guilty of a horrid perjury in Notre-Dame church at Paris, where cardinal de Bourbon performed the nuptial ceremonies (aa), she manifestly contradicted what she has written in her Memoirs. We there find (bb) that she rejected the proposal of a divorce; and that she had nothing more at heart than to testifie her affection, regard, and obedience to her husband, even so far as to be present at the delivery of his mistresses (cc), to assist them to her utmost, and to take all possible care of him when his excesses with other women cast him into a fainting fit (dd). Her marriage having been declared null, Henry IV married Mary de Medicis. He, and his second wife, gave our Margaret a very honourable reception in 1605. She was first lodged in the castle of Boulogne, and afterwards in the palace of Sens, which she quitted to go and live in the suburbs of St Germains, where she built a palace answerable to the majesty of the kings she was descended from (ee). She there led a life full of variety; it was a mixture of galantry, devotion, and study [O]. She died the twenty-seventh of March 1615. It is impossible to forbear condemning her panegyrists, who have boldly suppressed her faults and ill actions, notwithstanding they were so very notorious; and I think the Historian, Scipio du Pleix, has not deserved all the censures, which were cast on him for speaking of this queen's bastards. But this I shall examine in another place (ff), this article being too long already. I will not conclude without saying, that the wife and famous Pibrac was her chancellor and galant [P].

(t) Ib. pag. 598. See the article USSON.

(u) Id. ib.

(x) Brantome, Illustrious Ladies, pag. 255.

(y) Id. ib. See also d'Aubigne, Tom. iii, book v, chap. iv.

(z) D'Aubigné, ibid.

(aa) Memoirs of queen Margaret, pag. 49.

(bb) Ib. pag. 68. See the remark [C] at the beginning.

(cc) See the remark [F].

(dd) Memoirs, ubi supra, pag. 115.

(ee) Hilarion de Coste, Elogies of Illustrious Ladies, Tom. ii, pag. 306.

(ff) In the article USSON, where I relate many things which have been said of this queen's ill morals.

I am

nor hackney or post-horses for half her maids; many of whom followed one after another, some without masks, some without aprons, and some without both; all in so wretched a condition, that they rather resembled the whores of foot-soldiers in the rout of a camp, than the attendants of a noble house. She was accompanied by some gentlemen unequipped, who half without boots, half on foot, conducted her under the guard of Lignerac, to the mountains of Auvergne into Carlat, where Marze (75), his brother, was governor, a strong fort, but more resembling a den of thieves, than the habitation of a princess, the daughter, sister, and wife, of a king (76). There are some circumstances in the Scaligerana, which are not in the Satirical Divorce: (77) She got behind a gentleman without a pillion. She chafed off the skin of her thighs, which disordered her for a month with a fever. The Physician, who took care of her, is at present with the king, she ordered him to be lashed. . . . . She was forced to borrow a smock of a servant-maid in a neighbouring place, until she came to Usson, at the entrance into Auvergne (78). Observe, by the by, that too much liberty is taken in the General and Curious Dictionary; for it is there affirmed, that Scaliger says, the Physician, who had this princess in cure, when she had chafed off her skin, was lashed for speaking too freely (79). These last words are not in my edition of the Scaligerana; and I do not believe they are to be met with in others, or that Cæsar de Rochefort had any grounds to add them of his own head, though it is probable that Scaliger had such a meaning. We are by no means to cite an author according to our probable imaginations of what he meant to say, but according to what he has said; for otherwise things would be quickly multiplied and falsified; before this came to a fourth or fifth hand, it would import, that the Physician had said this and that, he had made a draught, and a kind of a topographical map.

(75) Others call him Marie.

(76) Satirical Divorce, pag. m. 196, 197.

(77) Scaligerana, at the word Navarræ, pag. m. 166.

(78) Scaliger is mistaken, she went not to Usson till after she had staid a considerable time at Carlat.

(79) Cæsar de Rochefort, General and Curious Dictionary, pag. 415, col. 1.

[O] She there led a life full of variety; it was a mixture of galantry, devotion, and study.] Mezerai relates (80), that queen Margaret, engaging very deeply in intrigues to discover the secret practices of the count d'Auvergne, gave frequent intelligences of them to the king, so that at last he resolved to comply with her request, that she might come to Paris. She arrived there in August, 1605, 'and had the castle of Madrid, in the forest of Bou-'logne, assigned her for her lodgings. She lived 'there six weeks, afterwards she removed to the pa-'lace of Sens: but there an unfortunate accident hap-'pening to one of her minions, who was killed at 'the boot of her coach, by a young gentleman, en-'raged that this spark had ruined his family with 'this princess (§ a): she quitted that unfortunate 'palace, and bought another in the suburbs of St Ger-'main, near the river, and the Pré aux Clercs, where 'she began great designs of building and gardening. 'Here it was she kept her little court the rest of her 'days, mixing together with an odd variety, pleasures, 'and devotion, the love of letters, and the love of va-'nity, Christian charity, and injustice: for as she prided 'herself in being seen frequently at church, entertain-'ing learned men, and giving the tenth of her reve-'nues to the Monks, she gloried in having still some 'galantry, inventing new diversions, and never pay-'ing her debts.'

(80) Mezerai, Chronological Abridgment, Tom. vi, pag. 316.

[(§ a) The name of this minion was Datte, and young Vermond killed him, by the express command of the king, say some memoirs against all probability, which are in manuscript in the king's library, and some of them in the royal libraries at Berlin. The queen of Navarre lamented him under the name of Atys, in some verses contained in those Memoirs, where, in the same volume intituled Memoirs of State under Henry IV, may be met with some other verses she had made before that, under the same name of Atys, on the death of Aubiac, one of her galants who was hanged at Aigue-Perse. REM. CRIT.]

[P] The wife and famous Pibrac was her chancellor and galant.] See the remark [O] of the article HENRY IV. I have read in Thuanus (81), that, in 1582, Pibrac communicated to him a draught of the answer he designed to make to a smart letter, which he had received from the queen of Navarre: in which this princess reproached him, among other things, with being too much addicted to love, and presuming to cast his eyes even upon her. Pibrac recited his intended answer, with so much heat to Thuanus, that he gave occasion to believe that Margarets reproach was well grounded (82). Trust after this those venerable magistrates, who compose moral stanza's so grave and sententious, that Cato himself would be proud of being the author of them. Here is a passage of queen Margaret's Memoirs (83): Monsieur de Pibrac played a double game, telling this princess, that she ought not to suffer herself to be braved by such an inconsiderable man as he was (84), and that whatever came

(81) Thuan. Vita sua, lib. pag. m. 1180.

(82) Addo ac ratis verbis, t taque contes & affectus v mentia, ut M garitæ exp tioni filium stituret. L

(83) Mem queen Marg pag. 321.

(84) That i say, the k du Pin, of w we have sp in the rem [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I am now enabled to clear up the difficulties which occur in the relations I have given, concerning the affront ſhe received, and the ſatisfaction that was demanded (gg) [Q]. I ſhall make ſome reflexions on the true account which has been communicated to me [R].

(gg) See, above, the remarks [K], [L], and [M].

came on it, ſhe muſt get him to be removed; and telling the king of Navarre, that there was no probability that ſhe would deprive him of the ſervice of a man, who was ſo neceſſary to him. Which he did to induce her, by her diſcontents, to return into France, where he was fixed in his place of preſident and counſellor to the king. We muſt add, that as he loved the queen, he could not reſolve to return to Paris without her.

[Q] I am now enabled to clear up the difficulties which occur in the relations I have given, concerning the affront ſhe received, and the ſatisfaction demanded.] I have had communicated to me ſome extracts (85) of a ſpeech of Pibrac †, which will adjuſt the whole train of this affair in very perfect order. Pibrac delivered this ſpeech to Henry III, to ſhew, by a particular account of the conduct of the king of Navarre, that there was no room to complain of him. Theſe are the facts he mentions:

I. That in 1582, queen Margaret made a journey to the court of France, and that the king of Navarre accompanied her, till he left her in the hands of the queen-mother, who came to meet them half way.

II. That during her ſtay at court, king Henry III ſent one of his wardrobe to the king of Navarre, to acquaint him that Margaret's behaviour had given him ſome uneaſineſs. He wrote to him with his own hand, the fifth of Auguſt, 1583, and informed him, that he had removed from about her the ladies de Duras, and de Bethune, as very pernicious vermin ‡.

III. That the king of Navarre having received this letter as he was hunting at Saintefoi, on the Dordonne, made choice of Pibrac to diſpatch him to the court of France. He inſtructed him to ſay, that he would come himſelf to meet his wife as far as Poitou, and named the ladies who ſhould be placed about her.

IV. That Pibrac did not ſet out, becauſe news immediately came of the affair that happened two leagues beyond Bourg la Reine, that is to ſay, the affront put upon queen Margaret when Soler ‡, who commanded a regiment of the guards *, ſtopped her litter.

V. That the king of Navarre ſent the Sieur du Pleſſis to the king, to know the cauſe of this inſult, and to demand ſatisfaction for it.

VI. That the Sieur du Pleſſis, who was entruſted to ſpeak only to the king himſelf, was ſent back with very great civilities; ſatisfaction being promiſed him, and aſſurance given him that a proper perſon ſhould be ſent to the king of Navarre, who ſhould carry him ſuch an anſwer, as ſhould make him entirely eaſy.

VII. That the king of Navarre, not hearing any thing of this deputy, was diſpleaſed, and ſent to forbid his wife to come any farther, till ſatisfaction ſhould be given. He diſpatched one of his attendants to the king, and upon this ſecond meſſage Mr de Bellievre was ſent to him.

VIII. That at the ſame time marſhal de Matignon put a garriſon into Bazas, and ſome other places near Nerac, where the king of Navarre reſided; that this prince complained of it, and inſiſted that the negotiation concerning his wife ſhould be ſuſpended, till thoſe appearances of force were removed; that he ſent a third meſſenger to the court of France, named Diolet; and that he acquainted Mr de Bellievre, who had retired to Bourdeaux, that he was ready to give him audience.

IX. That Mr de Bellievre preſented himſelf, and maintained, before him, that no indignity had been offered to the queen, and that his maſter was not at all obliged to give an account to the king of Navarre of the inquiry he had made, that it was his good pleaſure, and, in a word, that he was the king of the king of Navarre.

X. That the king of Navarre replied, that he was ready to take his wife again, and to receive her at Nerac; but on condition that the garriſons ſhould be removed, which were placed in the neighbouring towns; that this was neceſſary as well for his ſecurity, as to prevent it's being ſaid, that he received his wife only by force.

XI. That Monſieur de Bellievre declared to him, that this could not be done, and that the king would be obeyed; that the king of Navarre might receive his wife in what place he pleaſed, if Nerac did not ſeem ſafe for him in the midſt of thoſe garriſons.

XII. That the king of Navarre, uneaſy at this treatment, ſent Pibrac to Henry III, as his fourth meſſenger, who rendered an exact account of the manner in which every thing had been tranſacted, from the beginning of the affair, to Bellievre's negotiation. This is the ſubject of his ſpeech. He demands juſtice in terms both ſtrong and ſubmiſſive at the ſame time.

[R] I ſhall make ſome reflexions on the true account which has been communicated to me.] It is a little ſtrange that Pibrac, who gives the names of the firſt and third meſſenger, ſhould not give that of the ſecond. It is very probable that d'Aubigné was the perſon whom Pibrac does not name: we may ſay, therefore, that d'Aubigné does not advance an untruth, in ſpeaking of his own deputation; but he is not to be excuſed for ſpeaking of that only. To judge of the affair by his account, there could be none but himſelf who carried the complaints of the king of Navarre to Henry III, and yet they had been already carried by du Pleſſis, and ſo they were afterwards by two other envoys. Mr du Pleſſis is more excuſable in ſpeaking only of his own deputation: for in the firſt place he does not give an univerſal hiſtory, as d'Aubigné has done, but only the Memoirs of his life; and in the ſecond place, it was not he himſelf who reduced them into order, and put the finiſhing hand to them. Perhaps if he had publiſhed them himſelf, he would have given us this paſſage more at large, in order to make this part of the domeſtic hiſtory of the king of Navarre the better underſtood. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that he would have done well to have beſtowed a few paragraphs on the other deputations, in his firſt compoſing this chapter.

We muſt remark alſo, that Pibrac ſays nothing of Clervant, who was diſpatched to the queen of Navarre after the declarations of Bellievre, and was after that to go to the court of France, to demand the removal of the garriſons (86). It is certain that he negotiated this affair; for Mr du Pleſſis aſſures us, in a letter of the twentieth of February, 1584, that being at the palace of the queen-mother, he ſaluted the duke of Alençon, who aſked him, if the queen of Navarre was with her huſband? his anſwer was, that they waited the return of Mr de Clervant (87). The queen-mother, imagining, that du Pleſſis was come on the affairs of the queen of Navarre, told him, that ſhe was very ſure the king of Navarre would receive entire ſatisfaction from the diſpatch of Mr de Clervant (88). It cannot be ſaid that Pibrac meant him, when he ſpeaks of a ſecond meſſenger without naming him: it is too evident that the ſecond meſſenger ſet out before the arrival of Bellievre, and that Clervant was not diſpatched till after Bellievre had executed his commiſſion. It is probable that he was diſpatched after Pibrac; and if ſo, there is no reaſon to wonder at the ſilence of the latter.

(85) Mr Marais, advocate to the parliament of Paris, was ſo kind to communicate them; the marginal notes that accompany this remark [Q] are his.

† It is to be met with in a collection of pleadings, harangues, and remonſtrances, of the moſt illuſtrious and famous Politicians of our time; printed at Paris by Adrian Tiſſane, in 1618, in 12mo.

‡ Note, that this letter of Henry III, made no mention of the inſult committed againſt the queen of Navarre: the author of the Note on the Confeſſion of Sancy, is miſtaken in affirming it.

‡ So Pibrac names him.

* He was not therefore a captain of the guards, but rather the colonel of the regiment of the guards.

(86) See, above, remark [M].

(87) Mémoir. de Du Pleſſis, Tom. i, pag. 306.

(88) Ibid. pag. 307.

NAUCRATIS, a city of Egypt upon the Nile. Some authors have placed it upon the moſt weſtern branch of that river [A]; but every one is not of their opinion [B]. It

[A] Some authors have placed it upon the moſt weſtern branch of that river.] This branch was that which was called Oſtium Canopicum, the mouth of Canopus, near which Alexander the Great built the city of Alexandria. It is plain, that Herodotus has placed Naucratis upon this branch of the Nile. See in the body of the article what I cite from the 179th chapter of his ſecond book. Salmaſius embraces this opinion (1).

(1) Salmaſ. Exercit. Plin. in Solin. pag. 476.

[B] Every one is not of their opinion.] Indeed Pliny (2) obſerves that the branch of the Nile, which, by reaſon of the city Naucratis, was called Naucraticum, came

(2) Plin. lib. v, cap. x.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It was a colony of Mileſians [C], if we will believe Strabo. He is not the only one who has affirmed it (a); but he is not conſiſtent with himſelf; and there are a great many arguments to be urged againſt his opinion. Diodorus Siculus does not agree with him came immediately after that of Canopus. Naucratis, unde oſtium quidam Naucratiticum nominant, quod alii Heracleoticum, Canopico, cui PROXIMUM eſt, præferentes. Let there be a fault, if you pleaſe, in the word præferentes, it will ſtill be true, that, according to Pliny, the mouth of Naucratis, and that of Canopus, are not the ſame. Tacitus (3) is perfectly of this opinion; for, after having ſpoken of the mouth of Canopus, he adds, 'Inde proximum 'amnis os dicatum Herculi, quem indigenæ ortum 'apud ſe & antiquiſſimum perhibent. - - - - - - That 'branch of the river next to this, was dedicated to Her-'cules, whom the inhabitants pretend to have been born 'amongſt them, and to be extremely antient.' Dionyſius Periegetes affirms the ſame thing (4). But let us ſee a little what Strabo ſays. He obſerves (5), that the Bolbitic mouth is next to that of Canopus; and that the Sebennytic comes immediately after the Bolbitic. In this he agrees with Pliny, proximo Alexandriæ Canopico, ſays this latter (6), deinde Bolbitino, Sebennytico; from whence we may infer, by the by, that, according to Pliny, Heracleoticum, Bolbitinum, Naucratiticum oſtium, are one and the ſame branch of the Nile. Strabo adds, that the Mileſians entred with thirty ſail into the Bolbitic mouth, at the time of Pſammitichus and Cyaxares, the former king of Egypt, the latter king of the Medes; and that making a deſcent, they built what was called the Mileſians Wall, Μιλησιων τεῖχος, a place between the Bolbitic and Sebennytic mouths. Another time, continues he, they ſet ſail towards Saïs, and having obtained a naval victory againſt Inarus, they built the city of Naucratis, a little above Schedia. The city of Saïs, was, according to him, farther from the Bolbitic branch, than the city Sebennys. It ſeems therefore, that ſince they built Naucratis, after their conducting their fleet towards Saïs, Naucratis muſt be imagined pretty near Saïs; and this would not only refute thoſe, who ſay that Naucratis was built upon the moſt weſtern branch of the Nile, but alſo thoſe who place it upon the ſecond branch, reckoning from weſt to eaſt. But we muſt not fix the true ſituation of Naucratis by the place where the Mileſians ſet ſail, and vanquiſhed Inarus, ſince Strabo explains himſelf, and gives us another rule. They built, ſays he, Naucratis a little above Schedia. The queſtion at preſent is, concerning the poſition of Schedia. Salmaſius (7) places it upon the mouth of Canopus, but he is miſtaken; for Strabo has placed a canal betwixt this mouth and Schedia; and conſequently a town might have been built above Schedia, upon the ſecond branch of the Nile. The diſtance of Alexandria from Schedia, was about twelve or fifteen of our leagues (8). See another paſſage of Strabo (9), which deſerves to be obſerved. They who went up the Nile from Schedia to Memphis, found, on the right, Hermopolis, Momemphis, &c. with ſome canals leading to the lake Mareotis; on their left they found Naucratis upon the river, in the Delta itſelf, and Saïs at ſome diſtance from the Nile. This you ſee is deciſive againſt the poſition of Naucratis upon the moſt weſtern branch of this river. I do not think Salmaſius ever conſidered this paſſage of Strabo. Nor has he well conſidered the other, but has ill inferred from it, that Naucratis was where Herodotus placed it; namely, upon Canopus, the moſt weſtern mouth of the Nile. What he adds, that this Canopic mouth, and the Herculean, are the ſame in Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolemy, Solinus, and Ammianus Marcellinus, only ſerves the better to convince us of the confuſion in which the antient writers have left Geography; ſome ſaying one thing, and others affirming the quite contrary. This is moſt commonly the fruit we reap, after having laboured hard to reconcile theſe people; we bring their wanderings and darkneſs more into view.

(a) Euſebius, Stephanus Byzantin. and Suidas alſo affirm it.

(3) Annal. lib. ii, cap. lx.

(4) Heracleoticum nominat quod Canopico proximum fuit, ut Dionyſius Periegetes cenſuit teſte Euſtathio ad illius verſum 13. Harduin. in Plinium, Tom. i, pag. 563.

(5) Lib. xvii, pag. 551.

(6) Lib. v, cap. x.

(7) Exercit. Plin. pag. 476.

(8) Of four ſchœni, according to Strabo; now one ſchœnus, according to Herodotus, lib. ii, cap. vi, contained 60 ſtadia; eight ſtadia a mile. See Strabo, lib. xvii, pag. 553, who obſerves, that this meaſure varied according to the different places.

(9) Lib. xvii, pag. 552.

(10) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. clxxviii.

(11) He began his reign forty-two years after the death of Pſammitichus. Helvic. Chron.

[C] It was a colony of Mileſians.] Here is a proof of what I have been obſerving. Herodotus is ſo far from ſaying with Strabo, that the Mileſians built Naucratis after their naval victory over Inarus, that he obſerves (10), that king Amaſis (11), out of his great favour to the Greeks, conſented that ſuch of this nation as pleaſed, might live at Naucratis; and that thoſe who had a more rambling humour, and loved rather to ſail up and down, might build temples in certain places. This Hiſtorian adds, that, in purſuance of this grant, many Grecian cities built a temple at the common charge, and that the Mileſians, in particular, built that of Apollo. He inſinuates that the places, where theſe temples were, became ſo many magazines or ſtore-houſes, for the merchandizes of the Grecians, and that thus they abridged the privileges Naucratis enjoyed of being the ſole trading city of Egypt. I do not think it eaſy to reconcile with this paſſage of Herodotus, that which I have cited from Strabo in the preceding remark. It would be much if this Geographer could be reconciled with himſelf. He ſpeaks (12) of two expeditions of the Mileſians. The conſequences of the firſt were the building in Egypt a city called the Mileſians Wall. The conſequences of the ſecond were the building the city Naucratis. He does not reckon the years which intervened between theſe two enterprizes: but he places the firſt under Pſammitichus, and the ſecond under Inarus; and he makes Pſammitichus cotemporary with Cyaxares, king of the Medes. It follows from hence, that the Mileſians made their firſt expedition into Egypt, between the XXXVIIth and XLth Olympiad; for that is the time wherein the reigns of theſe two princes concur (13); and perhaps this expedition ſhould not be diſtinguiſhed from that mentioned by Herodotus (14), when he tells us, that Pſammitichus having taken the Ionians and Carians, who landed in his country, into his ſervice, by their means overcame all the other kings of Egypt; after which he gave lands to theſe foreigners, who had ſo well ſerved him. It is true, they were placed pretty far from the eſtabliſhment of Strabo's Mileſians (15). As for the expedition made in Inarus's time, it muſt fall about the LXXXth Olympiad, being the time in which the Egyptians elected him their king, in order to deliver themſelves from the ſevere yoke of the Perſians. Now if Naucratis was not built till the Mileſians had conquered Inarus, this city muſt have been founded after Xerxes's expedition: whence comes it then, that Strabo (16) relates, that Charaxus, Sappho's brother, traded in Leſbian wine at Naucratis? Did not Strabo know, that Alcæus and Sappho flouriſhed at the ſame time; that is, 150 years, more or leſs, before the reign of Inarus? It muſt therefore be confeſſed, that this Geographer's account of Naucratis is indigeſted, and very doubtful. I ſhould rather believe what Euſebius ſays of it, namely, that it was built towards the end of the VIth Olympiad, at the ſame time as Rome. I find that Athenæus (17) upon the teſtimony of an author, a native of Naucratis, relates, that in the XXIIId Olympiad, Heroſtratus, a merchant of that city, was wont to trade by ſea into ſeveral countries. This does not beſpeak a city built but the other day. Scaliger, who depends rather on Strabo than Euſebius, accuſes the latter of a prodigious Anachroniſm (18); he finds an hiatus of about 150 years betwixt the year of the foundation of Naucratis, according to Euſebius, and the year that this town was actually built; for he believes that the Mileſians built it towards the end of Pſammitichus's reign, or the beginning of Cyaxares's. He cites Strabo, without ſeeming to have taken notice of the victory obtained over Inarus: he therefore draws a falſe conſequence from his citation, ſince it is manifeſt, that if Naucratis was not built till after the defeat of Inarus, cotemporary with Artaxerxes Longimanus, it is impoſſible that Scaliger has rightly fixed the time when this city was founded. Salmaſius takes this Inarus of Strabo for a city (19). Upon this foot the Mileſians might have built Naucratis, at the time which Scaliger has fixed. But where ſhall we find the city Inarus? What Geographers have ſpoken of it? We muſt not ſay, that this city was perfectly obſcure; for Strabo, in that caſe, would not have barely named it: when we ſay briefly, that conquerors have taken ſuch, or ſuch a town, we ſuppoſe it to be known.

(12) Lib. xvii, pag. m. 551.

(13) See Helvicus in his Chronological Tables.

(14) Lib. ii, cap. liii.

(15) A little above the town of Bubaſtus, upon the channel of Peluſium, which is the moſt oriental mouth of the Nile. Herod. ibid. cap. clvi. See what ſhall be cited from Diodorus Siculus in the remark [D].

(16) Lib. xvii, pag. 556.

(17) Lib. xv, pag. 675.

(18) Μέγα χάσμα ἀναγκαῖον φανεῖται. Scalig. Euſeb. Chron. pag. 74.

(19) Expugna Inaro cond derunt Naucrat Salmaſ. Exer in Solin. pag. 476.

[D] Diodorus

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him [D]. What is moſt certain is, that Naucratis was a very famous city. Herodotus ſays (b) that it was antiently the only trading city in Egypt; and that to preſerve this privilege, no merchant-ſhip was ſuffered to unlade in any other port. All who put into any other mouth of the Nile, were obliged to ſwear it was againſt their intention, and to ſet ſail for the mouth of Canopus in the ſame veſſel. That if they could not arrive there by reaſon of contrary winds, they unloaded their effects in barges, which they brought up the Nile, through all the windings of that river, quite to Naucratis. It is not a little ſtep towards the proving the great wealth of that city, and the mighty courſe of foreigners, to obſerve, as Herodotus does, that the courtezans there took great care to appear charming (c). Though this Hiſtorian confutes thoſe who have ſaid, that Rhodope, by her proſtitutions, got money enough to build one of the principal pyramids of Egypt; yet he owns ſhe acquired immenſe ſums, and clearly enough inſinuates, that ſhe got the greateſt part of her wealth at Naucratis. Athenæus accuſes him of confounding this Rhodope with Dorica. It was the latter, according to Athenæus, who had Sappho's brother for her galant; but, according to Herodotus, ſhe that was beloved by Sappho's brother, was called Rhodope. Let them diſpute it out. Athenæus ſeems to draw an advantage from this, that Naucratis, his native place, had produced moſt famous and moſt handſome ladies of pleaſure (d). He forgets not to mention Archidice (e), who, as Herodotus relates (f), was very famous throughout all Greece. She ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from her, who had a ſuit with her galant. I have ſpoken elſewhere (g) of what the courtezan Lamia thought of the judgment, which was given in that cauſe. This city pretended to have a great ſhare in the protection and favour of Venus (h), and boaſted of poſſeſſing a miraculous image of this goddeſs, which was conſecrated in her temple, after it had done a great miracle in a violent ſtorm. The ſtory was to be found in a book compoſed by Polycharmus, concerning the goddeſs Venus. If we had this book, we might ſee very probably many things, of which ſome ſtories of our legendaries would ſeem only a copy; and if we had the work of Apollonius Rhodius concerning the foundation of Naucratis, it would be eaſy to make a long and curious article concerning this city. Origen (i) has obſerved, that the god Serapis was particularly adored there, though antiently they worſhiped other gods. Athenæus (k) relates ſome cuſtoms that were practiſed there. He is not the only author who was born in this city. Polycharmus (l), Julius Pollux (m), Lyceas (n), and, according to ſome, Philiſtus (o) and Ariſtophanes (p) were born there alſo. Philiſtus had compoſed ſomething concerning this city (q). It drew infinitely more wealth from its Potters ware and nitre [E], than from its ingenious men, though theſe have moſt contributed to its glory.

(b) Lib. ii, cap. clxxix.

(c) Id. ib.

(d) Ἐνδέξους δὲ τοὺς ἐν τῇ Naucratis ἑταίρους γενέσθαι αἱ ἑταῖραι. Gaudent autem quidam modo in Naucrate proſtibula fieri gratioſa. Herod. lib. ii, cap. clxxv.

(d) Ἐνδέξους δὲ τοὺς ἐν τῇ Naucratis ἑταίρους γενέσθαι αἱ ἑταῖραι. Celebres quoque meretrices & inſigni forma tulit Naucratis. Athen. lib. xiii, cap. viii, pag. 596.

(e) Herod. lib. ii, cap. cxxxv.

(f) In the article LAMIA, a courtezan, remark [K].

(g) Athen. lib. xv, cap. vi, pag. 676.

(h) Contra Celſum, lib. v, pag. m. 257.

(i) Pag. 149, 150, 675.

(k) Athen. pag. 675.

(l) Philoſtr. de Sophiſt. lib. ii, Suidas.

(m) Athen. pag. 616.

(n) Suidas.

(o) Helicdorus Athenienſis, apud Athenæum, lib. vi, pag. 229.

(p) Suidas.

[D] Diodorus Siculus does not agree with him.] He tells us (20), that Pſammitichus, one of the twelve princes who governed Egypt for fifteen years, was obliged, in order to maintain himſelf againſt his partners, to take ſtrangers into his pay; by whoſe means he gained a battle, which ſubjected to him the whole kingdom. Theſe ſtrangers were Arabians, or Carians, or Ionians. From that time ſtrangers were had in great eſteem with him, whether they liſted for ſoldiers, or came only to ſee Egypt. He made an alliance with the Athenians, and with ſome other Grecian nations; and was the firſt who permitted foreigners to traffic in Egypt: for, under the preceding reigns, all ſtrangers, who landed in this country, were either murdered or made ſlaves. Now, according to Athenæus, the city Naucratis was already conſiderable in the XXIIId Olympiad: it is therefore impoſſible, according to Diodorus's hypotheſis, that it ſhould have been built by Mileſians, ſince, according to that hypotheſis, no ſtranger could ſafely land in Egypt, before the reign of Pſammitichus; that is to ſay, before the XXXth Olympiad, more or leſs (21). Judge whether Euſebius could find his account in this hypotheſis; he who would have Naucratis to have been built by the Mileſians in the VIth Olympiad. There is nothing but confuſion in all this.

(20) Lib. ii, cap. ii.

(21) Helvicus begins this reign in the ſecond year of the XXVIIth Olympiad, and doubtleſs excludes not the time that Pſammitichus reigned with his aſſociates.

[E] It drew . . . wealth from it's Potters ware and nitre.] The paſſage where Athenæus (22) ſpeaks of theſe Potters wares, has not been well tranſlated. Πολλοὶ δ' ἐν τῇ Ναυκράτει κεραμεῖς, ἀφ' ὧν καὶ ἡ πλησίον τῶν κεραμείων πύλη Κεραμικὴ καλεῖται. His meaning is, that there were a great number of Potters at Naucratis, and that the gate of the city, which was called Ceramic, took it's name from it's neighbourhood to the Potteries. Inſtead of this ſenſe, it is turned thus, that the arm of the Nile, in the neighbourhood of theſe Potteries, was called the Ceramic mouth. Dalechamp (23) has been ſo fond of this verſion, as to make uſe of it to change the word Canopicum, in a paſſage of Pliny, into that of Ceramicum. It ſhould be read, ſays he, Naucratis, unde oſtium quidam Naucraticum nominant, quod alii Ceramicum, &c (non Canopicum). If there was any change to be made, it ſhould not have been Canopicum, but Heracleoticum, which ought to be changed into Ceramicum (24). But, as Salmaſius very well obſerves (25), Athæneus does not ſay, that the mouth of the Nile, upon which Naucratis was built, was called Ceramicum, I ſhall take notice, by the by, that there was in Athens a fine ſtreet called Ceramica, and a ſuburb which went by the ſame name (26); the ſtreet ſtill retains it's antient name, which it took from a hero named Ceramus, the ſon of Bacchus and Ariadne: but the ſuburb was called ſo from the great quantity of earthen pots made there. They paſſed through it to go to the academy. As to what concerns the nitre of Naucratis, I ſhall content myſelf with citing Pliny (27).

(22) Lib. xi, pag. 480.

(23) Not. in Athen. ad pag. 480.

(24) Salmaſ. in Exercit. Plin. pag. 476.

(25) Ibid.

(26) Taken from Guillet, Old and New Athens, pag. m. 212, 268.

(27) Nitrariæ Ægypti circa Naucratim & Memphim tantùm ſolebant eſſe, circa Memphim deteriores. Plin. lib. xxxi, cap. x.

NAUSICAA or NAUSICAE, daughter of Alcinous king of the Phæacians, in the iſle of Corcyra (a), appears with great luſtre in Homer's Odyſſes. The Poet has been very liberal of his favours to her, and repreſented her as a goddeſs both in body and ſoul (b), and woud have his hero, after his ſhipwreck, receive from her the firſt aſſiſtance he wanted. Naked, as he was born, he was laid upon the earth in a place, where the thick branches of two trees ſecured him from the eyes of the paſſengers; and he ſlept very quietly by the favour of Minerva, when the cries of ſome maids awaked him.

(a) Now Corfu.

(b) Ἀθανάτῃσι φυὴν καὶ εἶδος ὁμοίη. Immortalibus indole & forma ſimilis. Homer. Odyſſ. lib. vi, ver. 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him. They were Nauſicaa, and her maids, who were playing at Tennis [A], while the linen, they had waſhed and hung out, was drying in the ſun. Ulyſſes firſt of all covered his privy parts with leaves, and then went to ſee what was the matter. The ſight of him put all thoſe poor girls to flight, except Nauſicaa, who had received from Mercury, by inſpiration, the courage to ſtand her ground and hear what the naked man had to ſay to her. Ulyſſes, fearing to diſpleaſe her if he ſhould embrace her knees, made his complement to her at a little diſtance, telling her, that, ſeeing her ſo beautiful, he did not know whether ſhe were a goddeſs, or a woman; that her father, mother, and brothers, were happy in her; but yet much happier would he be who ſhould marry her: and after a prelude ſo handſomely concerted, implored her aſſiſtance, eſpecially in relation to his nakedneſs, praying the gods to make her as happy as ſhe could wiſh in a huſband, children, and domeſtic concord. Nauſicaa anſwered, like a young lady of quality, calling back her ſervants, and commanding them to give the man meat and drink, and to waſh his body. Immediately they led him to the bath, and brought him both cloaths and oil, bidding him to waſh himſelf in the river; but he deſired them to retire at a little diſtance, being aſhamed to appear naked before ſo many young women. Upon this they retired. He waſhed and rubbed himſelf all over, and then dreſſed himſelf, and went to Nauſicaa, who was ſo well pleaſed with him, that ſhe told her ſervants ſhe ſhould be charmed with ſuch a man for her huſband. After he had eaten with all the ravenous precipitation of a perſon, who had faſted a long while (c), ſhe told him he muſt go with her ſervants to a certain place near the city, and wait there till ſhe ſhould have entered her father's palace with all her attendants. She gave him her reaſons for this very frankly; which were, that ſhe would give no occaſion for tattling to any ſlanderers, of whom that city was full, and who would not fail to ſay in caſe they ſaw him go in with her ſervants, that ſhe had been to ſeek him for a huſband; upon which they would make a hundred malicious jeſts in prejudice to her reputation, and that ſo much the more, as ſhe herſelf ſhould be provoked againſt another, who, without the conſent of either father or mother, and before marriage, ſhould lie with a man. Ulyſſes, in obedience to theſe remonſtrances, waited at the place appointed him; from whence he was afterwards inviſibly conducted by Minerva to the palace of Alcinous [B], who received him very graciouſly. He there again ſaw Nauſicaa, who deſired him to remember at his return home, that ſhe had ſaved his life. He anſwered he would every day pay his vows to her as to a goddeſs (d). It will be ſeen below, why I have enlarged upon this epiſode of Homer [C]. There is in the cabinet of the Sieur Nigri at Bologna, an exceeding rare medal of this heroine (e).

There are ſome grave authors (f) who affirm that Telemachus, the ſon of Ulyſſes, was married to our Nauſicaa, and that he had a ſon by her, whom ſome name Perſeptolis, and others Ptoliportus.

(c) Ἦτοι ὁ πῖνε καὶ ἤσθιε πολύτλας δῖος Ὀδυσσεύς, Ἄρτα λίως· δηρὸν γὰρ ἐδητύος ἦεν ἄτασθος. Atque ipſe bibebat & edebat prudens divinus Ulyſſes, rapaciter; jampridem enim cibum non guſtaverat. Id. ib. ver. 249.

(d) Τῷ κέν τοι καὶεἰθε θεῷ ὡς εὐχετοῴμην, αἰεὶ ἤματα πάντα. Sic enim tibi etiam illic velut Deo vota faciam ſemper diebus omnibus. Odyſſ. viii, ver. 467.

(e) Spon's Voyage, Tom. i, pag. 99, Edit. Holl. There is a print of it in Wheeler's Travels.

(f) Ariſtoteles de Republ. Ithacenſi; & Hellanicus, apud Euſtath. in Odyſſ. lib. xvi; Dictys Cretenſis, lib. vi, pag. m. 204.

[A] Nauſicaa and her maids, who were playing at Tennis.] You ſee that Homer is contented with making Nauſicaa divert herſelf at this play with her attendants; but Anagallis, a Grammarian, has made her the inventor of it (1). It is true, that Athenæus contradicts her, and ſuppoſes, that being herſelf of Corcyra, ſhe was willing to pay a compliment to Nauſicaa her country-woman (2). It is true alſo, that it ſeems to be rather the invention of a dance, than of Tennis, that is aſcribed to her: but theſe things lie too deeply concealed in the obſcurity of antient times.

(1) Suidas, in Ἀναγαλλίς, & in Ὀρχηστής.

(2) Athen. lib. i, cap. xi: he calls her Agallis.

[B] He was . . . conducted by Minerva to the palace of Alcinous.] This is what neither Charles Stephens, Mr Lloyd, nor Mr Hoffman have taken any notice of; for they all make Nauſicaa introduce Ulyſſes to Alcinous. There has been more care taken in Calepin; for inſtead of ſaying with others, In Regiam patris ſui eum perduxit, - - - She introduced him into his father's palace, it is there ſaid, In Regiam Patris ſui ire juſſit, - - - - ſhe commanded him to go into her father's palace. The two verſes of Martial which are quoted,

Si mihi Nauſicaë patrios concederet hortos,
Alcinoo poſſem dicere malo meos,

Nauſicaë's gardens I ſhou'd, like a clown,
Refuſe, and cry, I've finer of my own.

are not in the ſecond book, as that quotation ſays; but in the thirty-firſt epigram of the twelfth book, where Martial commends the gardens of his wife. I have obſerved, in another place (3), an error much groſſer than this.

(3) In the remark [C] of the article ALCINOUS.

[C] It will be ſeen below, why I have enlarged upon this epiſode.] It is to give ſuch a demonſtration, as may be underſtood by every capacity, of Homer's ſimplicity, and of the difference there is between the character of his age, and that of ours.

NAUSITHOUS, king of the Phæacians. See the article ALCINOUS.

NAZIANZEN (GREGORY) one of the moſt celebrated fathers of the church, in the IVth century. I could make a very long article of him; but I muſt then repeat what ſome great authors (a), have ſaid before me, whoſe works are in every body's hands, and ſtill retain the grace of novelty. I ſhall be very ſhort. An error has been commited in Chronology by one who cenſured Gregory Nazianzen for writing againſt the emperor Julian [A]. Some over-nice critics pretend that he has corrupted the

(a) Mr du Pin in his New Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, Tom. ii, pag. 201, & ſeq. Edit. of Holland; and Mr Le Clerc, in the beginning of the eighteenth Tome of Bibliotheque Univerſelle.

[A] An error in Chronology has been committed by one who cenſured Gregory Nazianzen, for writing againſt the emperor Julian.] It was Cunæus, profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden, who committed this error. Theſe are his words (1): 'Fuit profectò, fuit Græ-'corum quorundam, qui eâ tempeſtate Eccleſiam rexere, 'magna

(1) Cunæus, Præfat. in Juliani Cæſares pag. m. 119.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the purity of the Greek tongue and given occaſion to the barbariſm of the Latin Divines [B]. They alſo complain that his Greek verſes were ſubſtituted for the inſtruction of youth, in the room of the antient Pagan Poetry, which was burnt at the inſtigation of the prieſts [C].

' magna imprudentia. Etenim, uti cauſæ ſuæ ſervirent, ' principem Chriſtianis infeſtum laceſſebant, quem tole- ' rare latius fuiſſet. Sunt in hominum manibus ora- ' tiones eorum, in quibus, tanquam in ſcena, palam ' eum omnibus ludibrium fecere, & faciem illius, ' formamque corporis, atque geſtus, tum alia fortuita, ' quæ vulgus & imperitiſſimus quiſque notat, traxerunt ' in culpam. Qui viri, ſi meminiſſent temporum, ' quibus nati erant, ſanè neceſſitati, quæ pertinax ' regnum tenet, fine contumacia paruiſſent, &, quod ' magnæ prudentiæ eſt, obſequio mitigaſſent imperia. ' There were indeed, it muſt be owned, ſome Greeks who ' then ruled the church, very much to blame for their im- ' prudence. For, in order to ſerve their cauſe, they abuſed ' a prince who was an enemy to Chriſtianity, when it ' would have been much better to have born with him. ' We have their ſpeeches ſtill left, in which they have ' expoſed him, as it were, on a ſtage, to univerſal ' ridicule, and have reflected upon his aſpect, the ſhape ' of his body, his geſtures, and other accidental matters, ' of which the vulgar, and every ignorant perſon, is apt to ' take notice. Theſe men, if they had remembered the ' times they were born in, would certainly have obeyed, ' without reflexion, the neceſſity of a ſevere reign, and ' what is always the part of great prudence, they would ' have rendered it the leſs ſo by their ſubmiſſion.' This was animadverted on in a book which appeared in 1690. ' A famous profeſſor, as is there ſaid (2), ' has been guilty of falſifying Hiſtory, by accuſing ' thoſe prelates of very great imprudence, whoſe in- ' vectives againſt Julian are ſtill extant. They had ' much better, ſays he, have complied with the neceſ- ' ſity of the times, by an humble ſubmiſſion, and have ' born with the ſeverity of that prince againſt the ' Chriſtians, than to have exaſperated him yet more ' by their writings. Now is not this ſuppoſing that ' St Gregory Nazianzen, and St Cyril, the only two ' whom Cunæus could ſpeak of, publiſhed their In- ' vectives during the life of that emperor; which is ' however a very apparent falſity; for St Gregory did ' not write his till after the death of Julian, and ' St Cyril did not live till a conſiderable time after the ' deceaſe of that prince. Where was then the great ' imprudence of theſe two prelates?' Petavius in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to his edition of the works of Julian, is very angry with this Cunæus, and reproaches him, among other things, with the error in Chronology before-mentioned. See what he ſays, after having copied the Latin words of Cunæus which I cited: ' Hæc ille non ſolum imprudenter talibus de viris, ſed ' etiam imperite. Etenim Græci illi Patres, quos im- ' prudentiæ arguit: quorumque contra Julianum extа- ' re orationes aſſerit, ſunt omnino duo. Gregorius ' Nazianzenus, & Cyrillus; quorum alter haud paucis ' poſt Juliani obitum annis vixit, ac ſcripſit, alter æ- ' qualis quidem fuit illius. Sed eo mortuo σηλιτευ- ' τικὸς, illos duos conſcripſit, ex quibus, cæteriſque ' fide dignioribus liquet; fuiſſe Imperatorem iſtum mul- ' tis, veriſque vitiis præditum, &c. - - - - He has thus ' cenſured thoſe great men not only imprudently but igno- ' rantly. For thoſe Greek fathers, whom he taxes with ' indiſcretion: and whoſe, declamations againſt Julian ' he affirms to be yet extant, are but two. Gregory Na- ' zianzen and St Cyril, one of whom neither wrote nor ' lived till many years after Julian's death; the other ' was cotemporary indeed with him, but did not compoſe ' thoſe two invectives till after his death, from which, as ' well as from other writings leſs liable to exception, it is ' plain that this emperor was actually guilty of many real ' vices.' It is poſſible Cunæus might have replied to the other ſarcaſtic complaints of Father Patavius, but he muſt have been obliged to own himſelf in the wrong in regard to this.

(2) An Important Advice to the Refugees, pag. 43, 44.

[B] Some critics . . . . pretend that he has corrupted the purity of the Greek tongue, and given occaſion to the barbariſm of the Latin Divines.] I have read this complaint in a work of Alcyonius. You will find there a fine encomium upon St Gregory; but which concludes with theſe words (3). ' Utinam incorruptam ' Græcæ linguæ integritatem ſervaſſet in tanta rerum ' ſilva & tam magna librorum vi, certe ſanctiſſimum ' illum pontificem omni laude cumulatum judicarem ' . . . . ex illius maxime ſcriptis barbariem irrepſiſſe ' in Theologiam Latinam arbitror. Nam veteres no- ' ſtri interpretes mediocris literaturæ, nullius fere ju- ' dicii homines, cum animadverterent Theologum hunc ' frequenter uſurpare voces quaſdam novas eaſque non ' ſatis apte fictas, neceſſe ſibi eſſe crediderunt illas la- ' tine reddere, atque hunc in modum ſordida barba- ' rie eſt lingua Latina infuſcata. - - - - It were to be ' wiſhed that he had preſerved the purity of the Greek ' tongue incorrupt, in ſo large a field of matter, and in ' ſo great a number of books, this would have made ' me judge that moſt holy Father, worthy of all poſſible ' praiſe . . . . from his writings principally in my opinion, ' has that barbariſm crept into our Latin Divinity. For ' our antient interpreters, being men of little learning, ' and ſcarce any judgment, obſerving this Father fre- ' quently to make uſe of new terms, and thoſe not very well ' adapted, thought it neceſſary for them to be rendered ' into Latin, and by this means it happened that the ' Latin tongue became ſo much defiled with impure ex- ' preſſions.' It is the cardinal John de Medicis who here ſpeaks.

(3) Petr. Alcyonius, in Medice Legato priore, fol. ciij, verſo.

[C] . . . and alſo complain that his Greek verſes were ſubſtituted in the room of the antient Pagan poetry, burnt at the inſtigation of the prieſts.] Let us continue to hear the ſame John de Medicis. ' Audiebam etiam ' puer ex Demetrio Chalcondyla Græcarum rerum ' peritiſſimo, ſacerdotes Græcos tanta floruiſſe auc- ' toritate apud Cæſares Byzantios, ut integra illorum gra- ' tia complura de veteribus Græcis poemata combuſ- ' ſerint in primiſque ea ubi amores, turpes luſus, & ' nequitiæ amantum continebantur, atque ita Menan- ' dri, Diphili, Apollodori, Philemonis, Alexis fabel- ' las, & Saphûs, Erinnæ, Anacreontis, Mimnermi, ' Bionis, Alcmanis, Alcæi carmina intercidiſſe. Tum ' pro his ſubſtituta Nazianzeni noſtri poemata, quæ ' etſi excitant animos noſtrorum hominum ad flagran- ' tiorem religionis cultum, non tamen verborum atti- ' corum proprietatem & græcæ linguæ elegantiam e- ' docent. Turpiter quidem Sacerdotes iſti in veteres ' Græcos malevoli fuerunt, ſed integritatis, probitatis, ' & religionis maximum dedere teſtimonium (4). ' - - - - - I was informed even while I was a ' boy, by Demetrius Chalcondylas, that the Greek ' prieſts had ſo much influence over the Conſtantinopolitan ' emperors, that they obtained leave from them to burn ' a great many antient Greek poems, eſpecially ſuch as ' were of the amorous kind, and deſcribed the looſe enter- ' tainment and ſtratagems of lovers, and ſo came the ' plays of Menander, Diphilus, Apollodorus, Philemon, ' and Alexis, and the verſes of Sapho, Erinna, Anacre- ' on, Mimnermus, Bion, Alcman, and Alcæus, to be loſt. ' Then in the room of theſe were ſubſtituted the poems of ' our Nazianzen, which tho' they excite the preſent age ' to greater zeal in religious worſhip, yet do not teach the ' true propriety and elegance of the Greek language. ' Thoſe prieſts have indeed given a ſhameful inſtance of ' their malice againſt the antient Greeks, at the ſame ' time that they produce ſo great a teſtimony of their up- ' rightneſs, probity, and devotion.'

(4) Id. ib.

NEMESIUS, a Chriſtian Philoſopher, author of a book De natura hominis [A]. It is pretended that he was biſhop of Emeſa a city of Phœnicia, and that he lived towards

(1) See concerning this author, who was a native of Caſſel in Flanders, the Bibliotheca Belgica, of Valerius Andreas, pag. 678, and Moreri, at the word Ellebodius.

[A] He is author of a book, De natura hominis.] The firſt edition is that of Antwerp by Plantin, in 1565, in 8vo. Nicaſius Ellebodius Caſletanus (1), who procured it, added it to his Latin verſion; his Epiſtle Dedicatory to Antony Perrenot, Cardinal, is in Greek and dated at Padua. In it he treats with the utmoſt contempt

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google towards the end of the IVth century: others make him flouriſh a century after (a). He eſpouſed the errors of Origen concerning the pre-exiſtence of the ſoul, and the article of Free-will, and diſputed againſt the fatality of the Stoics with great force. Some have been of opinion that St Gregory Nyſſenus was the true author of the work which goes under the name of Nemeſius, but their arguments are of no great weight (b).

(a) See du Pin, Bibliotb. Tom. iii, Part ii, p. 280, Edit. of Holland.

(b) See Theoph. Raynaud, Erotem. de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 339, pag. m. 150.

contempt the Latin verſion which Georgius Valla had made of it, and had been printed at Lyons by Gryphius in the year 1538. This work was inſerted in the Auctarium of the Bibliotheca Patrum in the year 1624, and is in all the following editions of the ſame Bibliotheca. It was printed ſeparately at Oxford in Greek and Latin, in the year 1671, in 8vo with notes.

NEPHES OGLI. This name among the Turks ſignifies, The ſon of the HOLY GHOST, and is given to certain perſons, born after an extraordinary manner, I mean of a virgin-mother. There are, it is ſaid, ſome Turkiſh virgins who live in ſuch retirement, that they never ſee a man. They go but very rarely to the moſques; and when they do, they tarry there from nine at night till mid-night, and join to their prayers ſuch contorſions of body, and howlings, that they exhauſt all their ſtrength and oftentimes happen to fall down to the ground in a ſwoon. If they find themſelves with child from that time, they give out they are ſo by the grace of the HOLY GHOST; and upon this account the children, they bring forth, are called Nephes Ogli (a). They are looked upon as a ſort of people who have the gift of miracles [A].

(a) Georgiewitz, cap. i. Ita mihi narratum eſt, ſays he, à pediſſequis earum, nam nec ipſe vidi, nec aliquis virorum eorundem huic ſpectaculo intereſſe potuit.

[A] They are looked upon as a ſort of people who have the gift of miracles.] A monk, who lived a long while in Turkey, aſſures us, that it was ſaid, there was always two or three of theſe Nephes Ogli's in the city of Bruſczia (1), whoſe hair, and pieces of their habits, cured all ſorts of maladies. 'Dicuntur tales, 'adds he (2), prodigioſè naſci, id eſt ſine virili ſemine, & per conſequens tota eorum vita & actio ſupernaturalis & mirabilis credenda eſt. - - - Such are 'ſaid to be born after a miraculous manner, that it with-'out human ſeed, and by conſequence their whole life and 'behaviour is to be thought ſupernatural and miraculous.'

(1) It was undoubtedly the city of Pruſa in Bithynia, the firſt ſeat of the Ottoman empire.

(2) Septemcaſtrenſis, de Moribus Turcorum, pag. 47, apud Hottinger. Hiſtor. Orient. pag. 295.

NERO (BERNARD DEL), a nobleman of Florence, was puniſhed with death in the year 1497, for not having diſcovered a plot which Peter de Medicis had contrived againſt the government (a) [A]. We ſhall ſee in the remark that the laws of the country ſubjected him to that puniſhment, and therefore Lewis XI, is not the firſt who made a like ordinance (b). Mr Varillas, much leſs to be credited than Guicciardin, ſuppoſes (c) that Bernard Nery (for ſo he calls him) was the chief director of the enterprize, and (d) that Savonarola was of opinion that the guilty perſons ought to be pardoned (e).

(a) Guicciardin, lib. iii, fol. m. 97.

(b) See rem. [M] of his article.

(c) Varillas, Anecdotes of Florence, pag. 212, & ſeq.

(d) Ib. p. 219.

(e) You will find quite the contrary, in remark [F] of the article SAVONAROLA.

[A] He was puniſhed with death . . . . for not having diſcovered a plot . . . againſt the government.] Every body may remember the fate of Mr de Thou (1), ſon of the Hiſtorian, and many people will not be pleaſed to ſee the parenthеſis of Guicciardin in the paſſage I cite. When the conſpiracy of Peter de Medicis had been fully proved. They not only condemned to death Nicolas Ridolphi, Laurence Tornaboni, Janot Pucci, and John Cambi, who had ſollicited him to come, and whom Laurence for that purpoſe had ſupplied with money; but alſo Bernardin de Nero, whom they charged with nothing elſe but that having known this plot he had not diſcovered it, which fault (being of itſelf capital by the laws of the Florentines, and by the interpretation which the greateſt part of the Civilians gave to the common laws) was found to be ſo much the greater becauſe he was ſtandard-bearer, when Peter came before Florence: as if he had been obliged to diſcharge the office of a public rather than of a private perſon (2).

(1) See remark [M] of the article LEWIS XI.

(2) Guicciardin, lib. iii, fol. m. 123.

NESTORIUS, biſhop of Conſtantinople, was depoſed as a Heretic, by the council of Epheſus, in the year 431. The reaſon of this was, that he maintained that the holy Virgin ought not to be called, the Mother of GOD. There are ſome people, who maintain, that the ſenſe in which he rejected this epithet is reaſonable and orthodox [A]; and that therefore this pretended Hereſiarch was condemned very unjuſtly. At [A] There are ſome people who maintain that the ſenſe in which he rejected this epithet is . . . . orthodox.] This is the manner in which Neſtorius ſets forth his opinion in a letter he wrote to Celeſtin biſhop of Rome: he ſays 'that having met with ſome perſons at Con-'ſtantinople who corrupted the orthodox faith, he 'endeavoured to reclaim them by ways of lenity, al-'though their Hereſy came very near that of Arius 'and Apollinaris, becauſe they made the union of 'the two natures of JESUS CHRIST to degenerate in-'to confuſion and commixtion, holding the divine na-'ture to be born of Mary, and changing the body of 'CHRIST into his Deity: that upon this foundation 'they gave the Virgin-Mother of CHRIST the title 'of Mother of GOD; that this term, though it was 'improper, might be born with on account of the 'union of the word with the fleſh, did not they un-'derſtand it of the Deity, and ſuppoſe that the Virgin 'is the mother of the word of GOD, which is un-'warrantable (1).' In another letter (2) he commends St Cyril for diſtinguiſhing the two natures in JESUS CHRIST; but he accuſes him afterwards of deſtroying this truth, and of rendering the Deity paſſible and mortal. He confeſſes the two natures are united, but denies, that, by reaſon of that union, the qualities that belong only to one of the two, can be attributed to the other, and he ſays, that as often as the holy Scripture ſpeaks of the paſſion and death of JESUS CHRIST, it is aſcribed to the Human nature and not to the Divine. St Cyril acknowledges (3), that Neſtorius owns the word was incarnate, and that it was in the womb of the Virgin together with the man who was born of Mary; but he ſays, that this man is not naturally God; and that it is the man only who died and roſe again. We own, ſays St Cyril (4), the word of GOD to be immortal, and life itſelf; but we believe at the ſame time he became fleſh, and that being united with a body animated with a rational ſoul, he has ſuffered in that body as is ſaid in the Scripture: and, becauſe his body has ſuffered, we ſay he has ſuffered likewiſe, although he be of an impaſſible nature; and becauſe his body was raiſed again, we ſay he was raiſed again alſo. But Neſtorius is not of this opinion; for he ſays it was the man who was raiſed again, and that it is the body of the man which is offered to us in the holy myſteries: we believe, on the contrary, that it is the fleſh and blood of the word which enlivens all things.

(1) Du Pin, Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, Tom. iii, Part ii, pag. 287, Dutch Edit.

(2) This was the ſecond anſwer he made to St Cyril. See Du Pin, ibid.

(3) Du Pin, ibid. pag. 289.

(4) Du Pin, ibid.

It

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

At leaſt it muſt be owned, that the proceedings of St Cyril, his adverſary, were altogether irregular. There never was a judgment more precipitate, nor more to be ſuſpected of paſſion, than that which was given by the council of Epheſus againſt our Neſtorius [B].

It is eaſy to comprehend that there was only a diſpute about words between them; for St Cyril did not pretend that the word, as word, had ſuffered death; he acknowledged that the word was of an impaſſible nature; but he would have it, that becauſe a human body, united to the word, died and roſe again, it might be ſaid the word died and roſe again. The conteſt therefore was only about a turn of phraſe; the diſpute did not concern the thing itſelf. Both Neſtorius and St Cyril agreed, that the word, as word, was not born of Mary, and did not die on the croſs; but that it was united with the fleſh, which was formed in the womb of the holy Virgin, and which had been crucified. They diſputed therefore, whether in conſequence of this doctrine, it might be allowable to uſe certain phraſes. Neſtorius would not conſent to it, becauſe he feared the conſequences of ſuch expreſſions. St Cyril would have it ſo, becauſe he apprehended the conſequences of rejecting thoſe phraſes. So that, to judge charitably, they were both orthodox, and animated with a true zeal; but they had the misfortune to explain themſelves ill, and not to underſtand one another. One who had been accuſtomed to give things an ill conſtruction, would perhaps ſay, that they did underſtand each other very well, but that finding themſelves once in the career, like two famous champions they would not own their conteſt was grounded on a triſle: this would have taken away all pretence for combating. They behaved like thoſe brave duelliſts in their expoſtulations, who, for fear of being ſuſpected of cowardice, will neither own their giving or putting up an affront. By giving ſatisfaction they might confeſs a ſort of deſire not to draw, and they might teſtify the ſame deſire by acquieſcing in the ſatisfaction. However it be, the whole doctrine of the hypoſtatic union, may be retained, and the title of Mother of GOD, be nevertheleſs rejected, not only becauſe it may furniſh Infidels with an occaſion of joking (5) as the primitive Chriſtians, though with greater reaſon, did upon Cybele, but becauſe in a rigorous ſenſe, it is not true that the holy Virgin is the mother of GOD. It is very poſſible for an angel to be united with a human body, at the time of conception, in ſuch a manner that this angel and this human body, may make a man juſt as the body and ſoul of Adam made one. The woman, who ſhould conceive and bear in her womb this body, to which this angel was united, would be the mother of the perſon which proceeds from the hypoſtatic union of this angel with this body; but ſhe would not be the mother of the angel. We cannot even ſay that Eve was the mother of the ſoul of Abel, though ſhe was the mother of Abel. Let us ſay the ſame of the holy Virgin: She was the mother of JESUS CHRIST, but not of the word; which, by uniting with a body, formed a whole, which is called JESUS CHRIST. To ſay therefore that the holy Virgin ought to be termed the mother of JESUS CHRIST, but not of GOD, is not an argument that one rejects the hypoſtatic union, but only that one prefers the exact language of the Philoſophers to that of the vulgar, and to the ſynecdoches (6) of Rhetoricians. I am of opinion however, that Neſtorius was blameable for oppoſing the torrent: he ought to have contented himſelf to make his adverſaries explain what they underſtood by the mother of GOD (7). St Cyril on his part was alſo very blameable for not being content with making the Neſtorians explain what they meant by the mother of CHRIST. They might have ſaved the church great troubles, if they would have underſtood each other: there needed nothing more than to give reciprocally a juſt definition of their terms. I remember upon this occaſion a chapter in the Art of Thinking (8) where it is ſhown, that a thouſand diſputes would ceaſe, would but the diſputants take the trouble of explaining what they mean by the terms they employ. As for the reſt, it ſeems to me, that the abuſes, in reſpect to the worſhip of the holy Virgin were equally to be feared, whether ſhe was called the mother of JESUS CHRIST, or the mother of GOD. For, doubtleſs, the moſt violent votaries did never believe that the word, as ſuch, received from the holy Virgin it's life and ſubſiſtence, in the ſame manner that children receive them from their mother. And it is certain, that by urging the conſequences of the title of mother of JESUS CHRIST, as much as thoſe of mother of GOD have been urged, one might with equal readineſs have introduced the worſhip of the holy Virgin, and the 'O felix puerpera Noſtra pians ſcelera Jure matris impera Redemptori, - - - O bleſſed be thy delivery, expiating our ſins, by thy mother's right command our Redeemer.' I ſhall ſpeak of this hereafter (9). This refutes thoſe who find in the conduct of Neſtorius ſomething which was capable of preventing idolatry (10) Here is a fact which may perſuade us, that, at the bottom, his opinion was orthodox; which is, that he offered (11) to call the Virgin Mary the mother of GOD, provided the error of Apollinaris, maintained by St Cyril, was condemned.

[B] There never was a judgment more precipitate, or more ſuſpected of paſſion, than this . . . . againſt Neſtorius.] But one ſeſſion was employed in citing Neſtorius, examining his writings and thoſe of St Cyril, hearing witneſſes, and depoſing him. He who preſided in this aſſembly was St Cyril, Neſtorius's adverſary. He made the council begin to act, without waiting for the oriental biſhops, or the Pope's legates; and notwithſtanding the oppoſition of ſixty eight biſhops, who inſiſted upon the ſtaying for the arrival of John of Antioch, and of the eaſtern and weſtern biſhops (12). Count Candidian, the emperor's commiſſioner, had alſo demanded that nothing ſhould be done before the arrival of the oriental biſhops alledging, that the emperor his maſter's intent was, that a general council ſhould be held, and not particular and ſeparate aſſemblies (13). But as his remonſtrances were not taken notice of, he retired, having firſt proteſted againſt the council. St Cyril, over-ruling all theſe proteſts and remonſtrances, opened the council, and in the firſt ſeſſion condemned and depoſed his antagoniſt, altho' he had promiſed to appear as ſoon as all the biſhops ſhould be arrived. All this ſhews, that the emperor did not write to St Cyril without being well informed of the matter, that he looked upon him as the author of all this diſturbance. It was not without reaſon that he reproached him with diſturbing the church, with having a mind to divide the Imperial family, by writing ſeparately to the empreſſes, with meddling with what did not concern him, and with acting with too great authority and too little prudence (14).

We ſhall make uſe of Monſieur du Pin's words to ſet forth the irregularities of St Cyril (15). There are many objections made againſt the nature of this council, and the conduct obſerved in it. They ſay, it cannot paſs for any thing but a tumultuous and raſh aſſembly, where nothing reigned but faction and paſſion, and that it cannot be termed an Oecumenical Council. That St Cyril held it in ſpight of the commiſſioners the emperor ſent to convene it; that not only Neſtorius, and thoſe of his party, but alſo ſeveral other Catholic biſhops oppoſed it; that he reſolved not to wait for the oriental biſhops, tho' they were juſt upon their arrival, and had deſired that he ſhould ſtay for them; that he did not even wait for the coming of the Pope's legates, or of any of the weſtern biſhops; that his ſynod was only compoſed of Egyptian biſhops, and ſome others of Aſia, all entirely devoted to his will. That he alone did all and governed all, in that council. Tho' he was an enemy to Neſtorius, and had refuſed him for his judge, becauſe he looked on him as his enemy, had not Neſtorius the ſame reaſon to refuſe him? The manner in which he acted againſt Neſtorius, and the precipitation with which he cauſed him to be condemned, ſeem to make it plain, that he was animated by nothing but paſſion. He cited Neſtorius twice in one day: Neſtorius anſwered, that he was ready to come as ſoon as the biſhops of the Eaſt and Weſt ſhould arrive, and the council was full; that he did not refuſe to be judged, but did not care to be judged by his enemies only. Theſe excuſes appear reaſonable. St Chryſoſtome alledged no other for not appearing before the ſynod of Theophilus. Nevertheleſs St Cyril, in imitation of his uncle and predeceſſor Theophilus, received the accuſation, formed the proceſs, delivered his own opinion firſt againſt his enemy, and cauſed him to be condemned. This is what Iſidorus of Damiata reproached St Cyril with, acquainting him, 'that there were a great many who

(5) Might they not ſay, that according to the Chriſtians, God has a father, and a mother, a grand-father, and a grand-mother, a great grand-father, and a great grand-mother, and ſo go throughout all the degrees of parentage, both lineal and collateral? and then ſay with Cicero, Si (Saturnus) eſt Deus, patrem quoque ejus, Cœlum, eſſe Deum confitendum eſt. Quod ſi ita eſt, Cœli quoque parentes Dii habendi ſunt; Æther, & Dies, eorumque fratres, & ſorores, qui à genealogis antiquis ſic nominantur, Amor. Dolus, &c. De Natura Deor. lib. iii, cap. xvii, pag. m. 625.

(6) This is a figure by which the name of the whole is given to the part, or the name of the part to the whole; that of the genus to the ſpecies, or of the ſpecies to the genus, &c.

(7) Neſtorius might have ſaid that the councils never made uſe of the term, Mother of God; but yet this term was in uſe, ſo that the people of Conſtantinople, being accuſtomed to hear it, were extremely diſpleaſed when the Neſtorians affirmed it ought not to be made uſe of. See du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 61.

(8) It is the 12th of the firſt part.

(9) In the remark [L].

(10) See the remark [H], citation (58).

(11) In a letter he wrote to the emperor, during the holding of the council of Epheſus. See Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 297. Neſtorius had been already depoſed by the biſhops, who adhered to St Cyril; but the latter had alſo been depoſed by thoſe who adhered to John of Antioch.

(12) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 293. He quotes Collect. of Lupus, chap. vii.

(13) Ibid. pag. 292. He quotes Collect. of Lupus, chap. ix.

(14) Id. ib. pag. 294. He quotes pag. 1, Act. Conc. cap. xxxi.

(15) Id. ib. pag. 320, 321.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nevertheleſs St Cyril, who preſided in it, and was the ſoul of that tumultuous ſentence, has preſerved his rank and dignity [C], and has ever ſince, throughout all ſucceeding ages, been venerated as a great ſaint; whereas Neſtorius miſerably ſpent the remainder of his days, and his memory ſtill continues odious, they have not failed to ſay, that the manner of his death carried the marks of the Divine puniſhment and malediction [D]. His

'laughed both at him and the tragedy he acted at Ephe-'ſus; that it was publickly ſaid he ſought only to re-'venge himſelf upon his enemy; that he herein imitated 'his uncle Theophilus; and that, altho' there were a 'great difference between the parties accuſed, yet the 'conduct of the accuſers was the ſame; that he would 'have done better to have ſat down quietly, and not to 'have revenged himſelf for particular affronts, at the ex-'pence of the church in general, and by exciting an 'eternal diſcord amongſt it's members under a falſe pre-'tence of piety.' Theſe are the very words of Iſidorus of Damiata, which he ſpoke to him as a friend. Gennadius biſhop of Conſtantinople, compares likewiſe the conduct of St Cyril with that of Theophilus, and calls him the ſecond ſcourge of Alexandria. The manner after which this affair of Neſtorius was determined, ſeems to prove plainly, that it was paſſion only which influenced St Cyril, and the biſhops of his party; that they were reſolved, at what rate ſoever, to condemn Neſtorius, and that they apprehended nothing ſo much as the arrival of the oriental biſhops, for fear of not having then the power of doing what they pleaſed; for in the very firſt ſeſſion they cited Neſtorius twice, read the teſtimonies of the Fathers, the letters of St Cyril, with his twelve chapters, and the writings of Neſtorius, and gave all their opinions. Never was any affair determined with ſo much precipitation, ſince the leaſt of theſe matters required an intire ſeſſion. How could the twelve propoſitions of St Cyril be examined in ſo ſhort a time, which needed ſo many explanations, and which have cauſed ſo many diſputes? How could ſo many paſſages out of the ſermons of Neſtorius be compared with what preceded, and followed, to find out the true ſenſe? How could ſo ſhort a time be ſufficient to explain the opinions of the antient Fathers? All theſe matters required a long and ſerious examination of ſeveral days; but the biſhops of this council were ſo afraid of not finiſhing that matter in this one ſeſſion, that they remained ſhut up from morning till night, to judge that affair by themſelves, for fear if they ſhould delay it till next morning, things might take another turn. The ſentence they notified to Neſtorius, was directed in ſuch terms, as expreſs the paſſion which animated them, To Neſtorius, the new Judas. Was it not enough to condemn and depoſe him, without inſulting over him yet further with injurious words? In concluſion; this council, very far from procuring peace, procured nothing but diſturbance, diviſions, and ſcandal to the church of CHRIST; and there never was a council of which might more truly be ſaid, what St Gregory Nazianzen obſerved of thoſe of his time; 'That he had never known any aſſemblies of 'biſhops conclude happily; that they had always rather 'increaſed the malady, than cured it (16). That the 'obſtinate heats, and deſire of conqueſt and dominion, 'which commonly reigned amongſt them, rendered them pre-'judicial; and that for the moſt part, thoſe who un-'dertook to judge others, were induced to it more out of 'ill-will, than out of any inclination they had to re-'form their errors.' This ſeems to ſuit with the council of Epheſus, more than with any other aſſembly of biſhops. The hiſtory of the troubles which followed this council ſufficiently demonſtrate it, and we may ſay that theſe troubles were not appeaſed, but by ceaſing to talk any more of what had been done in this council. Monſieur du Pin has forgot nothing, in order to anſwer theſe objections; but the ſubject was ſo little favourable to him, that it may very juſtly be ſaid, his anſwers are weakneſs itſelf.

(16) Compare with this what has been ſaid of the aſſemblies of the ſtates-general of France in the remark [B], citation (6), of the article MARILLAC (CHARLES DE).

Why have we not a hiſtory of this council, written by a Father Paul! And what obſervations might there not be made in an hiſtorical comment on the words of St Gregory Nazianzen? for it ought not to be imagined, becauſe in other councils, there has not been ſo great a precipitation uſed as that of St Cyril, at the council of Epheſus; that therefore paſſion and caballing have had a leſs ſhare in them. It is highly neceſſary that the HOLY GHOST ſhould preſide in theſe aſſemblies, for without this all would be loſt. This extraordinary aſſiſtance, and much more powerful than uſual, ought to aſſure and perſuade us firmly, that the HOLY GHOST has done his work, amidſt the irregularities of human nature, and drawn from the darkneſs of paſſions the light of truth, not in all the councils, but in ſome only.

[C] Cyril . . . . . preſerved his rank and dignity.] We have ſeen in the preceding remark, that he did not wait for the arrival of the oriental biſhops, before he opened the council. They arrived five days after the depoſing of Neſtorius, and held a council, where John of Antioch preſided, and where St Cyril was depoſed. Each party deputed ſome perſons to the emperor, to give him an account of what had paſſed. The oriental biſhops ſent him a relation, wherein they complained that the church of St John had been ſhut upon them; inſomuch that they were forced to ſay their prayers without doors, and that in their return they had been ill treated. They beſeeched the emperor to baniſh from Epheſus St Cyril and Memnon, the heads of that perſecution. A little after they diſpatched alſo count Irenæus with another information againſt St Cyril, concerning an act of violence they complained of, in having been hindred, by ſtones thrown at them, from entering the church of St Paul (17). St Cyril's party deputed three biſhops to the emperor; whereas the orientials contented themſelves with deputing only count Irenæus, who ſucceeded ſo well, that he perſuaded that prince, that the ſynod held by St Cyril, ought not to be eſteemed a lawful council, and had almoſt prevailed upon him to confirm the proceedings of the oriental biſhops, and to baniſh St Cyril. But John, the emperor's Phyſician, and St Cyril's friend, intervening, ſoon gave a change to the face of things, by gaining the majority of the miniſters; ſome of whom were of opinion, that what had been done on both ſides was lawful; the others thought, that the whole ought to be declared void, and that diſintereſted biſhops ſhould be convened to examine the grounds of the faith, and all that had paſſed at Epheſus. In this confuſion Theodoſius was of opinion to approve the depoſing of Neſtorius, St Cyril, and Memnon, on account of their factions . . . . And he ſent count John to execute that order and to re-unite all the biſhops in one ſynod, after having expelled Neſtorius, St Cyril, and Memnon (18). The party of John of Antioch, acquieſced in the emperor's pleaſure (19); but the other party oppoſed it in ſuch a manner, that count John was obliged to commit Neſtorius to the cuſtody of count Candidian, and St Cyril to that of count James, and to write to the emperor, that he found the minds of the biſhops ſo exaſperated againſt each other, that he ſaw no way to reconcile them (20). The emperor ordered, that each party ſhould ſend him deputies; to whom he gave audience at Chalcedon, and ſeemed very favourable to the oriental biſhops (21); but he began by degrees to turn againſt them . . . . His council had been entirely gained. Acacius of Beræa, in a letter to be found in the collection of Lupus, chap. 41, accuſes St Cyril of having changed the ſentiments of the court, by giving money to a certain ſcholaſtic eunuch: He ſays alſo that this eunuch dying, and leaving a great deal of money, the emperor found a memorandum which imported that he had received ſeveral pounds of gold from St Cyril, which had been paid him by Paul, St Cyril's nephew (22). Mr du Pin obſerves, that there is no reaſon to believe what Acacius of Beræa ſays, ſince he was not one of St Cyril's friends. I confeſs it; But what better reaſon can be given for that ſudden change of the emperor? He acknowledged for orthodox the biſhops of both parties (23), and yet he declares (24), that Neſtorius (25) had been juſtly condemned; that St Cyril and Memnon ſhould continue in their ſees, and that all the other biſhops ſhould return alſo to their churches: he declares, I ſay, all this, after he had ſhown himſelf favourable to the oriental biſhops who had ſubmitted to his orders; whereas the party of St Cyril had haughtily refuſed to ſubmit to them. This proceeding looks very much like the effect of money given by St Cyril to the emperor's counſellors; and thus in ſome caſes a perſon is orthodox or heretical, according as he has or has not money to give.

(17) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 297.

(18) Ib. p. 301.

(19) Ib. p. 302.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Ib. p. 303.

(22) Ib. p. 304.

(23) Ib. p. 305.

(24) Ibid.

(25) He had already received an order to retire to his monaſtery. Ibid. pag. 303.

[D] They have not failed to ſay, that the manner of his death carried the marks of the Divine puniſhment and malediction.]

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

His ſect multiplied exceedingly, and ſtill ſubſiſts. It is very probable, that it owes its preſervation to the toleration given to it by the Mahometan princes [E]. Some ſay that other malediction.] 'After the ſentence of the council, Neſtorius durſt not return any more to Conſtantinople, 'but retired to his old monaſtery at Antioch, whence 'he was taken four years after in 435, by the empe- 'ror's orders, and baniſhed to Oaſis. But the Barba- 'rians having taken and deſtroyed that city he was 'obliged to retire to Panopolis in Thebais, where he 'was not ſuffered to be long at quiet; he was ſo often 'obliged to remove from place to place, that he got 'his death in a journey by the misfortune of a fall. 'Evagrius, who relates theſe paſſages, taken out of 'Neſtorius's own letters, written during his exile, ſays, 'he had met with a certain author, who affirmed, 'that, before Neſtorius died, his tongue was eaten by 'worms, as a puniſhment for the blaſphemies he had 'uttered. But he does not ſupport that circumſtance, 'which might very well be the invention of this ano- 'nymous author; ſince it has ever been cuſtomary to (26) Ibid. pag. 62. 'ſuppoſe, that all heretics come to a tragical end (26).'

[E] The toleration given to it by the Mahometan princes.] I have ſaid ſomewhere (27) that they have always had more humanity for other religions, than the Chriſtians, and I have added, that the different communions in the Greek church, which have preſerved themſelves under their empire, would have ſoon been extirpated, if they had lived under Chriſtian kings, who had not been of the ſame belief. I ſhould have quoted upon that occaſion a Father of the Oratory, who is of the ſame opinion, but not having then his paſſage ready at hand, I referred the reciting of it to another place. This is a proper opportunity. 'It will 'be concluded alſo from thence with the ſame evi- 'dence, how neceſſary the Imperial laws were for the 'preſervation of the church, ſince Egypt, and the 'neighbouring provinces, have been ſo over-run and 'ſubjugated by the Eutychians, that they have never 'ſince been well reconciled, or re-united, to the Ca- 'tholic church (28). - - - - If the emperors had not 'ſupported the faith againſt the Eutychians, the whole 'world would have been over-run by them. They 'ſpread themſelves very much over the provinces of 'Africa and Æthiopia, and the countries moſt remote 'from the eaſt, for no other reaſon but becauſe the 'emperors of Conſtantinople were no longer maſters 'of them, or had never been ſo. I might ſay the 'ſame thing of the Neſtorians: as ſoon as they had 'been fulminated by the firſt council of Epheſus, the 'emperor, Theodoſius the younger, made very near 'the ſame edicts againſt them: they were exiled with 'Neſtorius into frightful ſolitudes; yet they multiply- 'ed prodigiouſly towards the eaſt and the north, the 'emperors not being able to purſue them beyond the 'limits of their empire. The Saracens or Mahome- 'tans a little after over-ran Africa and all Aſia, feiz- 'ing upon I know not how many provinces of the 'Roman empire; and through the favour of the Ma- 'hometan princes, all theſe heretics gave an incre- 'dible extent to their ſects. God preſerved the Ca- 'tholic faith only in the Roman empire; which was 'owing merely to the care and edicts of the Chriſtian 'and Catholic emperors. Without this aſſiſtance from 'Heaven, the Eutychians, Neſtorians, and Arians, not 'to mention ſo many other antient ſects, would doubt- 'leſs have eſtabliſhed themſelves in the greateſt part of 'the provinces of the Roman empire, as they did in 'thoſe which were out of its juriſdiction; and the 'followers of all the new ſects, which have ſprung up 'only within theſe hundred years, would not have 'been able to find a church, which they might firſt 'be born in, and afterwards ſeparate from. They 'muſt have come into the world among the Arians, 'Neſtorians, or Eutychians, and would have been in- 'fected with the ſame errors from their birth. They 'would have taken the word for a meer creature, with 'the Arians; Jesus Christ for a mere man, with 'the Neſtorians; and for them, as well as for the 'Eutychians, Jesus Christ would be God, but 'he would not be truly man. Why therefore do they 'quarrel with the Chriſtian emperors, or kings, and 'their ſevere laws, for the antient religion, ſince it is 'by their aſſiſtance only that the Divine Providence 'has delivered them from all theſe errors? They 'ought rather to give thanks to him who has not per- 'mitted that they ſhould be ſo far ſeparated from us, 'as the antient deſerters of the Catholic church are, 'who departed from it above a thouſand years ago, 'and are not yet altogether returned from their er- 'rors (29). - - - - We muſt not omit mentioning the 'cauſe of the long delay of the eaſtern ſects from re- 'turning to the Catholic church. It is, as we have 'already ſaid, their diſperſion into provinces and 'kingdoms, which now no longer belong to the 'Chriſtian empire; but to Arabian princes, to the 'kings of Perſia, the Moguls, and the Tartars. The 'Catholic biſhops; whether Greeks or Syrians, but 'chiefly the miſſionaries from the holy See, have all 'along made ſome converts, and ſome progreſſes a- 'mong them; but all theſe efforts having not been 'ſupported, by the power and favour of temporal 'princes, they could never obtain either much extent, 'or duration (30).'

(27) In the article of MAHOMET, remark [AA].

(28) Thomaſſin, Of the Unity of the Church, Tom. i, Part ii, chap. ix, pag. 374.

(29) Ibid. pag. 375, 376.

(30) Ibid. pag. 376, 377.

When I ſaid the Mahometans have been leſs rigorous to the Chriſtians, than theſe to the heretics, I was ſupported by the teſtimony of a miniſter (31). I now build upon that of a prieſt; and by this means my opinion will appear the more reaſonable, ſince it is confirmed by the teſtimonies of two witneſſes of ſo oppoſite a character. Theſe two evidences agree in another thing, which is a little ſcandalous; for they both confeſs, that if the Chriſtian princes had not employed the rigour of the laws againſt the enemies of the orthodox faith, falſe religions would have over-run the whole world. By this rule, when our Saviour promiſed he would maintain his church againſt the gates of hell, he only promiſed that he would raiſe up princes who ſhould ſubdue the enemies of the truth, by depriving them of their eſtates, thruſting them into priſons, baniſhing them, ſending them to the gallies, hanging them, &c. There is no doctrine, how abſurd ſoever, but by theſe means might brave all the infernal powers that would oppoſe it. This brings into my mind what has been ſaid of Mahomet the impoſtor: it is reported, that when he was upon his death-bed, he left his diſciples a prediction, which favours not at all of a falſe prophet, My religion ſhall laſt as long as your victories (32).

(31) See, above, citations (157), (158), of the article MAHOMET.

(32) Veritati maxime conſonum eſt Muhammedis morientis præſagium, quod Ludovicus Vives (de Verit. Rel. lib. iv, in fine) citat, tamdiu nempe legem ſuam duraturam, quamdiu victoriam ſuorum. Quod enim lex non in recti perſuaſione ſed violentia conſiſtat, victoriis ceſſantibus, legem quoque ceſſaturam [illegible] Samuel Schultetus, in Eccleſiâ Mahammedanâ, pag. 22.

Whether Heretics oppreſſed in the councils by the Imperial authority are obſtinate becauſe of that oppreſſion.

I cannot part with Lewis Thomaſſin before I aſk him upon what grounds he goes, when he ſays the Eutychian hereſy would have over-run all the world, had not the emperors ſupported the faith. What had this hereſy ſo charming? Did it favour the paſſions of the heart? Did it enervate the morality of the goſpel? Not at all: it was not upon the doctrine of morality that this heretic combated the Orthodox: he contended with them about a myſtery which reaſon cannot well comprehend; but he explained it after a manner leſs to be comprehended than that of the Orthodox, and manifeſtly abſurd. Perhaps it would be no miſtake to ſay, that the Eutychian hereſies found ſo many followers, only becauſe the proceedings of councils ſhocked an infinite number of perſons, and gave a very diſadvantageous preposſeſſion againſt the orthodox party. Father Thomaſſin ſuggeſts this thought: The Syrians, ſays he (33), the Jacobites, the Armenians, and all the Eutychian ſects, would no longer call us Catholics, but invented for us the name of Melchites, that is to ſay, Royaliſts or Imperialiſts, as if it had not been the ancient faith of the church which the Catholics had defended, but that of the emperor; and as if it had been only the Imperial authority, and not that of the council of Chalcedon, compoſed of above ſix hundred biſhops, that had kept us in the faith and union of the Catholic church. This ſhows that thoſe heretics had imprinted in their minds this ſtrong perſwaſion, that their patriarch had been oppreſſed by the factions which were formed againſt him at the Imperial court. We may paſs the like judgment on the ſect of Neſtorius. A vaſt number of people embraced it from the abhorrence they had of the injuſtice which they believed was done Neſtorius, by ſacrificing him to the credit of St Cyril. They could not perſwade themſelves that a cauſe, which triumphed by ſuch irregular ways, and through ſo unjuſt a partiality of the emperor, could have any right on its ſide. We ſhould ſee more clearly into this affair, if we had the relations of the Neſtorians, and thoſe of the other ſects; but we ſcarce know any thing of thoſe matters otherwiſe than from the report of a victorious party, and yet we know enough to judge, that the Imperial

(33) Ubi ſupra, pag. 374.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

other infidel princes had already taken them under their protection to vex the Orthodox [F]. Something ſingular has happened in the Low-Countries ſince the year 1690 (a). Almoſt at the ſame time that the Jeſuits accuſed the Fathers of the Oratory at Mons of renewing Neſtorius's hereſy [G], a miniſter of Rotterdam brought the ſame accuſation againſt a miniſter of Utrecht [H]. The ſucceſs of both theſe accuſations has been

(a) I write this the tenth of February 1696.

Imperial power has always had too large a ſhare in the deciſions. See with what force Pighius falls upon the council of Conſtantinople (34), where Pope Honorius was condemned as a favourer of Monotheliſm: and conſider this apology. Pighius 'ſays nothing againſt 'this council, but what might have been ſaid againſt 'the firſt council of Nice, and againſt that of Chalce- 'don; all his objections being grounded on this, that 'the emperor Conſtantine aſſiſted at it with his officers, 'and that he there regulated the order and manner of 'proceeding. It cannot be denied but Conſtantine I, 'did the ſame at the council of Nice, and that in that 'of Chalcedon the emperor's commiſſioners attributed 'to themſelves more authority, and meddled more 'with affairs belonging to that council, than the em- 'peror himſelf did in this. So that it is impoſſible 'to reflect on this council, without reflecting at the 'ſame time on the others; and this is attempting to 'overthrow the moſt ſolid foundations, on which our 'faith is built, in order to maintain a pretended in- 'fallibility in the perſon of Honorius (35).'

(34) Held in the year 680. This is called the ſixth œcumenical council.

(35) Du Pin, Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, Tom. vi, pag. 67, Edit. of Holland.

[F] To vex the Orthodox.] It is ſaid that Coſroës, king of Perſia, having a mind to vex the emperor Heraclius, his inveterate enemy, deprived the Catholics of all the churches they had in his dominions, and gave them to the Neſtorians. It is added, that Heraclius finding the Neſtorians favoured by the king of Perſia, thought he ſhould mortify that prince by favouring the Heretics who were moſt oppoſite to theſe; and that it was on this account he ſet himſelf about cheriſhing Eutychianiſm, not directly, for he durſt not openly oppoſe the council of Chalcedon, but by approving Monotheliſm, which was one article among the errors of Eutyches. Read what follows: Aumentò non poco l'Ereſia de' Monoteliti la ragione politica, che ne ſciſmi della Religione per ordinario vi aſſiſte, poſcia che ſendo Coſroe Re de' Perſi capital nemico di Eraclio, protegeva, e procurava di dilatare la fazzione de' Neſtoriani, e per far coſa di ſommo diſpetto ad Eraclio, levò à Cattolici le chieſe tutte della Perſia, e le diede à Neſtoriani, dal che ſtimolato l'Imperatore Eraclio per render pari diſguſto al Perſiano, ſi moſſe à tutto potere à fomentare la contraria Ereſia di Eutichete, non in quanto alla ſola natura di Chriſto, per non opporſi affatto al Concilio Calcedoneſe, che l'havea definito; mà benſì in quanto alla ſola volontà è operazione, errore parimente de gli Eutichiani (36).

(36) The IXth Giornale de Letterati 1678, pag. 235, in the abſtract of a poſthumous book of John Baptiſta Tamagnini, a Venetian, printed at Paris in 1678, and intituled, Celebris Hiſtoria Monothelitarum atque Honorii controverſia ſcrutiniis octo comprehenſa.

[G] The Jeſuits accuſed the Fathers of the Oratory of Mons of renewing Neſtorius's Hereſy,] Upon their complaining to the archbiſhop of Cambray of a great many calumnies which had been ſpread againſt them (37), that prelate commiſſioned Monſieur Steyaert, doctor and profeſſor of Divinity at Louvain, to enquire into the reports ſpread againſt their doctrine and conduct (38). This doctor made a juridical return by a liſt of forty articles of accuſation; whereof the eighteenth was this (39), That the Fathers of the Oratory would not allow the holy Virgin the title of the Mother of GOD, but only that of Mother of CHRIST (40). Let us attend a little to the progreſs of this malicious ſlander. 'It is not to be doubted but it had it's riſe at Mons; 'but paſſing from thence to the Jeſuits at Liege, 'it was they who firſt made uſe of it, in order 'to hinder the Fathers of the Oratory from being 'admitted into that city. To oppoſe the reſo- 'lution of the chapter, who had agreed to receive 'them, theſe Jeſuits forged a Memorial againſt 'thoſe Fathers, which they feigned to have been 'brought to them by a perſon worthy of credit; and 'pretending to debate what they ſhould do in the 'matter, it was reſolved, that, not being able in con- 'ſcience to paſs by the informations it gave them, 'they ought immediately to acquaint the chapter with 'it. Hereupon Father Iſerin was ordered to put it, 'as he did, into the hands of the ſcholaſter .... 'They engaged the chapter and burgomaſters of Liege 'to write to the chief magiſtrates of Mons, as per- 'fectly acquainted with all thoſe facts (41).' The letter from the chapter imported, that a rumour had prevailed that the Fathers of the Oratory, appointed to come to Liege .... made profeſſion of ſome particular and dangerous opinions, which they had taught in ſeveral propoſitions condemned by the holy church; that JESUS CHRIST did not die for all men; that the bleſſed Virgin Mary is the mother of CHRIST, but not of GOD (42). Father Iſerin went ſoon after to Mons, and ſollicited the anſwers which were required from the magiſtrates of Mons to the letters of the Chapter and Burgomaſters of Liege (43). The anſwer to the burgomaſters contained, among other things, as to the worſhip of the holy Virgin, the ſaid eccleſiaſtics have ſaid, that the Fathers of the Oratory were enemies to it, and the common report is ſuch (44). It is not doubted, but the anſwer ſent to the chapter contained the ſame article (45). What followed upon it? Why, the chapter of Liege revoked the permiſſion given to the Fathers of the Oratory to eſtabliſh themſelves in that city (46). The impreſſion which the calumnies of the Jeſuits Memorial, confirmed by the anſwer of the magiſtrates of Mons made upon them, no doubt inclined the chapter to this alteration of opinion; and there is a great deal of reaſon to believe that the article relating to the Divine motherhood of the holy Virgin, was, of all others, that which gave the greateſt horrour, and contributed moſt to incline them to the excluſion of thoſe Fathers .... (47). The Jeſuits had ſo violently accuſed the Fathers of the Oratory of Neſtorianiſm, that they omitted nothing which might confirm that calumny, and ſpread it amongſt the people, as well at Bruſſels as at Mons .... Father Coemans, a Jeſuit, preaching in Flemiſh (48) in the church of Sablon, during the octave of the dedication of that church, employed part of his ſermon to ſtir up the people againſt ſome pretended innovators; who, as he aſſured them, were then upon reviving the Hereſy of Neſtorius, which conſiſted in denying the holy Virgin to be the mother of GOD. In the work I have quoted, may be ſeen very ample proofs of the care the Jeſuits have taken to decry the Fathers of the Oratory in Mons, as rank Neſtorians.

(37) Difficulties propoſed to Monſieur Steyaert, Part i, pag. 9. This book was printed in 1691,

(38) Ib. pag. 3.

(39) Ib. p. 48.

(40) Ibid. pag. 64, 68.

(41) Ib. p. 65.

(42) Ib. pag. 65, 66.

(43) Ib. p. 67.

(44) Ib. p. 49.

(45) Ib. p. 67.

(46) Ib. p. 68.

(47) Ib. p. 69.

(48) At Bruſſels in the year 1690.

[H] A miniſter of Rotterdam brought the ſame accuſation againſt a miniſter of Utrecht.] See the book intituled, An Apology for the Sieur Saurin, miniſter of the Walloon church at Utrecht, againſt the accuſations of Monſieur Jurieu. It was printed in 1692. There are to be found in it three articles of accuſation; the laſt of which contains four hereſies, namely, Pelagianiſm (49), Neſtorianiſm (50), the civil toleration of ſects (51), and the hereſy of the Sacramentarians (52). As our preſent ſubject relates only to the ſecond of theſe, I ſhall take no notice of the other three. Let us ſee therefore what the perſon accuſed anſwers as to Neſtorianiſm. He declares plainly that he condemns this hereſy; but that he firmly believes Neſtorius innocent of it. In the aſſembly at the Hague, convened to examine Monſieur Jurieu's accuſation of Monſieur Jacquelot, I declared, ſays he (53), for Neſtorius againſt St Cyril; but I did not declare for Neſtorianiſm againſt the ſentiment of the church. I ſaid Neſtorius ſeemed to me more orthodox than St Cyril, becauſe the doctrine of the former appeared more conformable to ours, than that of the latter. It is plain, that if I err, it is an error in fact, and not in opinion (54) .... But, it will be ſaid, what intereſt can you have for thus maintaining the reputation of Neſtorius, in oppoſition to a Father, who has been acknowledged for a ſaint, and to a general council? To which I anſwer, the intereſt of truth and juſtice. I am verily perſuaded, that whoever ſhall read without prejudice what we have remaining of St Cyril's and Neſtorius's writings, will find the latter orthodox, and the former an Heretic, and an Eutychian, or at leaſt that he will agree it to be infinitely more eaſy to give an orthodox interpretation to the propoſitions of Neſtorius than to thoſe of St Cyril. I am neither the only one, nor the firſt of this opinion, and whenever it ſhall be neceſſary, I can produce ſome authors, both antient and modern (55), whoſe authority will at leaſt ſplit the difference between theſe two patriarchs. If Neſtorius then be orthodox, and St Cyril an Heretic, my zeal for the truth in general, obliges me not to conceal this in particular: we ought to call light light, and darkneſs darkneſs. Moreover, this is a truth from whence we may draw two great advantages againſt the church of Rome. The firſt is, that it annuls the authority of St Cyril, one of the chief introducers of idolatry into

(49) The Apology of the Sieur Saurin, pag. 72.

(50) Ib. p. 78.

(51) Ib. p. 88.

(52) Ib. p. 92.

(53) Ib. p. 78.

(54) Ib. p. 79.

(55) See the article RODON

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

been alike. The accuſations were ſet aſide, without the accuſers being cenſured [I]. It ſeems thoſe that were brought againſt a certain tranſlator of the Homilies of St Chryſoſtome in the year 1693 were better grounded; for he wrote a letter to the archbiſhop of Paris, in which he acknowledged that through inadvertency he had committed ſome faults in his tranſlation, which, contrary to his intention, might ſtrike at the eſſential parts of religion. Wherefore he thought himſelf obliged to make a ſolemn recantation of them to ſecure the reputation of his faith; declaring that his errors are purely perſonal, and that they ought to

into the Chriſtian church. The ſecond, that by convicting the Fathers of the council of Epheſus of the Eutychian hereſy, equally condemned by the Proteſtants and Papiſts, we undermine the foundation of Popery, which is the infallible authority of general councils. Juſtice and charity alſo oblige us to defend oppreſſed innocence, and to make it appear, that Neſtorius may have been condemned by a council without being guilty; and that our modern Divines may take the part of Neſtorius, rejecting the errors attributed to him (56) .... As for what regards the intention of Neſtorius, I muſt judge it innocent, becauſe I can ſee no reaſon to judge it guilty. But Monſieur Jurieu has choſen, with a great many others, the ſtrongeſt ſide. Neſtorius had neither the majority nor authority for him; he was born down by the weight of St Cyril's cabal. We muſt then, for form-ſake, conclude he was an Heretic, whether he will or no, and go dive into his heart to find there ſome wicked intentions, whereof no foot-ſteps appear either in his words or actions. This ſame author ſhows, in another book of his, that he is more againſt Neſtorius than his accuſer. I have proved, ſays he (57), in my apology, that the title of Mother of GOD is agreeable to the holy Virgin, and that it is grounded on the word of GOD, and the nature of the myſtery; whereas Monſieur Jurieu, in his Paſtoral Letters, flies out with extream violence againſt this way of ſpeaking in the language of the church, looking upon it as the cauſe of the moſt criminal hereſy. Some few pages after, he ſets down the paſſage out of thoſe Paſtoral Letters; which I ſhall ſet down after him, as well for the information of my reader, as to make it appear I have good authority for what I have ſaid of Neſtorius. He was, without doubt, unadviſed, and, GOD forbid, we ſhould fall into the ſame error, if it be true, that he has aſcribed two perſons to JESUS CHRIST, as well as two natures. Neither do we deny, that the holy Virgin may, in a good ſenſe, be termed the Mother of GOD, ſince ſhe is mother of JESUS CHRIST, who is GOD. But it was, however, an unhappy temerity in the Fathers of the Vth century, to introduce new terms. The holy Virgin is no where in the New Teſtament called the Mother of GOD, but only the mother of JESUS. They ought to have ſtopped there. For this title of Mother of GOD has ſomething in it that ſhocks, and is repugnant to the idea of GOD, who cannot have a mother. And indeed GOD did not think fit to beſtow his bleſſing on the falſe wiſdom of thoſe Fathers. On the contrary, he has permitted the moſt extravagant and criminal of all the idolatries of Antichriſt, to take it's riſe from thence (58). Let us conclude with the following words of Mr Saurin. 'The zealous and 'charitable Mr Jurieu, animated by his informing 'ſpirit, will needs have me examined upon this head. 'I am contented to be ſo; for I fear not to come to 'the touch as he does. I will not fly, as he has done, 'from ſeveral ſynods. I will not make uſe of a 'thouſand fetches, nor have recourſe to artifice, or 'violence to exempt myſelf from a law, impoſed on 'all the Faithful, eſpecially upon Divines, to give 'an account of their faith. I am for an anathema 'with all my heart, not againſt Neſtorius, but againſt 'Neſtorianiſm (59).' I ought not to omit, that before Monſieur Saurin obtained a teſtimony of his Orthodoxy from the ſynods, the public was very well ſatiſfied that he was an Anti-Neſtorian.

Conſult a letter which was printed at Amſterdam in 1701 (60), under the title of The Scrupulous Proteſtant, or an Explanation of the fourth chapter of the Adventures of Madonna; by way of Anſwer to a Letter, written to the Author (61) by Mr Jurieu, concerning the Title of Mother of GOD, and the Reputation of Cyril of Alexandria, and the firſt Council of Epheſus.

[I] The accuſations were ſet aſide without the accuſer's being cenſured, &c.] The proofs I ſhall bring, relate only to the Fathers of the Oratory. One of the articles in the liſt upon which Monſieur Steyaert had a commiſſion to make a juridical inqueſt, was, that theſe Fathers refuſed to give the holy Virgin the title of Mother of GOD. We have ſeen that this ſlander contributed very much towards hindering their obtaining at Liege, the eſtabliſhment that had been granted them. The accuſation in itſelf was one of the moſt important, according to the principles and practices of the Romiſh communion (62). It is natural therefore to expect, that the commiſſioner neglected nothing to diſcover the authors of this accuſation, and yet we are going to ſee he never once troubled his head about the matter. Obſerve how he was treated: 'The buſineſs 'was to know, whether the Fathers of 'the Oratory were new Neſtorians, who held, and 'taught thoſe under their inſtruction, that the holy 'Virgin was not mother of GOD, or whether they 'had been falſely charged with this hereſy, as well 'by public ſermons as reports ſpread abroad; and 'who were thoſe that ſo charged them with this ac'cuſation. What juridical proceedings have you ob'ſerved in making an enquiry, which might give the 'archbiſhop, who commiſſioned you, an occaſion to 'puniſh the Fathers of the Oratory, if they were con'victed of this damnable hereſy; or, in caſe they 'were found innocent, to make them reparation for the 'ſlander, from thoſe who had ſo falſely ſlandered 'them, and to ſubject their accuſers to canonical pe'nalties? But this enquiry you never made in any 'legal manner, becauſe you could find none guilty 'but the Jeſuits, and ſome magiſtrates of Mons, 'who had lent them their names, to confirm what 'the Jeſuits of Liege had made the chapter of that 'city believe, that the Fathers of the Oratory in the 'Low-Countries, founded by cardinal de Berulle, held 'ſeveral opinions, diſallowed by the holy church; and, 'among others, that the holy Virgin is not the mother of 'GOD (63).' The author names afterwards (64) a counſellor, who had been conſiderably concerned in the accuſation, and who preſſed him to proceed againſt him, to the end he might be fully juſtified by the diſcovery of the firſt author of this defamation; but it is objected to him, that notwithſtanding the many inſtances and requeſts repeated to him ſeveral times by this counſellor, he obſtinately refuſed to make any enquiry. Let us hear the Janſeniſt ſpeak (65). 'An accuſation of hereſy, and of an hereſy ſo impious, 'as that of Neſtorius, may be a good thing, and even 'neceſſary, providing it be true and well-grounded; 'whereas it muſt be abominable when it is falſe. Now 'being required by a man of honour to do him juſtice, 'upon an accuſation which had been fathered upon 'him, you told him that was not neceſſary, aſſuring 'him, that there was not the leaſt foundation imaginable 'to charge the Fathers of the Oratory, nor their adhe'rents, on the point of the Neſtorian hereſy; and, that the 'report which had been raiſed, appeared to you altogether 'extravagant, none of their adverſaries having pre'ſumed to maintain, or attempted to prove what they 'aſſerted. Why then was nothing of this to be found in the account you gave in of your charge (66)? 'Why was no mention made there, that you had ac'knowledged, that the eighteenth article (which was, 'that the Fathers of the Oratory refuſed to give the holy 'Virgin the title of Mother of GOD, allowing her only 'that of Mother of CHRIST) is a manifeſt calumny a'gainſt thoſe Fathers; none of their adverſaries having 'dared to maintain, or attempted to prove, what they 'aſſerted? You could not deny, but that there was a 'great noiſe about this Neſtorian hereſy, which was 'charged upon the Fathers of the Oratory: and tho' 'you was ſenſible this report was falſe, yet you con'tented yourſelf with only a verbal declaration to 'a private man, that it ſeemed altogether extravagant 'to you. Is it then a meer piece of extravagance, 'which deſerves only to be laughed at, and not a 'diabolical malice, that ought to be puniſhed, to 'ſpread abroad a report, that a congregation of 'prieſts believe a thing which they could not believe, 'without having loſt all ſenſe of religion (67)? .... 'There

(56) Ib. p. 82.

(57) Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 266.

(58) Jurieu, cited by Saurin, ibid. pag. 869. See the 16th Paſtoral Letter of the year 1687, pag. 364, Edit. in 12mo. In the fourth Paſtoral Letter of the following year, he ſpeaks more ſtrongly againſt thoſe who were for introducing the epithet of Mother of God.

(59) Saurin, ubi ſupra, pag. 795, 796.

(60) It contains thirty-two pages in 8vo. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Nov. 1701, pag. 578, &c.

(61) His name is Mr Renault.

(62) See the Difficulties propoſed to Monſieur Steyaert, Part 1. pag. 106.

(63) Ib. p. 98.

(64) Pag. 99.

(65) Ibid. pag. 104.

(66) It is a Latin treatiſe of Monſieur Steyaert's, where he gives an account of his commiſſion to the archbiſhop of Cambray.

(67) Difficulties, &c. pag. 106, 107. See alſo the ſecond part of the Difficulties, pag. 161, 163, and elſewhere.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to be attributed to none but himself (b) [K]. You will find at large in Moreri's Dictionary what relates to Neſtorius, and his followers; for which reaſon I ſhall ſay nothing of them. Conſult alſo Monſieur du Pin, who has met with ſome inconveniences in acting the part of an impartial hiſtorian [L]. I am willing to believe the encomium of Mother of GOD, has contributed to the extraordinary honours which have been paid to the holy Virgin; but it ſeems to me, that they might have fallen into the ſame worſhip, if no other title had been given her than that of mother of JESUS CHRIST [M].

(b) Beauval's Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, Nov. 1693, pag. 138.

Divers

'There being thus found, a ſet of men ſo wicked, as, 'without any proof, to charge a thing ſo little credible, 'and ſo very ſcandalous, upon the Fathers of the Ora- 'tory, it was of the laſt importance for appeaſing the 'diſturbances in the city of Mons, and undeceiving the 'common people in the ill opinion they had been made 'to conceive of theſe Fathers, that the authors of this 'diabolical calumny ſhould be detected, to the end 'they might be puniſhed, purſuant to the canons; and 'that a ſtop might be thereby put to all future ſlanders, 'which occaſion the committing of ſo many ſins. 'Why then, being legally required to give an ac- 'count of what you had in charge, and which your 'duty obliged you to do, did you refuſe it? Why 'alſo, not being able to ſay any thing upon this ac- 'cuſation, the moſt important of all, but what would 'be to the advantage of the Fathers of the Oratory, 'and to the confuſion of the Jeſuits, did you chuſe to 'ſpeak nothing at all of it in your Memorial? See 'how great is your juſtice, and pretended exemption 'from all partiality, in that which ought to have been 'the chief point of your commiſſion.'

This author having thus preſſed hard the archbiſhop of Cambray's commiſſioner, and having ſhown, with the cleareſt evidence, the fraudulent manner in which this commiſſion was executed, points out the main ſpring of this unfairneſs. Thoſe who know you better, ſays he (68), than the archbiſhop of Cambray, who choſe you for this employ, expected nothing elſe from you. They know your policy and love for your honour, make you act two different parts. You would think yourſelf diſhonoured, if in the poſt you are in, you did not maintain the ſound doctrine of your Faculty againſt the evil opinions of their adverſaries; and this is what you have done in ſeveral of your theſes. But the apprehenſion of bringing ſuch troubles upon yourſelf, as might diſturb your repoſe, makes you buckle to thoſe very perſons, whoſe opinions you condemn, leſt they ſhould injure your by their credit. Never did this cunning of your's ſhow itſelf more than on this occaſion. The Fathers of the Oratory had neither the power, nor the will to hurt you; and you could not do them juſtice without offending thoſe who would have had both, if you had not pleaſed them. You were in a manner under a neceſſity of abandoning the weaker ſide, that you might not diſoblige the ſtronger. You were obliged, to ſlight the proofs of the former's innocence, as you did, and to favour the latter, by diſſembling their horrible ſlanders and calumnies. This is to know how to live, according to the way of the world: but ought not you to apprehend this reproach of the GOD of Judges, * uſque quo judicatis iniquitatem, & facies peccatorum ſumitis? How long will ye judge unrighteouſly? How long will ye have regard to the power of ſinners, by making them appear innocent while they are moſt criminal? This is what that Hebraiſm, facies peccatorum ſumere, ſignifies: and it is this reſpect of perſons, which is ſo often, and ſo ſeverely condemned in the holy Scriptures; when, thro' timidity, or ſuch like conſiderations, the balance is made to incline to that ſide, which has the greater power, tho' the other has the better cauſe.

(68) Ibid. pag. 107.

* Pſalm lxxxvii, ver. 2.

This picture repreſents a great many people. They are ſenſible of the wrong done by a falſe accuſer; they deteſt him, and whiſper all the ill imaginable of him in their friends ears; but yet, if it be in his power, either to hurt or diſſerve them, they will be ſure, in caſe of their being his judges, to pronounce no ſentence that may diſgrace him. They have a thouſand artifices of evading, a thouſand methods of embarraſſing and perplexing matters: which ſhows, that the influence of power over juſtice, is a malady almoſt incurable in mankind; and therefore men in power will never be afraid of ſpreading uſeful calumnies. You ſee how a ſlander, cunningly managed, has ſhut the gates of Liege againſt the Fathers of the Oratory.

Note, That the archbiſhop of Cambray, did by a definitive ſentence on the twelfth of November 1692, declare theſe pretended Neſtorians innocent; yet he condemned no perſon by name to make them reparation. See the ſixth chapter of the eighth tome of, The Practical Morality of the Jeſuits.

[K] The tranſlator of the Homilies of St Chryſoſtome has declared, that his errors ought to be attributed to no body but himſelf.] The author who recanted after this manner was Mr Fontaine, and had formerly been ſecretary to Mr Arnaud and Mr de Sacy (69). It was this gave occaſion to the Jeſuit, who publiſhed a book intituled, Neſtorianiſm revived, to confound the tranſlator of the Homilies of St Chryſoſtome, with the Gentlemen of Port-Royal; and that was the reaſon which induced this tranſlator to declare expreſsly, that there was no body guilty but himſelf.

(69) Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, for Nov. 1693, pag. 138.

[L] Monſieur du Pin, who ſuffered ſome inconveniences in acting the part of an impartial Hiſtorian.] I am not very well acquainted with the particulars of the matters which were laid to his charge; and therefore I have only touched upon them by the by, but I refer my reader to one of our Journaliſts (70) who has mentioned ſome of them, and particularly the accuſation of his having too much favoured Neſtorius.

(70) Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, for Nov. 1692, pag. 140, 141, 142; and for May 1693, pag. 526, 527, 528. See alſo in the Hiſtorical Mercury, for June 1693, pag. 660, &ſeq. The diſcourſe of Monſieur Lamoignon advocate-general, requiring the ſuppreſſion of Monſieur du Pin's book, which he obtained.

[M] They might have fallen into the ſame worſhip, if no other title had been given her than that of Mother of JESUS CHRIST.] I have already ſpoken of this in my firſt remark, but it will not be amiſs here to touch it over again. I believe, I may ſay, that the diſputes between Neſtorius and St Cyril, have not ſerved to augment the honours of the Holy Virgin but by accident. Theſe two prelates did not contend about any point of devotion: their quarrel had no relation to worſhip; and ſuppoſing, that, at that very time, the Holy Virgin had been invocated, Neſtorius did not pretend to alter that cuſtom, nor did St Cyril require it to be enlarged. The difference between them was about a ſpeculative opinion: one apprehended the confounding the two natures of JESUS CHRIST; and the other feared the human nature of our Saviour would be looked upon as a perſon. Worſhip had nothing to do in this matter: Neſtorius, as infatuated as he ſeemed to be with his opinion, was ſo inclinable to grant the Holy Virgin the honours which were publickly paid her, that, in his diſgrace, he ſeemed diſpoſed to reſtore to her the title of Mother of GOD, rather than give occaſion of leſſening her worſhip by perſiſting in that refuſal (71). Theſe are the words of a French prieſt, who wrote a treatiſe of the devotion due to the Holy Virgin, as rationally as any one of his profeſſion could do. He confeſſes Neſtorius required no diminution of her worſhip; and he might likewiſe have acknowledged, that this Heretic retained all the foundations of worſhip, which St Cyril would have: for the worſhip of the Holy Virgin can be founded only on a ſuppoſition that GOD had done all for her in Heaven, which an elected king could do for his mother on earth, if he ſhould declare and inſiſt that he would have her who gave him life, whatſoever might be her former condition, to be acknowledged for queen-mother, and that he would grant her whatſoever ſhe ſhould aſk of him. From that very minute ſhe would be raiſed to ſuch a degree, as ſhould place her above all princeſſes, ducheſſes, and other perſons of the kingdom, except the king; and her intereſt would have no bounds. The honours paid her would exceed all the ſubmiſſion paid to other ſubjects. No body would go about to amuſe himſelf with inquiries, whether ſhe were the real mother of the king's ſoul or not: it would be thought ſufficient to acknowledge her to be the king's mother, and in poſſeſſion of all the authority due to ſo high a rank. The application of this to Neſtorius is not very difficult. If, in rejecting the title of Mother of GOD, he retains that of Mother of CHRIST, he

(71) Baillet, Of the Devotion due to the holy Virgin, pag. 33 &

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Divers considerations incline me to believe the justness of this thought; for the more I enquire into the reasons that could favour the progress of the worship of the Virgin Mary, the more I find that there is in the nature and constitution of man a very strong disposition to produce that worship [N], and to increase it prodigiously, and from thence I conclude, that even without the assistance of those epithets, which have been very useful to it, it might have rooted itself deeper and deeper, and produced fruit in abundance. As he retains all the foundations of worship; for, he will say, to be the Mother of JESUS CHRIST is the same thing as to be the mother of him, to whom all power has been given both in Heaven and in Earth (72), who reigns over all things, as well over angels as men: and consequently, if GOD has been pleased, that the mother of JESUS CHRIST should be invested with the quality of queen-mother and queen-regent, and that she should fully enjoy a maternal authority over her son: she must be above all other creatures; and, in a condition, to shower down on mankind whatever benefits she pleases. I cannot see, that St Cyril could place the worship of the holy Virgin upon a more solid foundation than this (73). It was not on account of the Divine nature, that JESUS CHRIST, on the day of his ascension, declared, that all power was given him; for, as he was GOD, he could acquire nothing, being in possession of all things from all eternity. It was then on account of his being man that he was established plenipotentiary: it was on his soul that GOD conferred that power, in as much as it was his pleasure that all the desires of his soul should be efficacious and operative: and consequently, to be assured of the universal authority of the holy Virgin, it is sufficient to believe, that the humanity of JESUS CHRIST refuses his mother nothing, and that it is as obedient to her as the best son could be. If the devotion of the Socinians should ever incline to festivals, processions, images, pilgrimages, &c. they would do the same for JESUS CHRIST, as the church of Rome practises towards his holy mother. It matters not that they do not believe him to be GOD; for it is enough, if he reigns with full power, and is the dispenser of all good things thro' the Divine institution. If Mr Baillet will but take the pains to reflect on what I have said, I am satisfied he will alter something in the following passage of his work. When the church maintained the holy Virgin, at the council of Ephesus, in the quality of Mother of GOD, against the injustice of the heresiarch Nestorius, who endeavoured to rob her of that glorious title, it was no less her intention and view to preserve the foundation of the worship, which the Faithful paid to the holy Virgin, than to establish a belief of the unity of the person of CHRIST (74). Perhaps, he would furnish me with views which I have not, and which would make me change my opinion. Now observe how, I believe, the disputes between Nestorius and St Cyril have by accident augmented the honours of the holy Virgin upon Earth. The title of Mother of GOD, contested for some time, and at length victorious, and confirmed by the canons of the councils, made more impression than it did before: it became a matter of great importance; the vanquished party was looked upon as impious, and the conquerors as the patrons of piety; the victory was boasted of, and this part of the faith fortified, as a breach, whence the enemy had been repulsed, and where he might give a second assault. Run thro' the whole History of the church, and you will find, that in all ages those disputes, which have not been victorious, have only served to redouble abuses. I have given the reason of it: and this puts me in mind of several cities, which, in order to preserve their privileges, have opposed burthensome edicts: they have only given a pretence to the sovereign for bridling them with citadels; which has rendered their condition yet worse than it was before. The author of the maxim, Nunquam tentabis ut non perficias, was no fool. See the margin (75).

To confirm what I have been saying, that those who attack old errors in religion, run the hazard of causing them, by accident, to take deeper root; I observe, that the followers of a false worship may be opposed, either during the hotteſt effort of their zeal, or when a lukewarm remissness has brought them to indifference (76). In the first case, is to be apprehended, what may happen, where one is opposed in the height of his fury. The resistance he meets with does but render him more furious.

Bacchæ bacchanti si velis advorsarier,
Ex insana insaniorem facies, feriet fæpius:
Si obsequare, unâ resolvas plagâ (77).

When the mad prieſteſs runs about the ſtreets,
And deals her blow to ev'ry one ſhe meets,
Take it in peace, and let the dame march on,
Her fury croſs'd will give you ten for one.

Hunc avus, hunc Athamas, hunc cætera turba suorum
Corripiunt dictis, frustraque inhibere laborant.
Acrior admonitu est; irritaturque retenta
Et crescit rabies, moderaminaque ipsa nocebant.
Sic ego torrentem, qua nil obstabat eunti,
Lenius, & modico strepitu decurrere vidi:
At, quacunque trabes, obstructaque saxa jacebant,
Spumeus, & fervens, & ab obice sævior ibat (78).

Thus did th' unhallow'd wretch thoſe rights profane
His friends diſſuade his blaſphemies in vain;
In vain his grandſire urg'd him to give o'er
His impious threats, the wretch but raves the more.
So have I ſeen a river gently glide,
In a ſmooth courſe, and inoffenſive tide;
But if with dams its current we reſtrain,
It bears down all before, and foams along the plain.

SEWELL.

In the second case the danger is of waking a sleeping dog, I mean of reviving a dying passion.

Consider a little the conduct of those husbands, whose conjugal love is almost extinguished. They possess their wives as if they possessed them not: they have for them a great deal of indifference, and it may be a great deal of aversion. But if any one should be for tempting them away, if they hear at their return home that they have eloped with some young galant, then they lose all manner of patience, are full of desires to recover them, and fill the air with complaints.

My poor wife, alas! what is become of her (79)?

Then they presently set the serjeants or bailiffs at work, and involve themselves in vexatious suits. There is no more lukewarmness nor indifference to be found in their behaviour. They took no notice of their wives while no body disputed the possession with them; now that is contested, they cannot live without them (80).

[N] There is in the .... constitution of man a very strong disposition to produce that worship.] The life of man is nothing but a scene of vicissitudes; but notwithstanding that inconstancy, there are certain things which being once introduced, grow up very fast, and go on for many ages, in a continual progress. This is what cannot be said of innovations, which tend to the reforming public abuses, or correcting immoralities. The laws made from time to time against luxury and gaming are of force only at first; they are quickly broke thro' and transgressed. Reformations in religion will sometimes last long in respect of speculative opinions; but, in regard to practical morality, they come speedily to their perfection, and to their full growth, and then succeeds as swift a relapse, and a state of corruption which requires a new reformation. The strict morals of the primitive Christians, their sobriety, their chastity, their humility, &c. appeared in their greatest lustre, during the lives of the apostles; but from that time they degenerated every day; so that, in the IVth century, there was no great difference between the morals of Christians, and those of other people. The Reformed in France, in the XVIth century, were at first very regular in their morals: they abstained from gaming, drinking, swearing, dancing, &c. The military laws, which the prince

(72) ... of ... Matthew, ... xxviii. ver. 18.

(73) ... Mary, ... de la ... la ... Vierge, p. 1. ... The rank which the ... Mother of God gives the holy Virgin ... which creatures not only ... with the part of salvation in the gives the ... is possessed of; but ... ask upon it a gift where she may intercede with her son, for all such as through the ... of that Divine Saviour are called to the future state of glory.

(74) Baillet, ibid. Pag. 3.

(75) Omittere priora invalida & aucta vires, eam hoc adjecui, ut illum fieret quo regitur imperes ... Tacit. Annal. L. iii. cap. liii.

(76) If I do not fix of the middle conditions between these two extreams, it is because every one may apply to them in proportion what I say of the extreams.

(77) Plautus in Amphit. Act. II. Sc. II. ver. 71.

(78) Ovid Metamor. lib. III. ver. 564.

(79) See the Memoirs of the duchess of Mazarin.

(80) Among the remedies of love Ovid, de Remedio Amoris, ver. 769, does not forget this, viz. that a man ought to think that he has no rival. At tu rivalem roli tibi fingere quemquam, Inque suo solam crede jacere toro. Acrius Hermionem, &c. See the sequel above, remark [G] of the article HELENA. See also citat. (143) of the article LUTHER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As for the reſt, I muſt not forget, that, ſince the firſt edition of my Dictionary, there has been publiſhed an Hiſtory of Neſtorianiſm (c) compoſed by Father Lewis Doucin (d), in a marginal note of which, may be ſeen (e) what I have ſaid above (f) concerning the miſunderſtanding of Neſtorius and St Cyril. To this the following remark is there ſubjoined, viz. I ground myſelf upon the authority and teſtimony of Mr du Pin, doctor of the

(c) Printed at Paris in 1698, in 4to.

(d) A Jeſuit.

(e) Pag. 551, 552.

(f) In this remark [A].

of Condé cauſed to be obſerved in the beginning of the civil wars, in the reign of Charles IX, were admirable (81). The ſoldiers were obliged to live in the greateſt regularity imaginable, and their leaſt faults were puniſhed ſeverely: but all theſe fine things were of ſhort duration, like children that die in their cradles (82), or plants, which ſhoot up prodigiouſly in a few days, and yet wither and die away before the end of the ſummer (83). It would be better for them to grow by little and little, after the manner of trees, which are deſigned by nature to be of long duration (84). The reaſon is eaſily given why a rigid diſcipline, and a great reformation of manners is like a ſtraw-fire, which quickly blazes, but as quickly loſes its force: it is becauſe too ſtrict an attachment to modeſty, temperance, and auſterity, is a violent ſtate: now, according to the Philoſophers maxim, ſuch a ſtate cannot be laſting, nullum violentum durabile. They (85) mean, by a violent ſtate, a ſtate contrary to the inclinations of nature, a place of exile, an external and ſuperior force, which detains a body out of its proper element, but which cannot prevent its tendency to return to it, and its continual reſiſting and weakening this external force, till at laſt it overpowers it, and then moves to the place, where its natural inclination carries it. Heavy bodies, thrown from the earth, which fall again when the impulſe which carries them becomes of leſs force than their own internal gravity, are made uſe of by the Philoſophers for an example to explain this doctrine. We may therefore compare the reformation of manners to the impulſe that carries a ſtone upwards. The paſſions, naturally implanted in mankind, continually oppoſe the practice of a ſevere morality, and are a gravity that will bring men quickly down to their primitive condition, ſhould any fit of zeal or reformation ſhoot them up towards Heaven.

(81) See Varillas's Hiſtory of Charles IX. Tom. i. pag. m. 163. ad ann. 1562.

(82) Compare this with citat. (13) of the article ALESIUS.

(83) Gourds for example.

(84) Creſcit occulto velut arbor ævo. Horat. Od. XII, lib. i.

(85) This is according to the doctrine of the ſchool-Philoſophers.

Naturam expellas furca tamen uſque recurret (86).

Strive to expel ſtrong nature, 'tis in vain,
With doubled force ſhe will return again,
And conquering riſe above the proud diſdain.

(86) Horat. Epiſt. X, lib. I, ver. 24.

From whence we muſt conclude, that the innovation, introduced into Chriſtianity, by eſtabliſhing the worſhip to the Virgin three or four hundred years more or leſs, after the aſcenſion of JESUS CHRIST (87), has been countenanced by the natural and mechanical diſpoſitions of mankind, ſince it has made a continual and prodigious progreſs, and ſtill ſubſiſts at this very time in all the full vigour it ever obtained. There is no conceiving that if it had not met with very great diſpoſitions in the human paſſions, it could have made ſuch progreſs, deſtitute as it was of all ſupport from Scripture and authentic tradition. This has moved ſome curious wits to enquire what thoſe natural modifications of the ſoul of man might be, which have favoured the innovations here ſpoken of; and this is the reſult of their enquiries.

(87) See Mr Baſnage's Hiſtory of the Church. book xviii, chap. xi.

CONJECTURES upon the cauſes of the progreſs of the worſhip of the holy Virgin.

In the affair of religion, there is nothing which better ſuits with the groſs genius of the people, than repreſenting Heaven to them as reſembling the earth. This was the reaſon, that the fancies and caprices of the Poets, concerning the marriage of the gods, their councils, their diviſions and intrigues, paſſed ſo eaſily upon the Greeks, and afterwards upon the Romans, for articles of faith. It was impoſſible to raiſe man to the gods; and therefore they were to be brought down to man; and thus was formed the point of contact and center of union. Had it been ſaid, that GOD governed the world by ſimple acts of his will; and that he was alone in Heaven: this would not have ſatisfied the imagination of the people, who have no example of ſuch a thing. But if you tell them, that a GOD aſſiſted with ſeveral other Divinities governs the world, that the court of Heaven is pompous and magnificent, that every one there has his poſt, and does not ſuffer another to encroach upon his employ, they will eaſily believe you; becauſe the mind of man is accuſtomed to the like ideas borrowed from what they daily ſee in the government of the ſtates, and the courts of great kings. Such courts are not without females: we there find a queen-mother, and a reigning queen whoſe authority is ſometimes equal to that of the king. Thus the people eaſily believed what was told them of Cybele and Juno; and becauſe amongſt men the power of a queen-dowager is generally leſs than that of the reigning queen; hence the worſhip of Cybele, mother of the gods, was eſteemed inferior to that of Juno, ſiſter and wife of Jupiter. This wife of Jupiter had abundance of temples under different titles (88). It is no wonder, ſince ſhe was conſidered as the queen of the world, and as a queen who intereſted herſelf in the government: and beſides it is the cuſtom to pay our reſpects to the ladies, with greater care and ceremony, than to men of equal quality (89).

(88) See Pauſania in the Index under the word Juno.

(89) See remark [M] of the article JUNO.

By ſuch prejudices as theſe the Chriſtians have been eaſily perſuaded, without any example, or command, or permiſſion of Scripture, without any authority of the tradition of the firſt ages, that the ſaints in heaven are continually employed as mediators betwixt GOD and man. We find in the courts of princes, and proportionally in thoſe of governors, and intendants, that nothing is done without the recommendation of a favourite, either of a ſecretary of ſtate, or a ſteward of the houſhold, or a lady in waiting, &c. We ſee innumerable inſtances of thoſe miſcarrying who neglect theſe interceſſors, and venture to apply directly to the head (90), and it is of abſolute neceſſity to make choice of ſome ſubaltern patrons. Nothing has contributed more than this to eſtabliſh the cuſtom of worſhipping the ſaints: all the arguments of a Proteſtant controverſiſt will hardly have the ſame weight with an Huguenot, as with a courtier; and in general all thoſe who are a little acquainted with the way of the world, will be affected with the parallel they hear made by their pariſh-prieſt betwixt the mediation of ſaints, and the recommendation of a great prince's officers. Popular notions do very well ſuit with a celeſtial court, where the angels, apoſtles, and martyrs, are perpetually employed in recommending terreſtrial affairs to GOD, in ſolliciting the diſpatch of a decree, and putting him in mind of this and that, as is uſually practiſed in the courts of princes.

(90) See the remark [E] of the article DASSOUCI.

But whilſt you only ſtock Heaven with ſaints and angels, maſculine ſollicitors and mediators, you do not compleat the popular ideas. Theſe require a queen as well as a king (91): a court without women is ſomething abſurd, and ſhocks the natural taſte with it's irregularities. Conſequently it was natural that the people ſhould applaud the new invention of a mother of JESUS CHRIST, eſtabliſhed in Heaven the queen of men and angels, and of all nature. This hypotheſis filled up the chaſm which was before apparent in the celeſtial court, and corrected all it's irregularity. From hence it muſt follow, that the peoples devotion would immediately flame out for this almighty and moſt merciful queen. It is a general and reaſonable pre-poſſeſſion, that women are more diſpoſed to charitable actions than men. They are incomparably more officious towards the poor, the ſick, and the priſoners; and if there be any favour to be begged, as the life of a deſerter, they are the perſons who ſollicit, and take upon them to ſoften thoſe in whoſe power it is to ſave him. A more certain ſucceſs was therefore to be expected from the invocation of the holy Virgin, than from any other. We need not wonder that the honours paid to her, exceed thoſe which the Heathens paid to Juno: for the dignity of queen-mother and reigning queen did not center in the perſon of Juno; and beſides ſhe was looked upon as proud, moroſe, and revengeful: whereas the holy Virgin was at once queen-mother and queen-conſort, free from all faults, and abounding with unſpeakable goodneſs. It is very well known, that courtiers grow cold and become diſcouraged when a queen has too much pride, and is too prone to puniſh. This is the

(91) Finally, a court without l dies is a court without a cou to ſpeak truth Brantome Eloge of Francis I, Tom. i, of the Memoirs of th French Captain pag. m. 281, 2

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Faculty of Paris, who has indeed said many things of that kind, amongst others, that Nestorius, in his declaration, published before the council of Ephesus, gives a good sense to what he had advanced in his sermons. But that I take no notice that all these things have been the reason that Juno could not have so many adorers, as she would have had, upon the persuasion of her being a goddess, purely beneficent. My reader already imagines with what zeal the people contributed to build chapels and altars to the holy Virgin, and to offer her jewels and ornaments of all sorts; for, according to the vulgar notions, these are things that please women, and this is the way that leads to their favour. Let us now take a view of a new device, which those liberalities and offerings have given rise to.

The monks and parish-priests perceiving that the devotion to the holy Virgin brought in a great revenue to their cloysters and churches; and that it increased in proportion, as the people were more strongly persuaded of the authority and goodness of this queen of the world, laboured with all their industry to enlarge the notion of this power and inclination to do good. The preachers made use of all the hyperboles and figures that Rhetoric could furnish. The legendaries made a collection of all sorts of miracles: the Poets engaged in the design; and annual prizes (92) were established, for those who made the finest poems in praise of the mother of GOD. What was at first an oratorical sally, or a poetical rapture, became afterwards an aphorism of devotion. The Divinity professors laid hold on these subjects, and were not the least concerned in corrupting them. It became a custom in all desperate diseases, and all other dangers which seemed inevitable, of making vows to our lady of such or such a place, as also when they desired children, or any other blessing. It happens every where, both amongst Infidels and Christians, that some patients, given over by their Physicians, recover from their distempers against all probability, and others by unforeseen incidents avoid misfortunes which were thought to be unavoidable. We see in all countries of the world, that women, who have been barren many years, at last conceive. The vows I am speaking of are a wonderful artifice; for if they effect not a deliverance, there are a thousand evasions; as that they were not made with a faith sufficiently fervent, &c. There is no register kept of those ill successes, and people are not allowed to attend to them. If the sick person recovers, if barren women happen to be with child, &c. this is attributed to the vow: the list of miracles is enlarged with it in the new edition; offerings are multiplied, and devotion spreads farther and farther. We have lately learned from the Gazettes, that the king of Spain, who was at the very point of death, towards the end of September 1700, escaped this danger; and because, amongst other objects of devotion, there was brought to him an image of our lady of Beelen, which has but very lately been in vogue, his recovery was ascribed to the efficacy of this image. If he had not relapsed some weeks after, and died the first of November following, this Notre-Dame had acquired a reputation that would have eclipsed the rest; for the preachers would have set off this miracle with all the circumstances which the conjuncture of public affairs might have furnished in abundance. These gentlemen have been the great promoters of this worship: it was they, I suppose, who first advanced, that JESUS CHRIST had reserved judgment to himself, and had left to his mother the whole distribution of graces: a sure method to bring over to the Virgin all the acts of the most tender devotion. This maxim is no longer a meer flight of a Rhetorician, grown warm in his pulpit; it is got into the books which are put into the hands of the votaries (93). Is any thing more likely to strengthen the worship of the holy Virgin, than to affirm that GOD gives her an infinite number of signed blanks, that she may distribute as she pleases the things that appertain to GOD (94). The world therefore is indebted to her for salvation and all other good things, and not to GOD; since it is she who chooses the persons, and puts them down with what gratification she thinks fit, in the void space of the grant. You will find an infinite number of such thoughts in the book I cite (95). The Heathens did not deal thus with Jupiter: they said that in regard to punishment he acted by the advice of the other gods; but that he consulted none of them in the case of benefits and rewards (96). This is a conduct which wise men have recommended to monarchs; and we see that worldly kings are the immediate authors of a pardon, but they appoint judges for the condemnation of criminals. Ἐγὼ δὲ φημι. ἀνδρὶ ἀρχοντι τὸ μὲν ἀναγκης δεόμενον, ἄλλοις προσακτέον εἶναι κολάζειν. τὸ δὲ τὰ ἄθλα ἀποδιδόναι, δι' αὐτοῦ ποιητέον. Censeo itaque viro principi sic agendum, ut si quis eget coactione, hunc aliis puniendum tradat: cæterum cum præmia reddenda sunt his qui rem bene gesserunt, id per seipsum faciat (97). When we call to mind, that the devotion to the Virgin is a fruitful source of gain to the churches and convents, we shall easily discover the reason that has occasioned a division so different from this, betwixt JESUS CHRIST and his holy mother, with respect to warrants of justice, and patents of grace (98). Nothing is more proper than this to make the holy Virgin the principal, and almost the sole, object of prayers and vows, and pilgrimages, and even of love and of gratitude, and of all the internal acts of piety. Let us once more consider the court of princes, the grand model of most religions. There are some princes who suffer themselves to be so engrossed by a favourite, that they bestow no place but upon his recommendation. Present a petition to them yourself; particularize all your services; humbly beg, but as a just recompence, the government of a town, and they will refuse it you. Let but the favourite speak for you the next day, and they will grant it you immediately. When things are reduced to this state in a court, much more pains are taken to gain the good graces of the favourite, than those of the monarch; and there is a good deal of reason for this conduct, prudence enjoins it. Nay I will go farther yet, and maintain, that both reason and justice require, that such as have obtained the government of a town, by the method I have been mentioning, should think themselves obliged for it not to the prince, their master, but to his favourite, and should reserve all their gratitude and friendship for the favourite as the true cause of their promotion. The prince is only a remote and indirect cause, an accidental, indefinite, and general, cause. He is the fountain of authority, but it is another who determines it, and applies it to the benefit and advantage of such and such persons. By this parallel you see, that, according to the hypothesis of those doctors, who say, that no favours are bestowed upon earth, but at the nomination and recommendation of the holy Virgin, it is to her, and not to GOD, that each private man owes his good fortune, and that it is for her and not for GOD he ought to have a suitable degree of love and gratitude. He could obtain nothing of GOD, if the Virgin did not interest herself in it: consequently it is she who ought to be the object of his devotion: this is founded on good sense, and the reasons of it are demonstrative (99). Is it to be wondered at after this, that the acts of religion have taken in the Romish church that turn which we find they have? Is not this a true discovery of their foundation? However it be, the worship of the holy Virgin is grown to such a prodigious height, and maintains itself to so great a degree, that the Jansenists, who would be offering their opinion upon this subject, have gained nothing by it: and for one man who conforms to their limitations, there are two thousand, literally speaking who follow, Father Crasset (100). Consider, I pray the obstacles, met with in the Sorbonne, when the book of a Spanish nun was censured there (101). The most proper means to put a stop to the mischief, would be to lay an interdict on panegyrics, and to oblige the votaries, who desire to testify their gratitude by their liberalities, to send them not to the Virgin's chapels, but to the hospitals. A preacher is not ignorant that his auditors have been often present at the panegyrics of our lady, and have read the finest sermons that have been published upon that subject. If therefore he would be heard and admired, he must take a new flight, and soar higher than all those who went before him; and this is a great cause of errors. The principal thing would be to forbid, under the pain of Simony, all those who

(92) There are some at Rouen, Caen, &c.

(93) See Mr Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, lib. xviii, cap. xi. pag. 1082; and Mr Arnauld, Objections proposed to Steyaert, Part 1, pag. 60.

(94) The Jesuit Giattini has said this in a sermon. See Mr Du Pin-court's reply to the bishop of Belley, pag. 374.

(95) See Mr Du Pin-court, ibid.

(96) See Seneca Nat. Quæst. lib. ii, cap. 42, 43. See the remark [K] of the article PERICLES.

(97) Xenophon in Hierone, pag. m. 584.

(98) Note, that it is pretended that the holy Virgin not only distributes all graces, but frequently diverts the acts of the justice of God; and thus she possesses her own dominion entire, and besides extends her authority to that which Jesus Christ has reserved to himself.

(99) Note, that a prince, who gives at the recommendation of a favourite, what he would refuse without this to a gentleman, does not give it to the gentleman, but to the favourite; therefore the gentleman's acknowment must be to the favourite and the prince has no pretensions but to the favourite's gratitude.

(100) I make use of this example, because the Jesuit Crasset is one of those who have most highly condemned the author of the Virgin's wholesome Advice to her indiscreet Votaries. See Mr Jurieu in his Preservative, pag. 108, & seq. and Mr Arnauld, in his Reflexions upon that Preservative, pag. 19.

(101) See the article AGREDA.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

been condemned in Mr du Pin, and that he himself has retracted them. I shall make an Observation hereupon [O]. It will not be improper to relate what a minister of Paris alledged against a bishop who seemed to accuse the Protestants of renewing the heresy of Nestorius [P], with respect to the epithet of Mother of GOD.

who serve privileged altars, and who preside over the worship, to receive so much as the value of a penny from any votary. This would be the way to dry up the sources of the legendaries, and preachers, and of pretended miracles: but is not this an impracticable method? Hoc Opus, hic labor est.

[O] I will make an observation upon a note of Father Doucin.] When I composed the article of Nestorius, I knew in general that Mr du Pin had been brought into trouble, among other reasons, for some things he had said concerning this heresiarch: but I knew nothing in particular, either concerning the propositions which had been condemned, or the recantations he had been forced to make. I scarce know any thing farther at present; all the informations I have met with are only from the note of Father Doucin. However, I shall say, that to destroy the consequences of this doctor of the Sorbonne's testimony, it is not sufficient to alledge his retractation; for there are some persons who retract for fear of being oppressed; and there are others who do so from their having been dazzled with some sort of reasonings, which are yet of less weight than the proofs of their first opinion. Upon supposition, that Mr du Pin has changed his opinion, it remains to be enquired, whether it was, from his having examined the controversy of Nestorianism, that he was convinced by internal proofs, of his being mistaken; or whether it was from his knowing in general, that Nestorius was condemned by a general council, that he thought it the duty of a good Roman Catholic to acquiesce in that, without giving any encouragement to dangerous and pernicious distinctions of fact and of right. In this last case, his retractation does not prevent his first opinion from being of some weight in favour of Nestorius: for we may conclude from it, that so able a Divine, who had examined the subject, must have been convinced by internal proofs, I mean proofs as the process affords, that he had been some such way misunderstood: but I confess, that this does not form so strong an objection as what Father Doucin relates, concerning the complaints of the antient disciples of Nestorius. They maintain, 'that the dispute betwixt this prelate and St Cyril, was only a 'dispute about words, and that the explication he 'gave to his first sermons was conformable to what 'we at present believe .... nay farther, they pro- 'duced several of his writings; in which he com- 'plains, that his propositions * have been mutilated 'and falsified; that essential words have been suppres- 'sed, and others addded which were none of his own; 'that a sense has been foisted in quite contrary to his 'own; and that by these detestable artifices Celestin, 'and others, that is, the Fathers of Ephesus, were sur- 'prized; that he makes no scruple to give Mary the 'title of Mother of GOD, provided it be not taken 'only in the sense of Arius and Apollinarius. † What 'Nestorius had said, was constantly repeated by Hella- 'dius, Theodoret, Ibas, Irenæus, and others; that 'a thousand falshoods had been fathered on Nestorius; 'that neither he, nor any one that they knew, had 'ever divided Christ, or acknowledged more than 'one only SON of GOD; that the term, ‡ hypostatic 'union, had indeed been rejected as unknown to the an- 'tients, and as signifying a necessary and purely na- 'tural union betwixt the two natures; but that St Cy- 'ril himself had yielded to the force of his reasons, 'by suppressing this term, when the peace of the 'church was treated of (102).' It is certain, that to dis-engage Cyril from the burden this lays upon him we must have recourse to the infallibility of councils as to the determinations of matters of fact. See the observations that Father Doucin has advanced to maintain it, and to refute the distinctions of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal.

* Synodic. cap. vi.

† Synodic. cap. iii, iv.

‡ Oriental. Object. ad Cyril. Anathem. 3.

(102) Doucin, Hist. du Nestorianisme, pag. 552.

[P] A minister of Paris answered a bishop who seemed to accuse the Protestants of renewing the heresy of Nestorius, with regard to the epithet of Mother of GOD.] These are the words of Mr le Camus, bishop of Belley, addressing himself to Mr Drelincourt: 'You must 'give me leave, by the by, to tell you, that I never 'met with the term Mother of GOD, in your writers; 'that you yourself, who seem more favourable to this 'Divine Mother, studiously avoid it, as a rock; and 'that in the conferences and conversations I have had 'for thirty years with those of your confession, 'I have found such an aversion to this title, that 'they never make use of it; insomuch, that some of 'them being pressed, have denied it not without 'warmth; as if the Mother of CHRIST, and the 'Mother of GOD were two different things, and that 'CHRIST was not GOD; which shocks and strikes 'the foundation of the hypostatic union, and the 'communication of idioms: you may consider of it, 'if you please (103),' Mr Drelincourt answered (104), 1. That the belief of the Reformed churches is perfectly conformable to that of the antient church, with respect to the two natures of JESUS CHRIST in the unity of person: 2. That, tho' this term, Mother of GOD, is not to be found in Scripture; the thing signified by it, is there very clearly expressed (105): 3. That above ten years ago he had printed a little book, concerning the honour due to the holy and blessed Virgin; in which treatise are these words, We make no scruple to say with the antients, that the Virgin Mary is the Mother of GOD (106): 4. That the bishop of Belley having read this book, and yet nevertheless expressing himself in the manner he has done, has published a thing, the contrary whereof is an evident truth (107): 5. That none of the Protestant doctrines could be impugned by this title of Mother of GOD; and that no man well instructed in their religion will refuse to give it to the Virgin Mary (108). 6. 'That if this title of Mother of GOD, 'is not to be met with so frequently in our authors, 'as that of Mother of JESUS, it is not that they are 'so ignorant as to imagine that these are two different 'things, or two expressions which have not the same 'signification; or that they are so impious as not to 'believe, that JESUS CHRIST is GOD. But they 'use this method with religious prudence. They con- 'sider that, GOD be thanked, this kingdom is not 'afflicted with the Nestorian pest: and that there is no 'need at present of seeking precautions against an er- 'ror which is abolished. But that there are some per- 'sons who deify the Virgin Mary, and make her a 'goddess: and that it is to be feared, that the things 'which are in themselves most true, most holy, and 'and innocent, may help to encourage them in their 'error (109).' Finally, that minister makes this declaration: I protest before GOD, and his holy angels, that I firmly believe the holy Virgin to be the Mother of GOD: and that I am ready to sign this truth with my own blood. Nevertheless, I declare, with the greatest freedom, that, for fear of scandalizing ignorant persons, I do not delight to make use of these terms, without explaining them at the same time. For all are not capable of understanding what your and our schools mean by the communication of idioms. Instead of attributing to the person what belongs to the two natures, whether by mistake or gross ignorance, they ascribe to one of the natures what only agrees to the other. When they hear that the Virgin is the mother of GOD, they do not presently comprehend that she is not his mother, as he is GOD: but by a confused notion they imagine she is as properly the mother of his Divinity, as of his humanity. I have met with some of your communion, who conceive this title, Mother of GOD, in the grossest manner that can be imagined (110).

This will serve to confirm what has been insinuated in the remark [A], concerning Nestorius's fear, that this epithet, of Mother of GOD, should be abused; and manifest at the same time the circumspections of the ministers, as well as their reasons.

(103) Le Camus, bishop of Belley, Answer to Drelincourt pag. 83.

(104) Drelincourt, Reply to the bishop of Belley's Answer, pag. 292.

(105) Id. ib. pag. 293.

(106) Id. ib. pag. 294.

(107) Ib. p. 295.

(108) Ib. p. 296.

(109) Drelinc. pag. 297.

(110) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEVERS (JOHN OF BURGUNDY COUNT OF) in the XVth century, was very ill treated by the laſt duke of Burgundy, though he had the honour to be his relation [A]. This duke obliged him to renounce the duchies of Brabant and Limbourg, and the lands beyond the Meuſe, by a forced contract the twenty-ſecond of March 1465 (a). He degraded him alſo from the order of the Golden Fleece [B]. This count died at Nevers the twenty-fifth of September 1491 (b), at ſeventy-ſix years of age (c). He was born at Clameci the twenty-fifth of October 1415 (d). He came to inherit the county of Eu deſcended to him from his maternal uncle (e) in the year 1472 (f). He was thrice married, and left only two legitimate daughters, and three natural ſons (g) [C].

(a) Labbe, Tableaux Généal. pag. 263. Anſelme, Hiſtory of the Royal Family, pag. 218.

(b) Fabert, Hiſtory of the Dukes of Burgundy, Tom. i, pag. 155.

(c) Labbe, Tableaux Généal. pag. 263.

(d) Anſelme, ubi ſupra. (e) Charles of Artois, brother to Bonne of Artois, the mother of this count de Nevers. (f) Anſelme, ibid. (g) Labbe, ibid. pag. 264.

[A] He was very ill treated by the laſt duke of Burgundy . . . his relation.] He was the ſon of Philip of Burgundy, count de Nevers, de Rethel, and d'Etampes, who was killed at the battle of Azincourt in 1415, and whoſe father was Philip the Hardy, duke of Burgundy, the ſon of king John. This Philip, count of Nevers, married, for his ſecond wife, the daughter of the count of Artois; by whom he had two ſons, Charles, and John (1). The former died without legitimate poſterity, the latter is the ſubject of this article. It is eaſy to perceive the degree of his relation to Charles the laſt duke of Burgundy, when we remember that Philip the Hardy, duke of Burgundy, was great-grandfather to this Charles.

(1) Taken from Pontus Heuterus, lib. vi, Rerum Burgundicarum. See alſo Father Labbe, in his Tableaux Généalogiques, pag. 262.

[B] . . . . he degraded him alſo from the order of the Golden Fleece.] Peter Matthieu will preſently acquaint us with this important fact. Philip de Crevecœur lord of Eſquerdes, ſays he (2), received the collar of the Golden Fleece, in the firſt ſolemnity of the order that the duke Charles performed at Bruges after the death of his father, when the count of Nevers was degraded with greater indignity than might reaſonably have been expected, with regard to his family, from a prince, his near relation. His marginal note is more particular than the text; it is this: 'Duke Charles of Burgundy renewed the order of the Fleece the ſeventh, eighth, and ninth of May at Bruges, and cauſed the place to be painted black, where the arms of the count de Nevers were to be placed, with theſe words, which are to be found in a manuſcript chronicle in the king's library. The count de Nevers, being ſummoned by the letters-patents of the moſt high and moſt excellent prince, and my redoubted lord the duke, ſealed with the ſeal of his order of the Fleece, to appear in perſon in the preſent chapter, there to anſwer upon his honour, concerning a caſe of Magic, and for abuſing the holy ſacraments of his church, has not preſented himſelf, nor appeared; but has made default. And to avoid the proceſs and ſentence of privation of the order from paſſing againſt him, has ſent back the collar; and for this cauſe has been, and is declared, expelled the order, and not invited to the offering.' A modern Hiſtorian (3) affirms, that Philip the Good being diſpleaſed to find our count of Nevers in the party of Charles VII, king of France, cauſed him to be razed out of the order of the Fleece. Note, that this count was made a knight in the ninth chapter held at the Hague the twelfth of May 1456; and that the firſt chapter held by duke Charles, was the eleventh (4). It was held at Bruges in 1468 (5).

(2) Peter Matthieu, Hiſt. of Lewis XI, book xi, pag. m. 750.

(3) Fabert, Hiſt. of the Dukes of Burgundy, Tom. i, pag. 155.

(4) Gollut, Memoirs of Franche Comté, pag. 738.

(5) Id. ib. pag. 740.

[C] He was thrice married, and left only two legitimate daughters, and three natural ſons.] I. In the year 1435, he married Jacqueline d'Ailli, the daughter of Raoul, Vidame of Amiens, and lord of Pequigny, by whom he had one daughter, who was the wife of John duke of Cleves. II. In 1475, he married Paula de Bretagne, the daughter of John de Broſſe count de Penthieure, by whom he had one daughter, who was married to John d'Albret, Sire d'Orval. III. In 1480 he married Francis d'Albret, the daughter of Arnauld-Amanjeu Sire d'Orval (6), and ſiſter to this John (7). She had no children.

(6) Taken from Father Labbe, in his Tableaux Généal. pag. 263; and from Father Anſelme, pag. 218, & ſeq.

(7) Pontus Heuterus, ubi ſupra.

NEUFGERMAIN (LEWIS DE) a French Poet, a little crack-brained, to ſay no worſe of him, lived in the reign of Lewis XIII. He was a laughing-ſtock to the duke of Orleans, cardinal Richelieu, and the wits of that time. He ſtiled himſelf Heteroclite Poet to Monſeigneur only brother to his majeſty [A]. His darling method was to make verſes that ended with the ſyllablles of the names of thoſe whom he celebrated. This was a rack which forced him to ſet down a thouſand impertinencies, and ſuch ridiculous nonſenſe, that we need not wonder it ſhould be thought a diverſion to propoſe ſuch names to him as might gave him ſome exerciſe. I do not know however whether he might not be made uſe of to intermix ſome ſatirical touches amongſt his praiſes, I mean that ſome abler wits might ſometimes aſſiſt in the compoſition of his verſes. This conjecture ſeems to be probable with regard to thoſe he made for Mr Godeau and Mr Conrart. The one was neither of a mien nor perſon at all advantageous; the other did not underſtand Latin: it looks therefore as if there was ſomething of ſatire in their elogium, and as if an abler maſter than Neufgermain had a hand in it. I leave my readers to judge of it. They will find below the verſes I have been ſpeaking of [B]. There are hardly any among the works of Voiture, more ingenious than thoſe which

[A] He ſtiled himſelf Heteroclite Poet to Monſeigneur.] Let no one imagine that the wits, who by his means diverted the duke of Orleans, cardinal Richelieu, &c. gave him this title without his accepting it: it is certain he took it very ſeriouſly, and made it one of his titles in the front of his works. And, indeed, theſe are the words of the licence which he obtained of the king for the impreſſion of his poems in 1637. Our well-beloved Lewis de Neufgermain, hath repreſented unto Us his deſire of publiſhing a ſecond impreſſion of the firſt part, and alſo the ſecond part of a book, intituled, The Poems and Jokes of the Sieur de Neufgermain, Heteroclite Poet to our moſt dear and only brother the duke of Orleans; but being afraid that others ſhould print it, which might turn to his prejudice, requeſting our letters-patent to this purpoſe: for theſe cauſes, we being willing to gratify the ſaid Neufgermain, have permitted, and do permit him, &c.

[B] They will find below the verſes I ſpeak of.] We will firſt ſet down thoſe he made for Mr Conrart. He calls him Conrat; whether it was that the pronunciation of the Pariſians (1) made him miſtake the orthography of this name; or that the ſyllable rat ſeemed more favourable to him than that of rart.

(1) That is, of ſeveral Pariſians.

To Monſieur CONRAT.

The ſyllables of the name ending the verſes.

Ainſi que l'on parloit des rats de Taraſcon,
Quelqu'un me dit, tout mont peut engendrer un rat;
A quoy je reſpondis, excepté Helicon,
Car il eſt ſacro-ſainct, autre que Monferat (2),
Et c'eſt ſur Helicon que fut nourry Conrat.

(2) It ſhould be Monferrat. See, above, remark [D], of the article MARCA.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which he compoſed to ridicule this heteroclite Poet [C]. Neufgermain's anſwer ſhews that he was quite diſabled [D]: the blow had ſtunned him. He never was ſo little maſter of what he ſaid as upon this occaſion.

Il ſçait parler latin, il ſçait parler gaſcon,
Grave, ſententieux, diſert, nunquam errat,
Juſques-là qu'il vainquit diſputant dans Macon
Un Docteur Maconnois, & l'envoya au grat (3)
Chercher ſon Calepin pour ſe prendre à Conrat.
S'il ne harangue en chaire, il harangue en Balcon;
Zelateur de vertu, contraire au ſcelerat,
Puis boit l'eau d'Hipocrene à plein broc ou flacon,
Aux vivans & defunct, fuſt-ce au grand-Amurat,
Ayant ſoif & ſans ſoif, cet excellent Conrat.
Il ſçait de quel genre eſt dans Deſpautere Icon,
Seigner, tater le poux, appliquer le cerat:
Si quelque belle il voit, il dit, ô bon bocon!
Ses beautez admirant, & ſon bel apparat,
Puis de ſes beaux diſcours les charme ce Conrat.
Plus qu'Orphée puiſſant, il peut ſans Lexicon
Arreſter de propos le ſoleil, dum migrat,
L'Aigle volant en l'air, le Duc & le Faucon,
Par terre le Lion, & l'eſcumant Verrat,
Baleines prendre en mer par ſes accens Conrat.
Dans un livre il fait voir qu'au pris d'un patacon
Les teſtes des proſcripts mit le Triomvirat:
Et comme il les joüoit à la chance & tricon,
Recompenſant celuy qui hæc attulerat,
Tant eſt ſcientieux & rare ce Conrat (4).

(3) Furetiere, at the word Grat, tells us, that envoier au grat (ſend to the grat), ſignifies to give a rebuff, to drive away, to ſend about one's buſineſs.

(4) Neufgermain, Part ii, of his Poëſies & Rencontres, pag. 102, 103.

Let us proceed to thoſe he made for Mr Godeau. I am perſuaded it will not be taken amiſs that I relate theſe two examples: for it was neceſſary to ſet down ſome, ſince otherwiſe in foreign countries ſcarce any one could have a juſt idea of the character of this heteroclite Poet.

To MONSIEUR GODEAU,
The ſyllables of the name ending the verſes.

La belle & gentille Margo,
Trouvée n'aguere au bord d'eau
Puiſſant, puiſa un eſcargo,
Dont elle fit ſi bon chaudeau,
Qu'il n'en reſta point à Godeau.
Dedans ſon lict en ſon gogo,
Encourtinée d'un rideau,
Remuans la gigue, ou gigo,
Chantoit un air en go, en d'eau,
En faveur de Monſieur Godeau.
Luy ſeul à trouvé le mugo
D'éloquence, proſe, & rondeau;
Car plus charmant qu'un Larigo,
Meinte fere marche en bedeau;
Portant maſſes devant Godeau.
Venus luy donna ſon mago,
Atlas luy offrit ſon fardeau,
Diane, Taïol & Rago,
Et le beau Phebus, ce blondeau,
Donna ſes chevaux (5) à Godeau.
D'un nom ſi divin, origo
Eſt, que liée d'un cordeau,
Diſoit un pie, ou margo,
Got eo, ſive God eo *,
Voyant marcher Monſieur Godeau.
Ses feſtins conſtent un lingo,
En Nectar, lapin, betoudeau,
Puis qu'enſemble à tirlarigo,
Boivent, mangeans le fexandeau,
Apollon, Minerve, & Godeau (6).

(5) Probably an error of the preſs inſtead of chevaux.

* Incedo Deus.

(6) Neufgermain, ibid. pag. 125, 126.

[C] Thoſe which Voiture compoſed to ridicule this heteroclite Poet.] He wrote, 1. A ballad in favour of Neufgermain's works. 2. An anſwer to the complaints (7) of the conſonants, which have not the honour to enter into Neufgermain's name. 3. A requeſt to Monſieur de Puylaurens in the name of Neufgermain. 4. Some verſes in the way of Neufgermain to Monſieur d'Avaux, the letters of the name ending the verſes. All theſe pieces are full of wit: the anſwer to the complaint of the conſonants was compoſed in the name of Jupiter. It is an excellent piece; and yet Mr de Girac found ſome faults in it, which Mr Coſtar could hardly apologize for with all his ſubtilties and collections.

(7) It is amongſt Voiture's poems. Mr Patris was the author of it.

[D] Neufgermain's anſwer ſhews that he quite diſabled.] Mr de Girac, amongſt other things, criticized, as a falſhood, what Jupiter affirmed concerning the vowels, that they were all of them in Neufgermain's name. This cannot be true, but by ſuppoſing the true ſpelling to be Nœufgermain. You will ſee preſently what ſtrange nonſenſe this heteroclite Poet built upon this fault of Voiture: ' (8) Take it which way you ' will, Mr de Voiture is ſtill to blame; for if he did ' not uſe an o in the word Neufgermain, he is out ' in his reckoning, ſince there wants a vowel; and ' if he did, he deſerves correction, ſince it ought not ' to be there, as Neufgermain himſelf urges againſt ' him.

(8) Girac, Anſwer to the Defence of Voiture's Works, §. xxvi, pag. 196.

Il bâtit en l'air des chaſteaux,
Par diphtongue il fait mots nouveaux;
Par oe de Nœufgermaniſe,
Et brouillant un nom glorieux
Bedelneufgermicopſautiſe (9).
Au mépris des hommes & Dieux.
Qui deut monſtrer qu'en ce beau nom
Toutes voyelles ſont ſi non
O, qui par ſa forme Spherique
Environnant cét Univers,
Rend le caractere d'Afrique
Confrere de celuy d'Anvers.

(9) Note, that in the Anſwer to the Complaint of the Conſonants, Jupiter declares, that this Poet's name ought to be Bedelneufgermicopſaut.

NEVIZAN (JOHN), an Italian Civilian, a native of Aſti, was diſciple of Francis Curtius, profeſſor in the Univerſity of Padua (a). He publiſhed among other works a treatiſe intituled, Sylva Nuptialis [A], in which he diſcovered an inclination to ſhew his parts

(a) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. cap. cliv.

[A] He publiſhed .... a Treatiſe, intituled, Sylva Nuptialis.] Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris, was ſo obliging as to write me word that he has a Gothic edition of this work, printed at Paris by Kerver in the year 1521: that it cannot therefore be true, that Nevizan finiſhed it in the year 1522, as we are aſſured by Mr. Simon (1), who compoſed a little Bibliotheque of Civilians; that the title of this Paris edition contains what follows; ' Sylva nuptialis, bonis ' referta non modicis, nunc te lector obnixe rogat ut ' ſe aſpicias, deinde quod ſcriptum eſt legas, & proti- ' nus viſis opuſculi annotamentis, cum indice alpha- ' betico contentorum narrativo, lætaberis gaudio maxi- ' mo .... The matrimonial collection, being completely furniſhed with choice materials, now earneſtly recommends itſelf to the reader's view, aſſuring him that if he will take the trouble to peruſe it with the annotations and alphabetical index of the contents, he will ſoon find it a moſt agreeable diverſion;' that the author has collected all that is ſaid for and againſt women; that there are a great many original things in this book; that the author ſays, that GOD became man, and pardoned mankind, only becauſe the holy Virgin was handſome. Imo Deus optimus maximus ob pulchræ & decoræ filiæ Jeruſalem immaculatam virginitatem generi humano ſibi infeſto pepercit & homo factus eſt; that for this the counſels of Romanus are cited, with the page, line, and word; that theſe words are alſo to be found in it: ' Si mulieri non ſatisfit de ve- ' ſtibus & carnibus, ipſa ſatisfacit de cornibus; .... ' If a woman is not ſatisfied in her carnal dues, and in fine cloaths, ſhe will ſoon ſatisfy herſelf by dignifying her huſband with horns;' that God, if we believe Nevizan, did not caſt all the bad angels into Hell, but

(1) Counſellor in the prefidial court of Beauvais. See the 15th Journal of the Learned 1693, pag. m. 246; and 1695, pag. 270.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google parts on subjects of wit and humour, and also a stock of learning seasoned with diverting curiosities. He interwove with it large collections of slanders against the fair sex. Some say that the ladies of Piedmont, did not take it as a jest, and that they revenged themselves upon him very cruelly [B]. He was never married, but he kept a mistress, and had a son sent some of them into womens bodies to make men mad. This compilation, adds Mr. Marais, abounds with such things as these.

I do not believe the Paris edition in 1521 to be the first (§ a), and I wonder that Gesner and his continuators have been so negligent with respect to the Sylva Nuptialis. They mention no edition nor any particulars concerning it; and yet it has been looked on as a most curious book, and several editions have been made of it. I have that of Lyons, apud Antonium de Harsy 1572 in 8*vo* (§ β). The whole title runs thus: Sylvæ Nuptialis libri sex, in quibus ex dictis Moder. materia matrimonii, dotium, filiationis, adulterii, originis, successionis, & monitorialium plenissimè discutitur: una cum remediis ad sedandum factiones Guelphorum & Gibelinorum. Item modus judicandi & exequendi jussa principum. Ad hæc, de authoritatibus doctorum, privilegiisque miserabilium personarum. Quæ omnia ex quæstione, an nubendum sit, vel non, desumpta sunt. Joanne Nevizano Astensi, Jurisconsulto clarissimo, authore. Omnia multò quàm antehac castigatiora: indice etiam locupletissimo, ac argumentis in singulos libros additis, auctiora reddita. The first thing we meet with after the title, is a letter of the Civilian Achilles Alionus to the author: it was written in 1522, and begins thus: ' Habuisti aliquot ante annos (2), Johannes Nevizane ' vir clarissime, tuis genialibus atque ingenialibus nup- ' tiis, in amœniflua illa tua Sylva, frequentes quot- ' quot palatum habent interioris hominis, literariis pa- ' bulis, ac versatili libri gerulæque mensæ addictum, ' atque eductum. Qui, postquam absumpta fames, & ' amor compressus edendi, ita ad unum hilaritus tibi ' applausere, ut Alcinoi Phæacum regis epulum à ' Smyrneo Marone illustratum, & Didonis convivium, ' à Nostrate Melesigene celebratum, longo postposue- ' rint intervallo. - - - - Most learned Nevizan, you have had for constant readers of your matrimonial and anti- matrimonial lucubrations in your diverting Sylva, all who have any taste for a learned diet, and a table furnished out with variety, and yet portable about one in an agreeable book. And these after satisfying their appetite, and making a plentiful repast, have, to a man, applauded your entertainment with so much pleasure, as to prefer it very far before the feast of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, sung by the Smyrnean Maro, or that of Dido celebrated by our Latin Homer.' This letter informs us, that Nevizan had made several additions, which he resolved not to publish. Alionus advised him to change his resolution, and to give, as soon as possible, this new entertainment to curious readers; and assures him, that Gabriel de Laude, chancellor to the duke of Savoy, will be his patron, and drive into outer darkness, as not having the wedding-garment, all those, who shall shew their dislike of such a work. ' Est jam fama constans, te prioribus nuptiis ampliores ' ac longè ornatiores (si consummatis atque absolutis ' rebus accessio fieri potest) superconcinnasse: te tamen ' inaudito consilio atque insolenti ad eas neminem ad- ' missurum. . . . . Is (Gabriel Laudensis) tibi assertor ' ac vindex comparatus, si quem viderit tuis accuban- ' tem nuptiis, ex his quibus ob stomachi morositatem, ' etiam odoratissima pigmenta putere solent; tanquam ' non habentem indumentum nuptiale, in tenebras de- ' trudet exteriores. Et tunc te vel rigidi legant Catones. ' - - - - There is a strong report that you have very much enlarged and adorned your former edition of the Sylva ' Nuptialis, if it be possible to add any thing to so compleat a work, and yet that by an unheard of and unprecedented determination you will communicate it to no body. . . . . He (Gabriel de Laude) will patronize and protect the impression, and if he find any readers of it, who, by the badness of their taste, are used to find fault with the nicest dainties, he will cast them into utter darkness, as wanting a nuptial garment. And then the most rigid Cato's may read you without offence.' After this letter of Alionus comes the epistle dedicatory of the author to the chancellor of Savoy. We there find that Nevizan had resisted the pressing sollicitations of his friends, and refused them the publication of his supplements, and amongst other reasons which induced him to suppress them, this was none of the least, that by the ill reports which were spread concerning his book, a great many ladies (3) had been set against him. However he suffered himself to be prevailed on by Alionus's civilities. We shall recite the beginning of this epistle dedicatory; it may serve to let us into the history of the book: ' Petierunt à me, Cancellarie ' illustris, & propè quotidianis conviciis efflagitarunt ' plerique, ut lucubrationes & suppletiones quas ad ' Sylvam meam otiosiori studio gloméravi, in publi- ' cum ederem. Ingenuè fateor, repugnavi semper: ' adeo ut contra meos mores quibusdam sim visus ni- ' mis austerus. Non quòd me præteriret opus ipsum ' mutilum esse & mancum, quandoquidem impresso- ' rum incuria repentinè adeò emerserit, quòd fecit a- ' bortum: etsi aliqui, in Sylvam ne ligna feras, quia ' copiosa videretur, assererent. Ego tamen illam in- ' trospiciens cogebar dicere, quàm pauper Achaia no- ' stra est. Sed differebam, quia otium non daretur, &c. ' - - - - I have been almost daily teized, and clamoured at, most illustrious Chancellor, by a great many persons to publish the supplemental lucubrations I have had the leizure to compose for my Sylva. I confess ingenuously I have always put them off, insomuch that some may think me disobliging, contrary to my natural disposition. Not that I am ignorant that the work itself is very defective and incomplete, which the hastiness of the press, and the suddeness of the edition, has been the occasion of: though some have asserted that my wood was so compleatly furnished, as to admit of no more sticks. However, I am forced to own, when I look into it my self, that my store is too scanty of materials. But I have delayed complying for want of leisure, &c.' Of six books the work is composed of, the two first run upon the thesis, That we ought not to marry; and the two following upon the thesis, That we ought to marry. And therefore it cannot be said, that the author condemns marriage; he only relates the arguments pro and con.

[(§ a) I am of the same opinion with Mr Bayle, that the edition of the Sylva Nuptialis in 1521, was not the first, but not having met with one more antient, what I can say to the matter is, that if there be an older, it can go no farther backward at most than the year 1517, since in lib. i. num. 202, of this work, the author quotes from the Civilian afflictus or de afflictis, a form of summons dated the 17th of February in that year. Besides, it is not very certain, as Mr Simon, counsellor in the presidial of Beauvais pretends, that the Sylva Nuptialis in VI books, such as we now have it, was completed in 1522, since in lib. iv. num. 147, it appears that the author was then only upon the revision of that place of his work, some time after Christmas 1522, the day of the taking of Rhodes. Lastly, one remark to be made on this book, and which I had forgot, is that the errors of the press, so numerous in the new editions, among which is included that of 1545, are owing to the Printers mistaking the abbreviations of the Gothic editions. For example, lib. iv. num. 33. pag. 281, of the edition of Lyons 1545, the epitaph of the famous courtezan Imperia runs: Impiæ meretricis - - - - - - Impia cognata, in the room of imperiæ meretricis - - - - imperia Cortisana, as this place has been corrected, Tom. i. pag. 108, of the new Menagiana of the Paris edition. It is visible that so gross a mistake arises from the mistaking the abbreviations of this passage in the Gothic way of expressing it in former editions. REM. CRIT.]

[(§ β) My edition, which is of Lyons of the same year also in 8*vo* has: apud Bartholomæum Vincentium, which is an evident proof that these two Booksellers undertook it at their common expence. REM. CRIT.]

[B] Some say that the ladies of Piedmont . . . revenged themselves upon him very cruelly.] I have read this only in a work of Francis de Billon. It is a book that was printed at Paris in 1555, and intituled, The impregnable fortress of the honour of the female sex: we find in it these words (4): ' To return to my prisoners, the second ' is one Mr John Nevizan, (a Civilian, as it is ' said, but ill advised) who in the city of Turin, some ' years ago, discovered himself so mad as to meditate an ' attack, afterwards put in execution by him in a Latin book,

(2) This proves that Nevizan's book was printed some years before 1521.

(3) Accedebat quorundam finistra ad mulieres relatio, qui de bono opere & in commendationem matrimonii, excuso me, nonnullas earum concitasset. Nevizan. Epist. Dedicat. I do not correct the faults of the edition I make use of.

(4) Billon, Impregnable Fortress, fol. 27, verso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſon by her, who was an advocate, and was deprived of all his eſtate [C], and to aggravate his misfortune, from his extreme poverty fell into madneſs. John Nevizan died in 1540. He had taken care to marry his miſtreſs (b).

(b) Taken from Panzirol. ubi ſupra, cap. clv.

' book, upon the honour of the fair ſex, herein vin-
' dicated, and eſpecially upon that of the Piedmonteze
' ladies, which book was intituled, The foreſt of mar- ' riage, intirely filled with matters of ſcandal. Which ' book, being found by the ladies of Turin to be a ' defamatory libel; its author (here a priſoner) was ' immediately ſeized, and by them ſhamefully driven ' away by ſtones. It is true, ſome time after he ' obtained his return from exile, by means of ſub-
' miſſion, and the honorable Amende which he made
' them on his knees. Theſe two Latin verſes being fix' ed on his forehead, for an apparent ſign of penance.'

Ruſticus eſt verè qui turpia dicit de muliere,
Nam ſcimus verè, quod omnes ſumus de muliere.

Who rails at women is a very clown,
For our deſcent from them we all muſt own.

' This Latin rhyme ought not to be thought ridicu' lous; for tho' it was not made upon one who was
' very prudent, yet it was at leaſt made by a man,
' who in regard to his great chaſtity was capable of
' an angelical mind; conſidering that after the affair
' beforementioned, he could never meet with a wo-
' man (though ever ſo old) who would make his bed
' for him; and the noiſe of it is not yet ceaſed in the ' country. Thus good Mr John received his juſt re' ward; for having taken the pains to ſlander the ' ladies.'

(5) Bonis omnibus ſpoliatus ad extremam inopiam ac demum infaniam pervenit. Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. lib. ii, cap. clv, pag. m. 332.

[C] He had a ſon .... who was deprived of all his eſtate (5).] Panzirolus informs me of this, as alſo that Nevizan had a great ſuit with Paul Viſca; that he died whilſt it was depending, and made the count de Montafia his heir. I doubt not but he was related to this count; for his mother was the daughter of Godfrey, lord of Montafia (6).

(6) Joannes Nevizanus Aſtenſis avum maternum habuit Gofredum Montafiæ dominum. Ibid. He cites Nevizan, lib. iv. Sylvæ Nuptial. num. 111.

NEWTON (ADAM) author of the Latin tranſlation of the Hiſtory of the council of Trent, compoſed by Father Paul, was a Scotchman. He taught the firſt claſs in the college of St Maixant in Poitou under the reign of Henry III, and then pretended to be a Catholic. He returned into his own country, and was preceptor to prince Henry the eldeſt ſon of James I, king of Great Britain. He died dean of Saliſbury (a).

(a) Taken from the Funeral Oration of Andrew Rivet, compoſed by John Henry Dauber.

NICAISE in Latin Nicaſius (CLAUDIUS), a native of Dijon, was very well known among the learned of the XVII century. He died in the month of October 1701, aged ſeventy-eight years. Thoſe who would be acquainted with ſome particulars of his life, his good qualities, and his writings, need only read the Journal de Trevoux (a), and the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (b).

(a) For the months of Jan. and Febr. 1702, pag. 40, Edit. Amſterd.

(b) For April 1702, pag. 471, Octob. 1703, Art. I, II.

NICOLLE (PETER), one of the fineſt pens in Europe, was born at Chartres in 1625. His family had been conſiderable there for a long time [A]. He adhered to the party of the Janſeniſts, and wrote ſeveral books in concert with Mr Arnauld (a), whoſe faithful companion he was in the ten or twelve laſt years of his retirement (b). It was he who tranſlated Mr Paſcal's Provincial Letters into Latin, and added to them a commentary [B]. He

(a) See the book intituled, A Curious Queſtion, whether Mr Arnauld be an Heretic, pag. 150, & ſeq. Edit. 1695.

(b) Ibid.

[A] His family hath been conſiderable there.] I prove it by the teſtimony of Mr. Deviſé. I mention not, ſays he (1), the family of the Nicoles. Every body will tell you it is very antient at Chartres, and has furniſhed magiſtrates there for above two hundred years. At preſent its worthy head is lieutenant-general of that town. A little before he had been ſpeaking of Mr Nicolle the father of him who is the ſubject of this article, and this is what he ſays of him (2). I am to tell you of the death of ' Mr Nicole, whom the city of Char-
' tres had choſen for its advocate. The men of let' ters will have a conſiderable loſs of him. Though
' he was of a very great age, he maintained the high
' reputation, his eloquent pieces had acquired him,
' with as great conſtancy as politeneſs. He had pro-
' cured himſelf the eſteem of many perſons of the no-
' bleſt extraction. He complimented in the name of ' the city their royal highneſſes, when they paſſed
' through Chartres, and always with an univerſal ap-
' plauſe. He was the father of the illuſtrious Mr
' Nicole, known to all the world for his learned and
' pious works, which he has publiſhed within theſe
' thirty years; among others for his Perpetuity of the ' Faith, and lately for his Moral Eſſays.'

(1) Deviſé, Mercure Galant, for October 1678, pag. 22, Edit. of Holland.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 20.

[B] It was he who tranſlated Mr Paſcal's Provincial Letters into Latin, and added to them a commentary.] We ſhould ſay, Letters to a Provincial, and not Provincial Letters, if we choſe rather to conform to exactneſs, than to the caprice of cuſtom. But laying aſide Grammar, let us ſay hiſtorically, that Mr Nicolle, under the falſe name of Gullielmus Wendrockius, is the author of the Latin tranſlation of Mr Paſcal's letters againſt the Jeſuits; to which he ſubjoined a commentary. The doctor of the Sorbonne, who publiſhed the Préjugez légitimes contre le Janſeniſme in 1686 (3), did not know the time in which Mr Nicolle had publiſhed this verſion. This ignorance would have done him no injury, had he not grounded the reaſons of his conduct upon it: but making that uſe of it, he has been taken to taſk a little ſeverely. We will relate his words, and thoſe of his adverſary: ' Theſe gentlemen have ' newly compiled in their Vendcrokius, all their moſt
' ſubtile and enſnaring writings in defence of Janſeni-
' us; they have put them into Latin, and publiſhed
' them through all Europe, without fear of diſturbing
' that profound peace, for which they pretend to be ' great zealots, when they are written againſt. It is ' therefore juſt, that the children of light ſhould not
' ſuffer themſelves to be excelled in wiſdom by the ' children of darkneſs: they would doubtleſs be charge-
' able with a moſt criminal negligence, if they had
' leſs zeal for the defence of truth, than the enemies
' of the church have for the defence of errors (4).' Mr Arnaud anſwered him as follows; If our Savoyard doctor had himſelf read the book, of which probably he ſpeaks only from ſome wretched memoir that has been given him, he would have known that the author does not call himſelf Vendcrokius, but Wendrockius; that it is not a compilation of what was moſt ſubtilly written in defence of Janſenius, but a Latin tranſlation of the Provincial Letters, with notes and diſſertations, wherein the greateſt principles of Chriſtian morality are explained, not only in an eloquent, but alſo in an edifying and ſolid manner: and that this book having been written and publiſhed above ten years before the peace, nothing is more ridiculous, than to ſuppoſe it to be NEWLY that theſe gentlemen have compiled and publiſhed it thro' all Europe, without any fear of diſturbing the peace: as if there was any danger of troubling the peace ten years before it was made. Nevertheleſs he triumphs, after ſo many falſhoods and impertinences, and draws this abuſive concluſion. It is therefore juſt that the children of light ſhould not ſuffer themſelves to be excelled in wiſdom by the children of darkneſs: They would doubtleſs be chargeable with a moſt criminal negligence, if they had leſs zeal for the defence of truth than the enemies of the church have for the defence of error. We leave it to thoſe who have read Wendrock, and the Savoyard doctor,

(3) See the News from the Republic of Letters, June 1686, Art. III.

(4) Préjugez légitimes contre le Janſeniſme, Preſ. pag. ††6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He did not follow Mr Arnauld when he left the kingdom in 1679, and he even consented, as it is said, to an accommodation with the Jesuits; which consisted in engaging to do nothing against them, but not to break with his old friends. One of his finest works is that intituled Moral Essays. What he wrote against the Protestants is very subtile; never were the objections against schism nor the difficulties of the method of enquiry urged with greater force: but many wise men are of opinion, that he had better have suppressed than published this; for besides that the Romish church is no gainer by it, since all the arguments of Mr Nicolle are retorted against her; his works, together with the answers made to them, may unhappily confirm in their evil dispositions all those who have a bias towards Scepticism [C], and who consider not with sufficient attention the doctor, to give each of them the place they shall think in their conscience belongs to them, amongst the children of light, or amongst the children of darkness . . . . What is certain, is, that the Savoyard doctor reckoning it a piece of prudence and zeal to have writ since the peace, without concerning himself whether he disturbed it or not, it is most false that he could be induced to this sort of prudence, by the example of Wendrock, who wrote a long time before the peace (5). Father Honoratus Fabri, a famous Jesuit, answered this work of Mr Nicolle: His answer was printed under the fictitious name of Bernardus Stubrockius (6). He inserted it afterwards entire in a book intituled, R. P. Honorati Fabri Societatis Jesu Theologi Apologeticus Doctrinæ moralis ejusdem Societatis (7). This work of Strubrock was put into the index; and, what is very strange, that of Wendrock was not, though the Jesuits had endeavoured to get it put in, and the Provincial Letters had been put into it. This occasioned a Jansenist to say, that they were only put into the index, because they were in French, and without the name of the author, &c. These are his words (8): 'The general applause that 'was, and is still given to the Provincial Letters, and 'the fruit the church has reaped from them, no body, 'before that author, having so well discovered the 'pernicious degeneracy of the modern Casuists, are a 'just reason to believe they were only put into the ca'talogue of prohibited books, because they came out 'without the author's name, without approbation, or 'the place of the impression; or else because, being 'in the vulgar tongue, it was feared they might give 'occasion to the people to lessen their esteem for a 'celebrated society; and not because there was any 'bad doctrine or calumny to be found in them. It is 'plain that this must be so, since the same letters hav'ing been translated into Latin by William Wendrock, 'with notes, which justify the citations, though this 'book had been brought to the Inquisition at the same 'time with the Apology of the Casuists, as Father Fabri 'witnesseth in his Notæ in Notas, promising himself 'that Wendrock's book should not escape the censure: 'Nullus dubito, (said he, speaking to Wendrock) quin 'tuus in Catalogum Librorum prohibitorum referendus sit: 'I do not doubt but your book will be soon in the 'catalogue of those that are prohibited: Yet he was 'found to be a false prophet, Wendrock's book hav'ing not been censured, whilst that Jesuit's Notæ in 'Notas were.' They confess in the new answer made to the Provincial Letters, that Wendrock's book met with wonderful success. These letters, after the tenth, were not meer attacks; for Pascal was obliged to put himself on the defensive, because the Jesuits pretended to have convicted the Port-Royal of a great many impostures, about which it had not been honourable to be altogether silent. Mr Nicolle, under the name of Wendrock, came some time after to his assistance; or rather he was let loose by the party to compleat the rout of the Jesuits. He discharged that task with a high hand in the Latin commentaries which he added to his translation of the Provincial Letters: In which he treats the Jesuits as wretched creatures. All this succeeded beyond what could be expected (9).

[C] His works . . . . may confirm . . . . those who have a bias towards Scepticism.] I have in view here only two works of Mr Nicolle: one is intituled, Well-grounded prejudices against the Calvinists (10); and the other, The pretended Reformed convicted of Schism (11). In the first I have an eye only to the fourteenth chapter, where the author pretends to shew, That the way proposed by the Calvinists to instruct men in the truth, is ridiculous and impracticable. He says there is no man who can reasonably be instructed this way, without being certain; 1. Whether the Scripture passages, alledged to him, are taken from a canonical book. 2. Whether they agree with the original. 3. Whether there are not several ways of reading them which weaken their authority. After this Mr Nicolle plays all the engines of his Rhetoric, to shew in particular the difficulties that are to be met with in the examination of these three points. He urges this much further in the other book, in which he pretends that they who left the Romish communion in the XVIth century, could not do it without extreme rashness, unless they had an exact knowledge of the reasons for and against it; and in general of all the objections which might be formed upon the passages of Scripture produced on both sides. He shews what it was their duty to do, in order to acquire a well-grounded certainty that they ought to leave the Romish church, and come over to the Protestants: and he introduces so many examinations into the enquiry which ought to lead to such a certainty, that every one of his readers must perceive, that among ten thousand persons, it would be hardly possible to find four capable of discharging this duty. What fruit has he reaped from so many meditations? An advantage which terminates in his own person; he has acquired the reputation of a subtile disputant, and of a Philosophical Divine, who is able to maintain any cause, let it be what it will, and to carry difficulties as far as they can possibly go. But he has done no service to his party: For Mr Claude, who has answered his first book, and Mr Jurieu, who has answered the second, have evidently demonstrated that a man is exposed to all the same difficulties in the Romish communion: and that, over and above all this, he must launch into the ocean of tradition, and run through all the ages of the church, the whole history of the councils, and also that of the dispute concerning the Pope's authority, inferior to councils, according to some, and superior to them, according to others: So that the way of authority, according to which the Roman Catholics profess to direct their steps, is the high road to Scepticism. A man who would be justly assured that he ought to submit to the authority of the church, is obliged to know, whether the Scripture will have it so. Behold him therefore exposed to all the examinations of Mr Nicolle (12). And he ought farther yet to know whether the doctrine of the Fathers, and of all the several ages of Christianity, is agreeable to the submission he would have. He must be strangely indefatigable, if he should not choose rather to doubt of every thing, than to engage in so many enquiries; and he must be very subtile, if after he has taken all the pains which this requires, he should at last discover the light. This is therefore the way to Scepticism (13). Mr Claude's answer to Mr Nicolle, intituled, A defence of the reformation (14), is a masterpiece. He has not only retorted very handsomely his adversary's objections, but has also directly cleared them up in such a manner as to edify pious souls, without furnishing the Libertines with arguments to insult religion. A great many persons would be glad we could say as much of Mr Nicolle's other adversary: but this cannot be done without gross flattery. He has not contented himself with teaching the Jews how to convict of extreme rashness those of their ancestors, who embraced the Gospel, and finally declared the synagogue to be no longer a true religion (15). He has hammered out for us I know not what ridiculous distinction of an enquiry of examination, and an inquiry of attention (16), as absurd at least as that of formal quantity in order to itself, and actual quantity in order to place; Quantitas formalis in ordine ad se, & quantitas actualis in ordine ad locum, with which the Romish schools ring: and he has granted that the Faithful do not embrace Orthodoxy, by evident proofs, but by proofs of sentiment, and that they discern truth by taste, and not by distinct ideas. This dispute has been carried

(5) Phantome, ou Jansenisme, ubi supra, pag. 4, &c. This book was printed in 1656.

(6) See the 4th Denunciation of the Philosophical Sun, at the end of the preface.

(7) Ib. p. 22.

(8) Difficulties proposed to Mr Steyaert, Part 2, pag. 40, 41.

(9) Answer to the Provincial Letters, or Dialogues between Cliander and Eudoxus, pag. 21, edit. Dutch Edit. 1696.

(10) Printed at Paris in 1671, and in Holland in 1683.

(11) Printed at Paris in 1684, and reprinted in Holland in the same year. See the News from the Republic of Letters, Nov. 1684, Art. I.

(12) See the same News, &c. ubi supra, pag. 888.

(13) Mr Turretin, the son, maintained some fine theses at Leyden, Author & respondens, in 1692, intituled, Pyrrhonismus Pontificius, five Theses Theologico-Historicæ de variationibus Pontificiorum circa Ecclesiæ infallibilitatem. See also Mr de la Placette's book, de Insanabili Romanæ Ecclesiæ Scepticismo. Printed at Amsterdam in 1696, in 4*to. The Leipsic Journalists give the extract of it in their month of June*, 1697, pag. 264, & seq. It was printed in English at London, in 1688.

(14) It was printed at Roüen in 1673, and in Holland in 1682.

(15) See the book of Mr Jurieu, intituled, The True System of the Church, printed at Dort in 1686, chap. xiii, book ii, pag. 333, & seq.

(16) Ibid. chap. xxii, pag. 402.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the ſpirit and character of the Chriſtian religion. His treatiſe concerning the Unity of the Church carried on: on the one hand Mr Peliſſon (17), and the author of the commentary on thoſe words, Compel them to come in, and Mr Papin (18) have written books to ſhew further and further the inſurmountable difficulties of the way of examination; and on the other ſide, ſome miniſters have made ſevere complaints againſt the anſwer to Mr Nicolle with regard to the foundation of faith. The author of this anſwer, inſtead of retracting or flinching in the leaſt, has explained himſelf a new with greater preciſeneſs. He has lately wrote a great book to maintain not only that the proofs of the Divinity of the Scripture are not evidently propoſed by the ſpirit of GOD, who converts us; and that it is not evident that GOD reveals ſuch and ſuch a myſtery in his word; but alſo that thoſe who lay the foundations of faith upon the evidence of teſtimony, teach a pernicious and moſt dangerous doctrine (19). There are a great many perſons of opinion, that this is bringing religion to the brink of a precipice, and that if the Celſus's and Porphyry's had found it in ſuch a ſituation, had they been to engage with Chriſtian doctors, who would have made them ſuch advances and conceſſions, it could never have been maintained againſt ſuch powerful enemies one quarter of an hour. I do not think them in the right, or that they have ſufficiently conſidered the nature of Chriſtianity. I do not know however what might be the conſequence of this diſpute between the two miniſters of Rotterdam and Utrecht: but it ſeems to me, that if we were now living in a time of a criſis, and at a conjuncture attended with a fermentation of humours, which have produced ſo many effects in divers ages, we ſhould have great changes to apprehend: Deus omen avertat (20).

There are ſome perſons perhaps who could wiſh the doctrine of the miniſter of Rotterdam were embraced by all doctors. They imagine that after this there would be no more diſputing, and that this would prove the true grave of controverſies: for as we do not diſpute concerning taſte, we ſhould not diſpute concerning religion, when all Divines ſhould reduce the analyſis of faith to taſte. I believe, one would ſay, I am in poſſeſſion of truth, becauſe I have the taſte and perception of it; and I alſo do the ſame, would another ſay. I do not pretend, would one ſay, to convince you by evident reaſons, I know you are able to elude all my proofs: nor I neither, would another ſay. My conſcience is convinced, would the latter ſay, it taſtes a thouſand comforts, tho' my underſtanding is not clearſighted in theſe matters: and it is the ſame with me, would the former ſay. I am perſuaded, would the firſt add, that the internal operation of the ſpirit of GOD, has led me to Orthodoxy; and ſo am I, would the ſecond affirm. Let us then diſpute no more, let us perſecute one another no more, would be their mutual reſolution. If I propoſe any objections which you cannot anſwer, I have no reaſon to hope to convert you: for ſince you do not pretend that evidence is the character of Theological truths, the obſcurity of your reaſons, and the weakneſs of your arguments will never ſeem to you a mark of falſhood. It would be in vain therefore for me to reduce you to ſilence. Your taſte would ſerve you in the room of a demonſtration; juſt the ſame thing as in the article of eatables, we truſt more to our palates, and the good effects they have upon our health, than to the ſpeculative arguments of a Cook or a Phyſician; though we are not able give any reaſon why theſe meats either pleaſe or ſtrengthen us. Let us therefore agree on all ſides not to diſturb one another, and let us content ourſelves with praying to GOD one for another. Behold the fruit that would ſpring from this doctrine, as ſome pretend, who call to mind a maxim of St Auſtin; which is, that the diſtinguiſhing truth and falſhood, being a very difficult thing, we ought not to be violent againſt thoſe that err. ' Illi in vos ' ſæviant, ſays he (21) to the Manichees, qui neſciunt ' cum quo labore verum inveniatur, & quàm diffi- ' cile caveantur errores. Illi in vos ſæviant, qui neſ- ' ciunt quàm rarum & arduum ſit, carnalia phantaſ- ' mata piæ mentis ſerenitate ſuperare. Illi in vos ſæ- ' viant, qui neſciunt cum quanta difficultate ſanetur o- ' culus interioris hominis, ut poſſit intueri ſolem ſuum ' .... Illi in vos ſæviant, qui neſciunt quibus ſuſ- ' piriis & gemitibus fiat, ut ex quantulacumque parte ' poſſit intelligi Deus. - - - - Let them perſecute you, ' who know not with what labour truth is to be diſco- ' vered, and with what difficulty error is to be avoided. ' Let them perſecute you, who know not how rare and ' difficult it is to overcome the imaginations of the fleſh, ' by the ſerenity of a pious mind. Let them perſecute you, ' who know not how very hard it is to clear up the blind ' eyes of the inward man, ſo as to enable them to ſee their ' proper ſun. .... Let them perſecute you, who know ' not with how many ſighs and groans, and in how very ' imperfect a manner God is to be underſtood.' This, I ſay, is the fruit which this doctrine might produce, if we believe ſome perſons; Sed non ego credulus illis: but I am in ſome doubt of it, when I conſider that the miniſter of Utrecht (22), whoſe opinion is that the Scripture contains an evident teſtimony of our myſteries, does not approve of the perſecution of Heretics; and, on the contrary, his adverſary, whoſe opinion is that we can alledge no good proofs (23) either of the Divinity of the Scripture to Infidels, or of the teſtimony of our myſteries to the Socinians, does highly approve of the magiſtrates perſecuting Heretics (24). What contradictions are theſe! we muſt depend upon nothing, at the ſame time that we ſuppoſe men will act according to their principles, and build their whole ſyſtem in conſequence of them. My meaning is not that the miniſter of Utrecht reaſons ill, in joining theſe two propoſitions together; one that there is in the Scripture, an evidence of teſtimony for ſuch as GOD enlightens, the other, that civil puniſhments ought not to be inflicted upon thoſe who do not believe the myſteries of the Trinity, Incarnation, &c. I fix the charge of inconſiſtency only upon his adverſary. It is manifeſt: for he who acknowledges, on one hand, that we can have no good proofs (25), that GOD clearly reveals the exiſtence of his myſteries in his word, muſt be very much in the wrong to pretend, that a man who does not believe them, deſerves to forfeit his eſtate, liberty, and country: for he has the lights of reaſon on his ſide, and you cannot deny but he acts reaſonably in refuſing to renounce this light, unleſs it appears to be evidently contradicted by the teſtimony of GOD. He is ready to ſacrifice his moſt diſtinct ideas, as ſoon as it ſhall clearly appear that the authority of GOD requires it. You own yourſelf incapable of making this appear to him; and confeſs that grace indeed may perſuade him it is ſo, but not diſcover it to him evidently. All therefore that reaſon and charity require of you is to pray to GOD for him (26); and by the ways of ſober inſtruction, to let him ſee that there is a greater degree of probability in your opinions, than in his own, If you cannot ſucceed this way let him enjoy his eſtate and country, and do not attempt to arm the ſecular power againſt him. Theſe are natural and clear conſequences, and yet the miniſter I am ſpeaking of ſeparates them from their premiſſes: ſo incomparably is he for the ſpirit of contradiction. For, to mention it by the by, was ever any thing more fantaſtical than to raiſe ſuch out-cries as he did againſt the Philoſophical commentator, and afterwards to adopt the whole foundation of his ſyſtem? it might be eaſily ſhewn, that his hypotheſes are the moſt proper that could be thought of to confirm thoſe of the Commentator (27): but this would carry me too far from Mr Nicolle; to whom I return.

Let it not be ſaid, that this author has ſufficiently gained his point, ſince his books have bred ſuch diſputes amongſt the miniſters of Holland. This is a chimerical advantage with regard to his communion; and has cauſed a real miſchief to Chriſtianity, in general by raiſing controverſies which demonſtrate, that neither by the way of authority, nor by that of examination (28), can a man chuſe his opinion with the ſatisfaction of aſſuring himſelf that he hath made a good uſe of his reaſon: for this good uſe conſiſts in ſuſpending his judgment, till the evidence of proofs ſhall preſent itſelf. Philoſophical minds would think it a great reproach to them eaſily to acquieſce in the belief of truths that ſhould be but obſcurely propoſed to them. They would not forgive themſelves for having paſſed a right judgment in a cauſe, before a ſevere examination of all the pleas of the contending parties. They give the contemptible term of opiniators to ſuch as engage on one ſide, without being as it were forced to it, by indiſputable arguments. They maintain, that this can produce nothing but a falſe ſcience, and they ſay, ' that ignorance is very much preferable ' to this falſe ſcience; which makes a man imagine ' he

(17) In his Reflexions on the Differences of Religion. See the News from the Republic of Letters, July 1686, Art. I.

(18) A miniſter who turned Papiſt; ſee his book intituled, The Toleration of Proteſtants, and the Authority of the Church. Mr de Beauval ſpeaks of it in the Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, Jan. 1693, Art. VII.

(19) See the book of Mr Jurieu, intituled, The Defence of the Univerſal Doctrine of the Church .... againſt the Imputations and Objections of Mr Saurin, printed at Rotterdam 1695. Mr Saurin is miniſter of the Walloon church at Utrecht.

HOPES of certain perſons that religious diſputes and perſecutions would ceaſe, if, &c.

(20) I ſpoke thus in the firſt edition of this work, when this diſpute was not yet ended; but at the time of the ſecond edition, that is, in December 1700, I cannot ſay that it is no more now talked of than the controverſies of Flaccianiſm, which have been forgotten above theſe hundred years.

(21) Auguſtin. contra Epiſt. fundam. cap. ii.

(22) Mr Saurin.

(23) By good proofs are meant ſuch as lead to evidence.

(24) See his treatiſe concerning the Rights of two Sovereigns; and his eighth letter of the Peſture of Socinianiſm.

(25) See, above, citation (23).

(26) See the preface to the Supplement of the Philoſophical Commentary, where it is ſhewn, that the obſcurity of controverſies is an invincible argument for Toleration. See alſo the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, Jan. 1693, pag. 209, & ſeq.

(27) The commentator has ſhewn in the preface to the fourth part, that with reſpect to the rights of an erring conſcience, Mr Jurieu, thinking to confute him, has confuted himſelf: this might be extended to other articles.

(28) His adverſary has renounced the method of examination, and his pretence to evident arguments.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Church ſhews a maſterly hand, and yet he has not attacked his adverſary in the weakeſt parts [D]: which is a manifeſt proof that with all his penetration he did not diſcover them. He died at Paris the ſixteenth of November 1695, a few days after his treatiſe of the Quietiſts was publiſhed. He was a great proficient in polite learning. The Delectus Epigrammatum, which has been ſeveral times printed, and the learned preface accompanying

' he knows what he does not know. For, as St Auſtin ' has moſt judiciouſly obſerved, in the book concern- ' ing the uſefulneſs of belief, this diſpoſition of mind ' is very blameable for two reaſons: one is, that he ' who is falſely perſuaded he knows the truth, there- ' by renders himſelf incapable of deſiring to be taught ' it, the other is, that this preſumption and raſhneſs ' is a ſure ſign of an untoward mind. Opinari, duas ' ob res turpiſſimum eſt: quod diſcere non poteſt qui ſibi ' jam ſe ſcire perſuaſit: & per ſe ipſa temeritas non be- ' ne affecti animi ſignum eſt. For the word opinari, ' in the purity of the Latin tongue, ſignifies that diſ- ' poſition of mind, which too lightly aſſents to un- ' certain things, and ſo thinks it knows what it does ' not know; for which reaſon all the Philoſophers main- ' tained, ſapientem nihil opinari. - - - That a wiſe man ' believed nothing haſtily; and Cicero blaming himſelf ' for this fault, ſaid, he was magnus opinator (29).' ' one greatly given to credulity.' Not only the Philoſo- phers, but all the world in general muſt acknowlege this maxim, that to avoid the imputation of raſhneſs, it is not ſufficient to ſpeak truth; but a man ought alſo to know that he ſpeaks truth. He who ſhould affirm, that the number of the ſands of the ſea is even, might ſpeak truth; but he could not avoid being certainly chargeable with raſhneſs (30). Thus the book of Mr Nicolle, has ſerved only to confirm the irreſolution of men that are indifferent, and to furniſh new pretences to the Sceptics in religion. We might ſay perhaps of the firſt work that appeared upon theſe ſubjects, what the Antients ſaid of the firſt ſhip: would to God the tree that ſerved to build it were ſtill ſtanding! Cicero applies, that thought to reaſon: ' O utinam igitur, ut ' illa anus optat,

- - - - ne in nemore Pelio ſecuribus
Cæſa cecidiſſet abiegna ad terram trabes:

' ſic iſtam calliditatem hominibus dii ne dediſſent! ' qua perpauci bene utuntur; qui tamen ipſi ſæpe à ' male utentibus opprimuntur: innumerabiles autem ' improbe utuntur (31). - - - - We might juſtly wiſh, ' as the old woman did,

O that ſafe in the Pelian wood,
The fatal maſt might ſtill have ſtood.

' That GOD had never given to men this ſubtilty, ' which few uſe as they ought, and even thoſe liable to ' be impoſed upon by others who make an ill uſe of it, ' and who are infinitely the greater number.' But as things have two faces, there is ſome reaſon to hope, that well-turned minds will make an advantage of ſo unlucky a controverſy. They will learn to keep within due bounds, Des Cartes's maxim concerning the ſuſpenſion of our judgment (32). They will learn to diſtruſt natural light, and to have recourſe to the conduct of the ſpirit of GOD, ſince our reaſon is ſo imperfect. They will diſcover the neceſſity of adhering to the doctrine of grace, and how much GOD is pleaſed with our humility, ſince he had been willing to mortify us even in the poſſeſſion of his truths; having denied us the knowledge of them by the ways of a philoſophical enquiry, by which we arrive to the certain knowledge of ſome things.

[D] He has not attacked his adverſary in the weakeſt parts.] Mr Nicolle publiſhed a book in 1687, intituled, Of the Unity of the Church, or the refutation of Mr Jurieu's New Syſtem (33) In this he diſplayed his learning, wit, and eloquence; and, like an able man, took advantage of every thing he could find fault with in the particular opinions of the author of the New Syſtem: but he did not think fit to examine the powerful objections of this miniſter againſt the way of authority. This looks a little like artifice. It might be imagined that a leſs able writer had overlooked the importance of theſe objections, and had deſpiſed them from an ill-grounded pride. But ſuch a judgment as this could not be paſſed on Mr Nicolle; his underſtanding was too exact and penetrating not to comprehend the full extent of the objections which had been propoſed to him upon this article, whether by retortion or directly. It muſt be ſaid, therefore that his ſilence proceeded only from his being conſcious he ſhould ſink under the burden, if he undertook to anſwer them; he very well knew that theſe were inſuperable difficulties, and that his own reputation, and the intereſt of his church required he ſhould take no notice of them. From whence we may conclude, that there are every where a great many perſons who believe not all they make profeſſion of, or who remain perſuaded that their religion is good, tho' they are conſcious that upon ſome certain capital points their adverſaries objections are unanſwerable (34). However it be, Mr Nicolle did not anſwer the whole ſyſtem of Mr Jurieu. He made choice of ſuch parts as ſeemed eaſy to be refuted (35), and confined his views to theſe, excepting ſome objections which could not be ſeparated from them, and which by conſequence he was obliged to anſwer. It is not therefore to be wondered at that he ſhould obtain ſuch an advantage, and that his antagoniſt could not deprive him of it by his reply (36). But it muſt be thought a little ſtrange, that he ſhould not be aware of the greateſt fault in the book he refuted.

The deſign of this work was to prove, that the Proteſtants did not deſerve to be called Schiſmatics, and yet it is directly calculated to prove the contrary: for we are neceſſarily led to this by author's principles, viz. that the church of Rome did always belong to the true church. So that this author, in building his ſyſtem, has himſelf deſtroyed the end for which he built it. What could be a greater fault? Nor did he ſtop there, but laid down ſome aphoriſms and maxims, from which he drew certain conſequences manifeſtly proving that ſalvation may be obtained in all religions. This was a ſecond eſſential and capital fault, which Mr Nicolle did not perceive. See the book intituled Janua Cælorum reſerata cunctis religionibus (37). You will there find the demonſtration of what I have been juſt now ſaying, concerning the faults of this ſyſtem. The miniſters who have informed the ſynods againſt Mr Jurieu's falſe doctrine, have not forgotten to complain of ſome errors they found in his ſyſtem of the church (38), but they overlooked the principal of them: for example, they have taken no notice of this propoſition. God cannot permit great ſocieties of Chriſtians to be involved in mortal errors, and to continue long in them; at leaſt, if we judge of things by experience, we ought not to believe this poſſible, ſince it has never yet happened (39). This is overturning with one daſh of a pen, the whole fabric of Luther and Calvin: for ſince it is certain that all the doctrines of the Romiſh communion, with regard to which they thought it neceſſary to eſtabliſh the Reformation, have ſubſiſted for many ages; it evidently follows, that they are not mortal errors. Now they ought not to have ſeparated from that church, if none of it's errors were mortal. Larebonius (40) has proved this very largely. To ſee then the faults and blunders with which this ſyſtem abounds, you muſt not only read Mr Nicolle's anſwer, but alſo the Janua Cælorum reſerata.

Some will aſk, how it is poſſible, that this work ſhould contain ſo many imperfections, and yet be looked upon as the maſter-piece of its author? I refer you to a little book (41) that was printed in 1692, where you will find an anſwer to this queſtion. The author of this ſmall piece having deſcribed the ridiculous figure in which Larebonius had made this New Syſtem of the Church appear, propoſes himſelf the following objection: ' but why then has it been ' formerly owned that this book was the maſter- ' piece of this miniſter? We do not contradict it; ' we own ſtill, that this, of all his other books, is that ' in which he has moſt ſignalized the extent of his ima- ' gination and his great faculty of inventing proofs, ' and urging objections. All this may be found in ' a work, which is in other reſpects very faulty, ' and in which the author, dazzled with the great ' fright he had taken, has not obſerved that he ' went too far, that he paſſed into the enemy's camp, and

(29) Art of Thinking, Part 1, chap. iii, pag. m. 54, 55.

(30) Nicolle, Pretended Reformed convicted of Schiſm, lib. 1, cap. ii, pag. m. 15.

(31) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. iii, cap. xxx.

(32) Concerning the fatal effects of this maxim introduced into religion, ſee the New Letters of the author of the General Criticiſm, pag. 779, & ſeq. Mr Jurieu, True Syſtem of the Church, pag. 373, & ſeq. Jurieu from the Republic of Letters, Nov. 1684, Art. I. pag. 889; and July 1686, Art. I, pag. 745. See alſo the remarks of the article PELISSON.

(33) See the article COMENIUS, remark [N].

(34) See the remark [D] of the article PELISSON.

(35) He found ſome errors of fact, and ſome pitiful reaſonings in it.

(36) The reply is intituled, A treatiſe concerning the Unity of the Church, and the fundamental points; at Rotterdam 1688, in 8*vo.*

(37) Printed at Amſterdam 1692, in 4to. I have mentioned it in the remark [N] of the article COMENIUS.

(38) See Mr Saurin, Examination of Mr Jurieu's Theology, pag. 6, & ſeq.

(39) Jurieu, Syſtem of the Church, pag. 236.

(40) It is under this name the author of Janua Cælorum reſerata, has diſguiſed himſelf.

(41) Intituled, New Advice to the little author of little books.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing it are aſcribed to him [E]. For the reſt I ſhall enlarge (c) upon the conſequences of one of his books, becauſe ſome perſons of judgment have aſſured me that ſuch facts, accompanied with reflexions, belong to this Dictionary; and that they will furniſh agreeable varieties for the entertainment of the reader. This is the true reaſon why here, and on ſeveral other occaſions, I uſe this method.

(c) In the remark [C].

The ſupplement which I have to add to this article relates only to certain works of Mr Nicolle, which I had not mentioned [F].

' and loaded his edifice with more materials than the ' foundations could bear. In a word, there are ſome ' men who by turns afford two very different ſorts ' of admiration: one is, that having made ſo many ' high diſcoveries, they ſhould not be aware of ' a multitude of inconveniences, and contradictions ' that are obvious to the moſt ſtupid: and the other ' is, that while they want light for things ſo eaſy ' to be remarked, they ſhould yet have it for great ' diſcoveries. The miniſter I am ſpeaking of, might ' have contributed very uſefully to the conſtruction ' of a new ſyſtem; he might have invented a great ' many things, and afforded a great many views: but ' it muſt have required a man of judgment to ſeparate ' all the diſagreeing pieces, and, after a ſkillful choice, ' to connect the parts together (42).'

(42) Ibid. pag. 60, 61.

[E] The Delectus Epigrammatum . . . . . with the learned preface is aſcribed to him.] It is ' a col- ' lection of Latin epigrams, and Greek, Spaniſh and ' Italian ſentences, printed in 12mo, at Paris in 1659 ' (43).' At the head of it is placed (44) a Latin diſſertation upon epigrams, which deſerves a place amongſt the beſt pieces written on the art of Poetry. It is a treatiſe concerning Poetical Beauty; wherein this author has undertaken to diſtinguiſh true and ſolid beauty from the falſe and apparent . . . . . (45) in his enquiry after this beauty he has confined himſelf to the epigrammatic kind. He treats of the excellencies of the epigram with great accuracy and judgment. He ſhews, that the number of excellent epigrams is much leſs than many imagine, and he boldly ranks amongſt the vicious, ſuch whoſe ſubject is falſe, fabulous, equivocal, hyperbolical, deciſive upon a conteſted point, foreign, accidental, far-fetched, ſhocking, diſhoneſt, ſordid, mean, and odious. He places in the ſame rank, thoſe that are virulent, verboſe, vulgar, and trivial, and ſuch as have childiſh, and ridiculous ſubtilties, or affected alluſions, and playing with words. Father Vavaſſeur hath cenſured ſeveral paſſages of this diſſertation, and has found fault not only with ſome of his ſentiments, but alſo with ſome expreſſions (46) in Latin.* Mr Menage, ſpeaking of ſome critics who condemned the uſe of quibbles in verſe, adds, ' that it is ſaid, ' Mr Nicolle, or Mr Lancelot, was the firſt who ' publiſhed this notion againſt quibbles, in a collection ' of verſes and epigrams of the Antients (47).' Mr Menage therefore did not certainly know that Mr Nicolle was the author of the preface placed before this collection.

(43) Baillet, Judgments on the Poets, Tom. i, num. 1080.

(44) Ibid.

(45) Ibid.

(46) He has taxed him even with ſome ſoleciſms. The new Anſwer to the Provincial Letters, in the ſeventh dialogue, pag. m. 297, ſays, that Wendrock has now and then committed ſome very egregious ſoleciſms among thoſe fine Latin phraſes, which made thoſe who are not judges look upon him as the Cicero of his party.

* See Father Vavaſſeur, Treatiſe on the Epigram.

(47) Menagiana, pag. 301, 302, of the firſt edition of Holland.

Note, that the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, have publiſhed ſeveral books for the uſe of youth. It was principally with regard to their own ſcholars; for it is certain, they had ſome. The Latin Method; the Greek Method; the Garden of Greek Roots; the Art of Thinking; the Delectus Epigrammatum, &c. are works purpoſely compoſed by them for the inſtruction of ſome diſciples whoſe education they had undertaken. They had a war upon their hands with the Jeſuits on this ſubject: ſo that all the quarrels of theſe two parties did not turn upon the doctrine of grace, and on the corruptions of morality. We have ſeen that Father Vavaſſeur criticized Mr Nicolle on the nature of the epigram: he publiſhed a very fine treatiſe upon this ſubject; and we may be ſure his deſign was only to take an opportunity of cenſuring Mr Nicolle's Diſſertation: he well knew that it came from Port-Royal. Before him Father Labbe made it his buſineſs to contradict the grammatical works of theſe gentlemen who attacked him a little roughly in a Preface (48). If he is to be credited, they had ſeveral ſchools. I was ſhewn, ſays he, at the ſame time a little book, intituled, The Garden of Greek Roots, put into French, with a tract of Prepoſitions, and other undeclined Particles, and an alphabetical Collection of French words derived from the Greek Tongue, and printed in the year 1647, by the care, as was ſaid, of ſome patriots of Janſeniſm, for the familiar inſtruction as well of the little ſchools, which they then had in three houſes about the abbey of Port-Royal in the Fields, as of thoſe which were diſperſed in ſeveral villages and caſtles in the neighbourhood of this great city, the capital of the kingdom, and elſewhere in the provinces. We have in this college of Clermont ſome ſcholars, who have learnt them there themſelves, and ſeen them taught their ſchool-fellows; as alſo in the college of one of the good cities of Picardy, which is not one of the moſt remote from Paris (49). Some pages after he tells us, that the king had lately broke all their ſchools. I will relate his obſervation ſomewhat at large; in which we ſhall ſee the effects of prepoſſeſſion and hatred. Father Labbe imagined theſe gentlemen were capable of cauſing a thouſand diſorders, by this little collection of French words, derived from the Greek, which they had joined to the Garden of Greek Roots. He repreſented (50) to the French academy the heinouſs of this attempt, and inſiſted, that this ſect of new Helleniſts ought to be ſuppreſſed I have called, ſays he (51), their deſign by the name of a ſect, becauſe what has been done by the preceding Helleniſts, produced no ill conſequences, nor occaſioned any great miſchief among our French youth: but the enterprize of thoſe Port-Royaliſts, who may take for their motto, Legio nomen noſtrum eſt, - - - Our name is legion, if it had met with all the ſucceſs they aimed at, would have directly ruined the Latin and French tongues, and under pretence of teaching their ſcholars Greek, would have thrown them into intolerable abſurdities and blunders, which muſt, in the end, have made us ridiculous and contemptible to foreigners, and to their lateſt poſterity. They have compoſed this famous collection after their rhiming roots, and their Greek and Latin methods, in order, that the youth whom they educated (not only, as we have before obſerved, in the three houſes adjacent to the Abbey of Port-Royal in the Fields, which we ſhall name when there is occaſion, and in many other little blind ſchools in ſome villages and caſtles in the country round about this great city of Paris, but alſo at a diſtance in ſeminaries and colleges of cities and provinces more remote) might draw, as out of a public fountain, and open to all their party, the firſt principles, and the moſt obſcure originals of the French tongue; learning by heart, with great diligence, the words they pretend to have been borrowed, and derived from the Greek by our anceſtors. But GOD has oppoſed their pernicious deſigns, by inſpiring our moſt Chriſtian monarch Lewis XIV with the reſolution of prohibiting and ſuppreſſing all the unlawful aſſemblies of this ſect, where our youth were inſtructed in the dangerous maxims of Janſeniſm, and ſucked from their cradle, as we may ſay, the milk of one of the moſt damnable hereſies, that ever attacked the church. This is flying into a rage for a very trifle, and diſcovering in the conduct of his enemies a pernicious enterprize, which is nothing but a phantome. It is uſeful to collect examples of this wicked prepoſſeſſion.

(48) That of the Garden of Greek Roots.

(49) Labbe, preface to his Etymologies of ſeveral French words. This book was printed at Paris in 12°, in 1661.

(50) In the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Etymologies.

(51) Ibid. Pref.

[F] Certain works of Mr Nicolle, which I had not mentioned.] ' The relation Mr de Marca had made, in ' his way, of all that had been done ſince the year ' 1653, in the aſſemblies of the biſhops on the ſubject ' of the five propoſitions, was no ſooner publiſhed in ' the name of the clergy; but Mr Nicolle, ſurprized ' to find in it a compilation of falſhoods and impoſtures, thought himſelf obliged to make them ' known, to prevent the world from being deceived ' by them (52).' This piece of Mr Nicolle was intituled, ' Belga Percontator: ſive Franciſci Profuturi ' Theologi Belgæ, ſuper Narratione rerum geſtarum ' in Conventu Cleri Gallicani circa Innocentii X Conſtitutionem, Scrupuli, iſtius Narrationis opifici Propoſiti, 25 Februarii 1657. - - The Belgic Enquirer; or, the Scruples of Francis Profuturus, a Dutch Divine, on the relation of the Tranſactions in the Aſſembly of the Gallican Church, concerning the Conſtitution of Innocent X, propoſed to the Author of that Relation, February 25, 1657. Some days after, appeared two ' Latin diſquiſitions of the ſame author, under the ' name of Paul Irenæus; in which he demonſtrated, ' that there was no ſuch thing as a Janſenian hereſy; ' and that it was a meer fiction made uſe of by the ' Jeſuits (53).' Theſe two diſquiſitions were followed by

(52) Hiſtory of Janſeniſm, Tom. II, pag. 329, Edition of Amſterdam 1700.

(53) Ibid. pag. 331.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by four others in the same year (54). He wrote in 1662 against the Thesis in which the Jesuits of Paris had maintained, the twelfth of December 1661, that the Pope had the same infallibility as JESUS CHRIST, to determine questions of fact as well as questions of right (55). He shewed (56) 'how contrary 'this new opinion of the Jesuits was to the laws and 'customs of France. But this writing falling into 'the hands of one who stuffed it with impertinencies, 'and printed it with this title, A Defence of the Liber- 'ties of the Gallican Church against the Theses of the 'Jesuits of the college of Clermont of the twelfth of De- 'cember, 1661, this work was disowned and sup- 'pressed by the Jansenists, who substituted in it's 'room, the first of February, the pernicious consequences 'of the new heresy of the Jesuits against the king and 'the state: to which was added, a refutation of the 'cavils wherewith some Divines endeavour to elude the 'authority of the councils of Constance and Basil.' Note, that the eighteen letters concerning the imaginary heresy (57) which appeared in 1664, and 1665 (58), are ascribed to him.

Let us add a word or two of his posthumous works. The tenth tome of his Moral Essays was printed at the Hague in 1700, with an advertisement, that the executors of this famous author have in their hands several of his writings not yet printed, and that they will take care to have them speedily published. See Mr Bernard in his News from the Republic of Letters (59), and Mr de Beauval in his History of the Works of the Learned (60). I do not know whether they reckon amongst those writings the interlineary glosi, and the Greek notes that Mr Nicolle wrote with his own hand on the Greek text of Lycophron (61). But I believe, that they reckon the Treatise of Grace he composed some years before his death. It is affirmed in the History of the five Propositions (62), that he wrote it, against the system of Jansenius, Mr Arnauld, and Father Q. . . . ; and that he confutes nothing in all this treatise, but physical necessity, that is, the inevitable and absolute necessity of doing the ill we do: and in order to confute it, he acknowledges in all sinners a sufficient grace, which delivers them from this necessity, by giving them a physical power, entire and absolute, of avoiding evil; without which power they could not be culpable for what they do; and by virtue whereof it may be truly said of the most obdurate, that they may abstain from evil; as it is true, that a man of honour, who is in his senses, may, if he pleases, in the face of the world, commit the greatest extravagances. This is the instance Mr Nicolle makes use of. This treatise of Mr Nicolle, upon Grace, was printed in 1699, and re-printed the year following. It contains only 105 pages in 12mo. You will find the abstract of it in the Journal of Trevoux (63).

(54) Ibid. pag. 334, 371, 374, 375.

(55) Ibid. Tom. 2, pag. 3.

(56) Id. ib. p. 6.

(57) Ten of them are intituled Les Imaginaires, and eight of them Les Visionnaires.

(58) See the History of the five Propositions of Jansenism, pag. 293.

(59) August 1700, pag. 213, 214.

(60) August 1700, pag. 357, & seq.

(61) See the preface of the Telemacomanie, pag. m. 6.

(62) History of the five propositions, pag. 139, 140. Edit. of Liege 1695.

(63) For the months of March and April 1701, pag. 182, & seq. of the Dutch edition.

NIDHARD (a) (JOHN EVERARD), confessor to the queen, mother of Charles II, king of Spain, was born the eighth of December 1607, in the castle of Falkenstein in Austria [A]. 'He entred himself a Jesuit the fifth of October 1631, and having finished all his studies taught Morality, Philosophy, and the Canon-Law, in the university of Gratz. He would also have read School-Divinity, if the emperor Ferdinand III, had not sent for him to his court [B]. He was at first confessor to the arch-duchess Mary-Anne; and afterwards confessor and preceptor to the arch-duke Leopold (b). He followed this princess into Spain, when she went thither to be married to king Philip IV (c); for the emperor Ferdinand would not suffer her to change her confessor. the king of Spain had so great an esteem for this Jesuit, that he was desirous of procuring him a cardinal's hat in 1665; but Nidhard beseeched him not to have any thoughts of it. After the death of this prince he was honoured with the post of Inquisitor-general by the queen-mother (d), and he had a great share in the government. The party which was formed against him, which was headed by John of Austria natural son of Philip IV, was so potent, that notwithstanding the queen's protection, her confessor was forced to retire [C]. He left Madrid in the midst of the curses of the populace the twenty-fifth of February 1669 (e). The

(a) It is pronounced Nitard.

(b) Who was elected emperor in 1658.

(c) In 1650.

(d) Taken from Nathaniel Southwell Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu, pag. 441, 442. See also the Epistle Dedicatory of that work.

(e) Bouhours, ubi infra, pag. 289, & seq.

[A] He was born . . . . in the castle of Falkenstein.] The Bibliographer of the Jesuits does not take any notice to us (1) of the religion of John Everard Nidhard's parents: he contents himself with telling us they were noble. There are accounts which affirm, that they were strict Lutherans. Madam d'Aunoi having said, that the ministers of state were disgusted, that the queen-mother (2) had, without consulting them, disposed of a very important place (3), and in favour of a stranger (4), who was born, and bred up, till fourteen years of age, in the Lutheran Religion, puts these words in the margin: 'Tho' it was true that he had been 'a Lutheran, and that it was objected to him, yet he 'stoutly denied it, because that would have excluded 'him from this post (5).' Father Southwell dedicating his Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu to Cardinal Nidhard, speaks in a very different manner: 'Quando claræ memoriæ, says he, Genitor Eminentiæ 'vestræ à principibus Austriacis Commissarius Gene- 'ralis constitutus ad expellendos ex hæreditariis ipso- 'rum provinciis hæreticos (6), id ille ingenti animi 'fortitudine ac zelo præstitit, quantumvis non sine 'discrimine vitæ suæ, & jactura fortunarum non exi- 'gua. - - - - When, says he, your Eminence's father, of illustrious memory, was constituted by the Austrian princes, their commissary, to expel the Heretics out of their hereditary dominions, he discharged that trust with great intrepidity and zeal, though not without the hazard of his life, and no small loss of his estate.'

Father Baron relates that he had heard a credible person say, that our Nidhard had been a captain of horse, and that he was a man grown when he abjured Lutheranism, which he had imbibed in his infancy (7).

[B] If the emperor Ferdinand III, had not sent for him to his court.] Madam d'Aunoi does not speak in that manner: This is her account. 'Among several 'others whom the emperor appointed to attend the 'queen, his daughter, he chose Father John Everard 'Nidhard, a German Jesuit, for her confessor. His 'birth was obscure; and his wit was almost the only 'means of making his fortune: he was supple and 'complaisant; he studied the character of those he 'had occasion for, and never opposed their sentiments. 'He performed his studies in the Jesuits college at 'Vienna, where he took the habit of the order, and 'they sent him afterwards to some of their houses, 'which he governed very well. When he returned 'to Vienna, he began to make himself known, and a 'great many ladies of the court took him for their 'confessor: They omitted nothing to do him good 'offices with the emperor; and they spoke so advan- 'tageously of him, that he was pleased the queen 'should take him along with her (8).' There are, perhaps, some circumstances in this account which are not true; I leave the examination of it to the reader.

[C] Notwithstanding the queen's protection, he was forced to retire.] The accounts of the differences between Don John of Austria and the queen-regent, are so common in every body's hands, that I shall not give the particulars. Madam d'Aunoi, whose works have been so often printed, has spoke very exactly of them. It is pity the public cannot be persuaded that she deserves much credit. It has prevailed, as a general opinion, that her works are a mixture of fictions and truths, half romance, and half history; and there is no other way to distinguish fiction from true matter of fact, but by comparing her's with other books. It is an inconvenience which daily gets ground by the liberty that is taken to publish the secret amours, the secret history, &c. of such and such lords famous in History. Booksellers and authors do all they can to make it believed that these secret Histo- ries

(1) That is in the article of John Everard Nidhard; but you will find at the end of this remark what he says in his Epistle Dedicatory.

(2) Memoirs of the court of Spain, Part i. pag. 6. Hol. Edit.

(3) That of Inquisitor-general.

(4) That is of Father Nitard.

(5) Memoirs of the court of Spain. Part i, pag. 7.

(6) Note, that it may be pretended he does not contradict Madam d'Aunoi. For from Nitard's father's being commissioned to prosecute the Lutherans, it does not follow that he was not a Lutheran till 1621, when his son was fourteen years old.

(7) Vincent Baronius, Apolog. Ord. Pred. Tom. i. pag. 524.

(8) Memoirs of the court of Spain, Part i, pag. 2, 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The queen signed with a steddy countenance the decree that had been brought her ready drawn up for this expulsion (f). We shall see, below, the contents of it [D], and the better to salve appearances she made a declaration the next day by which her majesty gave the ministers of state to understand, that being no longer able to withstand her father-confessor's frequent importunities to retire: she had permitted him to go to Rome in the quality of embassador extraordinary, and she desired it might be known that he went thither with all the honours, pensions, and employs, that he before enjoyed (g). He went to the court of Rome where he was ambassador extraordinary from Spain to Clement IX (b) [E]. In the following Pontificate he was ambassador ordinary from the same crown; and in order that the might be able to support that character with greater lustre, he was promoted to the dignity of archbishop (i). At last he obtained the cardinal's hat in 1672 (k) He published some books, and prepared some others for the press, which run all upon the controversy concerning the immaculate conception of the holy Virgin (l) [F].

(f) Relation of the difference between Don John of Austria, and cardinal Nitard, Tom. ii, pag. 13. Edit. of Cologne 1677.

(g) Father Nitard's Departure from Spain, translated from the Spanish, by Father Bouhours. See his Opuscules, pag 292.

(b) Southwell, ubi supra, pag. 442.

(i) He was made titular archbishop of Edessa.

(k) See the book intituled, Memoirs of the Intrigues of the court of Rome, from 1669, to 16-6, pag. 130, &c. seq. Paris Edit. 1677.

(l) Southwell, ubi supra.

We ries have been taken from private manuscripts: they very well know, that love-intrigues, and such like adventures, please more when they are believed to be real, than when they are thought to be mere fables. From hence it is, that the new romances keep as far off as possible from the romantic way: but by this means true history is made extreamly obscure; and I believe the civil powers will at last be forced to give these new romancers their option; either to write pure history, or pure romance; or at least to use crotchets to separate the one from the other, truth from fiction (9).

(9) Compare with this what is said in the News from the Republic of Letters, October 1684, Art. viii, of the catalogue of new books.

[D] We shall see, below, the contents of this decree of expulsion.] The queen signed it (10), saying, 'she 'never had desired any thing but what was for the advantage of the state; and since this was of that 'nature, she would have it executed. This was done 'very honourably: for, to express her majesty's esteem 'for this Jesuit, the decree was drawn up in these 'terms: John Everard Nitard, a Religious of the 'society of JESUS, my confessor, counsellor of state, 'and Inquisitor-general, having intreated me to permit 'him to retire out of the kingdom: though I am very 'well satisfied of his virtue, and of his other good qualities, as well as of his zeal and care for my service; 'yet having regard to his request, and for other considerations, I have given him the permission he desires to 'retire whither he shall think fit: but desiring he may do 'it with all the decency and honour that are due to his 'dignities, and especially to his merit, I have resolved to 'give him the title of embassador extraordinary from this 'court to Germany or Rome, which he shall chuse, without resigning any of his employs, or of the profits he 'draws from them. Madrid the twenty-fifth of February 1669.

(10) Relation of the difference of John of Austria with cardinal Nitard, Tom. ii. pag. 13. Edit. of Cologne 1677.

THE QUEEN.

[E] He went from thence to the court of Rome, where he was embassador extraordinary from Spain to Clement IX.] As Father Southwell, whom I have followed, has passed lightly over the condition in which Father Nidhard at first found himself at Rome, what is wanting in his account, ought to be supplied. 'This 'Jesuit flattered himself that he should no sooner 'come to Rome but he would be made a cardi'nal; but for want of being provided with creden'tial letters for his embassy, he was extreamly out 'in his imagination. All that he could do was to 'send an account to Madrid of his arrival at Rome, 'and to desire letters, by virtue of which he might 'act. Many consultations were had on this account; 'and at last, as they knew his character, they sent him 'an order to procure a decision on the question of the 'Conception, and granted him an appointment of a'bout four thousand livres; with which he was made 'embassador capone. But the marquis of St Romain, 'who, in that conjuncture, was our embassador in 'ordinary to his holiness, judging the glory of this 'crown to be concerned in it, assisted him with all his 'power; and lent him his train and his equipage, that 'he might appear with some grandeur: but this hin'dered not the court of Rome from discovering very 'quickly what sort of man he was (11).' The Pope having a cardinal's hat to dispose of to the Spaniards, desired they would nominate some persons worthy of it (12). The council of state proposed three to him: the queen pretended to approve this choice, and writ herself about it to the Pope, and the marquis of St Romain; but by the same courier she secretly desired the Pope to bestow the hat on Father Nitard.

(11) Ibid. p. 112.

(12) Ibid. p. 113.

The Pope declared to this marquis, '(13) That Fa'ther Nitard had no hat to hope for; and that far'ther, he was instantly to be dismissed from his em'ploy of Inquisitor-general, in favour of Don Diego 'Sarmiento Valladares, president of Castile, who had 'been nominated to it; which Father Nitard would 'by no means hearken to. It is said, that the rea'son of his obstinacy proceeded from this; that Father 'Salinas, his confident in this kingdom, had sent 'word, that affairs were disposing in such a manner, 'that he might promise himself a very speedy return, 'and that he should have an apartment in the palace, 'with private stairs, by which he might, whenever 'he pleased, have admittance to the queen, and that 'he might govern the monarchy without any trouble; 'so that it would be most prudent for him not to 'part with his place of Inquisitor-general. This let'ter so agreeably flattered his imagination, that he 'resolved to follow that advice, being besides per'suaded, that he should quickly be a cardinal. But, 'in the interim, the marquis of St Romain signified 'his Holiness's order to him; so that the poor man, 'who flattered himself with being made a cardinal 'and regent of Spain, was so surprized with this 'sudden change, that he turned as cold as marble: 'It is said too, that he fell into a swoon, and was 'above an hour before he came to himself. It is af'firmed for certain, that the general of his order, 'seeing him deprived of all his employments, and that 'when he came to Rome, he had not paid that 'duty he owed to his reverence, ordered him to de'part from Rome immediately, and to retire into a 'neighbouring convent, called . . . . and that as soon 'as he was there he discharged all his domestics . . (14). 'This news (15) so surprized the queen, that it threw 'her into a Tertian Fever, which disordered her 'very much.'

(13) Ibid. pag. 116, 117.

(14) Ibid. p. 115.

(15) That is, that the cardinal's hat was given to Don Lewis Fernandez de Portocarrero dean of Toledo.

[F] He prepared some books . . . . which run all upon the controversy concerning the immaculate conception.] The author of the apology of the Nuns of Port-Royal, printed in 1665, drew a very merry parallel betwixt the conduct of Father Annat, in the affair of Jansenism, and that of Father Nidhard in the dispute concerning the immaculate conception. He shews many resemblances betwixt these two father-confessors, and the two affairs they prosecuted, one in France, the other in Spain. The only difference he finds is, that the Jesuit Nidhard (16), did not appear altogether so violent as Father Annat (17), and exceeded him in subtilty. The Jesuits having obtained of her Catholic majesty an order to sollicit the definition of the immaculate conception at Rome, this proposal was seriously hearkened to at Rome, but they contented themselves with putting off the Spanish Jesuits, with a provisional bull. 'It is expressly for'bidden by this bull, upon pain of excommunication, 'to accuse of mortal sin or heresy, such as did not 'hold the opinion of the immaculate conception: 'and hereby the Dominicans thought themselves safe 'from the insults of the Jesuits. But Father Nid'hard . . . . has quickly found the way of shaking 'off these fetters, and of setting himself at liberty 'to accuse the Dominicans of heresy and mortal sin. 'The Pope's injunction, says he, is only against those 'who do it affirmatively; but he has not forbidden to 'do it problematically, and several other ways: so that, 'when the Dominicans shall complain, that they are 'charged with heresy in a question not subject to it, 'the Jesuits will be clear, by saying they do not call 'them Heretics affirmatively, but problematically, and 'several other ways. Afterwards, lest the doctrine 'of

(16) Apology for the nuns of Port-Royal. Part iv, in the preface.

(17) Ibid. fol. †† 2, verso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We are told a pleaſant reaſon of the friendſhip the queen-mother of the king of Spain conceived for this Jeſuit [G].

' of the immaculate conception ſhould not be thought ' more certain after the Pope's bull, than it was be- ' fore, the good Father Nidhard, has, by his argu- ' ments, raiſed it to the higheſt point of human cer- ' tainty. He thought it was doing nothing, to main- ' tain, that it is morally certain, becauſe thereby it ' would not be abſolutely impoſſible but it might be ' falſe, which ſeems to him a great inconvenience. ' He therefore goes farther, and maintains in the ſe- ' cond place, that it is phyſically certain. One would ' think he might have fairly ſtopped there, and that there ' needed no more, than that it was as certain the Vir- ' gin was conceived without original ſin, as it is cer- ' tain the ſun ſhines. But Father Nidhard is not yet ' contented with this degree; he will have this opi- ' nion to be metaphyſically certain, that is, as certain as ' theſe firſt principles: every thing is, or is not: the ' whole is greater than one of its parts. What could ' be deſired after this? Yet Father Nidhard never- ' theleſs deſires ſomething more, becauſe there was ' nothing but what was natural in all this certainty; ' whereas he was willing it ſhould have ſomething ſu- ' pernatural. For which reaſon he eſtabliſhes a fourth ' degree, which he calls infallible certainty, pretend- ' ing that this doctrine was immediately derived from a ' propoſition of faith. But if you demand of this ' good Father the foundation of all theſe certainties ' moral, phyſical, metaphyſical, and infallible, which he ' aſcribes to this opinion; he will tell you in a ' word, it reſts on the infallibility of the Pope, in the ' inſtitution of feaſts and fraternities. From whence ' he concludes, that the Pope permitting or ordain- ' ing their inſtitution in honour of the immaculate ' conception, this doctrine muſt be certain in all theſe ' ways.' The Nuns apologiſt adds to this, that the Jeſuits have diſtinguiſhed two things in this opinion; the truth and piety, or laudability. It is not material to faith, ſay they, that it be true, but it is material to faith that it be pious and laudable. And thus the Dominicans are Heretics, not becauſe they do not believe this opinion true, but becauſe they do not believe it pious. Father Nidhard, coutinues he (18), enforces as much as poſſible the new article of faith, concerning the laudability of the opinion of the conception. He ſhews, That the Dominicans were obliged to pronounce the formula (19), whatever private notions they had of this opinion. . . . . He ſuppoſes the Pope to have a right to confer upon opi- nions, the truth whereof he does not yet define, a certain degree, as he calls it, of indubitability, by forbidding the calling them in queſtion, directly or indirectly, and the teſtifying by any ſign, the leaſt doubt one might have about them. He ſuppoſes, that by the bull of the con- ception, tho' the truth of that opinion be not defined as a matter of faith, yet it is eſtabliſhed in this degree of in- dubitability. The Pope, ſays Father Nidhard, will have this opinion to be indubitable. VULT illam eſſe indubitabilem, vult ut nemo dubitet. He will have every thing ſuppreſſed which might occa- ſion the leaſt doubt about this privilege of the holy Virgin. VULT taceri quodcunque in dubitationem poſſet Virginis privilegium revocare. This foundation being laid, he adds, that the ſilence of the Dominicans, and their refuſal to pronounce this formula, brings this privilege in queſtion. Therefore, ſays he, the Dominicans are not only blameable when they ſpeak, but even by their ſilence they oppoſe the order of the Pope, ſince there is a ſpeaking ſilence, which gives as great offence as words themſelves. Non tantùm loquentes culpantur Domini- cani, ſed etiam tacentes adverſus totam Pontificis diſ- poſitionem obloquuntur. Quapropter eſt loquens ſi- lentium quod non minus quàm vox ipſa producit ſcan- dalum. From all which he concludes, that they commit a mortal ſin by this ſilence, and that they ought to be forced to pronounce this formulary. It cannot be doubt- ed, ſays he, but that this ſilence violates the bull, and conſequently that he who violates the bull by his ſi- lence, is guilty of a mortal ſin. Laſtly, he under- takes to prove (20), ' that there is no lie in the ex- ' ternal pronunciation of the words of the formula- ' ry, tho' a man does not believe the contents of it. ' He who ſpeaks, ſays he, conformably to a proba- ' ble opinion, tho' he believes the contrary to be ' alſo probable, does not lie. Now, it is probable, ' that the Virgin was conceived without original ſin. ' And therefore the Dominicans may ſpeak conforma- ' bly to this opinion. But if their judgment cannot ' comply with the probability of the opinion of the ' immaculate conception; What is to be done? Would ' they not then be guilty of a lie? No, ſays Father ' Nidhard, becauſe it ſuffices to conform our affection ' to our words, without conforming to them our under- ' ſtanding, etiam cum retentione proprii judicii.'

(18) Ibid. fol. †† 3.

(19) That is to conform to the ſenſe of ſeveral Spaniſh preachers, who ſay at the beginning of their ſermons, praiſed be the holy Sacrament of the holy altar, and the pure and immacu- late conception of the Virgin mo- ther of God, con- ceived without o- riginal ſin, in the firſt inſtant of her being.

(20) Ibid. fol. †† 3 verſo.

I thought it would not be diſagreeable to the reader, to find here an analyſis of Father Nidhard's works upon the immaculate conception. See the margin (21).

(21) It is mani- feſt from this Analyſis, that Father Nidhard was very much ac- quainted with the moſt abſtract and ſubtile diſcuſſions of the ſchools.

But I muſt not paſs over in ſilence, that the Jacobin Vincent Baron, having imputed to this Jeſuit almoſt the ſame things which have been juſt now mentioned, retracted them in another work, printed in 1666, and made a moſt reſpectful ſatisfaction to this father-con- feſſor of the queen-mother of his Catholic majeſty. ' Lætor, ſays he (22), datum mihi occaſionem re- ' tractandi quæ temerè de illo ſcripſeram, & quam ' ex nimiâ credulitate religioſiſſimo viro intuli inju- ' riam ſanè atrocem, quâ poſſum, reſarciendi. - - - - - ' I am very glad to meet with an opportunity of retract- ing what I had raſhly written concerning him, and of repairing by all means poſſible the intolerable injury I had done that moſt religious man by my too great cre- dulity.' He confeſſes, 1. That he had not read the book that bore the name of Father Nidhard. 2. That he had truſted to the deceitful relation of a certain author, who pretended to have taken from a work printed at Doüay the interpretation this Jeſuit gave to the bull of Alexander VII, concerning the conception of the holy Virgin. 3. That he had ſought for the book in queſtion, amongſt the Bookſellers of Paris, and had ſollicited the Dominicans of Doüay to let him ſee a copy of it, but that he could never obtain it; and therefore his opinion is, that it is wrongfully imputed to Father Nidhard. He gives ſeveral reaſons for his opinion, which are not very convincing, and which I ſhall not give myſelf the trouble of examining. I will only re- late one thing, which ſhews, that the book which he will not have attributed to the queen-mother's con- feſſor, is the ſame from which the writer of Port- Royal has taken what we have ſeen above: ' Incide- ' ram in Authorem neſcio quem: is forte aliorum ' dictis, ſicut ego ipſe ejus lectione deceptus, quam ' citato loco adnotavi, Pontificii de Conceptione de- ' creti præpoſteram omninò interpretationem retulit ex ' libro hujus Authoris, ut narrabat, Duaci edito, aſ- ' citam Conceptionis Immaculatæ Laudabilitatem ex ' Pontificiis ſanctionibus, Catholicis indubitatam, con- ' tendebat ad certitudinem fidei proximam, per qua- ' tuor gradus ſuprà Moralem, ſuprà Phyſicarum dig- ' nitatum, & Metaphyſicarum demonſtrationum, imo ' ſupra principiorum per ſe notorum, & indemonſtra- ' bilium evidentiam arcanum Immaculatæ Concep- ' tionis proveniſſe: unde inferebat, quamvis ultima ' Alexandri VII Conſtitutione cautum ſit, ne ſecùs ' ſentientes damnentur, aut vexentur, aſſertive & fide ' certâ, poſſe tamen illis notam erroris inuri, & pœnas ' problematicè infligi (23). - - - - - I have met with a certain author, who perhaps being deceived by the repreſentation of others, as I was by his, which I have taken notice of in the paſſage quoted, has given a very prepoſterous interpretation of the Pope's decree concerning the conception, from the book of this author, publiſhed, as he affirmed, at Doüay: it aſſerts, that the laudability aſcribed to the immaculate conception by the pontifical conſtitutions, and believed without ſcruple by the Catholics, amounts to a certainty next to faith, thro' four degrees, above moral certainty, above phyſi- cal dignities, and metaphyſical demonſtrations, even a- bove ſelf-evident principles; from whence it inferred, that tho' by the laſt bull of Alexander VII, it be de- creed, that thoſe who believed otherwiſe ſhould not be ſentenced or diſturbed, aſſertively, and by a determina- tion of faith, yet they may problematically be accuſed and puniſhed as Heretics.'

(22) Vincent. Baron. Apolog. ordinis prædicat. lib. iii. Art. ul- timo, pag. 524, 525.

(23) Id. id. pag. 525.

[G] We are told, a pleaſant reaſon of the friendſhip the queen-mother of Spain conceived for this Jeſuit.] This is a ſtory I find in a letter of Mr Bourſault, and I re- late it without any alteration. ' Cardinal Nidhard roſe ' (24) by a method, which never before was taken, ' and perhaps never will be again, and paſſed from ' the ſociety of JESUS to that of the cardinals, which ' he

(24) That is, to his greatneſs.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' he liked better. The late queen of Spain, mother ' to the preſent king, and ſiſter to the emperor, car- ' ried him along with her when ſhe went to be mar- ' ried to Philip IV. This princeſs, who in Germany ' enjoyed a great liberty, and was gratified with every ' thing ſhe deſired, did not find the ſame ſatisfaction ' in Spain. Every thing there is ſo exactly deter- ' mined, that their queens can neither eat nor drink ' but what is appointed by the general officer, to ' whom that care is committed; and if they are ' thirſty between meals, they are treated with a glaſs ' of water. It was difficult for her to conform to a ' manner of life ſo different from what ſhe had led: ' and Father Nidhard, who was a Jeſuit, ergo a man ' of addreſs, having obſerved it, brought her ma- ' jeſty every morning when he went to maſs, a bot- ' tle of the beſt wine he could meet with, which he ' committed to a truſty perſon, and which the queen ' had the pleaſure to drink of, as often as ſhe had ' occaſion. This Father's aſſiduity, in doing her this ' little ſervice, ſo ſtrongly affected her, that ſhe re- ' ſolved to recompenſe ſo great a zeal, if ever it lay ' in her power: and in effect, being declared regent ' after the king's death, ſhe raiſed him to ſo high a ' pitch, that Don John of Auſtria growing jealous of ' him, and the grandees of Spain demanding his re- ' moval, he could not be diſmiſſed but by making him ' a cardinal (25), and ambaſſador extraordinary at ' Rome; where he died (26).' What has been ſaid, that a great fortune is a great ſlavery, magna ſervitus eſt magna fortuna (27), is moſt remarkably veri- fied in a queen of Spain, who has been educated in France or Germany, or in any other country which allows the ſex liberty.

(25) Mr Bourfault is miſtaken in this; for Father Nidhard had not the hat till three years after his departure from the court of Spain.

(26) Bourfault, New Letters, pag. 378, 379. Dutch Edit. 1698.

(27) Seneca de Conſol. ad Polybium, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 722.

(a) Non humanarum modo literarum, ſed & philoſophiæ, & aſtrologiæ, & rei medicæ conſultiſſimus extitit. Glandorp. Onom. pag. 625. He has been copied by the author of the additions to Charles Stephens, and afterwards by Lloyd and Hoffman.

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS (PUBLIUS), one of the moſt learned men of antient Rome [A], flouriſhed at the ſame time with Cicero. He wrote ſeveral books upon various ſubjects [B]; but they were found ſo ſubtile and difficult, that they were neglected [C]. Some authors ſay he underſtood Phyſic perfectly well (a): I do not find any proofs of it. The other things they ſay of him are atteſted by the antients, as that he was a good Humaniſt, a good Philoſopher [D], and a great Aſtrologer

[A] One of the moſt learned men of antient Rome.] Aulus Gellius has expreſſed this elogy ſeveral ways: He ſays in one place, ' P. Nigidius homo in omnium ' bonarum artium diſciplinis egregius (1) - - - - P. Nigidius, a man eminently endowed with univerſal knowledge:' in another, ' Verba ſunt hæc ipſa P. Nigidii, hominis in ſtudiis bonarum artium præcellentis (2) - - - Theſe are the words of P. Nigidius, a man of excellent taſte in all uſeful arts;' or, ' In diſciplinis doctrinarum omnium præcellentis (3) - - - Excellent in all branches of learning:' in another place, ' P. Nigidius homo impenſe doctus non minus ' arguto ſubtilique ἐτύμῳ interpretatur (4). - - - P. Nigidius, a man exceedingly learned, gives a no leſs curious and ingenious etymology.' He ſays ſomewhere, that next to Varro, he was the moſt learned man in Rome (5); but in another place he affirms it without exception (6). Servius has ſo divided the pre-eminence betwixt theſe two, as to give it to Varro in Divine ſubjects, and to Nigidius in human learning. Both of them, adds he, have writ upon both theſe ſubjects. Nigidius Figulus ſolus poſt Varronem: licet Varro præcellat in Theologia, hic in communibus litteris: nam uterque utrumque ſcripſerunt (7). I ſhall cite other elogies in the following remarks.

(1) Aulus Gellius Noct. Attic. lib x, cap. xi. Macrob. Saturn. lib. vi, cap. viii. pag. m. 565, uſes the ſame words, citing Nigidius.

(2) Id. Aulus Gellius, lib. xi, cap. xi.

(3) Id. lib. xiii, cap. xxiv.

(4) Id. lib. xiii, cap. x.

(5) Nigidius Figulus homo, ut ego arbitror, juxta M. Varronem doctiſſimus. Id lib. iv, cap. ix.

(6) P. Nigidius civitatis Romanæ doctiſſimus. Id. lib. xvii, cap. vii.

(7) Servius in Virgil. Æn. lib. X. ver. 175.

[B] He wrote ſeveral books upon various ſubjects.] He wrote ſome de Augurio privato: de Animalibus: de Extis: de Vento: Aulus Gellius has ſometimes cited them, but not ſo often as the great work of Grammar I ſhall ſpeak of preſently. Macrobius (8) cites Nigidius's nineteenth book de Diis, who had alſo written de Sphæra barbarica & græcanica, as Servius affirms (9). Pliny has often cited Nigidius, and tho' he does not mention the title of the books, yet we know he means thoſe de Animalibus, except in one place (10), where, according to all appearance he had in view a work of Aſtronomy, the ſame perhaps out of which the Commentator upon Aratus has cited ſeveral paſſages. The book de Animalibus has been honourably mentioned by Sammonicus Serenus: ' Quod ' ait Plinius de acipenſeris ſquamis, id verum eſſe ' maximus rerum naturalium indagator Nigidius Figulus oſtendit, in cujus libro de animalibus quarto ita ' poſitum eſt (11). - - - What Pliny ſays of the ſcales of the ſturgeon, is ſhewn to be true by Nigidius Figulus, the moſt curious enquirer into Natural Hiſtory, in whoſe fourth book of Animals it is ſo affirmed.' The Commentary upon Cicero's epiſtles in Grævius's edition (12) furniſhes a note aſcribed to Paulus Manutius (13). This note is very learned, but yet erroneous in giving as for Macrobius's words, thoſe that he has cited from Sammonicus; and the author ſhould not have conjectured that Nigidius has written de Deis, nor have quoted for it only Arnobius (14); for we have expreſs teſtimonies of this fact (15). It is ſaid in the ſame note, that Donatus affirms, that Nigidius had explained Terence's Comedies: interpretatus eſt Comœdias Terentii teſte Donato. But Rutgerſius thinks, that all that Donatus cites from Nigidius, was taken from his Commentaries on Grammar (16). Note, that Rutgerſius (17) has collected all the fragments he could find of Nigidius; and has alſo publiſhed a Greek tranſlation of a treatiſe of this author, done by John Laurentius of Philadelphia. It is a kind of Almanack, containing preſages of thunder for each particular day.

(8) Macrob. Saturn. lib. iii. cap. iv. pag. m. 391.

(9) Servius in Georg. lib. I, ver. 19, 43, 218.

(10) Plin. lib. vi. circa fin.

(11) Sammonicus Serenus apud Macrobium Saturn. lib. ii, cap. xii. pag. m. 364.

(12) Page 217 of the firſt volume ad Familiares.

(13) There is at the end of the Note, P. Manutius in argum. ep.

(14) Arnobius lib. iii. pag. m. 119, 123, 124. cites Nigidius for things relating to the Heathen deities.

(15) That of Servius in Eclog. iv. ver. x. that of Macrob. Saturn. lib. iii, cap. iv. and that of Nonius Marcellus at the word obſcundamter, and at the word liba.

(16) Janus Rutgerſius Variar. Lect. lib. iii. pag. 269.

(17) Ibid. pag. 246, & ſeq.

[C] They were found ſo . . . . difficult that they were neglected.] The words of Aulus Gellius are remarkable: ' Ætas M. Ciceronis & C. Cæſaris præſtanti ' facundia viros paucos habuit: doctrinarum autem ' multiformium variarumque artium, quibus humanitas erudita eſt, columina habuit M. Varronem & P. ' Nigidium. Sed Varronis quidem monumenta rerum ' ac diſciplinarum, quæ per litteras condidit, in propatulo frequentique uſu feruntur. Nigidianæ autem ' commentationes non proinde in vulgus exeunt: & ' obſcuritas ſubtilitaſque earum tamquam parum utilis ' derelicta eſt, ſicuti ſunt quæ paulo ante legimus in ' commentariis ejus quos grammaticos inſcripſit (18). ' . . . . The age of Cicero and Cæſar produced few inſtances of extraordinary eloquence: but for the many various arts and ſciences regarding human literature, the great ornaments of it were M. Varro & P. Nigidius. The remains of Varro's writings on theſe ſubjects are indeed every where to be met with, and in frequent uſe. But the works of Nigidius are not ſo public: their obſcurity and ſubtilty as being of very little uſe makes them neglected; as are thoſe which we have a little before read in the commentaries which he has intituled grammatical.' Here you ſee an example in favour of the maxim, qui non vult intelligi debet negligi. I ſhould eaſily believe that this diſcouraging and dark ſubtilty might belong in a more particular manner to his treatiſe of Grammar, divided into a great many books (19).

(18) Aulus Gellius, lib. xix, cap. xiv.

(19) Nonius Marcellus, at the word uxurire, has cited the thirtieth if we believe Rutgerſius pag. 265. But my edition, which is that of Paris 1614, has 25. Gellius lib. x, cap. v. has cited the 29.

[D] He was a good Philoſopher.] This cannot be better proved than by theſe words of Cicero: ' Multa ' ſunt nobis & in academicis conſcripta contra phyſicos, & ſæpe cum P. Nigidio, Carneadeo more & ' modo diſputata. Fuit enim vir ille quum cæteris ' artibus, quæ quidem dignæ libero eſſent, ornatus ' omnibus; tum acer inveſtigator, & diligens earum ' rerum, quæ à natura involutæ videntur. Denique ' ſic judico, poſt illos nobiles Pythagoreos, quorum ' diſciplina extincta eſt quodammodo, quum aliquot ' ſecula in Italia, Siciliaque viguiſſent, hunc extitiſſe ' qui illam renovaret (20). . . . . There are a great many things wrote by me and in the academies, againſt Natural Philoſophers, which have alſo very often been debated with Nigidius in the way and manner of Carneades. For he was a man not only adorned with all other branches of learning becoming a liberal mind, but alſo a diligent and penetrating enquirer into the moſt obſcure myſteries of nature. In ſhort, according to my judgment, after thoſe illuſtrious Pythagoreans whoſe doctrines were in ſome meaſure extinct, tho' they had prevailed for ſome ages in Italy and Sicily, it is to him we owe the reſtoration of them.' Here we learn, that Nigidius was the reſtorer of Pythagoriſm, and that he delighted (20) Cicero de univerſitate init. fol. m. 379. B.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Astrologer [E]. This hindered not his concerning himself in government (b), and advancing himself to great offices in the Republic; for he was Prætor (c), and senator (d). He seconded

(b) See the remark [F].

(c) Vives in August. de Civit. Dei, lib. v, cap. iii. Glandorp. ubi supra.

(d) Dio, lib. xlv, circ. init.

to treat things after the manner of the Academics: He discussed them pro and con, but determined little. Let us note here a fault of la Popeliniere: It is also said that Nigidius renewed in Sicily and Italy the lost sect of the Pythagoreans (21). This is mistaking Cicero, who yet said plain enough, not that Nigidius restored this sect in Sicily and Italy; but that it formerly had flourished in Italy and Sicily. Note, that Eusebius has given Nigidius the titles of Pythagorean Philosopher and Magician; 'Nigidius Figulus Pythagoricus & 'Magus in exilio moritur (22). . . . . Nigidius Figulus 'a Pythagorean and Magician died in exile.' Dion will presently inform us of something in regard to the latter; and Apuleius, whom I shall also cite, will give us a farther account.

21) La Popeliniere, Hist. of Histories, book v, pag. 302.

22) Euseb. in Chron. num. 1973.

[E] . . . . and a great Astrologer.] He was so perfect in the knowledge of the stars, and so successful in erecting figures, that he was suspected of being a Magician. I think Dion's words will bear this sense (23). Νιγίδιος Φίγουλος βουλευτὴς παραχρῆμα αὐτῷ τὴν αὐταρχίαν ἐμαντεύσατο, ἀρτια γαρ καθ' ἑαυτὸν τήν τε τῦ κόλπε διακόσμησιν, καὶ τὰς τῶν ἀστέρων διαφορὰς, ὅσα τε καθ' ἑαυτὰς γιγνόμενοι, καὶ ὅσα συμμίγνυντες ἀλλήλοις ἔν τε ταῖς ὁμιλίαις καὶ ἐν ταῖς διασάσεσιν ἀποτελοῦσι, διέγνω· καὶ κατὰ τοῦτο καί αἰτίαν, ὡς τινὰς ἀπορρήτως διαιρεῖς ποιήσων, ἔσχεν. Infanti recens edito Nigidius Figulus senator statim imperium vaticinatus est, qui ea tempestate omnem cœli descriptionem, siderumque differentias, & eorum proprietates, quasque coituum, intervallorumve suorum ratione effectiones ea edunt, adeo callebat, ut arcanis studiis eum uti crederetur. . . . . To the new born infant Nigidius Figulus, a senator, presently foretold the empire, who at that time so well understood every description of the heavens, the differences and properties of the stars, and the effects they produce by their distances and conjunctions, that he was believed to deal in the Magic art. The new born child, to whom he predicted the monarchy, was the emperor Augustus. This historian reports, that Nigidius meeting Octavius, asked him why he came so late to the senate. Because my wife, said he, is brought to bed of a boy. You have given us a master, immediately cried out Nigidius. This exclamation troubled Octavius to that degree, as even to make him resolve to kill his son; but the Astrologer diverted him from it, by telling him it was impossible to execute his design. It is not possible, said he, for the child to suffer any thing like it (24). I do not believe that Dion relates the thing exactly; for it is not the custom of great Astrologers to predict before they have erected their schemes of nativity. Now this is a work of application. You will answer, that as there are some who perform the rules of Arithmetic by the sole strength of memory (25), or play at Chess without men, why may not an Astrologer erect within himself the scheme of a nativity without any sensible object? To which I reply, in the first place, that such Arithmeticians, or Chess-players, are very rare; and, in the second place, that all these effects of imagination require time, and a recollection of mind, and cannot be done extempore, as Nigidius gave his answer, if we believe Dion. Let us say then that the historian maims his narration, and confounds the circumstances: we must suppose, that Nigidius, finding by Octavius's answer the moment of the birth, contemplated on this figure, or erected it at his leisure, and afterwards made the prediction. Suetonius permits us to believe that this was not done in such great haste. 'Quo natus est die (Augustus) says he, cum de Catilinæ conjuratione ageretur in curia, & Octavius ob 'uxoris puerperium serius adfuisset, nota ac vulgata 'res est, P. Nigidium comperta moræ causa, ut horam quoque partus acceperit, affirmasse, dominum 'terrarum orbi natum (26). . . . . On the same day 'Augustus was born, the senate being debating on 'Cataline's conspiracy, and Octavius coming thither late, 'on account of his wife being brought to bed, it is a common and known story, that Nigidius being told the reason of his coming no sooner, and the time of the birth, 'foretold that the child was born to be emperor of the 'world.'

(23) Dio, lib. xlv, init. pag. m. 306.

(24) Ὅτι ἀδύνατόν ἐςι τοιοῦτόν τι αὐτὸ παθεῖν. Quod ei infanti tale quid evenire impossibile foret. Id. ib.

(25) See the Journal of the Learned of the twenty first of November 1678, pag. 416, Dutch Edit.

(26) Sueton. in Augusto, cap. xciv.

The objection I have started against Dion would have less force, if he had considered Nigidius as a Magician; for in that case it might be said, that his Dæmon instantly revealed to him the destiny of Augustus. And therefore it must be observed, that I principally insist upon Dion's observing, that Nigidius, a great Astrologer, only delivered his prediction the same instant in which he knew that Octavius's son was born at such an hour. But I ought not to pass over in silence, that what is told of magical operations, supposes almost always some application of the Magician to certain ceremonies; without which it is not pretended he discovers futurities. I might therefore attack Dion's account also on that side.

I do not enter into the question whether Nigidius, erecting at his leisure the figure of the nativity of Octavius's son, actually predicted that he would be emperor. This question would draw on another: viz. how a great astrologer can discover such events. This is the order to be observed: we must first of all agree upon the fact, and afterwards seek for the causes; for it is mispending our time to examine how it is possible for certain things to be produced, which there is room to doubt whether ever they existed (27). If we were once well assured, that on the very day Augustus was born, his exaltation to the empire was predicted by Nigidius, it would be very reasonable to enquire how such a prediction could be made, and to seek for a good answer to this question. It is true, this enquiry does not seem to admit any possibility of an answer; for, in the first place, it would be absurd to say, that the knowledge of the influence of the stars can reveal futurities. 2. It seems unworthy of God to reveal himself to a man, who only prepares himself for this favour, by the ridiculous labour of erecting a figure. 3. It does not seem possible for an angel to reveal such casual events; for if he could foresee them by his natural science, there could be no free-will; all our thoughts would be as mechanical as the motions of bodies; and if he foresaw them by an infused science, God would have revealed them to him for no other purpose than to make a Prophet of a wretched Astrologer, which seems altogether inconsistent with the wisdom of God. If therefore it was true, that Augustus's elevation was foretold the day of his birth, the fact ought not to be disputed, much less the possibility of predictions; for there is nothing more foolish than to contradict experience by arguments ab impossibili: When the fact is agreed, after having attempted to discover its cause, we must fairly confess, that the manner or foundation of Nigidius's prediction exceeds the reach of our understanding, and that it is inexplicable. We are not reduced to these terms: Suetonius's nota ac vulgata res est, is no very strong proof: he does not say that this was divulged before Augustus was emperor. If he had said, I have read public and authentic acts, dated on his birth-day, which testify that Nigidius had made this prediction, he had alledged a considerable proof; but he is contented to say, that it was given out that Nigidius had done it. I do not doubt of it: I am certain that after Augustus was settled on the throne, there were spread infinite stories of the predictions of his greatness. Nigidius could not be forgotten, who was the most famous Astrologer of his time. He was brought into the party; and his discourse with Octavius was circumstantiated. All the city rung with it; orators, poets, and even historians, mentioned it. Suetonius found monuments of it: he has spoken of it as of a thing manifest; but the worst is he has forgotten the dates, the most essential thing of all. It is thus historians are to be pressed: give us uncontroverted proofs, that the Astrologer's prediction was current, when there was yet no probability of its accomplishment. We shall presently see that Lucan, going only upon probability, says a great many fine things of Nigidius's gift of prophecy.

Here is another proof of Nigidius's great reputation in regard to Astrology. Lucan reckons him among those who presaged the miseries of the Roman people, when the rupture was upon the point of breaking out between Cæsar and Pompey: He attributes to him abundance of speculations hereupon.

REFLEXION on what is said of Nigidius's prediction concerning Augustus's being emperor.

(27) Divers Thoughts upon Comets, num. 49.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google seconded Cicero with great prudence in defeating Catiline's conspiracy, and did him great services in the time of his adversity [F]. He engaged himself in Pompey's interest against Cæsar (e), which reduced him to the condition of an exile all the rest of his life, for he died in his exile (f). Cicero, who had always a very great esteem for him (g), wrote a fine letter of consolation to him, in the 707th year of Rome. It is the thirteenth of the fourth book ad Familiares. We find in St Austin the reason of his surname Figulus [G]. Some Critics, without any great foundation, affirm, that Nigidius wrote annals [H]. A certain

(e) See Cicero, Epist. xiii, lib. iv, ad Familiares.

(f) Euseb. in Chron. ad ann. 4, Olymp. 183, that is, in 709 year of Rome.

(g) See the remark [F].

At Figulus, cui cura Deos, secretaque cœli
Nosse fuit, quem non stellarum Ægyptia Memphis
Æquaret visu, numerisque moventibus astra,
Aut hic errat (ait) nulla cum lege per ævum
Mundus, & incerto discurrunt sidera motu:
Aut, si fata movent, orbi, generique paratur
Humano matura lues, &c (28).

(28) Lucan. Pharf. lib. I, ver. 639.

But Figulus exclaims (to science bred,
And in the Gods mysterious secrets read;
Whom nor Egyptian Memphis' sons excell'd,
Nor with more skill the rolling orbs beheld:
Well could he judge the labours of the sphere,
And calculate the just revolving year.)
The stars (he cries) are in confusion hurl'd,
And wand'ring error quite misguides the world;
Or if the laws of nature yet remain,
Some swift destruction now the Fates ordain, &c.

(29) In the remark [G].

Add to this the passage which I shall relate (29) from St Austin.

What Apuleius reports is considerable. He says, that he has read in Varro, that the Trallians informed themselves, by Magic art of the events of the Mithridatic war; and that a child, who beheld the image of Mercury in the water, repeated a hundred and sixty verses, which contained all that was to come to pass; and that Fabius, having lost five hundred Denarii, went to consult Nigidius, who, by the power of inchantments, made little boys tell where the purse was buried that contained some of them, and how the rest were distributed, and that Cato the Philosopher had one of them: it is added, that Cato confessed he had received one of a servant. Itemque Fabium, cum quingentos denarios perdidisset, ad Nigidium consultum venisse: ab eo pueros carmine instinctos indicasse ubi locorum defossa esset crumena, cum parte eorum, cæteri ut forent distributi: unum etiam denarium ex eo numero habere M. Catonem philosophum, quem se à pedisequo in stipem Apollinis accepisse Cato confessus est (30). I would fain know whether Varro gave his judgment upon all these stories; for he was a man whose learning was incomparably greater than his credulity.

(30) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. m. 301.

[F] He seconded Cicero . . . . in defeating Cataline's conspiracy, and did him great services in the time of his adversity.] The letter he received from Cicero in his exile contains these words: 'Careo cum familiarissimis 'multis, quos aut mors eripuit nobis, aut distraxit 'fuga, tum omnibus amicis quorum benevolentiam 'nobis conciliarat per me quondam, TE SOCIO, de- 'fensa respublica (31). - - - I am not only at a loss for 'many of my most intimate acquaintance, of whom either 'death or flight have deprived me, but also for all those 'friends whom I had gained by defending the common- 'wealth in conjunction with your self.' Corradus's note upon this passage tells us, that Nigidius had drawn up the interrogatories that were ordered to be put to the informers of the conspiracy (32). The letter I have cited ends thus: 'Ego quæ pertinere ad te intelligam 'studiosissime omnia diligentissimeque curabo: tuorum- 'que tristissimo meo tempore meritorum erga me me- 'moriam conservabo. - - - I shall take a very particular care of every thing wherein I can find you to be 'concerned; and shall never forget your favours to me 'in the time of my adversity.' Plutarch observes, that Cicero was animated against the conspirators by Terentia his wife, by Quintus his brother, and by Publius Nigidius, his companion in Philosophy, and his ordinary counsellor in the affairs of state. Ἡ δὲ Τερεντία . . . . . παρώξυνεν ἐπὶ τὰς ἀνδρείας. ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ Κόιντος ὁ ἀδελφὸς, καὶ τῶν ἀπὸ φιλοσοφίας ἑταίρων Πόπλιος Νιγίδιος, ᾧ τὰ πλεῖστα καὶ μέγιστα παρὰ τὰς πολιτικὰς ἐχρῶντο πράξεις. Terentia . . . . in conjuratos incendit: Quintus item ejus frater & in philosophia socius P. Nigidius, cujus fere gravissimis in negotiis publicis utebatur consilio (33). Add to this the passage of Plutarch (34), in which Cicero owns that he concerted with the Philosopher Nigidius, the most important deliberations, that saved the republic in his consulship. Aulus Gellius had reason to say, that Nigidius was much respected by Cicero for his sense and learning; but he ought also to have said, he was so for his services. 'Verba sunt hæc ipsa P. 'Nigidii, hominis in studiis bonarum artium præcel- 'lentis: quem M. Cicero ingenii doctrinarumque no- 'mine summe reveritus est (35). - - - These are the 'very words of Nigidius, a man eminent for universal 'knowledge; and who was most highly esteemed by M. 'Cicero for his great parts and learning.' Note, that when Cicero went to govern Cilicia, Nigidius waited for him at Ephesus, Nigidius, I say, who was returning to Rome, after his discharge of a public employ in that country. These two friends met with great pleasure, and had long philosophical conferences with Cratippus, a most famous Peripatetic. I observe this as a proof of Nigidius's intimacy with Cicero, and as an instance of his being employed in state-affairs. 'Nigidius quum me in Ciliciam proficiscentem Ephesi 'expectavisset, Romam ex legatione ipse decedens, 'venisset que eodem Mitylenis me salutandi, & visendi 'causa Cratippus, peripateticorum omnium, quos qui- 'dem ego audierim, meo judicio, facile princeps, per- 'libenter & Nigidium vidi, & cognovi Cratippum. 'At primum quidem tempus salutationibus, reliquum 'percontatione consumpsimus (36). - - - - As Nigidius 'waited for me at Ephesus, on my way to Cilicia, being 'himself returning to Rome from his embassy, and Cra- 'tippus was also come thither from Mitylene to make me 'a visit, who, in my judgment, is the most learned of all 'the Peripatetics I ever yet conversed with, it was doub- 'ly agreeable to me to meet with my friend, and to be- 'come acquainted with Cratippus. The first part of our 'time was taken up in salutations, the remainder in 'philosophical subjects.'

(31) Cicero, Epist. xiii, lib. iv, ad Familiares, pag. 218, Græv. Edit.

(32) Quippe qui indicum dicta, interrogata, responsa perscripseris. Corrad. in hunc locum Cicer.

(33) Plut. in Vita Cicer. pag. 870, D.

(34) Id. an seni sit gerenda Resp. 797. D.

(35) Aulus Gellius, lib. xi, cap. xi, where he relates the difference Nigidius made betwixt mentiri & mendacium dicere. Nonius Marcellus voce mentiri, pag. m. 445, relating the same difference gives the same elogy, Mentiri & mendacium dicere quemadmodum differt P. Nigidius studiis bonarum artium præcellentissimus manifestissime separavit.

(36) Cicero, de Universitate, initio, fol. m. 379. B.

[G] We find in St Austin the reason of his surname Figulus.] St Austin, confuting Astrology by the argument of the different fate of two twins, proposes Nigidius's answer to this difficulty. This Astrologer maintained, that the motion of the Heavens, is so rapid, that though there is but a small interval betwixt the birth of the first and second of the twins, yet they are born under celestial points very different from each other: and to prove it, he turned with all his strength a Potter's wheel, and made two marks on it whilst it turned: it was thought that the marks were made upon the same part of the wheel; but when it rested, they appeared to be at a good distance from one another. This was the reason of his being surnamed the Potter, Figulus. These are the words of St Austin (37): Frustra itaque assertur nobile illud commentum de figuli rota, quod respondisse ferunt Nigidium hac quæstione turbatum, unde & Figulus appellatus est. Dum enim rotam figuli vi quanta potuit intorsisset, currente illa bis numero de atramento tanquam uno ejus loco summa celeritate percussit: deinde inventa sunt signa, quæ fixerat desistente motu, non parvo intervallo in rotæ illius extremitate distantia. Sic, inquit, in tanta cœli rapacitate, etiam si alter post alterum tanta celeritate nascatur, quanta rotam bis ipse percussit, in cœli spatio plurimum est. Hinc sunt, inquit, quæcunque dissimillima perhibentur in moribus, casibusque geminorum. Hoc figmentum fragilius est quam vasa quæ illa rotatione figuntur. St Austin had reason to think this answer as fragil as a Potter's vessels. He solidly confutes it. See also his commentators (38).

(37) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. v, cap. iii.

(38) Ludovicus Vives, & Leonard. Coquæus.

[H] Some Critics affirm . . . . that Nigidius wrote annals.] You will find some fragments of his amongst those which Riccobon has collected from the antient historians, and which he pretends Livy has followed. Vossius declares, that he is not of this Critic's opinion, but that he ought however to be so, if what la Popeliniere affirms was true, that Nigidius composed annals

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google certain obſcure author fathers on him a treatiſe concerning the Remedies of Love [I]. I ſhall ſum up in one ſingle remark the miſtakes of Mr Moreri, and thoſe of ſome other authors [K]; but I will ſet down here a ſtrange blunder of Father Rapin. He ſays in the thirteenth paragraph of his Reflexions upon Philoſophy, that Nigidius was baniſhed by Auguſtus for the crime of Magic. I do not by this pretend to deny that he paſſed for a Magician. See the paſſage of Apuleius at the end of the remark [E].

(39) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. 50.

(40) La Popeliniere, Hiſtory of Hiſtories, lib. v, pag. 301.

(41) In the remark [D].

(42) In the paſſages above cited, remark [F].

(43) In the laſt remark.

nals (39). La Popeliniere is of no authority here, ſince he has committed ſo many faults in a few lines. Paul. Nigidius Figulus, ſays he (40), was in no leſs eſteem in his time for learning than Varro. But the confuſion and obſcurity of his writings prevented their being preſerved and recommended to poſterity; which is the reaſon theſe annals came not down to us. He adds what I have already confuted (41). What dependance is there upon a man, who thinks that Paulus was a prænomen in antient Rome, and knows not that Nigidius's prænomen was Publius? Plutarch has given it him twice at full length (42). I queſtion much whether Aulus Gellius has been rightly underſtood. He inſinuates that Nigidius became obſcure by his ſubtilty: his little grammatical punctillios were not underſtood, and were thought uſeleſs; and therefore his writings were ſuffered to be loſt. There is no likelihood that his books de Animalibus periſhed on this account. They doubtleſs contained many curious reſearches, and eaſy to be underſtood This we may be aſſured of from what remains of them. There is yet much more reaſon for us to believe, that if he had written annals, they would have been found intelligible. Therefore let us reject what la Popeliniere has ſaid. We ſhall ſee, by and by, the origin of theſe pretended annals (43).

[I] A certain obſcure author fathers on him a treatiſe concerning the Remedies of Love.] A judicious reader reaps advantage from every thing; for which reaſon I do not think this remark uſeleſs: it proves by an example in print, that there are no lies, tho' ever ſo groſs, extravagant, and fooliſh, but that ſome authors will make no ſcruple to relate them ſeriouſly. The caſe is this: 'Nigidius, Ovid, and Samocratius, have 'compoſed a great many volumes, and ſerious writ-'tings, concerning the remedy of love; but the jeſt 'is, that they could invent many remedies for 'others, but could find out none for themſelves: 'becauſe they all three died, proſecuted, and de-'ſtroyed, not for the crimes they committed at 'Rome, but for their amours at Capua. Now let 'Nigidius tell his diſcoveries, and Ovid his thoughts, 'and Samocratius ſay what he pleaſes; the beſt 'remedy at laſt will be to avoid converſations, and 'to ſhun the occaſions (44); for in the caſe of Love, 'we ſhall obſerve but very few who ſtand their 'ground to continue exempt from its chains, where-'as thoſe who fly, may preſerve their liberty (45)'. You will find in the margin the name and titles of him who has ſaid this, and alſo the title of his book. I can tell you that he publiſhed it at London, but not in what year: he dedicated it to Charles prince of Wales, the only ſon of the king of England; from whence you may certainly conclude, that he lived in the reign of James I. Is it not a pity that a paſſage, which ends with ſo very good a reflexion, ſhould contain ſuch abſurdities? For the reſt, this conjunction of Nigidius with Ovid, puts me in mind that Pierius Valerianus aſcribes to them jointly the ſame poem. 'Ovidius eo volumine quod 'Halieuticon inſcribitur, quod opus olim à Nigidio 'elucubratum ajunt (46). - - - - Ovid in that volume 'which he intitles Halieuticon, which work is ſaid 'to have been formerly compoſed by Nigidius.'

(44) Confer remark [N] of the article FONTEVRAUD.

(45) Francis Vollerert, Sieur de Florizel, counſeller, notary, and ſecretary to the king, the houſe, and crown of France, pag. 83, of The Meadow of Miſcellaneous Flowers.

(46) Pierius Valerianus, Hieroglyph. lib. xxx, apud Rutgerſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 289.

[K] The miſtakes of Mr Moreri, and thoſe of ſome other authors.] He is miſtaken in ſaying that Nigidius was baniſhed for being ſuſpected to be a Magician; for it is certain his exile was occaſioned only from his not daring to return to Rome, after Cæſar was maſter. He had followed Pompey, and not being able to obtain his pardon, he was afraid of being ſacrificed to Cæſar's reſentment. This was the whole of his exile. The fact is notorious to any one that reads Cicero's thirteenth letter of his fourth book ad Familiares. Glandorpius (47) does not faithfully report the thought of Aulus Gellius: he makes him ſay, that the obſcurity and ſublimity of Nigidius's writings were the reaſon of their being unknown. He adds that ſome quote the twenty-fourth book of Nigidius's Compoſitions of Grammar. This is an error. If he means that none but that is cited, he is miſtaken. If he would tell us that the work contained at leaſt twenty-four books; he is equally miſtaken. Aulus Gellius has cited the twenty-ninth. Theſe words of Glandorpius, citantur . . . . præterea de annalibus, contain an error of the preſs; which probably was the cauſe that ſeveral moderns have made Nigidius an annaliſt: it ſhould be de Animalibus, and not de Annalibus. Laſtly, Glandorpius ſays, that Cicero, in his ſecond Philippic, obſerves, that Nigidius died in exile. I do not think this is to be met with in that oration. We can only infer from another book of Cicero (48) that Nigidius was dead. What Glandorpius has ſaid of Nigidius, has been inſerted word for word in Charles Stephens's Dictionary; and after this Mr Lloyd has altered nothing from Stephens, nor Hofman in this article from Lloyd. So true it is, that if you cut not off the thread of generations, theſe faults multiply from book to book ſucceſſively without ceaſing.

(47) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 625.

(48) That de Univerſitate, in the beginning.

NIHUSIUS (BARTHOLD) obtained repute by his works in the XVIIth century [A]; and I do not know whether he may not very properly be called a famous convert, and a famous converter (a). He was born at Wolpe in the duke of Brunſwick's territories in 1589, and having ſtudied ſome time in the colleges of Verden and Goſlar, he went to the univerſity of Helmſtad about the year 1607. As he was but ill furniſhed with money he was obliged to ſeek a maſter for his ſubſiſtance. He entered into the ſervice of Cornelius Martinus, who read Logic (b). He continued there four years, and made a progreſs in the ſciences; for his maſter did not ſo fully employ him, but that he left him ſome hours for ſtudy (c), and even took the pains to inſtruct him. The youth, obtaining favour by his good qualities and wit, was recomended to the biſhop of Oſnabrug, and obtained a penſion from him. To teſtify his gratitude, he wrote verſes upon this prelate's birth-day; but as he was no Poet, he made uſe of a borrowed Poem, and

(a) See the remark [B] of the article LAMBECIUS.

(b) Tenuis & inops, & ut vitam tolerare poſſet . . . Cornelio Martino Antverpio, Logices Doctori, famulitium ſuum addixit. Calixtus, De Arte Nova, pag. m. 6.

(c) Quibus (diſciplinis) inter domeſtica miniſteria, ſub tanto hero & magiſtro quantus Cornelius erat, fatis feliciter imbuebatur. Ibid. pag. 7.

[A] He obtained repute by his works.] Theſe are ſuch as have come to my knowledge. Proſphonematicus ad Senatores Brunſwigios & Luneburgicos de Conrado Horneo, Cologne 1646, in 8vo. Moroſophus, ſeu Vedelius in ſuo Rationali prorſus irrationalis, ibidem. Synacticus, ibidem. Epiſtola de cruce ad Thomam Bartholinum, ibidem 1647. Hypodigma quo diluuntur nonnulla contra Catholicos diſputata in Cornelii Martini tractatu de analyſi logica, ibidem 1648, in 8vo. Programmata duo ad Proteſtantium Academicos, Moguntiæ 1655, in 8vo. Annotationes de communione Orientalium ſub ſpecie unica, in 4*to*. This work was printed at Cologne in 1648, at the end of Leo Allatius's book, De perpetua conſenſione Eccleſiæ Occidentalis & Orientalis, the edition of which was procured by Nihuſius. He alſo procured the publication of Allatius's Symmicta at Cologne in 1653 in 8vo, and of ſome other pieces of the ſame author at Cologne in 1645; amongſt others a treatiſe, intituled, Confutatio fabulæ de Joanna Papiſſa ex monumentis Græcis; to which he added ſomething. In 1658 was publiſhed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

and publiſhed it in his own name [B]. His patron's liberality did not prevent his being reduced to ſtraits, though he taught in private the richeſt ſcholars, after he had taken his maſter's degree in Philoſophy in 1612. He wavered betwixt the ſtudy of Phyſic and Divinity, becauſe he feared a very powerful faction, which oppoſed all thoſe who had been diſciples of Martinus and Caſelius [C]. He experienced the ill will of this faction, when he was to maintain metaphyſical theſes 1614. He met with a terrible affront, which began to diſguſt him againſt the Lutheran church. Two years after he was made Tutor to two gentlemen, whom he brought to the univerſity of Iëna. He afterwards obtained the like employ at the court of Weimar (d). He had there a good ſalary, and made an honourable figure: nevertheleſs he retired from thence without ſaying a word to any perſon and came to Cologne, where he turned Catholic about the year 1622. His firſt employ was the direction of the college of Proſelytes [D]. He wrote ſome letters of controverſy to Horneius and Calixtus (e), in which he laid the whole ſtreſs upon the neceſſity there is that Chriſtians ſhould have a judge to determine diſputes viva voce infallibly; for the Scripture being a law, which can only ſpeak by the interpretation that is given to it, and controverſies being founded upon the different interpretations that are given to the Scripture; there is a neceſſity, ſaid he, either that the diſputes of Chriſtians ſhould never have an end, or that there ſhould be a ſpeaking authority in the church, to which all private perſons ſhould be obliged to ſubmit (f). He placed this authority in the perſon of the Pope; and when the bad life of many Popes was objected to

(d) According to Voſſius, Epiſt. CCCLXXX. pag. 349. He was preceptor to the famous duke of Weimar, who commanded under Guſtavus.

(e) Famous Divines at Helmſtad.

(f) See the article MAIMBOURG, remark [D].

liſhed a book in 8vo, with this title; Bart. Nihuſii Tractatus Chorographicus de nonnullis Aſiæ Provinciis ad Tygrim, Euphratem, & Mediterraneum ac rubrum mare (1). I ſhall ſpeak below of his new method of controverſy.

(1) The Sieur Witte, in Diario, ad ann. 1657, makes mention of ſome tracts of Logic by Nihuſius.

[B] He made uſe of a borrowed poem, and publiſhed it in his own name.] The biſhop of Oſnabrug, who contributed to his maintenance, entered into his 43d year the firſt of July 1610. He was called Philip Sigiſmund, and was of the houſe of Brunſwic. Calixtus made this poem for Nihuſius. 'Natalem ejus prin-'cipis quadrageſimum tertium carmine celebrare vo-'luit. Sed quum aridiore eſſet venâ, quàm ut quic-'quam inde poſſet elicere, meam qualemcunque ope-'ram commodavi, carmenque confeci, quod ipſius no-'mine typis deſcriptum Principique oblatum fuit (2). '.... He had a mind to celebrate the birth-day of this 'Prince, on his entering into his 43*d year, with a piece* 'of poetry. But having no genius for poetry, I lent him 'my aſſiſtance, ſuch as it was, and compoſed a Poem, 'which was printed and preſented to the prince in his 'name.' Calixtus tells this himſelf.

(2) Georgius Calixtus, in Digreſſione de Arte nova, pag. 7.

[C] A faction .... which oppoſed all thoſe who had been diſciples of Martinus and Caſelius.] This faction conſiſted of ſome perſons, who would not allow a Divine to be either a good Humaniſt or good Philoſopher: and therefore they prevented the admiſſion of ſuch to eccleſiaſtical preferments, who had ſtudied Humanity under Caſelius, and Philoſophy under Martinus. This not a little puzzled young Nihuſius; he durſt not ſtudy Divinity, fearing to meet with this faction in his way to Church-preferment. His caution was ſo great, that when he maintained a theſis, dedicated to the biſhop of Oſnabrug, and accompanied with ſome Greek verſes in praiſe of the reſpondent, he would not permit the author of this elogy to inſert the name of Martinus. He was afraid, leſt the praiſes of this Philoſopher ſhould provoke theſe gentlemen. He therefore rather choſe to be ungrateful, than expoſe himſelf to the ill-offices of thoſe, who might one time or other oppoſe his little fortune. Calixtus blames him very juſtly, for this ſelf-intereſted conduct, and declares this was courting the favour of a certain party, which men of worth and honour choſe rather to diſoblige. 'Quod vereretur ne id ſibi apud μισο-'λόγους καὶ μισοσόφους inſcitiæ patronos fraudi eſſet. 'Tanta erat ejus ſive puſillanimitas, ſive creſcendi 'cupiditas, ut nomen viri eximii, è cujus domo & 'diſciplinâ prodiiſſe gloriæ verti oportebat, taceri 'mallet, quam abjicere qualemcumque ſpem iis pla-'cendi, quibus ut diſplicerent rectæ & præſtantes ani-'mæ totâ vitâ ſeſe adlaboraſſe nunquam diffitebun-'tur (3)..... Becauſe he was fearful this might do him 'ſome injury among the decriers of Learning and Philo-'ſophy, thoſe patrons of ignorance. Such was his mean-'neſs of ſpirit, or his earneſtneſs to make his fortune, 'that he choſe rather to avoid mentioning the name of 'that great man, to whom he ought to have gloried in 'having been a pupil, than forfeit his views in pleaſing 'thoſe, whoſe diſpleaſure all upright and ingenuous minds 'will always own to have been the point they have 'aimed at.' He obſerves, that there are always to be found more or leſs of theſe capricious men, who oppoſe the advancement of youth, unleſs they ſtudy under ſuch or ſuch maſters. 'Non deerant tunc (quam-'quam vix unquam deſunt, niſi quod alio atque alio 'tempore plus minuſve poſſunt) qui accuratiora lite-'rarum & philoſophiæ ſtudia odiſſent, & cum Theo-'logiâ conjungi nollent, ne in aliis admirari, quæ in 'ſe defiderarent, cogerentur. Et quum inter illos 'unus primario loco ſederet, iis qui è ſummorum vi-'rorum Caſelii & Cornelii diſciplinâ prodierant, adi-'tus ad officia & dignitatem muneris eccleſiaſtici vel 'omnino intercludebat, vel difficillimum ſaltem redde-'bat. Quæ res hominem meticuloſum adeo terruit, 'ut ſacra Theologiæ ſtudia animo diffidente & vacil-'lante tractaret (4)..... There were not wanting at 'that time, (nor indeed are they at any time, tho' their 'power may happen to be greater at one time than ano-'ther) thoſe who had an averſion to the politer ſtudies 'of Humanity and Philoſophy, and oppoſed their being 'joined with Divinity, that they might not be obliged to 'admire thoſe talents in others, which were wanting 'in themſelves. And as there was one of this claſs in a 'very high ſtation, the way to eccleſiaſtical preferments 'and dignities was either quite ſtopped, or rendered very 'difficult to all thoſe who had been educated under thoſe 'great men, Caſelius and Martinus. Which ſo terrified 'a man of his timorous diſpoſition, as to make him pur-'ſue his Theological ſtudies with great diffidence and in-'conſtancy.' The unfortunate Nihuſius loſt all his advances; his policy did him no ſervice: the faction which he had ſo carefully courted, gave him notwithſtanding a ſevere mortification, which had unlucky conſequences; for from that time he became diſguſted againſt Lutheraniſm. 'Anno 1614, inſignis ei 'illata erat injuria diſputaturo è lumine naturæ prin-'cipiiſque philoſophicis de Deo. Quam tamen è fon-'te, quem digito ante indicavimus, manaſſe, & intel-'ligentibus ac bonis omnibus, non minus quam ipſi, 'doluiſſe, nunquam potuit ignorare. Et hæc, niſi 'vehementer fallor, animum ejus à reformatâ religione 'primùm cœpit abalienare (5)..... In the year 1614, being about to diſpute concerning the Deity from the light 'of nature, and the principles of Philoſophy, he met with 'a very high affront, which he could not be ignorant of 'having proceeded from the ſame ſpring before mentioned, 'to the great concern of all learned and good men, as 'well as of himſelf. And this, if I am not greatly 'miſtaken, was the firſt occaſion of alienating his mind 'from the Proteſtant religion.'

(3) Ib. pag. 9.

(4) Ib. pag. 8.

(5) Ib. pag. 12.

[D] He had .... the direction of the college of Proſelytes.] They educated in this college, at the charge of the Arch-fraternity of the Holy Croſs, the young people who turned Catholics; but then it was neceſſary that one of their fraternity ſhould have a hand in their converſion (6). The duke of Bavaria was then the head of this fraternity: Albert of Auſtria had been in that ſtation before him, and Cardinal de Zollern, biſhop of Oſnabrug, had firſt of all enjoyed this dignity. 'Mihi id negatum hactenus, ut pote cujus 'curæ ac ſollicitudine perpetuæ demandatum Colle-'gium,

(6) Ita tamen ut nemo in Collegium illud ſive Seminarium recipiatur, niſi ab aliquo Archifraternitatis iſtius membro in viam ſalutis adductus. Nihuſius, Epiſt. ad Nicolaum Granium Helmſtadii Phyſices Profeſſorem, apud Calixtum, ibid. pag. 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to him, he had the confidence to retort this objection againſt the authors of the Scripture [E]. The letter he wrote to Calixtus has been printed more than once. That celebrated profeſſor, unwilling to anſwer him in writing, undertook to refute him in his auditory; of which he gave notice to the ſtudents, by a written paper poſted up. This paper was printed without the author's knowledge in 1625; and being very ſevere did extremly incenſe Nihuſius, who returned ſome time after into the country of Brunſwic to be director of a convent of nuns (g). He was made abbot of Ilfeld in 1629, after that monaſtery had being juſt then taken from the houſe of Brunſwic who had made a ſchool of it; in which Michael Neander, and his ſucceſſours, had educated very good ſcholars. The next year he publiſhed a book in High-Dutch, in which he violently inveighed againſt Calixtus: and at laſt, in 1633, his darling work came to light. It was a new method to confound the Heretics (b) [F], which was very learnedly refuted by Calixtus. Nihuſius knew ſo well how

(g) Monialibus Cœnobii Haldenſlebienſis præpoſitus eſt. Calixtus, ubi ſupra, pag. 26.

(b) Taken from Calixtus in his digreſſion de Arte nova.

'gium, ubi ſelecti omnium Facultatum ſtudioſi, ad 'fidem catholicam converſi, jamque à ſuis omni ope 'deſtituti, aluntur atque ad altiora diriguntur, & qui-'dem ſumptu Archifraternitatis Sanctæ Crucis, cujus (7) Id. ib. 'caput hodie Elector Bavariæ, &c (7). .... This is 'what I have not hitherto been able to obtain, as being 'intruſted with the care and concerns of the college, 'where the choice ſtudents in every faculty who are con-'verted to the Catholic faith, and now deprived of all 'ſubſiſtence elſewhere, are maintained and encouraged to 'make farther advances, and this at the expence of 'the archfraternity of the Holy Croſs, whoſe preſent 'head, the duke of Bavaria, &c.' Theſe words are taken from a letter of Nihuſius. By this we perceive with what vigilance the church of Rome has for a long time minded the buſineſs of converſions.

[E] He had the confidence to retort this objection againſt the authors of the Scripture.] A curſed effect of prepoſſeſſion! A man who is once engaged in an hypotheſis, and has made it his darling, ſpares nothing ſacred or profane to maintain it, and get clear of an objection. He will rather have the Scripture ſuffer, than be found without reply; and, provided his opinions be ſecured from inſults, he is little concerned about the ſacred writers ſuffering in their credit: he endeavours to ſave himſelf at their coſt; and oppoſes them to the breach, that they may be trampled on, before the enemy comes at him, or that the reſpect for them may prevent his being attacked. He makes uſe of the ſtratagem that was ſo advantageous to the Spaniards, when they re-took Maeſtricht in 1576. They placed the women of Wich (8) before their ſoldiers, ſo that the inhabitants of Maeſtricht durſt not fire upon the Spaniards: For they feared they ſhould kill their relations, or at leaſt their country-women (9). However it be, when Nihuſius was to anſwer Calixtus, who ſaid it became not the Divine Wiſdom to eſtabliſh religion upon the authority of ſuch wretches as the Popes had been for whole ages, he urged that the authors of the Bible were very wicked men, either bare-facedly, as David, or perhaps ſecretly. 'Objeceram ego, non eſſe probabile nec divinæ pro-'videntiæ, quæ ſuaviter omnia diſponat & gubernet, 'conſentaneum, certitudinem univerſæ doctrinæ quæ 'ad pietatem Deique cultum faciat, ab auctoritate & 'arbitrio hominum impiorum & flagitioſorum, qua-'les aliquando integris ſeculis (audiatur de decimo te-'ſtis Baronius) Romani Pontifices fuerint, ſuſpendere: 'ab auctoritate inquam & arbitrio hominum, quos ipſi 'eorum clientes an patroni, & inter hos princeps Ba-'ronius, monſtra horrenda, apoſtaticos, fures & latro-'nes, vitâ turpiſſimos, moribus perditiſſimos, uſquequaque 'fœdiſſimos ex re & vero proclament. Ut hoc telum 'declinet, de auctoribus Sacræ Scripturæ idem pro-'nunciat. Scripturæ, inquit, conditæ à meris homini-'bus, & partim apertè, ut erat David, partim forſan 'etiam occultè facinoroſis (10). .... I had objected, that 'it was not probable, nor agreeable to the Divine Pro-'vidence, which governs and diſpoſes all things in the 'moſt beautiful regularity, to found the certainty of the 'whole ſyſtem of knowledge, relating to piety and the 'worſhip of God, upon the authority and decrees of im-'pious and wicked men, ſuch as the Popes of Rome have 'been for whole ages, I appeal to Baronius himſelf, as a 'witneſs againſt the tenth; upon the authority, I ſay, 'and decrees of men, whoſe very advocates or patrons, 'and among theſe Baronius in the firſt place, cry out up-'on with reaſon and truth, as horrid monſters, apoſtates, thieves, and robbers, moſt ſcandalous in their 'lives, moſt abandoned in their morals, and every 'way moſt abominable. To defend himſelf from this 'blow, he declares the ſame thing of the authors of ſa-'cred Scripture. The Scriptures, ſays he, are compoſ-'ed by mere men, either openly, as David, or per-'haps privately wicked.' It was no difficult taſk for the profeſſor of Helmſtad to confound him, upon ſo falſe and deteſtable a retortion (11). There is a great deal of difference between a holy man who commits heinous ſins, of which he ſpeedily repents, and thoſe who continue all their lives in a ſinful courſe.

(11) Ib. p. 20.

[F] He publiſhed .... a new method to confound the Heretics.] It was printed at Hildeſheim, with this title: Ars nova dicto ſacræ Scripturæ unico lucrandi è Pontificiis plurimos in partes Lutheranorum, detecta nonnihil & ſuggeſta Theologis Helmſtetenſibus, Georgio Calixto præſertim & Conrado Hornejo. Calixtus did not write a book on purpoſe to refute it; he contented himſelf with anſwering it by way of digreſſion, in a work he had then in the preſs, namely, an Epitome of Moral Divinity, which was publiſhed in 1634. This digreſſion was printed apart by the Frankfort Bookſellers in 1652, in a volume of 344 pages in 4to. The author addreſſes himſelf to the profeſſors of the Roman Catholic univerſities in Germany, and all along treats them very civilly. He obſerves (12) that Nihuſius was not the firſt who had invented methods of controverſy; and ſays, that Renatus Benoit, Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, propoſed a particular method of that kind in 1565 (13). He adds, that this doctor grew milder afterwards, and publiſhed a French book at Caen (14), to ſhew that the Proteſtants could not be convicted of hereſy, either as to their doctrine or their worſhip; and that the council of Trent, which condemned them, was not clear of faults, neither has it been received in the kingdom. Calixtus does not doubt but this book was written by Renatus Benoit; for, ſays he, Thuanus (15) tells us, that Henry IV, being at laſt reſolved to go to maſs, had a mind to be inſtructed by that doctor; who, coming to the king, had like to have loſt his benefice (16), as being a favourer of the ſectaries, and one who had preached what was contrary to the Faith (17). Theſe reaſons appear to me not to be of ſufficient force to make me believe that Renatus Benoit was the author of the book printed at Caen. Had he been the author of it, he had never kept his living of St Euſtache, till the king's abjuration. The doctors of the Sorbonne, who moved to have him excommunicated, when he went from Paris to wait on the king of Navarre, would have inſiſted chiefly upon this book, and not upon certain things alledged to have been delivered by him in the pulpit. I believe therefore, that, by a trick familiar to the writers in thoſe days, ſome author, who was either a good Huguenot, or, out of policy, engaged in the intereſt of Henry IV, publiſhed that book in Benoit's name. This, I very well know, is not the opinion of the author of the eleventh volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle; for he poſitively aſcribes it to the curate of St Euſtache (18). To turn to the hiſtory of methods:

(12) Ibid. pag. 126.

(13) In a book intituled, Stromata in univerſum Organum Biblicum, ſeu Panoplia adverſus omnes nunc viventes Hæreſes.

(14) In the year 1590.

(15) Thuan. lib. cvii.

(16) He was curate of St Euſtache.

(17) Thuan. lib. cviii.

(18) See pag. 546, of Tome xi, of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle. In the ſubſequent pages you will find the title, and the abſtract of the pretended book of Renatus Benoit.

Calixtus obſerves (19), 1. That about forty years after Renatus Benoit had publiſhed his Method, Father Gonteri the Jeſuit appeared with his. He was followed by Father Arnoux, and Father Francis Veron, both Jeſuits. 2. That Vedelius (20) is perſuaded that cardinal du Perron drew the plan of theſe Jeſuits method; which conſiſts in obliging the Proteſtants to prove what they teach in oppoſition to the council of Trent, not by the aſſiſtance of conſequences, but by expreſs words of Scripture. 3. That he cannot perſuade himſelf (21) that this cardinal approved that method, ſince it differs ſo widely from that we meet with in his controverſy with king James. 4. That in 1605, Antony Faber,

(19) Calixt. ibid. pag. 129.

(20) In Rationali Theologico.

(21) Calixt. ibid. pag. 130.

(8) It is that part of the town which is beyond the bridge.

(9) Captas quas potuêre, loci mulieres ante fore ſtatuunt objiciuntque: atque eo promoto velu-ti vallo ſubeunt pontem mulſebriter cyperati, ſclopos ſubter earum brachia axillaſque in hoſtem colli-mantes. In quos dum explodere ſeva trepidant, ne conſanguineas affinesve, popu-lares certe ſuas, antequam Hiſpa-nos, impeterent, audiunt, &c. Strada, de Bello Belgico, Decad. i, lib. viii, pag. m. 103. See alſo Valerius Maximus, lib. v, cap. i, num. 5.

(10) Calixt. ubi ſupra, pag. 19.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

how to improve his interest, that he came to b gan of the archbishopric of Mentz (i). In the March 1657 (k). He had made himself frie the edition of some books composed beyond you, that, being driven from his abbey by continued several years (m) [G]. In that co and among other things told him, that the p munion of Rome, was his observing that nothing by demonstration [H].

(i) Tuldenus, Part iii, Histor. pag. 165, apud Konig, Biblioth. vet. & nova, pag. 577.

(k) Id. ib. apud eundem, ibid.

Faber, publishing a Code, prefixed to it a new method of overthrowing the Heretics. 'Codex Antonii Fabri Sebusiani, Senatoris & Consiliarii Sabaudici, quem à suo nomine Fabrianum inscripsit, bonum factum existimans, si in vestibulo voluminis hæreticos, quos vocat, insigni & majore, quam Jurisconsulto-rum captus esse solet, audaciâ conficeret. Cui conatui primum librum impendit; eliso tamen, ut accepimus, alterius Jurisconsulti, Jacobi videlicet Lectii, operâ & opposito scripto (22). - - - The Code of Antony Faber of Breſſe, a ſenator and counſellor of Savoy, which, from his own name, he intituled Codex Fabrianus, eſteeming it a good work, to attack in the beginning of the volume thoſe he calls Heretics, with greater violence than is uſually to be met with from the capacity of Civilians. Upon this undertaking he ſpends the firſt book; fifling at the ſame time, as I have been informed, the work and oppoſite writings of another Civilian, namely, James Lectius.' Every plaintiff, said he, is obliged to bring proof, whether he insists on the negative or the affirmative: this is the maxim of Law; and he is more especially obliged to it, when he disturbs those who are in the peaceable possession of the estate for which he sues. This Civilian concludes, that the Protestants are bound to prove all that they deny; and in case of failure of good proof, ought to be non-suited. This is the whole of Nihusius's invention, and is nothing more than the method of prescription. 'Primum & præcipuum caput artis Nihusianæ, aut potiùs Fabrianæ, hoc ipsum est, probationem omnium eorum, quæ Pontificii hodie affirmant, declinare & à se alienam dicere, atque adeo nihil eorum, quæ de Pontificis principatu & infallibilitate, de sacrificio Christi in Missâ quâ speciem & substantiam iterando, de statuis adorandis, de purgatorio, septem sacramentis, indulgentiis & plurimis similibus adferunt, vel è Scripturâ, vel è traditione Ecclesiasticâ probare velle: nempe quia ipsi sint in possessione suorum dogmatum; quin, ait, se & majores suos, cum quibus & nostri aliquando fecerint, ab aliquot seculis in possessione fuisse, suasque adeo de religione opiniones sive sententias usucepisse, vel, ut recentiores loquuntur, præscripsisse. Se igitur & suos non teneri ad probationem eorum, quæ ipsi doceant & affirment, sed probationis, & quidem prævalidæ vicem esse, quod affirment: nos verò teneri, ut quæ negamus, demonstremus, & quidem demonstremus è Scripturâ, id est, Scripturam continere negantes, ipsorum affirmantibus oppositas (23). - - - The principal and fundamental point of Nihusius's, or rather, Faber's method, is this, to decline, and to deny, their having any thing to do with the proof of all thoſe things which the modern Catholics affirm, and therefore not to undertake the proving, either from Scripture, or from the tradition of the church, any of thoſe things which they maintain concerning the Pope's primacy, infallibility, the ſacrifice of CHRIST in the maſs ſpecifically and ſubſtantially repeated, the adoration of images, Purgatory, the ſeven ſacraments, indulgences, and ſeveral others of the like nature: and for this reaſon, becauſe they are in poſſeſſion of theſe their doctrines; for he ſays that they, and their anceſtors, with whom ours alſo formerly joined, have enjoyed this poſſeſſion for ſome centuries, and therefore have gained a right to their religious doctrines and opinions, or, as the moderns expreſs themſelves, have obtained a preſcription-right. That therefore they, and ſuch as remain with them, are not under any obligation of proving theſe things, which they teach and maintain; but that it is incumbent upon us to demonſtrate what we deny, and to demonſtrate it from Scripture, that is, to ſhew that the Scripture contains the direct negatives to thoſe propoſitions which they maintain in the affirmative.' Thus far has Dr Calixtus carried the history of these methods. See the sequel or continuation of it in

(22) Ibid. pag. 156.

(23) Ibid. pag. 159, 160.

I

Nicolas Ritterſhuſius being charged with ſtealing things from Nihuſius, returned an anſwer that deſerves conſideration [I]. The author of Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica Sæculi Decimi diſputare. Eligere ſuos Lutheranos, vel etiam Calvinianos, & quoſvis alios, poſſe, ubi maximè exiſtiment ſuæ Eccleſiæ cauſam triumphare. Si unum viderit argumentum, velle redire ad eos, unde malum pedem extulerit. Sin diſputando intelligant, nihil ſolidi crepare, quicquid hactenus obtenditur, æquum videri, ut redeamus ad Romanæ Eccleſiæ ſinum (31). His ſtrongeſt argument was this: Tell me, Mr Voſſius, why your father quitted the church of Rome? give me one juſt reaſon for it. Voſſius inſiſted on the difference that was to be met with between that church and the primitive church; but after ſeveral diſcourſes he fixed upon this: the doctors of the church of Rome interpret Scripture in ſuch a manner, that they put upon it a ſenſe manifeſtly forced, and ſometimes contradictory, and, in general, widely different from the doctrine of the antient Fathers; and not content with this, they put to death thoſe who will not adopt ſuch interpretations: there was juſt reaſon therefore to come to a rupture with ſuch interpreters of the word of God, and to form new aſſemblies, as well for obtaining a worſhip agreeable to one's conſcience, as for preſerving a life that may be ſerviceable to one's country, church, and family (32). Illo igitur poſcente cauſam juſtam, cur parens meus à Romana abierit Eccleſia, reſpondi multa, de veteris, præſentis Romanæ Eccleſiæ diſcrimine. Sed tandem in eo pedem figebamus; Romanæ Eccleſiæ Doctoribus, ita ſcripturas interpretantibus, ut manifeſta iis vis fiat, planaque abeant à primorum ſeculorum Doctoribus, imo interdum (ut in tranſubſtantiationis dogmate) ſenſus interpretationi reclamet, manifeſtaque ſit contradictio: nec ſolum ſic interpretantibus, ſed etiam, niſi ſimpliciter (33) interpreteris, ferro te, & flamma perdere paratis: jure ab ejuſmodi Doctoribus receditur, ac ſeorſim cultus Dei celebratur, partim conſcientiæ ſtudio, partim vitæ conſervandæ, quam Patriæ, Eccleſiæ, Familiæ, & amicis conducibilem exiſtimamus. Tho' Voſſius's anſwer was highly reaſonable, he did not entirely rely upon it; for he deſired his good friend Grotius to examine the caſe, and communicate his thoughts to him. 'Si valetudo, ſi otium tibi, ſi res etiam 'tuæ ſic ferant, ut hujuſmodi tractes, quod arbitror: 'quæſo paucis ſaltem perſcribe, quid tibi de hac re 'videatur, & quam potiſſimum viam, cum iſtiuſmodi 'hominibus inſiſtendam putes. - - - - If your health, if 'your leiſure, if your affairs, will permit you to conſider 'this opinion of mine; I beg you will write to me in as 'few words as you pleaſe, what you think of the matter, 'and which is the beſt way of dealing with this ſort of 'perſons.' All the anſwer that was given him was, that he very well juſtified the ſeparation of the Proteſtants (34).

It is plain, that Nihuſius reaſoned thus: When we find ourſelves by birth and education in a certain communion, the inconveniencies we therein undergo are not a warantable reaſon for quitting it, unleſs we can be gainers by the change; that is, remove to another where we may be eaſier. For to what purpoſe ſhould we abandon the communion that gave us being and education, if in ſo doing we only change the diſtemper? Let us put this caſe to the trial; I agree to it: let us imitate thoſe poor patients, who, when weary of the bed, think they ſhall be much better by being ſet in an eaſy chair. Let us leave the church of Rome, and embrace Proteſtantiſm; but then as theſe ſick perſons are no ſooner undeceived, in finding the eaſy chair of no ſervice to them, but they go to bed again: ſo ought we to reſume the profeſſion of Popery, as ſoon as we find that the Proteſtant doctors do not remove our difficulties. They alledge nothing to us but diſputable reaſons, nothing that is convincing, nothing that is demonſtrative: they prove, and they object; but both their proofs and their objections are anſwered: they reply, and meet with replies again. There is no end of this. To what purpoſe then ſhould we form a ſchiſm? Did we meet with any thing in the church we were born in, that is more inconvenient? We there wanted demonſtrations; we had nothing offered to us that could fix our mind upon a foundation of certainty; we ſtill found objections againſt all the doctrines, and all the replies, in infinitum. This was our great diſadvantage; and we meet with the ſame among the Proteſtants: we ought not therefore to ſtay among them. Let us return to that body that has on it's ſide the advantage of poſſeſſion; and if we muſt be ill lodged, is it not better to be ſo in our own country, and in our father's houſe, than in the inns of foreign countries? Beſides, the controverſy is attended with more inconveniencies on the Proteſtant ſide, than on the Popiſh. The latter has all it's enemies before it; the ſame arms that ſerve it for attacking and repulſing one, are of uſe for attacking and repulſing others. But the Proteſtants have enemies both before and behind them; they are like a ſhip engaged between two fires; Popery attacks them one ſide, and Socinianiſm on the other. The arms they make uſe of againſt Popery, do them hurt inſtead of doing them ſervice in their controverſy with the Socinian; for this Heretic turns upon them all the arguments they make uſe of againſt the church of Rome: ſo that a Proteſtant, coming off from the attack of a Papiſt, and preparing to attack a Socinian, is obliged to change his armour, or at leaſt part of it. Theſe, without doubt, were the chimera's with which Nihuſius fed himſelf; and which influenced him to think, that in order to convince the Proteſtants that they had done wrong in abandoning the church of Rome, it was ſufficient to aſk of them a demonſtrative proof of their belief: a proof, I ſay, that admits of no reply, any more than a mathematical demonſtration. He knew very well they would never take him at his word. Moſt Divines agree, that the controverſies of religion cannot be carried to that height of evidence. A famous miniſter has lately informed us that to aſſert, that the holy Spirit gives us an evident knowledge of the truths of religion, is not only a dangerous error, but a doctrine hitherto rejected by the Proteſtants (35). He maintains, that a faithful ſoul embraces theſe truths, without the evidence of reaſon, and even without knowing that it is evident that God has revealed them; and he ſays, that they are pernicious innovators, who aſſert, that at leaſt the holy Spirit makes us ſee evidently the teſtimony which God has given to theſe truths. I am very ſure, that Nihuſius did not expect to have a demonſtrative argument offered him. What did he think of, then, when he promiſed to return to Lutheraniſm upon that condition? Did he act the part of a grave man? Had he been a man of reaſon, he would fully have acquieſced in the anſwer that Voſſius gave him, which is very judicious, and very ſolid. But we muſt confeſs, that Nihuſius did not always ground his thoughts upon chimera's. He made a bad application of a good principle, which is this, We ought not to depart from the place where we are, if the change be uſeleſs. The miniſter I have been now mentioning, makes uſe of that axiom. He is a rigid Predeſtinarian, and a great Particulariſt, and groans under a load of objections, to which his ſyſtem is expoſed; but he does not change his hypotheſis, becauſe he finds none that relieves him from the oppreſſion. He would find nothing to ſatisfy his reaſon in the hypotheſis of the Moliniſts, nor in the other looſe ways of explaining grace; ſo chooſes to continue where he is, rather than take another ſituation that would not cure him (36). This is wiſely judged.

[I] N. Ritterſhuſius . . . . returned an anſwer that deſerves conſideration.] His place obliging him to harangue at the promotion or graduation of a doctor, he choſe for the ſubject of his ſpeech the voyage of Hanno. He was charged with copying a letter that Nihuſius had writ upon this matter (37). He returned for anſwer, that this letter had ſerved him for a guide nineteen years before; but that he lay under no obligation to cite Nihuſius: for, added he, I do not make uſe of Nihuſius's words: I quote the expreſſions of the authors whom I have conſulted, and do accordingly mention their names; only two indeed I have made uſe of, without the opportunity of peruſing them. 'Tu Nihuſii ne ſemel quidem mentionem facis. Fateor, nec cauſa fuit, cur allegarem cujus verbis non 'utor, ſed ſemper auctorum quos ille citat, & illa 'ipſa verba non ex Nihuſio, ſed ex ipſis auctoribus exſcripſi, excepto Hieronymo & Tranſylvano anonymo. 'Illum ad manus non habui, hunc vidêre nunquam 'contigit (38). - - - - You never once ſo much as mention 'Nihuſius's name. I confeſs it, nor was there any reaſon 'for me to mention a perſon whoſe words I make no uſe 'of, but always thoſe of the authors he quotes, and I have

(31) Idem, Epiſt. ccxxviii, pag. 240.

(32) Id. ib.

(33) We ought to read ſimiliter. Several ſuch faults are ſlipped into Voſſius's Letters. They miſtook his manuſcript, and your correctors commonly mind nothing but the orthography. They let one word paſs for another, provided it does not mar the ſenſe, ſo as to make it manifeſtly abſurd.

(34) Diſceſſionis cauſa quæ abs te redditur optima eſt, non potuiſſe vivi ſub tali Dominatu, neque integras nationes aut magnas Nationum partes ideo debuiſſe à conventibus abſtinere. Grotius, Epiſt. ccxxxix, primæ partis, pag. 122.

PARAPHRASE upon the ſentiments of Nihuſius.

(35) The queſtion of right is, whether Mr Saurin is in the right, when he ſays, faith obtains it's certainty by the way of evidence, eſpecially in the article of the Divinity of the Scriptures. The queſtion of fact, is, whether Mr Saurin's opinion is the opinion of the whole Reformed church; and whether that of Mr Jurieu is new and peculiar to himſelf and to Mr de Beaulieu, his maſter and profeſſor. Upon the firſt queſtion, it is no wonder that Mr Saurin is miſtaken. There are groſſer errors than that, tho' ſcarce any more dangerous; but upon the queſtion of fact, we can never wonder enough, that a man, who ſets up for an author ſhould fall into ſuch an error, as to call that a new opinion, a budding error, which is as antient as the world, and of equal extent with the Chriſtian religion; and which, till this our age, was never attacked by any but Heretics. Jurieu, Défenſe de la Doctrine univerſelle de l'Egliſe contre les imputations de Mr Saurin, pag. 3, of the Rotterdam edition in 1695.

(36) See the book intituled, Jugement ſur les Méthodes rigides & relâchées d'expliquer la Providence & la Grace, pag. 23.

(37) Thomaſius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 239.

(38) Nicol. Ritterſhuſius, Epiſt. ad Georgium Richterum, pag. 206, Epiſtolarum Richterianarum. See Thomaſius, ibid. pag. 73, and 240.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Decimi Septimi, has not given the right time when Nihusius published a new notion upon the invocation of saints [K].

'have transcribed them from those authors themselves,
'except only Hieronymus and an anonymous Transylvanian.
'The first I had not by me, the last I never happened to 'meet with.' We must own, that this justification is very fair in some respects. An author who goes to the spring-head, and compares all the passages that others have alledged, becomes a lawful possessor. He is not obliged to cite any but the original writings which he has consulted; it would be a piece of injustice to call him a plagiary, upon pretence that he relates the same things with others. But after all, I am of opinion, that honour, equity, and gratitude, demand an acknowledgement of the obligations we are under to those who have directed us to the sources. When an author therefore is convinced in conscience; that, if he had not read the dissertations of some Moderns, who have quoted antient authors, he had not known to whom he could have applied in order to procure the original authorities; he would do very well to make a public acknowledgment of the good offices done him by these Moderns. Having once done this in a preface, he may cite, upon his own bottom, the Antients he has consulted, and act the part of a true proprietor. I must observe here, by the by, that writers, who religiously cite the chapters and pages, in regard to every thing they borrow from others, have more honesty than policy: they neglect the interests of vain-glory; they deprive themselves of the pleasure of being cited; for by this means they render it so easy to verify them, that every writer will turn to the respective places when he has occasion for the same proofs, or to mention the same matters of fact, that are contained in their books; after which he contents himself with citing the antient author. Whereas, if they brought in curious things, without saying from what particular place they have them, and only mention the names of their authors, others would scarce dare to vent the same things any otherwise than under their authority, at least except writers of the first rank. They would see their names in the margins of many books; and that honour would be for a long time paid them. How many authors do this day pay this honour to Alexander ab Alexandro, and to Cælius Rhodiginus, who practised the politics we are now speaking of?

A REFLEXION upon a certain way of quoting.

[K] The author of the Memorabilia - - - has not given the right time when Nihusius published a new notion upon the invocation of saints.] He says, that about the year 1614, Nihusius, a new Papist, coined a new error, viz. that the saints departed, live still in respect of their bodies; and therefore are to be adored in their relics. Novum cudit ac protudit Errorem, dum conatu magno quidem sed irrito, probare nititur: Sanctos hac vita defunctos, non esse mortuos vel quoad corpus, vel quoad reliquias seu exuvias corporis. Formata enim quæstione: 'An adorandi sint Sancti suis in reliquiis? affirmat,
'quia, inquit, Sancti in exuviis corporum non sunt mor-
'tui, sed omnino vivunt adhuc (39).' The consequence, that this proselyte drew from his hypothesis, went a great way; for, not contented to prove from thence, that the saints merit our adoration, he found a sort of Atheism in the opinion opposite to his own, and pretended that they, who deny the bodies of the saints to be living, destroy, at the bottom, the resurrection. Quoniam itaque Sancti suis in corporibus adhuc vivunt, certatim nos illuc agglomeremur, & adoremus amorosissimè, spem resurrectionis nostræ simul quasi satiantes, & mortis metum puerilem abjicientes, nequaquam verò superbè quicquam ejus respuentes, hæreseos ac atheismi pars est, opinio illa feralis & luctuosa, de mortuis ac non viventibus Sanctorum corporibus, utpote resurrectionem impiè negans in recessu (40). My author does not inform me whether these words are taken from a didactic piece, or from an oration; but, I imagine, Nihusius spoke these words in some declamation. We are referred to two authors who refuted him (41); one named Himmelius, and the other David Christianus. The latter is cited by my author when he speaks of the death of Nihusius in 1657, and when he relates that about 1614 he was brought over to the communion of Rome, by the Jesuit Martinus Becanus, and that he taught, that the saints in paradise live still in their bodies: a thought which he called a divine oracle, and a clear light into a profound mystery, and a sublimer Philosophy touching sleeping and waking, than that of Aristotle and the other Philosophers. David Christianus owns, that it was a new oracle, not prophetical, but poetical, and so subtile that it was unknown to all the Fathers, and was neither understood by Aristotle, nor Scaliger, nor any of the most penetrating Philosophers, unless perhaps by Rodolphus Goclenius, who somewhere affirms, that certain portions of life remain in dead bodies, of which GOD will form a new body at the resurrection. Oraculum novum hoc est, sed non Propheticum, Poëticum autem ac Nihusianum, tam subtile, ut nulli vel S. S. Patrum, vel Lutheranorum, vel Pontificiorum, visum fuerit; nec intellectum vel ab Aristotele, vel Scaligero, vel à quovis alio, acutissimo etiam Philosopho, nisi forsan à Rodolpho Goclenio, alicubi asserente: in humano corpore demortuo quasdam adhuc vitæ reliquias superesse, ex quibus in resurrectione novum corpus formandum sit (42). Here by the way, we may take notice of a notion of Goclenius, that is very fantastical and singular: but it is good to be informed of such notions, that we may have a fuller view of the extent of the whims and visions of the human mind. From what I have set forth in this remark, we may conclude, that Nihusius was one of those lively presumptuous men, who easily suffer themselves to be dazzled by the false lustre of a paradox, and labour with eargerness to communicate to all the world their own prepossessions. They magnify the ideas of small things; and recommend them with such warmth, as if they were treating of a matter of the last importance; the true reverse of the Roman Poet, who said, (39) Andreas Carolus, Memor. Ecclesiast. Sæculi XVII, lib. ii, cap. xviii, pag. 352, ad ann. 1614.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Himmelius in Tractatu de Natura invocationis Religiosæ, pag. 120, 125, seq. confer disput. inauguralem Dn. Davidis Christiani, de R. Pontificis Infallib. & S. S. Canonisatione, pag. 66. seq. Id. ib. pag. 353.

(42) David Christianus, ubi supra, apud Andream Carolum ibid. lib. vi, cap. li, pag. 165, ad ann. 1657.

Non equidem hoc studeo bullatis ut mihi nugis
Pagina turgescat, dare pondus idonea fumo (43).

(43) Persius, Sat. V, ver. 19.

'Tis not indeed my talent to engage
In lofty trifles, or to swell my page
With wind and noise. - - - - -

DRYDEN.

By this sign we may distinguish those who enter the lists riding in the chariot of vanity,

Quos tulit in scenam ventoso gloria curru (44).

(44) Horat. Epist. I, lib. II, ver. 177.

To discover the Chronological error of the author of the Memorabilia Ecclesiastica, we need only call to mind, that Nihusius did not abjure Lutheranism till about the year 1622.

NYMPHODORUS of Amphipolis, the author of a book which has been twice cited by Clemens Alexandrinus [A], and now lost, flourished we know not when. The scholiast upon Apollonius has cited the same work to prove, that the Tibarenians (a), as soon as their wives were brought to bed, went to bed themselves, and made their wives wait on them in every thing after the same manner as women in child-bed are waited

(a) A people that lived near the Euxine sea. See that article.

[A] Author of a piece which has been twice cited by Clemens Alexandrinus.] Νυμφόδωρος ὁ Ἀμφιπολίτης ἐν τρίτῳ νομίμων Ἀσίας. Nymphodorus Amphipolitanus in tertio de legibus Asiæ (1). - - - - Nymphodorus of Amphipolis in his third book of the Asian laws. Νυμφόδωρος ἐν νομίμοις βαρβαρικοῖς. Nymphodorus in libro de legibus barbaricis (2). - - - Nymphodorus in his book of Barbarian laws. We cannot reasonably doubt, but that both these passages relate to the same author; but, it is not so certain, that they refer to the same book. I believe, however, with Vossius, that the Treatise of the Laws of Asia, compiled by Nymphodorus, differed no otherwise from the books of the laws of the Barbarians, than only as a part from

(1) Clemens Alexandr. Stromat. lib. i, pag. 322.

(2) Id. in Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 43.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google waited on in other countries. Politian is very much miſtaken upon the words of this ſcholiaſt [B].

from the whole (3). This work was not ſmall; for the ſcholiaſt upon Sophocles (4) has cited the thirteenth book of it.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. iii, pag. 393.

(4) Schol. Soph. in Oedip. Colon.

[B] Politian is much miſtaken upon the words of Apollonius's ſcholiaſt.] Ἐν δὲ τῇ τῶν Τιβαρήνων χῇ αἱ γυναῖκες ὅταν τέκωσι, τημελοῦσι τὸς ἀνδρας ὥσπερ λεχὼς· ὡς ἱστορεῖ Νυμφόδωρος ἔν τισι νόμοις (5). In the country of the Tibarenians, the women, as ſoon as they are delivered, nurſe their huſbands, as tho' they had been delivered. As Nymphodorus relates in ſome laws. Theſe are the words of the ſcholiaſt upon Apollonius. Now Politian's words are theſe. 'Addunt Interpretes Apollonii ſcriptum id etiam à Nymphodoro in 'Tiſinomis (6). --- The Commentators on Apollonius 'add, that this is aſſerted by Nymphodorus in his Tiſ-'nomis.' According to this, Nymphodorus muſt have writ a book, intituled, Tiſinomi. But nothing is more ridiculous than that ſuppoſition. The occaſion of Politian's miſtake was undoubtedly this: His manuſcript of the ſcholiaſt made but one word of τισι and νόμοις; for if the tranſcribers had parted theſe two words; he would readily have ſeen that they ſignify in quibuſdam legibus, --- in ſome laws; and ſo would not have fallen into the miſtake that he has been ſo often charged with. Note, That Rutgerſius diſliking ἔν τισι νόμοις, ſuppoſes, that it ſhould be read ἐν τοῖς νόμοις (7). His conjecture is ſo likely, that we may very well take it to be juſt: but he is wrong, when he ſays, that Politian's error was followed by John Hartungus; for all that can be laid to Hartungus's charge is, that he made uſe of the reading, ἔν τισι νόμοις (8), which reading is rational enough, and has been adopted by Hoelzlinus in his edition of Apollonius, publiſhed ſince the work of Rutgerſius. Let us obſerve, by the way, that Hartungus, who has diſcovered ſo many falſe quotations, has made one of the ſame kind himſelf in the place I have been now citing. He there affirms, that Cælius Rhodiginus relates, upon the teſtimony of the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius, the fooliſh cuſtom of the Tibarenians. This is not true; Rhodiginus only cites Nymphodorus (9).

(5) Scholiaſtes Apollonii in lib. ii, Argonaut. ver. 1012.

(6) Angelus Politianus, Epiſt. XVI, lib. i, fol. m. 26.

(7) Rutgerſius, Variar. Lection. lib. iv, cap. xx, pag. 443.

(8) Joh. Hartungus, Locorum Memorabilium, Decuria I, cap. ix, pag. 68, Tom. ii. Theſauri Gruteri.

(9) Cælius Rhodigin. Antiq. Lection. lib. xviii, cap. xxx, pag. m. 1023.

NIPHUS (AUGUSTIN) one of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers of the XVIth century, was born at Jopoli in Calabria, and not at Seſſa in the Terra di Lavoro, though he very conſtantly gives himſelf the epithet Sueſſanus [A]. Finding himſelf ill uſed at home upon his father's ſecond marriage (a), he left the houſe, and went away to Naples, where he had the good fortune to pleaſe one of the inhabitants of Seſſa, who placed him among his own children. He ſtudied with them, and accompanying them to Padua, he applied himſelf very cloſely to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. Returning afterwards to Seſſa, and Naples, and being informed that his father after waſting all his ſubſtance was departed this life, he thought no more of Jopoli, the place of his birth, but took a wife in the town of Seſſa, and taught Philoſophy in Naples for ſeveral years (b). He engaged ſo ſtrongly in the dangerous opinions of Nicoletus Vernias, his profeſſor in Philoſophy at Padua, that having the aſſurance to write upon that ſubject in the year 1491, he brought himſelf into ſuch ill terms, with the monks, that it was very near coſting him his life [B]. This profeſſor Vernias maintained with great warmth the opinion of Averrhoës on the unity of the intellect (c) [C], ſo that the lower claſs of Philoſophers every where gave out, that he had propagated this error almoſt over all Italy (d). Niphus having laid this ſtorm by the aſſiſtance of the biſhop of Padua, and by ſome corrections of his work de Intellectu & Dæmonibus, printed in the year 1492, publiſhed ſucceſſively ſeveral other books, which gave him ſo great a reputation, that the moſt famous univerſities made him the offer of a profeſſorſhip in Philoſophy

(a) He might ſay with the ſhepherd in Virgil, Eccl. III, ver. 33. Eſt mihi namque domi pater eſt injuſta noverca.

(b) Gabriel Barrius, in Antiquit. Calabriæ, apud Naudæum, in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 16.

(c) See the remark [E] of the article AVERRHOES.

(d) See, below, the remark [C], citat. (9).

[A] He very conſtantly gives himſelf the addition of Sueſſanus.] Upon this we may obſerve, that having ſaid in one of his books, that he was born in Calabria, he ſuppreſſed this paſſage in the ſecond edition. Ipſe in Sinueſſanorum (1) gratiam quòd apud eos aliquando degerit, uxoremque duxerit, Sinueſſanum (2) ſe ſcribebat. Quamquam ſæpius in Gymnaſia palam Calabrum ſe eſſe fateatur, & in Epiſtola quæ eſt ad Joannem Arenarum Principem, in Commentario ſuper Peri Hermenias, ſe Calabrum eſſe teſtatur, id quod tamen in ſecunda operis editione ſublatum fuit (3). This ſhews, that he preferred Seſſa, his adopted place, before Jopoli, his native place. Paul Jovius had but a confuſed notion of the native place of Auguſtin Niphus: he makes him a native of Seſſa, and originally of Trophea (vulgarly Tropea) in Calabria (4). Jerome Marafioti, who publiſhed in Italian the Antiquities of Calabria in the 1601, pretends that Niphus performed the principal part of his ſtudies at Tropea (5). His grand-children, and ſeveral of his relations, adds he, are yet living in a country village not far diſtant from that town.

(1) It ſhould be Sueſſanorum.

(2) It ſhould be Sueſſanum.

(3) Gabriel Barrius, in Antiq. Calabriæ, apud Naudæum, in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 16.

(4) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. xcii, pag. m. 215.

(5) Apud Naudæum, ibid. pag. 17.

[B] He brought himſelf into ſuch ill terms with the monks, that it was very near coſting him his life.] This was by a book on the Intellect, and on Dæmons. He therein maintained, that there is but one intellect, and that there are no other ſubſtances diſtinct from matter, but the intelligences which move the Heavens. He brought himſelf into great trouble and danger upon this ſcore, and had very probably loſt his life, if Petrus Barocius, biſhop of Padua, had not diverted the ſtorm. From hence it is, that Tiberius Ruffilianus introduces Philoſophy repreſenting to Leo X, that ſhe has ſaved from the flames Auguſtin Niphus, and Pomponacius. Niphus was obliged to ſuppreſs certain paſſages in his work, when he cauſed it to be printed in the year 1492 (6). Voluit etiam Niphus ingenium ſuum in hac præceptoris ſui ſententia, qua explicanda, qua ſtabilienda periclitari; verùm hanc ob rem, aut certò propter negatas à ſe diſtinctas à motricibus cœlorum intelligentiis, ſubſtantias omnes à materia ſeparatas, oppido cucullatos Patres contra ſe in caput, & nominis famam vehementiſſimè commovit; à quibus ſe explicare haud facili negotio potuiſſet, niſi eum ab ancipiti illo diſcrimine celeriter eximiſſet, Petrus Barocius Epiſcopus Patavinus . . . . . quæ (dica hæreſeos Auguſtino Nipho inuſta) non ita de nihilo fuit, quin Tyberius Ruffilianus Calaber Philoſophiam inducat, in oratione quam habet ad Leonem X. dicentem, Nec longo pòſt tempore Sueſſam (7) noſtrum fidiſſimum alumnum, ac Pomponatium mediis ex ignibus eripuimus (8).

(6) Naudæus, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

(7) I think it ſhould be read Sueſſanum.

(8) Naud. ibid. pag. 27, 28.

[C] This profeſſor Vernias maintained, with great warmth, the opinion of Averrhoës on the unity of the intellect.] Naudæus is my author. 'Nicoletus Vernias opinionem Averrois de unico Intellectu, confirmare argumentis, eo uſque validis & numeroſis conſueverat, ut omnes plebei & minuti Philoſophi, quemadmodum Riccobonus libro 6. de Gymnaſio Patavino ſcribit, dictarent in vulgus, eum totam pene Italiam in hunc pernicioſum errorem compuliſſe (9). --- Nicolet Vernias uſed to confirm the opinion of Averrhoës with ſo many and powerful arguments that all the lower claſs of Philoſophers, as Riccobonus writes in his ſixth book, de Gymnaſio Patavino, reported it among the common people, that he had drawn almoſt all Italy into that dangerous error.' The biſhop of Padua, whom I have named, engaged this Vernias by his gentle remonſtances to write an orthodox book. This piece treats of the immortality of the ſoul, and was printed in the year 1499. The author therein maintains, not the unity of the ſoul of all mankind, as he had done very obſtinately for thirty years together, but the multiplication of ſouls, according to the multitude of bodies.

(9) Id. ib. pag. 27.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Philoſophy with a conſiderable ſalary [D]. H him, and permitted him to bear, in his eſcutch and alſo created him a count Palatine. The l be met with (e); but it does not appear from t of Medicis: though it is certain that this fa accordingly made public uſe of it (f). He w in the affirmative ſide of the queſtion, whether immortal (g). He was very much careſſed b ſexes, to which his talent of diverting them witl contributed. He had a very clumſy air, and u he ſpoke with a good grace, and eſpecially was ſurprizing to obſerve how very much he d ſpeaking. He was of an amorous diſpoſitio age by the extravagances of his paſſion for

(e) See them in Naudæus, at the head of the Opuſcula of Niphus, which he cauſed to be printed at Paris in 1645.

(f) See Naud. in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 24, 25.

(g) See remark [B] of the article POMPONATIUS.

Qui (Petrus Barocius Epiſcopus Patavinus) Nicoletum quoque amicè poſteà compulit, ut edito de animæ immortalitate libello, eam non unicam eſſe, quemadmodum totos annos triginta pertinaciſſimè docuerat, ſed multiplicem, & pro ratione corporum diviſam, oſtenderet (10).

(10) Id. ib. pag. 28.

[D] The moſt famous univerſities made him the offer of a Profeſſorſhip in Philoſophy with a conſiderable ſalary.] According to Paul Jovius, he taught in almoſt all the univerſities of Italy on very advantageous terms, at the ſame time that Achillinus and Pomponacius flouriſhed (11). Theſe two Profeſſors taught Philoſophy in Padua, and if we believe Gauricus they had Auguſtin Niphus for their colleague (12). However he is not named in the Catalogue of the Profeſſors of Padua publiſhed by Riccobon. But Niphus intimates himſelf, that he taught in that univerſity. ‘ Ceſſantibus enim his turbulentiis, ſays he (13), quas ‘ ocyſſimè ceſſandas arbitror, adſum qui Patavii ubi ‘ mea ſedes ſemper parata eſt, aut ſicubi boni Principes ‘ florere ſtatuent ſtudia, bonas artes, profiteri polliceor. ‘ - - - - For as ſoon as this ſtorm ſhall be blown over, ſays ‘ he, as I expect it very ſhortly will, I promiſe to come and ‘ teach ſtudents, either at Padua, where I have a chair ‘ always prepared for me, or whereſoever encouraging ‘ princes deſire to have learning flouriſh.’ It is certain at leaſt that he had the offer both at Padua and Bologna of a ſalary of a thouſand gold crowns a year, which was the ſum appointed him in the univerſity of Piſa. He tells us this himſelf. ‘ Præceptores qui ‘ has (artes & ſcientias) diſcipulos docent, pecunias ‘ multas accumulare cernimus: nos primi à Bononien- ‘ ſibus, à Venetis, ſi in eorum Gymnaſiis philoſophi- ‘ am docere vellemus, millenarium aureorum nume- ‘ rum pro mercede ſingulis annis acciperemus, ſicuti à ‘ Florentinis accepimus, Piſis philoſophiam profeſſis ‘ (14). - - - - We ſee thoſe who teach ſtudents theſe ‘ (arts and ſciences) heap up great riches: I am the ‘ firſt who have had ſo large a ſalary as a thouſand ‘ gold crowns a year offered me by the Bononians and Ve- ‘ netians, if I would agree to teach in their univerſities, ‘ as I had the ſame actually paid me by the Florentines ‘ for teaching Philoſophy in their univerſity of Piſa.’ Note that he was Profeſſor at Piſa about the year 1520 (15). The Preface to his Dilucidationes Metaphyſicæ, a work which he began to compoſe at Salernum, about the year 1507, informs us, that while he was obliged upon account of public misfortunes to teach in his native country (16), he was invited to Salerno by Robert de Sanſeverino, who had a deſire to make that univerſity flouriſh. He accepted the Philoſophy profeſſorſhip, and during his exerciſe of it he received orders from that prince to explain all Ariſtotle's works (17). I obſerve this, that the reader may know the time of his being Profeſſor at Salerno. It is ſaid that he was called to Rome by Leo X, to teach Philoſophy in the college della Sapienza (18). It may be doubted whether ever he taught in the univerſity of Bologne, ſince he does not appear in the liſt given by Alidoſius of the Profeſſors of that univerſity.

(11) Quum in omnibus ferè Italiæ gymnaſiis, Achillino, & Pomponatio florentibus, opima ſtipendia meruiſſet. Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(12) Gauricus, in Themate natalitio Pomponatii, apub Naudæum in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 31.

(13) Niphus, in Dilucidation. Metaphyſ. apud Naudæum, ibid.

(14) Niphus, de Divitiis, pag. 83, Edit. Pariſ. 1645.

(15) See Naud. in Jud. de Aug. Nipho, pag. 29.

(16) That is, at Seſſa.

(17) See Naud. in Jud. de Aug. Nipho, pag. 29, 30.

(18) Opmer. in Chron. apud Naud. ibid. pag. 30.

[E] He had .... an ungenteel appearance; but yet for all that, he ſpoke with a good grace, and eſpecially when he inclined to be merry.] This is what Paul Jovius informs us. ‘ Erat ingenio fertili, ſays he (19), ada- ‘ perto, liberali, ſermone autem Campanum pingue ‘ quoddam reſonanti maximè libero, & ad ſerendas ‘ fabulas in ſuggeſtu, coronaque ad voluptatem aurium ‘ perjucundo; ſed vel toto ore ſubagreſti, & penitus ‘ infaceto ita ſe ad urbanos jocos componebat, ut valde

(19) Jovius, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

this in another place (b). His wife was named Angelella, he mentions her in ſeveral places of his works, and relates an uncommon inſtance of her affection for him [G]. He had children by her as we ſhall ſee below (i). He died of a diſtemper in his throat which he contracted by a cold he catched in travelling in the night [H]. Paul Jovius informs us that it was the ſame night on which Alexander de Medicis duke of Florence was aſſaſſinated, that is the ſixth of January 1537; but Naudæus proves that Niphus was ſtill living in the year 1545 [I]. He endeavours to excuſe his errors, and obſcenities, (b) See the remark [C] of the article ARRAGON (JANE OF).

(i) In the following article.

afterwards to ſuch a degree as to carry him to public extravagances (24). The exceſſes of our Philoſopher may be ſeen in theſe verſes of Latomus:

(24) Amare cœpit Claram Viſcontiam amore ferum, qui magis converſationum eſſe ſolet quàm libidinis: cum tamen ipſe continentiſſimus foret, & cùm paſſim in colloquiis cum ea quotidie verſaretur, tanto amore affectus eſt tandem ut uſque ad inſanias aperti ſſimas deveniret. Id. ib.

Apagete vos, Philoſophiam qui tetricam
Putatis: & boni indignam
Leporis, ebriæ horridamque Cypridis.
Quid? Niphus an non melleus,
Perplexa ſuetus inter enthymemata,
Et ſyllogiſmos frigidos
Narrare ſuaves, Atticaſque fabulas:
Multumque riſum ſpargere?
At quàm venuſtum hoc: ſeptuagenarium
Quod undulatis paſſibus,
Ex curioſo, flexuoſoque capite
Saltare coram cerneres
Modò Dorium, modò Phrygium, vel Lydium:
Amore faucium gravi?
Tractare ſic philoſophiam inviſam, arbitror
Summi fuiſſe philoſophi (25).

(25) Latomus, apud Jovium in Elogiis, cap. xcii, pag. 217.

Away ye fools, who think Philoſophy
Too grave for jokes and wanton venery.
What, does not florid Niphus think it beſt,
Amidſt dry ſyllogiſms to crack a jeſt;
With crabbed moods to mix a pleaſant ſtory,
To entertain his laughing auditory?
How wondrous pleaſant muſt it be to ſee
This great Philoſopher at ſeventy,
Inſpir'd by love with ſhaking head advance,
And trembling knees to grace the airy dance?
Much like a grave Profeſſor muſt he look,
Who thus his learned character forſook.

The Italians have preſerved by tradition ſeveral ſtories relating to the amorous follies of old Auguſtin Niphus. Naudæus had heard them; but beſides that he was not aſſured they were true, however probable they might be, he thought it neither conſiſtent with charity nor juſtice to publiſh them. I quote his words with ſo much the more pleaſure, as they give an example of what ought to be done, with regard to ſuch ſtories as are grounded only upon hear-ſay. 'Amoribus præſertim indulſit (Niphus) quos cum puellis honorariis quarumdam Heroïnarum, quibus cum familiariter verſabatur, tam liberè, adeoque intemperanter exercuit, ut non modò virginibus illis quas obſequio ſuo demereri ſtudebat, ſed omnibus qui tanti nominis Philoſophum, à petulcis illis & laſcivientibus puellis ita deludi faſcinarique videbant, ludos de ſe maximos faceret. Et hercle, niſi vellem ejus pudori per me nihil detractum iri, poſſem hic multa ridicula recenſere, quæ licèt incertis rumoribus per Italiam de illo ferantur, adeò tamen moribus amantium proxima ſunt, ut nullo negotio vera quoque cenſeri poſſunt: ſed abſit, ut privati cubiculi ſecreta, & dulces illas nequitias, ineptiaſve, quas ſibi quiſque pro diræ libidinis modo fingit ad libitum, è latebris quas faventes habuerunt, in odioſam lucem proferam. Adde quòd tam alienum eſt à natura mea, rebus certis & exploratis, dubios rumores miſcere, ut nequidem in aliqua ludicra narratione, & oblectationis tantùm de cauſa, facere illud ullo modo vellem (26). - - - - He (Niphus) gave himſelf up more particularly to amours, which he purſued with ſuch eagerneſs and extravagance among certain maids of honour belonging to ſome great ladies, with whom he had the liberty of converſing, that he made himſelf the jeſt not only of the young girls themſelves, whom he took ſo much pains in endeavouring to pleaſe, but alſo to all others who ſaw a Philoſopher of his great reputation enſnared and made a fool of by a company of frolickſome wanton girls, And indeed, if I was not reſolved to have no hand in detracting any thing from his gravity, I could take this opportunity to recount a great many ridiculous ſtories, which, tho' they are reported all over Italy, upon no better evidence than hear-ſay, are yet ſo natural to the conduct of a lover, that they may very eaſily be ſuppoſed to be true: but far be it from me to drag out of their favourite lurking holes, thoſe ſweet ſins and follies which every one indulges at pleaſure, in proportion to his curſed luſt, and to expoſe them to a diſagreeable light. Beſides that it is ſo contrary to my diſpoſition to mix doubtful reports with certain and evident facts, that I would not do it in the leaſt degree ſo much as in a merry ſtory, intended purely for diverſion.' There are ſome perſons perhaps who have commended his ſilence for the reaſon contained in theſe four verſes of Malherbe:

(26) Naudæus, in Judicio de Niphо, pag. 31, 32.

Sieroit-il bien à mes écrits
D'ennuier les races futures
Des ridicules avantures
D'un amoureux en cheveux gris (27).

(27) Malherbe, Poëſ. pag. 85, Edit. of Menage, Paris 1666.

My writings might, in ſuch a caſe,
Bring ſcandal on ſome future race,
Should they without reſerve diſcover
The follies of a gray-beard lover.

[G] He relates an uncommon inſtance of his wife's affection for him.] While he was compoſing a work intituled, Theſſerologium Aſtronomicum, he ſhut himſelf up ſo cloſely among his books that he ſaw no body. His wife imagined he was grown melancholy, and vainly tried ſeveral ways to cure him. She at laſt fancied that the pleaſures of Love would prove an effectual remedy; for this reaſon ſhe ſent into his ſtudy to him all alone a handſome girl that ſhe had been very jealous of, and hated heartily upon that account. She begged of her earneſtly to refuſe him nothing he ſhould deſire, not even the laſt favour. Niphus took no notice of her; upon which his wife betook herſelf to her prayers and tears: which laſted till he had finiſhed his book. After which he reſumed his uſual gaiety, and ſaw company as before. The good woman alſo recovered her good humour, ipſa quoque è mortuis in vitam rediit (28).

(28) Niphus, de Amore, cap. cii, pag. 428.

[H] He died of a diſtemper in his throat, which he contracted by a cold he catched in travelling in the night.] Paul. Jovius is my author for this. 'Periit in patria nocturno itinere refrigeratus, quum ſero è Sinueſſa rediiſſet, obortis ſcilicet tonſillis quæ fauces obſederant (29). . . . . He died in his own country by a cold he got upon the road in the night, as he was returning late from Seſſa, the glands of his throat ſwelling and ſtopping up the paſſage.' Since, according to Paul Jovius, Seſſa was Niphus's country, how could he ſay that in returning too late from Seſſa, he contracted a diſtemper which carried him off in his own country? This queſtion will only let us ſee that the author has not been ſufficiently exact in his account; but it is eaſy to clear up the difficulty. He meant, without doubt, that Niphus having ſtaid too late at Seſſa, returned in the night to a country houſe he had not far from that place. This houſe was undoubtedly that which he called Niphanum, from whence he dated ſeveral Books. It is not ſo eaſy to prove that Paul Jovius has truly related the place of his death; for Leander Albertus affirms, that Niphus died at Salerno, where he had taught Philoſophy a long time (30). He continued there in the year 1534, as appears from the date of his treatiſe de Re Aulica. He dedicated his book de Rege & Tyranno, printed at Naples the ſame year, to Ferdinand de Sanſeverino, prince of Salerno.

(29) Jovius, in Elog. cap. xcii, pag. 217.

(30) Obiit annis ſuperioribus Salerni qua in urbe diu regali illius præmiis honeſtiſſimis philoſophiam docuerat. Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 244.

[I] Naudæus proves that Niphus was ſtill living in the year 1545 (31).] For he ſays, that Niphus dedicated

(31) Naudæus, in Jud. de Niphо, pag. 34.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſcenities [K], and commends him (k) for havin of a deluge which the Aſtrologers had given ou very great alarm all over Europe (l). He r treated him with a great deal of reſpect, anc no better authority for ſaying that Niphus rece than he has for adding, that Niphus died of a di at his ſecond wedding (m), what he ſays of it is r of ſome miſtakes in Moreri's Dictionary [M]

(k) Naudæus, in Judicio, de Aug. Nipho, pag. 43, 53.

(l) See the remark [B] of the article STOEFLER.

dicated his Book de Animalibus to Paul III, in the year 1545. He concludes from thence, that the author was then 70 years of age, and he grounds this upon a very probable ſuppoſition, that he muſt be 21 years of age at the time of the diſpute mentioned above (32), and which belongs to the year 1491. He might have found a more direct proof in the epiſtle dedicatory of a Book written by this Philoſopher in 1534, in which he declares himſelf to be 66 years old (33). I am ſurpriſed Naudæus ſhould not cenſure Paul Jovius in relation to the time of Niphus's death.

(32) In the remark [B].

(33) Nec mirentur qui hunc legerint librum, Philoſophum ſenex ſexagenarium & pene capularem eum puellæ dicaſſe. Niphus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Libri de Re aulica, pag. m. 238.

[K] Naudæus endeavours to excuſe his errors and obſcenities.] He lays the fault of them upon the licentiouſneſs of that age, and demonſtrates by examples that before the decrees of the Council of Trent concerning the examining and cenſuring of Books, an extreme liberty uſed to be taken in maintaining erroneous propoſitions, and in publiſhing tales and ſatires without any regard to chaſte ears. He confeſſes that Niphus made an ill uſe of this cuſtom in the writings he compoſed for the polite part of the world, and even in ſome philoſophical treatiſes, but not in ſo very looſe a manner as ſome other authors. ‘ Eum (Sermonem ‘ Niphi) talem eſſe (inæqualem & immundum) nullus ‘ unquam inficias ire poterit, cui lectæ fuerint jucundæ ‘ illæ narrationes, quas ſub finem libri de viro aulico ‘ creberrimas juxta, fœdiſſimaſque attulit. Neque ‘ tantùm iſtis uſus eſt, cùm Aulici ſui urbanitatem per ‘ ejuſmodi facetias urbaniorem reddere ſatagit; ſed in- ‘ terdum etiam in Porticu & Academia, cùm adverſus ‘ viros graviſſimos diſputat, in dicteria quædam pro- ‘ rumpit, neque loco, neque tempori ſatis convenien- ‘ tia; eaſque hiſtorias refert, quas ob rerum fœtidarum ‘ mentionem, nemo vel inter lixas & ruſticos, abſque ‘ honoris præfatione referre vellet (34) . . . . . (35) Phi- ‘ lologis præſertim adeò familiaris erat ſermonum ob- ‘ ſcœniſſimorum licentia, ut qui Bocatium, Pogium, ‘ Aretinum, Caſam, Caſtalionem, Pacificum Aſculanum, ‘ Julium Grotum, Puccium, Ludovicum Cinthium, Phi- ‘ lelphum, Codrum, Septabinam, Mazzuccium Francum, ‘ & id genus alios (36) legerit, impudentiam tunc, ‘ malitiam, fœditatem, impietatem, virus ſuum omne ‘ plenis buccis, aut potiùs pleno jure, ſive in Deum, ‘ ſive in ejus Miniſtros, aut publicas, privataſque per- ‘ ſonas, & in omnem denique honeſtatem aut verecun- ‘ diam effudiſſe, fateri cogatur. Unde nihil mihi, aut ‘ aliis mirum videri debet, ſi cùm hi mores, hæc tem- ‘ pora vivente Nipho fuerint, ipſe etiam, qui petulanti ‘ ſplene cachinno factus à natura fuerat, qui cum He- ‘ roïnis & Principibus viris continuò vivebat, quem ſa- ‘ gaces puellæ, miris illecebris in ſui amorem pellicie- ‘ bant, ſui ſæculi moribus, & inſtitutis, longè tamen ‘ quàm cæteri parciùs, uſus fuerit; quandoquidem ſi ‘ aliter feciſſet, paratum ejus nomini, & gloriæ exiti- ‘ um erat, quod viris Academicis nimia ſtoliditas, & ‘ rerum civilium ignorantia, ſuique potiſſimum incuria ‘ afferre ſolet. - - - - That it (the diſcourſe of Niphus) ‘ was ſuch (impure and obſcene) none can deny, who ‘ have read thoſe merry ſtories which he has added, no ‘ leſs numerous than ſmutty, towards the end of his book ‘ on the Courtier. Nor has he introduced theſe only, when ‘ he attempts to ſet off his Courtier to greater advantage ‘ by pleaſantries, but ſometimes alſo in the Schools and ‘ Univerſity, when he is diſputing againſt perſons of the ‘ greateſt gravity, he breaks out into little jeſts neither ‘ becoming the place nor occaſion; and tells ſuch ſtories, ‘ as no Porter would repeat without apologizing for their ‘ immodeſty. . . . . Thoſe who ſtudied polite learning were ‘ ſo uſed to this licentious obſcenity in their diſcourſes, that ‘ whoever will read Boccace, Poggius, Aretine, Caſa,

(34) Naud. ubi ſupra, pag. 54.

(35) Id. ib. pag. 56.

(36) See the words of Mr Magliabechi, in the remark [E] of the article VAYER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NIPHUS (FABIUS) grandſon of the preceding, was the ſon, if I am not miſtaken, of that JAMES NIPHUS, to whom Auguſtin, his father, dedicated his book de Divitiis in the year 1531. He was learned and eloquent, but of a ſpirit a little too fretful, and he took occaſion from every thing to complain of his ill fortune. He publiſhed a Proœmium Mathematicum at Paris in the year 1569, at the ſame time that he taught the Mathematics to two youths who were brothers, Peter Alexander, and Albret Delbene. He dedicated it to John Cavalcante, uncle by the mother's ſide to his two pupils, and gives him an account of the misfortunes he had ſuffered (a) [A]. He ſucceeded Nicolas Curtius in the ſecond profeſſorſhip of Practical Phyſic at Padua, in the year 1575; and having been impriſoned ſome months after upon ſuſpicion of Lutheraniſm (b), he found means to eſcape, and retired to Vienna in Auſtria [B]. He went afterwards into England, and there proved very unfortunate. From thence he came to Holland, and there alſo met with misfortunes [C]. I do not know whether he ſucceeded or not in the expectation he had of defeating the proſecutions of his enemies by the protection of the States. I have not been able to trace this beyond an Epiſtle Dedicatory where this expectation is expreſſed. Naudæus conjectures that he retired into the Spaniſh Netherlands, and that he there abjured Calviniſm, and married a wife by whom he had FERDINAND NIPHUS, who printed at Louvain, in 1644, Caramuel's Severa Methodus diſputandi, to which he added a letter wherein he calls himſelf great-grand-ſon of Auguſtin Niphus. Mr Moreri, who knew no more of all theſe things, than what he had read in Naudæus, has changed into affirmations, what the other had only delivered with a perhaps. This is a very ill example, and a very common fault. He has copied ſome miſtakes from the ſame

(a) Naudæus, in Judicio de Aug. Nipho, pag. 36, 37.

(b) Riccobonus, de Gymnaſio Patavino, lib. iii, cap. xxxix, apud Naudæum, ibid.

[A] He gave an account to John Cavalcante of the misfortunes he had ſuffered.] He teſtifies his gratitude for the good offices he had done him. Tu enim, Cavalcantium nempe ſic alloquitur, cùm in tantas rerum anguſtias atque aſperitates, quadam fortunæ amentia incidiſſem, ut penè de ſalute deſperandum putarem, non tantùm hac rerum mearum offenſione doluiſti, verùm etiam neque ſumptibus, neque amicis, in mea adverſitate lenienda, te conceſſurum confirmaſti (1).

(1) Apud Naudæum, in Jud. de Aug. Nipho, pag. 37.

[B] He found means to eſcape, and retired to Vienna in Auſtria.] This is a circumſtance which I have met with in a letter of Languetus, dated from that place the 15th of March 1576. Languetus wrote it to his maſter the elector of Saxony, and informed him among other things, that this grandſon of Niphus would be glad to accept of an employ in the public ſchools of that elector. He added, that tho' he was a young man, yet he ſpoke very well, being very well verſed in the impoſtures of the Romiſh church, but not ſufficiently inſtructed in the true religion, which made him wiſh to be eſtabliſhed in ſome place where he might have an opportunity of coming to a more perfect knowledge of it. The envy of his colleagues who found him commended by the ſcholars, inſtigated them to accuſe him to the Inquiſition for an heretic: he was impriſoned, but ſome young Germans reſcued him, and he went from thence to Vienna. He had taught Philoſophy in France and Italy, and had been crowded with auditors before he was made Profeſſor in Phyſic at Padua. This is the intire paſſage of Languet. Venit huc ex Italia Marcus Antonius Niphus, nepos illius Auguſtini Niphi, qui patrum noſtrorum ætate fuit valde celebris in Scholis Italicis. Hic Marcus Antonius per aliquot annos docuit Philoſophiam in Gallia & Italia cum maximo auditorum concurſu, & tandem factus eſt Patavii artis medicæ Profeſſor. Quoniam autem magno applauſu audiebatur a Studioſis adoleſcentibus, quidam ex Profeſſoribus metuentes, ne præ ipſo in contemptum venirent, eum tanquam de Religione Pontificia non bene ſentientem detulerunt ad Inquiſitionem, à qua eſt conjectus in carcerem, ex quo opera quorundam adoleſcentum Germanorum evaſit, & huc ſe contulit. Contraxi hic cum eo notitiam, & cum viderem eum eſſe moderato ingenio, & nihil eſſe in eo illius arrogantiæ, qua raro carent Itali, & ex aliorum ſermonibus ſcirem, ipſum eſſe inſigniter doctum, percontatus ſum ex eo, ſi forte vocaretur in aliquam ex ſcholis publicis Veſtræ Celſitudinis, an eſſet conditionem acceptaturus. A qua re cum viderem eum non abhorrere, promiſi ipſi me id Veſtræ Celſitudini indicaturum a qua humiliter peto, ut mihi ſignificare dignetur, quæ ſit ſua in ea re voluntas. Eſt adhuc Juvenis & valde facundus. Intelligit quidem impoſturas Religionis Pontificiæ, ſed in puriore Religione nondum eſt ſatis inſtitutus, quare cupit venire ad ea loca ubi poſſit inſtitui (2). If Naudæus had known any thing of this letter of Languetus, he would have found no fault with the account of Riccobon (3), but would have owned that our Niphus ſucceeded Curtius in the year 1575. Languetus's calling the Niphus he was ſpeaking of Marcus Antonius, ought to be no pretence for imagining that he was any other than the Fabius Niphus of this article. The argument which Naudæus founds upon Niphus's complaining while he was at Paris in 1569, of the dangers to which he had been expoſed (4) is of no weight: for it is not at all neceſſary to refer this, as Naudæus does, to his being impriſoned in Padua (5); he was a man who met with troubles where-ever he went, and without doubt his evil genius had croſſed him in ſome thing or other before he retired into France. We muſt remember that, according to Languetus, he had taught Philoſophy before he was promoted to the Profeſſorſhip in Phyſic at Padua.

(2) Languetus, Epiſt. lxvii, ad Elect. Auguſt. Part ii, pag. 166.

(3) Naudæus, ubi ſupra.

(4) See the preceding remark.

(5) Ipſe . . . tam expreſſe calamitates ſuas enumerat, ut dubitari non poſſit, quin de Patavinis intelligendæ ſint. Naudæus, ubi ſupra.

By the way I ſhall take notice of another miſtake of Naudæus. He ſays (6), that Niphus had retired into France, upon the ſame account that Peter Martyr had retired into England, and Simeo Simonius into Germany. It is certain that Peter Martyr took refuge in Switzerland, and ſettled at Straſburg, and did not go into England, till ſome years afterwards by accident, that is, upon his being invited thither to aſſiſt in the new Reformation under the reign of Edward VI. And as to what relates to Simonius, I am very well aſſured that he did not make choice of Germany for his firſt retreat. He was profeſſor at Geneva, before he exerciſed that office at Heidelberg. See his article.

(6) Ibid.

[C] He was very unfortunate in England, and . . . met alſo with misfortunes in Holland.] It is Gabriel Naudæus, who informs me of this: I have not the book from whence he takes it. ' In Angliam & demum in Ollandiam trajecit; cum tamen utrobique, reflantibus fortunæ ventis agitatus, non aliter quam ſi quartâ Lunâ natus fuiſſet, quacumque tandem ſe reciperet, illic etiam gravi ſemper aliquo infortunio mactaretur, ſic enim ille in præfatione Ophini ſui ad conſociatarum Belgii provinciarum Ordines: Equidem cum in Angliam nullo meo crimine, ſed nefario quorundam ſcelere, magna calamitate oppreſſus eſſem, ejuſque calamitatis reliquiæ, quaſi procellæ ad vos me detuliſſent, ecce veſtræ virtutis, & humanitatis non inanis ſpes effulſit. Ac paulò poſt, Cumque injuſte in mearum rerum, quaſi in fractarum navium reliquias, nonnulli impetum feciſſent, Senatus veſtris auſpiciis conſtitutus, ſingulari virtute obſtitit, meque in integrum, quantum in eo erit, reſtitutum iri, non inanem mihi ſpem oſtentavit (7). - - - He paſſed over into England and afterwards into Holland, in both which places he was ſo ruffled by the ſtorms of fortune, as if he had been born under ſuch an unlucky planet, that wherever he ſhould go, he muſt meet with misfortunes, for ſo in the preface to his Ophinus he expreſſes himſelf to the States-General of the United Provinces. Indeed when I found myſelf under great troubles in England, not for any crime of my own, but thro' the wickedneſs of others, the concluſion of which drove me, like a ſort of tempeſt, into your provinces, behold I conceived no ſmall hopes from your goodneſs and humanity. And a little after, And when ſome perſons very injuſtly made an attack upon the remain-' der

(7) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google same author [D], and has advanced without any proof at all (c) that Fabius Niphus taught some time at Leyden.

(c) That is, without having read it in Naudæus.

'der of my fortunes, as a sort of shipwreck, your 'senate with singular goodness has interposed, and 'given me great expectation of being fully relieved, as 'far as their power shall extend.' Naudæus supposes that the Ophinus seu de cœlesti animarum progenie Dialogus (8) was not printed at Leyden till 1617. Yet the Oxford Catalogue takes notice of it as printed at Leyden in 1599 in 4to.

(8) It is Divinatio in the Oxford Catalogue.

[D] Moreri . . . has copied some mistakes of Naudæus.] He has said, I. that Niphus professor in Physic at Padua, being expelled from thence came to Paris, and went into England. II. That the work intituled Ophinum, he should have said Ophinus (9) was not published till 1617. Note, that the author there calls himself Fabius à Nipho.

(9) Mr ought t given it title, an said that brevit (

NONIUS (a) (PETER), in Spanish Nunnes, a learned Portuguese, and one of the greatest Mathematicians of the XVIth century, was born at Alcaçar [A]. He was præceptor to Don Henry (b) son of king Emanuel, and taught the Mathematics in the university of Conimbra (c). He published some pieces which procured him a great reputation [B]. He set the greatest value on his treatise of Algebra, which he had composed in Portuguese, but translated it into Castillan, when he was resolved upon making it public (d); for he considered that the Castillan language was more generally known than the Portuguese, and that consequently his book would be of less use if he should leave it in its original form. He dedicated it to his former pupil prince Henry the cardinal infant. His epistle dedicatory is dated from Lisbon the first of December 1564. He was then principal Cosmographer to the king of Portugal, and mathematical professor in the university of Coymbra. This work is intituled Libro de Algebra en Arithmetica y Geometria, and contains 341 pages in the edition of Antwerp 1567 in 8vo. Nonius died in 1577 at eighty years of age, and left only one daughter (e). I have no where read except in Thuanus, that he was a Physician by profession.

(a) And not Nonnius, as in Moreri; or Nonnus as in Mr Teissier.

(b) Who was a cardinal, and reigned after the death of Don Sebastian.

(c) Thuanus, lib. xliv, pag. m. 204.

(d) See the Epistle Dedicatory of that book.

(e) Thuanus, lib. lxiv, pag. 204.

[A] He was born at Alcaçar.] Thuanus says that Alcaçar is a village, Vicus (1). Mr Baudrand (2) gives it the title of Pagus; but Resendius, a Portuguese author, calls it a town, tho' he owns it no otherwise considerable than for being the native place of Nonius. Salacia est, says he (3), quæ à Saracenis nomine mutato, nunc Alcassar Salis (4) vocatur, urbs nostro tempore non admodum clara, nisi civem haberet Petrum Nonium Mathematicum cumprimis nobilem. The antient name of this place was Salacia (5), and it was formerly a town of note: it is mentioned by Pomponius Mela and Pliny. Joachim Vadianus has not rightly understood what they say of it. Resendius proves him guilty of a very gross blunder (6).

(1) Thuanus, lib. lxiv, pag. m. 204.

(2) In Lexico Geograph. Voce Salacia.

(3) Resendius, Commentar. in Vincentium, pag. 78, Tom. ii, Operum.

(4) Vulgarly Alcaçar de Sal.

(5) This shews why Petrus Nonius is firnamed Salacienſis.

(6) Resend. ubi supra.

[B] He published some pieces which procured him a great reputation.] His book De arte navigandi was received so much the more favourably, as it served the grand designs projected at the court of the king, his master, to carry on the maritime expeditions into the East (7). Furetiere's Dictionary (8) remarks, that Peter Nonius was the first who in 1530, invented the angles of forty five degrees made with each meridian, and which he calls rhumbs in his language, and which he calculates by spherical triangles. Simon Stevinus (9) has shewn that Nonius, whom he acknowledges on other accounts to be scarce inferior to the very greatest Mathematicians, is sometimes mistaken in his calculation of Loxodromics. This learned Portuguese has explained a great many problems, and particularly the mechanical problem of Aristotle on the motion of vessels by oars (10). His notes, in Theoricas Planetarum Purbachii, upon Purbachius's Theory of the Planets, are very much to be esteemed; for he there explains several things which had either not been taken notice of, or not been rightly understood (11). He published in 1542 a treatise de Crepusculis, on the Twilight, which he dedicated to John III, king of Portugal, and added to it what Alhazen an Arabic author had composed on the same subject. We must not forget that he corrected several mathematical mistakes of Orontius Finæus.

(7) See Andrew Schot, Biblioth. Hispan. pag. 477.

(8) At the word Loxodromies.

(9) In Appendice Loxodromiarum, apud Vossium de Scient. Mathem. pag. m. 300.

(10) Sch ubi supra sius, de Mather 299.

(11) Id. 191.

This is the judgment of Father Dechales: 'In the 'year 1530, Petrus Nonius, a celebrated Portuguese 'Mathematician, upon occasion of some doubts pro- 'posed to him by Mortinus Alphonsus Sosa, wrote a 'treatise of Navigation, divided into two books. In 'the first, he answers some of these doubts; for exam- 'ple, whence it happens that the sun being in the e- 'quator, rises in the eastern rhumb, according to 'which however if we steer the ship, we shall never 'arrive at this circle, but describe a parallel; and in 'his answer, he explains the nature of Loxodromic 'lines. In the second book, he treats of rules and 'instruments proper for Navigation, particularly sea- 'charts, and instruments which serve to find the ele- 'vation of the pole. Obscurity is the character of this 'author: which makes him of little use to his rea- 'ders (12).

(12) Cla Francis Dechales face to b Navigati

NORADIN, the son of Sanguin, Sultan of Aleppo and of Nineveh [A], surpassed his father in every thing, though he had been the best accomplished and most puissant prince among the Turks in his time (a). Sanguin being killed by some of his eunuchs, while he laid siege to Cologembar upon the Euphrates, in 1143 (b), Noradin divided his paternal inheritance with his brother (c); by virtue of which division he became Sultan of Aleppo, and in a little time one of the most powerful princes in all Asia. He had nothing of the Turk or Barbarian, but the name; and was possessed of all the qualities of a great general. He was equally prudent, bold, and successful; the most vigilant man in the world, and the readiest to lay hold of all opportunities that might offer for putting in execution a brave action. He was not destitute of the qualities of a man of honour: he had a great share of probity and even piety in the way of his false religion. One of his first exploits was the defeat of Joscelin de Courtenai, count of Edessa, whose troops he so routed, that Joscelin had much ado to escape to Samosata where he arrived almost all alone. The greatest part of his territories fell under the sovereignty of Noradin, who afterwards made a great many other conquests, when the Crusade, to which St Bernard had predicted so much success, miscarried in a dismal manner in the siege of Damascus, anno 1148,

(a) Towards the middle of the XIIth century.

(b) And not in 1145, as Maimbourg has it, Tom. i, of the Crusades, pag. 305, Dutch Edition.

(c) He was the elder brother, and his name was Cotebedein.

[A] Sultan of Aleppo and of Nineveh.] But not of Egypt, as Mr Huber has affirmed (1). Mr Perizonius has taken notice of this fault (2).

(1) Histor. Civilis, Tom. i, pag. 475.

(2) Perizonius, in Specimine Errorum, pag. 129.

[B] Syra-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1148, and returned with the greateſt diſgrace to Europe. Noradin knew very well how to improve ſo favourable an opportunity. He invaded the principality of Antioch with a powerful army; gained a victory over prince Raimond, who was killed there; made himſelf maſter of the fortreſs of Harenc, and moſt of the other places of that principality; took the count of Edeſſa above-mentioned in an ambuſcade, and put him to death in irons at Aleppo; diſlodged the Greeks from that whole country, into whoſe hands the counteſs, and Baudouin king of Jeruſalem, had reſigned it, in order for them to protect it; and conquered the city and territory of Damaſcus. Baudouin made a very vigorous oppoſition to ſtop this conqueror's progreſs, and even defeated him more than once; and that in ſuch a manner as to make him admired by his enemy: for we are aſſured, that when Baudouin was poiſoned by his Phyſician at thirty-two years of age (d), Noradin would never take advantage of the conſternation raiſed all over his kingdom by his death, but ſaid with equal modeſty and greatneſs of ſoul, that it behoved him to condole with them, and bear a ſhare in ſo juſt a mourning, ſince they lamented the death of a prince who had not left his equal in the world. Some time after he made himſelf maſter of the city of Paneas. In a word, he poſſeſſed almoſt all Syria and Meſopotamia, and extended his conqueſts even beyond Cilicia to the ſtates of the Sultan of Iconium, whom he had defeated in battle. Fortune preſented to him a fair opportunity of carrying his arms into Egypt, when Sanar, Sultan of that kingdom, being diſpoſſeſſed by Dorgan, applied to him for protection. Accordingly he ſent into Egypt a numerous army, under the command of Syracon, general of his forces [B]. Amauri, king of Jeruſalem, very indiſcreetly [C] aſſiſted Dorgan, who had promiſed him a large tribute. Syracon, amidſt many viciſſitudes, was obliged to quit Egypt twice, but at laſt carried it, after having cauſed Sanar to be aſſaſſinated, and got himſelf to be made Sultan in his room, by the calif of Grand Cairo. Noradin, whoſe creature he was, ſuffered all this. This new Sultan died that ſame year [D], leaving for his ſucceſſor the great Saladin his nephew [E]. Noradin died likewiſe in 1173. His widow married Saladin, and his ſon was diſpoſſeſſed of his dominions by the ſame Saladin (e).

(d) In 1163.

(e) Guill. Tyrius, & alii, apud Maimbourg, Hiſtory of the Cruſades, Tom. i, ii.

[B] Syracon general of his forces.] Father Maimbourg (3), ſays, he was a little man, and that his merit raiſed him to the higheſt poſt in the kingdom, notwithſtanding the obſcurity of his birth, and his being a ſlave: but Calviſius (4) aſſures us he was Noradin's brother.

(3) Cruſades, Tom. ii, pag. 46.

(4) Ad ann. 1169.

[C] Very indiſcreetly.] I have made uſe of this expreſſion out of reſpect to a great many perſons, who attribute to this the loſs of Jeruſalem. The grounds they go upon, are, that Saladin, who expelled the Chriſtians from thence, found them and the Saracens linked together, by reaſon of the wars that his predeceſſor, Syracon, carried on in Egypt againſt king Amauri. However we muſt not forget that this young prince met with ſucceſs in the beginning of theſe wars. I find ſome Hiſtorians make him the cauſe of a more preſent evil: for they ſay, his expedition to Egypt occaſioned Noradin's invaſion of Antioch. I mean that invaſion in which Boemond, prince of Antioch, and Raimond count of Tripoli were defeated, and taken priſoners by Noradin. Cluverius puts this invaſion after Syracon's expedition (5), but Calviſius places it 1165, and the expedition in 1168 (6).

(5) Jo. Cluverius, Hiſtor. Epitome.

(6) Vide Calviſium, ad ann. 1169.

[D] Died that ſame year.] Father Maimbourg places his death in 1168; but Calviſius more juſtly places it in 1170.

(7) Ad ann. 1170.

[E] His nephew.] Or rather his grand-ſon; Nepos ex filio, as Calviſius aſſures us (7).

NULLY (a): STEPHEN DE NULLY, firſt preſident of the court of Aids at Paris, was the ſon of CHARLES DE NULLY and of Anne de Paris.

(a) An article communicated by Mr Marais, and cited at the end of remark [C] of the article PLACE (PETER DE LA.)

CHARLES DE NULLY was at firſt lay-counſellor to the parliament of Paris, he was admitted there the tenth of October 1541.

The twenty third of July 1543 he was promoted to the office of maſter of requeſts (1) and received the ſame day by the parliament. I have ſeen the extract of his admiſſion. At that time there were but few maſters of requeſt, and thoſe offices were conferred only upon perſons of note.

(1) He had the office of preſident Oliver.

In the year 1544, he was named Plenipotentiary for king Francis I, at the peace of Creſpy, together with marſhal d'Annebault, and Gilbert Bayard, Sieur de la Fond ſecretary of State and comptroller-general of the wars. Charles de Nully was the ſecond of the three. The treaty was ſigned the eighteenth of September 1544; and the ſame day king Francis I, wrote him a letter under his ſignet, wherein his majeſty commanded him to notify to the parliament the concluſion of the peace.

During the conferences it happened that a Spaniſh Jacobin, of the noble family of the Guſmans, who was plenipotentiary for Charles V, ſpoke too haughtily againſt France: Charles de Nully gave him a box on the ear, and by this action which appeared too violent, he was diſappointed of the office of chancellor which had been deſigned for him, cardinal de Tournon having remonſtrated that ſuch a ſpirit would not be at all agreeable to the head of the law.

In 1547, he was one of the eight maſters of requeſts who aſſiſted at the funeral ceremonies of Francis I.

In 1548, the reſolution he had ſhewn at the treaty of Creſpy, occaſioned his being pitched upon by Henry II, to go and arraign the whole city of Bourdeaux, which had rebelled ſo far as to aſſaſſinate the Sieur de Monneins, one of the king's officers and lieutenant of the province. The conſtable Montmorency went thither with an army, and entered the city by the breach. Two days after Charles de Nully began the proceſs on his part, and pronounced that famous judgment againſt the rebels, by which the city was declared guilty of rebellion, its privileges forfeited, the parliament ſuſpended, the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the bells taken away, the jurates and an hundred burgeſſes condemned to dig up with their nails the body of the Sieur de Monneins, and ſeveral other remaining particulars which may be met with in every Hiſtory.

Here follows what Thuanus ſays of him under the year 1548, Libr. V.

'Tertiâ die a Stephano Nullio Libellorum ſupplicum Magiſtro de ſeditione quæſtio 'habita eſt. Is, a Mommorantio in eam rem cum aliis a rege delectis judicibus 'adductus alioqui magnae authoritatis vir ſed vehemens & iracundus & qui in pacis 'ad Crepiacum factæ negotio, Dominicano Monacho cujus mutuâ operâ Cæſar & 'Franciſcus utebantur arrogantius utquidem ipſi videbatur loquenti injurioſe manus 'intulerit, quo facto ampliſſimâ Cancellarii dignitate quæ ultrò deferebatur indignus 'habitus eſt, monente Turnonio nequaquam ſummo Magiſtratui impotens & violentum 'ingenium convenire. - - - - On the third day began the proceſs for ſedition, before Stephen 'Nully, maſter of requeſts. He was brought thither for that purpoſe by Montmorency with 'other judges appointed by the king; and was, in other reſpects, a perſon of great merit, 'but warm and paſſionate, and who during the treaty of peace at Creſpy, by ſtriking a Domi- 'nican Monk, employed both by the emperor and king Francis, for ſpeaking as he thought 'too arrogantly, had been judged unworthy of the high dignity of Chancellor, which before 'that accident was deſigned for him without being aſked, cardinal de Tournon having intimated 'that ſo haſty and violent a diſpoſition would by no means become a chief magiſtrate.'

Thuanus, and, after him, Mezerai, have been miſtaken in calling him Stephen inſtead of Charles. They both of them agree that he who went to Bourdeaux was at the treaty of Creſpy: now it was Charles de Nully moſt certainly who was plenipotentiary at that peace, and beſides there never was a Stephen de Nully maſter of requeſts, except the preſident who was not ſo till 1571.

Blanchard, in his book of maſter of requeſts p. 278, calls him Charles. He dates his admiſſion on the twenty-third of July 1543; but he makes another miſtake, for he calls him Milly inſtead of Nully, in which it was eaſy for him to be deceived by the joining and the number of letters. Nor did this miſtake come afterwards from him; for in the editions of the treaty of Creſpy, I have ſeen Milly put inſtead of Nully, and it was certainly Nully who was at that treaty on the part of Francis I, as Thuanus and Mezerai both agree, and as it is yet more evident from the king's letter under his ſignet which I have ſeen in the original.

The twenty-third of October 1549, Charles de Nully died: he was interred in the church of the Holy Innocents, and by an extract from the parliament regiſter it appears that his relations deſired the court to be preſent at his funeral, and that their petition was granted.

He left his widow, Anne de Paris, in poſſeſſion of the eſtate of Neuilly upon Marne, three leagues from Paris, and this eſtate afterwards deſcended to the preſident de Nully, his ſon, as being his mother's jointure: there is nothing to be met with concerning the birth of the preſident, and there is no other proof beſides this circumſtance of the jointure, that he was the ſon of Charles.

The preſident was named STEPHEN: he was firſt counſellor in the parliament of Bretagne, his commiſſion is dated the twelfth of April 1559.

Afterwards he was attorney to the king in the chaſtelet of Paris, and provoſt of the merchants in that city.

In 1569, king Charles IX having removed all the officers of the Proteſtant religion, Mr de la Place, firſt preſident of the court of Aids, was turned out of his place, and Mr de Nully put in his room and admitted the laſt day of February 1569.

In 1571, Mr de la Place was reſtored by the Edict of Pacification; and to make Mr de Nully amends, the king gave him the place of maſter of requeſts: the commiſſion is dated the ſeventeenth of April 1571.

In 1572 happened the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day. Mr de la Place was murthered, and Mr de Nully entred a ſecond time on the poſt of firſt preſident of the court of Aids: the ſecond commiſſion was dated the ſecond of September 1572, eight days after St Bartholomew's day.

The league was formed: the preſident de Nully was one the the moſt violent leaguers. He was preſent among the eſtates of Blois in 1588. The cardinal and duke of Guiſe were there aſſaſſinated: the preſident de Nully was arreſted, and conducted to Amboiſe, from whence he was delivered by paying a thouſand crowns ranſom which he borrowed.

After the death of Henry III, the preſident de Nully continued always firſt preſident of the court of Aids. The duke de Mayenne made him ſecond preſident à Mortier at the erection of his parliament by virtue of letters patents, whereof I have ſent a copy (2). But he gave him letters of diſpenſation for the holding thoſe two offices together: ſome of them were dated the ſeventh of December 1593, and others in preceding years.

(2) This copy may be ſeen above, remark [Q] of the article of the third duke of GUISE.

The duke de Mayenne made him alſo library-keeper to the king, after the death of Mr Amiot grand Almoner and biſhop of Auxerre.

It is to be obſerved, that he took alſo the title of counſellor of ſtate, and that his warrant for it had been given him by Henry III.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

In 1594 Paris was reduced, but we do not find that he continued to exerciſe his office of firſt preſident, nor do we know when he quitted it. He was ſtill living in 1606; for he was preſent at the marriage of his ſon James de Nully, Eſq; lord of Neuilly, in the ſame year.

From JAMES DE NULLY deſcended PETER DE NULLY, Eſq; lord of Neuilly, who married Dame Mary le Bert.

And from this Peter de Nully iſſued another Peter de Nully now living, who, upon his being proſecuted in the Heralds-office, proved all theſe titles of dignity to belong to his family, and was ſupported in his claim of Nobility with honour and diſtinction.

The family of de Nully bears Gules a croſs flower-de-luce or cantoned between four billets or alſo, with two ſwans for ſupporters. Theſe arms may be ſeen in the arched roof of the church of St John en Greve where ſome of their anceſtors have been interred.

The ſame arms are alſo to be met with on the tomb of Foulques curate of Neuilly upon the Marne, that great man mentioned in every chronicle, who in the XIIth century having preached the Croiſade under the orders of St Bernard, and of Pope Innocent III, returned to die in his cure (3). He is buried in the church of Neuilly, and on his tomb, which is a work of that age, are engraved the arms of Nully, probably becauſe ſome perſon of that family had attended him in that holy expedition, and that they were then in poſſeſſion of that lordſhip.

(3) Geoffroy de Ville Hardouin, publiſhed by Mr du Cange.

NUMANTINA, wife of Plautius Silvanus whom I mention elſewhere (a), was accuſed of having occaſioned her huſband's diſtraction by Divinations, or Witchcraft [A], but declared innocent. She lived under the emperor Tiberius, and had been divorced by her huſband.

(a) In the article URGULANIA.

[A] She was accuſed of having occaſioned her huſband's diſtraction by Divinations and Witchcraft.] This is the true ſenſe of the words of Tacitus: Mox Numantina prior uxor ejus accuſata injeciſſe carminibus & veneficiis vecordiam marito, inſons judicatur (1). A French Phyſician (2) has quite miſunderſtood it; for he pretends that Numantina was accuſed of having rendered her huſband impotent and bewitched, by the ſole pronouncing of ſome words, and he proves from this example the vulgar notion, that there are certain words which prevent a man's enjoying a woman. . . . . Daily experience, adds he, of thoſe who are codpiece tied, confirms this. Since he would cite Tacitus, he ought to have examined him with a little more attention.

(1) Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. xxii, ad ann. 777.

(2) John de Renou, lib. i, of his Inſtitutions Pharmaceutiques, cap. xiii, pag. 23, Edition of Lyons 1637.

N. B. A tranſpoſition of certain monoſyllables, occaſioned by an accident, having perplexed the ſenſe of a paſſage in the 198th page of this volume, at line the ſixth from the top of the ſecond column, the reader is deſired to correct it after the following manner, viz.

I came to Paris the ſame year, where I was alſo admitted advocate, and where I pleaded for ſeveral years. In 1634, the parliament of Paris held their extraordinary ſeſſions at Poitiers, where I pleaded alſo. And this made Mr Coſtar ſay, that as there were ſerjeants ſerving warrants through all the kingdom, &c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

O.

OBSEQUENS (JULIUS) a Latin writer, whose country is unknown, as well as the age he lived in. It is only conjectured that he lived some time before the reign of Honorius. Scaliger insinuates (a) that he lived before the time, in which St Jerome, composed his supplements to Eusebius's Chronicon (b). Frisius is grossly mistaken [A]. We are no less at a loss as to the religion of Obsequens; but the fragments we have remaining of his Collection of Prodigies ought to perswade as that he was a Heathen. This work was chiefly a list of the prodigies inserted by Livy in his History [B]. What we have left of it begins with the consulship of Lucius Scipio and Caïus Lælius, that is, about the year of Rome 561 [C]: we have several editions of it [D]. Lycosthenes has endeavoured to supply what is lost of the original. Mr Moreri's quotation is wretched [E].

(a) Scalig. Animadv. in Euseb. num. 1886, pag. m. 147.

(b) He composed them in the reign of Valens the emperor: now Valens died in 379.

(1) Joh. Jacobus Frisius, in sua Bibliotheca apud Schefferum, in Præfat. in Jul. Obsequentem.

[A] Frisius is grosly mistaken (1).] He has said, that this Obsequens lived in the time of Panetius and Polybius, 240 years before CHRIST. This cannot be, since Obsequens makes mention of Augustus.

[B] His work was . . . . a list of the prodigies inserted by Livy in his History.] This we are convinced of by two reasons. 1. This collection ends at the 743d year of Rome, as Livy's Decades do. 2. The author frequently makes use of the same terms with that Historian.

(2) Balth. Bonifac. de Script. Hist. Rom. Note, that Zeiller in Historicis, Part i, pag. 55, in quoting him, puts 55 instead of 505.

[C] That is, about the year of Rome 561.] Some authors place this consulate in that year, others in 563. No body would dare to fix it in 505, and yet Beatus Rhenanus has said in the title of his book, that what we have of Obsequens begins with the year of Rome 505. Balthasar Bonifacius has copied after him the same error (2). The learned Schefferus was not ignorant that these two authors had said this (3), and yet he does not censure them at all, nor give the least notice of their mistake. We likewise meet with it in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca.

(3) See what he says after his preface, and the first of his remarks.

[D] We have several editions of it.] These are the editions mentioned by Schefferus (4). Aldus Manutius was the first who published this work; he printed it at Venice in 1508 (5). Beatus Rhenanus reprinted it six years after at Strasburg, with some other tracts. Asulanus, father-in-law to Aldus Manutius, published a new edition of it in 1518. Some time after Robert Stephens published another at Paris. John Oporin printed it at Basil in 1552, with the Supplements of Lycosthenes, who was then corrector and director of Oporin's Printing-house (6). Care was taking to distinguish by asterisks what was added by Lycosthenes. The following year John de Tournes, Printer at Lyons, copied this edition of Oporin's, and carefully observed all the asterisks. But since Vossius (7) speaks of an edition by John de Tournes, where Lycosthenes's additions were confounded with the work of Obsequens, without any mark of distinction, there is room to believe that this Printer was more careless in an after edition. This carelessness has been the occasion of great mistakes. The phrases of Lycosthenes have been cited as of an antient author; his authority has been alledged as that of an antient writer (8). This disorder is remedied in Mr Schefferus's edition (9); in which, what belongs properly to Obsequens is printed in a Roman letter, and Lycosthenes's Supplements in Italic. We shall give an instance of these mistakes: Alexander ab Alexandro affirms, that when Tarquin was expelled Rome, a dog spoke, and a serpent barked (10). Tiraquellus who has discovered the originals from whence this author had made his extracts, observes, that Livy said no more, than that a serpent fell from a wooden statue (11). Julius Obsequens, adds he, relates the same prodigy, and has all that Alexander ab Alexandro has said upon this head. But it is Lycosthenes, and not Alexander ab Alexandro that says a dog spoke and a serpent barked. Doubtless he took this prodigy from Alexander ab Alexandro; and thus by a strange reciprocation the copier is made use of as a proof for the original. Is not this what the schools call mutua causalitas? - - - - where two things are made the causes of each other.

(4) In the preface to his edition.

(5) From the manuscript that Jocundus of Verona had given him.

(6) Vossius, de Hist. Latinis, pag. 711.

(7) Id. ib.

(8) See Vossius, ibid.

(9) At Amsterdam 1679, in 8vo.

(10) Satis constat . . . canem locutum fuisse, serpentemque ipsius statuæ. Alex. ab Alexandro, Genial. Dier. lib. iii, cap. xv, pag. m. 735.

(11) Tiraquellus. Not. in hunc locum Alex. ab Alexandro.

[E] Mr Moreri's quotation upon this head is a very sorry one.] He cites Sebastian, Conrad. in Quæst. p. 41. This would make one believe that there are two authors, one of whom is called Sebastian, and the other Conrad, who will furnish us with a great many particulars relating to Julius Obsequens, if we do but take the pains to consult them. But these authors are not yet born. If he had cited Sebastian Corradus, he had still led us into an error; for that author gives us only the bare name of Obsequens. He cannot be quoted for any other end than to shew us, that he was of the opinion, that Orosius lived before Obsequens. This is the only use that Vossius makes of the citation of Corradus (12).

(12) Sebastianus Corradus, in quæstura sua, pag. 41. Videtur in alia fuisse sententia (quam quæ statuit antiquiorem Obsequentem Orosio) quia utrumque nominans Orosium præmittit. Vossius, ubi supra.

(a) Spond. ad ann. 1547, num. 22.

(b) Id. ad ann. 1525, num. 27.

(c) See the remark [D] towards the end.

OCHINUS (BERNARDIN) was one of the Ecclesiastics of Italy who fled their country in the XVIth century, in order to embrace the Protestant religion. He was of Sienna. He had been first a Franciscan, and then a Capuchin (a). He continued in the order of Capuchins from 1534 to 1542 (b). They who say he was the founder of the order, or one of the four who first engaged in it, are mistaken [A]; but it is true that he was elected general of the order. I do not believe he was the Pope's confessor (c), as some have affirmed. He observed the rules

[A] They who say he was the founder of the order of the Capuchins . . . are mistaken.] Zachary Boverius proves it by authorities and arguments (1). Among other things, he says it is certain the order of the Capuchins commenced in 1525, and above three hundred persons had embraced it before Ochinus entered into it in 1534. Mr Varillas (2) makes use of these reasons to confute the bishop of Amelia (3) who affirms the same thing with Theodore Beza (4) that Ochinus was the founder of that order. You have this passage of Mr Varillas in the Supplement to Moreri.

(1) In his Annals of the Capuchins, apud Spondan. ad ann. 1525, num. 27.

(2) Hist. of Heresy, book xvii, pag. 59, Dutch Edit.

(3) Antonius Maria Graziani, History of ecclesiastical Commentaries, lib. ii, cap. ix.

(4) Bernardinus ille Ochinus maximi prius in Italia nominis monachus, & Capucinorum (quos vocant) Ordinis auctor. Beza, in Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

[B] He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rules of his order with wonderful auſterity [B], and preached with incomparable zeal [C]; and probably he thought of nothing leſs than quitting his habit and his church, when the converſation of a Spaniſh Civilian (d), who had taken a liking to Luther's doctrine in Germany, raiſed ſome doubts in his mind. It was at Naples that he converſed with this Civilian, and began to preach up doctrines which appeared very new [D]. He became ſuſpected, and was ſummoned before the court of Rome (e). He ſet out upon his journey thither, but at Florence he met with his good friend, Peter Martyr [E], to whom he communicated the advices he had received of the danger he ſhould incur by ſurrendring himſelf to the diſcretion of the Pope. After a mature examination of the matter, they both reſolved to retire to a place of ſafety. Ochinus ſet out firſt, and took the road to Geneva; two days after Martyr began his journey and went for Switzerland (f). A continuator of Baronius aſſures us, that Ochinus carried along with him a woman who followed him to Geneva, and that he married her publickly in order to give an authentic proof of his renunciation of Popery (g). But if we were to judge of this fact, by ſome others related by

(d) His name was Johannes Valdeſius.

(e) Spond. ubi ſupra.

(f) Joſias Simler, in Vita Petri Martyris, apud Melch. Adam. pag. 36.

(g) Spondan. ubi ſupra.

[B] He obſerved the rules of his order with wonderful auſterity.] The biſhop of Amelia in the chapter above cited of the Hiſtory of cardinal Commendon, obſerves, that Ochinus was reſpected as a ſaint, and practiſed very exactly the externals of mortifications. His age, ſays he, his auſtere way of life, his rough Capuchin habit, his beard that hung down below his breaſt, his grey hair, his pale meagre countenance, a certain appearance of infirmity and weakneſs that was very artfully affected, and a general opinion of his ſanctity, occaſioned his being looked upon as an extraordinary man .... Not only the common people, but great lords and ſovereign princes reverenced him as a ſaint. When he came to their houſes, they met him and received him with all the honour and affection imaginable; and at his departure re-conducted him in like manner. For his own part, he made uſe of all the artifices poſſible to confirm them in their good opinion of him. In his travels he always walked on foot; and, though he was infirm both as to years and conſtitution, he was never ſeen on horſeback. When princes forced him to lodge with them, the magnificence of palaces, the Luxury of dreſs, and all the pomp of the age, could never make him abate of his poverty, nor of the auſterity of his profeſſion. At feaſts he never eat but of one diſh, and that always the ſimpleſt and moſt common, and ſcarce ever taſted of wine. He was frequently preſſed to lie in ſoft and rich beds, for the more convenient refreſhing of himſelf after the fatigue of his travels; but he would only ſpread his cloak, and lay himſelf down upon the ground. The reputation he acquired, and the honour and reſpect he met with through all Italy, are incredible.

[C] He preached with incomparable zeal.] Let us once more hear the biſhop of Amelia. We may juſtly ſay (5) he had ſome knowledge; but he applied himſelf more to eloquence and the beauty of words, than to learning and the force of reaſoning. He underſtood little of Latin; but when he ſpoke in his mother-tongue, he explained himſelf, with ſo much grace, politeneſs, and fluency, that the ſoftneſs and purity of his diſcourſes raviſhed all his hearers. When he was to preach any where (it is the biſhop of Amelia who ſtill ſpeaks) the people flocked thither; whole cities came to hear him: there was no church large enough to contain the multitude. The women were generally more numerous than the men. When he was to paſs through any city, an infinite number of people went to meet him, and receive his inſtructions. Bzovius has comprehended a great encomium in few words: 'In tanta tum erat exiſtimatione '(Ochinus) ut unus optimus totius Italiæ concionator 'haberetur, ut qui admirabili quadam cum actione, 'tum linguæ facundia auditorum animos quocunque 'vellet raperent, ac tanto magis quod vita doctrinæ 'reſonaret (6). - - - - - - Ochinus was at that time in ſo great eſteem, as to be reputed the very beſt preacher in all Italy, being able to affect the minds of his auditors juſt as he pleaſed, with his admirable action and eloquence, and ſo much the more as his life was agreeable to his doctrine.'

(5) Mr Varillas, in his Hiſtory of Herely, book xxiii, pag. 59, 60, has paraphraſed this and the preceding paſſage with his uſual liberty.

(6) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542, num. 34.

(7) Supplem. ad Sleidan. lib. xv, apud Spondanum, ad ann. 1547, num. 22.

(8) Eos ſeminatis ab impio Ochino dam ante aliquot annos publice concionaretur in Eccleſia Metropolitana falſis dogmatibus attribuat, quibus à mentibus & linguis hominum iis infectorum refecandis, Prorex Inquiſitionis remedium afferre voluerit. Spond. ibid.

[D] It was at Naples ..... that he began to preach up doctrines which appeared very new.] Tomaſo Coſto (7), who wrote the Hiſtory of the troubles in Naples, occaſioned by attempting to erect the Tribunal of the Inquiſition in that kingdom, pretends that Ochinus's ſermons had ſown the ſeeds of theſe commotions (8). The biſhop of Amelia does not ſay, that this Capuchin was perverted by any heretic who came from Germany, John Valdes for inſtance; he will have it that vanity ruined him, and that the mortification of not being promoted to a cardinal's cap, moved him to drop very artfully ſome words and ſentiments in his ſermons, that tended to run down or leſſen the authority of the holy See (9). Bzovius ſays in general that Ochinus let fall ſome grating expreſſions in a ſermon, quod pro concione quadam ſecus dicta effudiſſet (10); and the comment that has been made upon his words is this. They pretend that on Palm-Sunday he preached before the Pope, and cenſured his pride and pomp in a very lively manner by making a parallel between JESUS CHRIST and him. They add, that when the ſermon was over, one of the cardinals gave Ochinus notice of the Pope's reſentment, and adviſed him to fly immediately. Nimirum (prout alii ſcripto conſignarunt) quod in dominica palmarum faſtum Papæ Romani in ipſius præſentia ex ſuggeſtu acriter perſtrinxerit (facta comparatione Domini Jeſu in pauperi ſtatu Hieroſolymam ingredientis) & Pontificum Romanorum vitam. Qua concione finita unus Cardinalium Papam offenſum eſſe ipſi ſignificat, atque ut protinus præſenti periculo fuga ſeſe eripiat ſuadet (11). Some ſay he propoſed his cenſures of the pride and pomp of the papal court, only as objections ſtarted by the Heretics; but that having ſpent the whole time of his ſermon in ſtating them, he concluded without confuting them. The author to whom I owe this remark tells us, that Ochinus was the Pope's confeſſor and preacher. Fuit is patria Senenſis, conditione monachus, & Pontifici Rom. à ſacris concionibus & confeſſionibus. Is ob parrhæſiam qua motus in auribus ſummi Pontificis & totius Aulæ Romanæ Pontificiam arrogantiam & tyrannidem antichriſtianam, velut ex mente Lutheranorum, non addita objectionum, poſtquam eis ſtudio præſtitutam horam impendit, ſolutione, Italia cedere ..... neceſſe habuit (12). I relate theſe ſeveral things without pretending to warrant them to be true; for inſtance, I have read in the great work of the learned Mr Seckendorf (13), that there were printed in Germany twenty ſermons which Ochinus had preached in his monk's habit; in which he came very little ſhort of the pure doctrine of the Proteſtants, upon juſtification, good works, confeſſion, ſatisfaction, indulgences, purgatory, and other points. One doubt remains, namely, whether theſe ſermons were printed in Germany, exactly as they were preached in Italy. But be that as it will, they were printed at Newburg in 4to in 1545, being tranſlated into Latin by Joſeph Hochſteter.

(9) Ant. Maria Gratiani, ubi ſupra, pag. 205, according to Mr Flechier's tranſlation, printed at Paris in 12mo.

(10) Ad ann. 1542, num. 34, apud Bibliothec. Anti-Trinitariorum, pag. 3.

(11) Id. ib.

(12) Staniſlaus Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, lib. ii, cap. v, pag. m. 110. See likewiſe the Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitariorum, pag. 2.

(13) In Hiſt. Lutheran. Supplem. Indicis I.

[E] At Florence he met with Peter Martyr, his good friend.] I believe it muſt be ſo; for nothing could tempt Peter Martyr to give a falſe account of the circumſtance of the place. He has therefore given us a faithful relation of it in the Memoirs from which his life has been written. And for that reaſon Joſias Simler, who compiled that life, is more to be credited than the biſhop of Amelia, who tells us, 1, That Ochinus was at Verona when the Pope's orders were ſignified to him. 2. That Matthew Giberti biſhop of Verona adviſed him to go and juſtify himſelf. 3. That Ochinus, who complied with his advice with ſome reluctancy, advanced as far as Bologna where cardinal Gaſpar Contarini was at that time legate. 4. That this legate being ſo ill, that he could not adviſe with him upon his affairs, Ochinus reſolved to betake himſelf

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by the ſame author, we ſhould not believe that he made uſe of good authorities [F]. Ochinus's flight made the Pope extremely uneaſy [G]. Ochinus did not fix at Geneva, but went to Augſburg, where he publiſhed ſome ſermons. He and Peter Martyr made a voyage to England in 1547 (b). Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury had invited them both, when, upon the death of Henry VIII, he ſaw every thing prepared for a Reformation (i). But the change of religion which happened in that country after the death of king Edward, obliged theſe two doctors to depart from thence. So they repaſſed the ſea in 1553, and retired to Straſburg (k) [H]. Ochinus was at Baſil in 1555 [I]; but he was called to Zurich the ſame year to be miniſter of an

(b) Sleidan. lib. xix. fol. m. 538, verſo.

(i) Simler, ubi ſupra, pag. 40.

(k) Sleiden, lib. xxv, fol. 721, verſo.

to flight; and that very night threw off his monk's habit, put on a ſecular one, and fled towards the Heretics (14). Mr Varillas, who pretends that Ochinus, before his departure from Verona, conſulted Peter Martyr by letters, hath probably invented that circumſtance. This we may reject as a falſity; ſince there is no room to doubt, but that theſe two men did, in a perſonal interview at Florence, concert their retreat towards the Proteſtants.

(14) Hiſt. of Cardinal Commendon, pag. 205, & ſeq.

FAULTS in Spondanus.

[F] We ſhould not believe that he made uſe of good authorities.] In effect, Spondanus gives us a very ſorry recital of the adventures of Ochinus (15). He makes him in the firſt place an Arian, who durſt not diſcover his Arianiſm in a city that had put to death Michael Servetus. We have quoted Sleidan, who, in matters of this nature, ought to paſs for unexceptionable evidence all the world over: we have quoted him I ſay, upon the aſſurance he gives us that Ochinus went from Geneva to Augſburg before his voyage to England. Now this voyage was in 1547; ſo that he could not depart Geneva upon the account of the puniſhment of Servetus: for that Heretic was not burnt till 1553. Spondanus adds, that Ochinus concealing his ſentiments, for the reaſon above-mentioned, left Geneva, either of his own accord, or elſe becauſe, as ſome ſay, Calvin got him expelled (16). But if Calvin had been the author of his expulſion, he would not have given him the good character that we find he did in 1550 (17); for he muſt have cauſed him to be expelled before the year 1547, in which Peter Martyr and Ochinus went to England. The Annaliſt continues thus; Ochinus leaving Geneva retired to Zurich, and ſoon after was likewiſe forced to depart from thence in the ſame manner. He met with the like reception at Baſil: then he went to England in company with Martyr; and leaving that kingdom in the reign of queen Mary, retired to Germany, and afterwards to Poland, and to Tranſilvania. Now, here are a great many miſtakes. A man that was forced to leave England in the reign of a Roman Catholic queen, muſt doubtleſs have gone thither while the government was under a Proteſtant. Ochinus muſt therefore have gone to England in the reign of Edward; but before he went to England, he had left Geneva, according to Spondanus, for fear of undergoing the ſame fate with Servetus; his leaving Geneva therefore at the ſooneſt could not be before 1553. Then, how could he be in England in the reign of Edward; ſince that prince died in July 1553, and Servetus was not burnt till October in the ſame year? The Annaliſt does here betray a very great degree of negligence. Beſides, it is falſe that Ochinus was expelled Zurich and Baſil, before he went from England in the reign of Mary. He was not forced out of Zurich till 1563. He compoſed in Poland, ſays Spondanus, a Dialogue againſt the ſect of the Gods of the Earth, (meaning the Switzerland and Geneva Clergy) and after that ſome other dialogues, full of Atheiſm; in which he not only vindicated Polygamy, but alſo attacked the holy Scriptures, the Divinity of our Saviour, the Trinity, and even the Deity. This is no more exact than the former. The dialogues he ſpeaks of were the occaſion of his expulſion out of Switzerland, and his retiring to Poland. Therefore he did not compile them in Poland. They contain, without doubt, ſeveral errors, but no impieties; and it is not true, that Ochinus, one of the interlocutors, always owns himſelf baffled by the adverſary he brings in (18). Bzovius has committed errors of the like nature. He would have it, that Ochinus being forced to depart from Cracow, fled to Tranſylvania, and there compoſed dialogues, and that theſe dialogues were afterwards tranſlated into Latin by Caſtalio (19). Here are three errors. For 1. Theſe dialogues were compoſed before the author went to Poland. 2. He did not go from Poland to Tranſylvania. 3. Caſtalio was dead before Ochinus left Poland.

(15) Ad ann. 1547, num. 22.

(16) Cum non auderet eam ibi profiteri ubi Servetus illam igne luiſſet, ſive ſponte, ſive ut quidam habent, à Calvino pulſus. Ibid.

(17) Quos hac noſtra ætate monachos habuit Germania, qui vel doctrina vel ſanctitate cum Luthero, Bucero, Oecolampadio, & ſimilibus conferre ſe niſi nimis impudenter audeant? Quos Itali Bernardino Ochino & Petro Vermilio opponent? Calvin. de Scandalis, Opuſculor. pag. 96.

(18) Ita ſe iis gerens, ut quamvis omnia Catholica dogmata defendere præ ſe ferret, demum ſe tamen adverſarii argumentis victum profiteretur. Spond. ibid.

(19) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542, n. 30, pag. 88.

[G] His flight made the Pope extreamly uneaſy.] He was ſo greatly incenſed upon it, that he had once a mind to diſcharge his anger upon the whole order of the Capuchins; he had a great mind to have aboliſhed that order, and it was with difficulty that he was appeaſed, even after he knew that the offence was only perſonal. Cujus apoſtaſia adeo animus Pontificis perculſus eſt, ut de extinguendo univerſo Ordine tractaverit, vixque placari potuerit cognita Ordinis innocentia (20). Mr Varillas (21) could not believe this, becauſe he imagined that Paul III .... was a better Politician than to give Ochinus the opportunity of boaſting that the Catholics had ſo great a regard to him, as to revenge upon the whole order the loſs they ſuſtained in his perſon. This author's incredulity is more excuſable than the liberty he has taken of paraphraſing upon Spondanus; for we cannot doubt his having that author before him, when he ſpoke of Ochinus. Conſider but well the words of Spondanus juſt now cited. Can any one find there that the Pope's anger was occaſioned by Ochinus's imprudence in putting into his writings the greateſt affronts imaginable upon the religion he was about to renounce, and the moſt virulent reflexions upon the holy See in general, and the perſon of Paul III in particular? And yet Mr Varillas has found all theſe things in them. I do not deny but that Spondanus has obſerved (22) that this monk's apology was full of outrages againſt the holy See and the Catholic church.

(20) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547, n. 22.

(21) Hiſtory of Hereſy, book xvii, pag. 64.

(22) I quote his words in remark [Q] citat. (3).

[H] Peter Martyr and he retired to Straſburg.] We ſhall here meet with an Hiſtorian, whoſe exactneſs is no greater than that of Spondanus; I mean Father Maimbourg. He pretends that Ochinus being expelled from England, deſerted Peter Martyr, and retired into Poland, in order to have the liberty of profeſſing Arianiſm (23). It was there, ſays he, that he compoſed his dialogues, ſtuffed with a thouſand execrable blaſphemies againſt JESUS CHRIST, and the Holy Ghoſt: But having had the impudence to preach up Polygamy, and to dedicate a book in vindication of it to king Sigiſmund Auguſtus, he was forced to leave Poland, the people there riſing up againſt him. Ochinus continued in Switzerland about ten years after his return from England, and would gladly have ended his days there, if they would have ſuffered him to ſtay, upon the recantation he offered: which ſhews, that the free profeſſion of Arianiſm in Poland was not much in his view. This author's ſecond fault conſiſts in going further than he ought to do, in characteriſing the errors with which Ochinus's dialogues are interſperſed. In fine, he knew not that this book of Polygamy was written before his journey to Poland. I doubt very much whether Ochinus dedicated any treatiſe upon that ſubject to king Sigiſmund. The biſhop of Amelia would not have forgot ſuch a notable circumſtance; the Socinians could not have been ſo great ſtrangers to it; they know nothing of that book, but what they read in Bzovius, that Ochinus wrote it in Poland, and dedicated it to the king (24). I ſay once more, I make no doubt but that Bzovius upon that head, delivers a falſity; and I do not believe that Ochinus ever preached up Polygamy. If I am not miſtaken, he contented himſelf with writing his thoughts of it; and if he had preached that doctrine in Poland, the biſhop of Amelia, who was then upon the ſpot, muſt needs have perfectly known it, and would certainly have fully publiſhed it.

(23) Maimbourg, Hiſtory of Arianiſm, Tom. III, pag. 353, Dutch Edit.

(24) Liber de Polygamia in Polonia conſcriptus, Sigiſmundo II Regi Poloniæ dedicatus, teſte Bzovio ſub ann. 1542, n. 30. Bibliot. Anti-Trin. p. 5

[I] Ochinus was at Baſil in 1555.] This appears by the letters of Olympia Fulvia Morata. Salutem dic meis verbis tuæ familiæ & D. Bernardino Ocello quem in Chriſto valde diligo. This is the concluſion of a letter

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

an Italian church formed there. This church consisted of some refugees of Locarno (l), who could not obtain the liberty of professing the Reformation in their own country, by reason of the opposition of the Roman Catholic Swiss-Cantons. Ochinus readily subscribed the Confession of Faith of the church of Zurich, and found there Bullinger who proved a very good friend to him (m). He officiated in the Italian church at Zurich till 1563. At that time the magistrates expelled him by reason of some dialogues printed by him; which contained among other errors that of Polygamy [K]. He retired to Basil, and entreated the ministers and professors of the place to sollicit leave from the magistrates for his staying there. Some put questions to him upon the doctrine of these dialogues; and he made answer that upon these points he was of the same opinion with them; nay, he agreed to the proposal made to him, of giving a clear and precise declaration of his faith: this he agreed to, upon condition of obtaining leave for himself and his children to pass the winter at Basil. But the magistrates having heard his demands, and the report of the doctors, with reference to his doctrine, ordered him to be gone immediately; and resolved to take into consideration at some other time the dialogues themselves, and the dishonour he had done their city, in causing them to be printed there (n). Andreas Dudithius complained to Theodore Beza of their severity to that old man [L], whom they forced to go and seek for shelter, wherever he could find it, in the hardest season

(l) This is one of the four bailiwics that the Swiss possess in Italy.

(m) Josias Simlerus, in Vita Bullingeri, fol. 28, verso.

(n) Id. ib. fol. 38, verso, & 39.

letter she wrote from Heidelberg to Curio, the seventh of May, 1555 (25). Curio lived at Basil, and writ her an answer, dated the twenty-fixth of August following, in which he acquaints her that he had executed her commission. Two nomine salutavi . . . . Bernardinum Ocellum senem doctissimum & sanctissimum (26). We read in another letter (27): Audio Bernardinum Ocellum Senensem virum sincere Christianum ex Anglia Genevam profugisse. This letter is not dated in 1555, as they would have it in the Bibliotheca of the Unitarians (28), but in 1554.

(25) Lib. ii. pag. m. 168. The date of the year is not there; but Curio's Answer, dated Aug. 26, 1555, shews, that I have added the right year.

(26) Curio, ibid. pag. 169.

(27) Pag. 178.

(28) Pag. 3.

[K] His dialogues . . . . contain, among other errors, that of Polygamy.] This work consists of thirty dialogues, the twenty-first of which is that which treats of Polygamy. Ochinus wrote, and published them in Italian; and Castalio translated them into Latin, and printed them at Basil in 1563. Some of the senators of Zurich, were informed by letters from foreign countries, that Ochinus had published a book containing heretical doctrines, particularly that of Polygamy. This occasioned the senate to send for the ministers; who declared, that when they heard that Ochinus had some works in the press, which it would have been much better for him to have suppressed, they went and exhorted him to remember the promise he had made not to publish any thing without the approbation of the synod. They added, 1. That as soon as they knew his book was actually printed, they charged him with a contempt of their remonstrance. 2. That he pleaded, by way of excuse, that his book was gone to the press before their first admonition. 3. That tho' he argues pro and con upon the subject of Polygamy, it is evident he approves it (29). 4. That they had received letters, highly complaining of his other dialogues, and that they intended to enter into a strict examination of the whole work. They exhorted the author, in a particular manner, both before and after the sentence of the senate, to give an orthodox explanation of his sentiments; but they could not in the least prevail with him. The sentence ran thus (30): 'Quoniam Ochinus contra Leges & Edicta Magistratuum librum publicasset quem satius erat supprimi (31) & cujus nomine Ecclesia & Respublica male audit, ideo se velle & jubere ut quam primum ex urbe & agro Tigurino discedat. - - - - Forasmuch as Ochinus, contrary to the laws and edicts of the magistrates, had published a book, which it would have been much better to have suppressed, and on the account of which, both the church and state have been reflected on, therefore they will and command, that he do immediately depart out of the city and dominions of Zurich.'

(29) Quod dialogum de Polygamia stinet, disputan in utramque partem, sed ita ut facile appareat quonam ipse inclinet, præsertim cum ita concludat, & moneat eum qui plures ducere vellet, ut si non possit se continere & una contentus esse, sequatur instinctum spiritus in hac re. Simlerus, in Vita Bullingeri, fol. 39.

(30) Id. ib.

(31) Would they talk after this rate of that book, if it were such as Father Maimbourg represents it, who, unquestionedly never saw it? See the remark [P] at the end.

[L] Andreas Dudithius complained . . . . of their severity to the old man.] Since this is not a book of controversy, I hope it will not be taken amiss, if I say that Beza does not give a very fair answer to Dudithius: he seeks only some turns of wit, and endeavours to throw dust in his eyes. 'Ochinum præterea 'narras indicta causa, hyeme acri, decursa jam ætate 'senem cum uxore & liberis Tiguro ejectum. - - - - 'You also tell me, that without any trial, Ochinus was 'expelled Zurich in the depth of winter, and the decline 'of old age, together with his wife and children.' Thus it is that Beza has repeated the objection (32). This renders the sentence of Zurich odious upon three accounts: 1. Because the cause was not tried. 2. Because no regard was had to the rigour of the season. 3. Because of their having expoled to the inconveniences of the winter a man incumbered with years, and with a family. Upon the first head Beza makes answer, that it is a false and scandalous reflexion upon a just and pious senate, to offer to say, that the cause of Ochinus was not tried: that, it is true, they did not narrowly examine every thing, ; but that was the effect of their great clemency (33). Upon the second, that Ochinus had not a day's journey to travel (34). Upon the third, that the more aged he was, the more criminal he was (35), and besides, that his wife was dead. Now the first answer is very lame; for it is certain, the senate of Zurich condemned Ochinus, not only without hearing him, but without ordering an examination of his dialogues. The ministers, consulted by the senate, answered positively upon nothing but the article of Polygamy; they said in general, that they had received letters, complaining of his dialogues, and promised to inquire maturely into the matter: but what did the senate do in the mean time? Why, they enjoined Ochinus to depart out of the city, and out of the canton forthwith. Simlerus, who, as a Zurich professor, was more interested than Theodore Beza to set the affair in a favourable light, relates the thing exactly in the manner I have done. To say, that if every thing was not narrowly inquired into, it was the effect of a very great clemency, is a poor pretence, which all the judges in the world may equally make use of, when they condemn any one party without giving him a hearing. Nor is the third answer better than the first: it runs counter to the maxims of common sense, and the general practice of mankind. Regard is had to age, even in criminal cases; and if two men be sentenced to be put to the torture, one of seventy, the other of forty years of age, it would be ordered more moderate to the former than to the latter. So that our Ochinus's great age served to expose the sentence very much, but not to excuse it. If Beza would have made a right use of his wit, he should have owned Dudithius's plea of age, and made answer, that, in effect, the magistrates of Zurich had a regard to Ochinus's years, in only banishing him; which they would not have been content with had he been a young man. This is what he ought to have replied, and not to have had recourse to a maxim, which asserts, that the more aged Heretics are, the more unworthy are they of the clemency of their judges. The second answer is not sincere; for it supposes that all Ochinus's trouble consisted in travelling five or six leagues. That pretence might pass for good, if he could have found a retreat in the neighbourhood; but we have seen that he could not obtain leave to pass the winter there. Beza knew this very well; he was not ignorant that Dudithius could have enforced this objection by the usage Ochinus met with at Basil. So that upon the whole we cannot admit this answer to Dudithius to be a just one. Dudithius's design was only to tax the Protestants beyond the Rhine with severity to their Heretics: and among other instances, he brings that of the city of Zurich to Ochinus, in banishing him in the middle of the winter. The answer given is, that his exile expoled him only to the fatigue of travelling five or six leagues. Why then Ochinus

COMPARISON of Dudithius's objection, with the answer of Theodore Beza.

(32) Beza, Epist. prima Oper. Tom. i., Pag. 190.

(33) Delatus ad Magistratum, pro eo quod severam pœnam pro tantis sceleribus meretur, non sane indicta causa (quod qui dicunt magnam justo & pio Magistratui injuriam faciunt) sed non ad vivum resectis omnibus, ut cum illo quam clementissime ageretur, justus est è Tigurinorum agro facessere. Ibid.

(34) At hyems erat: nempe longa fuit non unius integri diei via. Ibid.

(35) At senex erat: tanto nocentior veterator. Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſeaſon of the the year. Ochinus was then ſev to Poland, but the Nuncio Commendon qui by virtue of an edict granted him againſt a retired to divers places. Ochinus went to M Plague ſwept away not only him, but his wife, if we give credit to the Hiſtory of Cardinal of his death are variouſly related [O], and a he embraced after his departure from Switzerla after preaching openly the hereſy of Macedor attacked the myſtery of the Trinity. The Ant of their authors. He writ ſeveral books; a Bibliotheca [P]: but they have forgot to p

(o) The Life of Cardinal Commendon, by Antonius Maria Gratiani, lib. ii, cap. ix.

Ochinus muſt have found a ſanctuary at the end of the five or ſix leagues; for if inſtead of having ſhelter there, he, on the contrary, met with another good Proteſtant ſenate who expelled him, Dudithius's objection, taken from the ſeaſon of the year, remains in full force, with reference to his aim, which was to ſhew, that Ochinus is a remarkable inſtance of the ſevere temper of the Reformed. It is morally impoſſible, but that Beza muſt have known all this; and yet he choſe rather to give ſuch an anſwer than to ſay nothing. He took took care not to ſeem as if he knew any thing of what was done at Baſil (36): the ſmall extent of the canton of Zurich furniſhed him with a ſpark of fire, a little point of wit; and he made uſe of it, in hopes, no doubt, to dazzle his readers with it.

(36) I mean the banishing of Ochinus; for he owns that the tenets of this Heretic were condemned there. Baſileam igitur venit, ubi quum itidem ſuos errores damnatos videret, tandem ad ſuos ſive Tritheïtas, ſive Arrianos, ſive Samoſatenianos ſe contulit. Would not one be apt to gather from theſe words that he left Baſil of his own accord? and yet he was ordered to depart that city. Can the ſuppreſſing of this matter of fact be fair or ſincere?

[M] Ochinus was then ſeventy-ſix years of age.] Peter Perna aſſures us of it in his letter to Czechovicius. This letter I never read, I have only ſeen it quoted (37). At this rate, Gratiani muſt be miſtaken, when he ſays, that Ochinus turned Heretic at ſixty years of age; without conſidering, ſays he (38), either his age, or his profeſſion, or his vow of continence, being a Prieſt, a Capuchin, and ſixty years of age, he inſtantly married a young girl. Ochinus left his cloiſter, and retired to Geneva in 1542; at which time he was not ſixty, but about fifty-five years of age, if it be true that he was but ſeventy-ſix in 1563, when he was baniſhed Zurich.

(37) Anno 1563 natus annos 76 (teſte Petro Perna in Epiſtola ad Czechovicium) à Tigurinis pulſus eſt. Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. pag. 3.

(38) Life of Cardinal Commendon, pag. 208.

[N] The plague ſwept away not only him, but his wife . . . . if we are to believe the hiſtory of cardinal Commendon.] I make uſe of this caution, becauſe he is miſtaken as to the wife. Ochinus was a widower when he was baniſhed Zurich; and it is by no means probable that he married again. It is Theodore Beza informs me of his being a widower: he even enters into the inſcrutable judgments of Providence, and aſſures us, in a Theological ſtyle, that the Divine juſtice purſuing that wretch in his family, before his impiety was made public, his wife broke her neck. This is one part of Dudithius's objection. At uxorem & liberos habebat; to which Beza anſwers thus (39). De uxore falſum eſt, quod ex bono Alciato ſive quovis alio cognoviſti. Fregerat enim collum horrendo Dei judicio domi impium ſenem perſequente, priuſquam foras productum eſſet ipſius ſcelus. Staniſlaus Lubienietſki (40) gives us the following account of the latter part of Ochinus's life. Ochinus retired into Moravia, and into Poland, where he was ſtill within the reach of John Calvin's letters. He returned from Poland to Moravia, upon the edict of king Sigiſmund, who, in 1564, baniſhed all thoſe who were called Tritheiſts, Arians, &c. Some gentlemen endeavoured to perſuade Ochinus to ſtay, but he anſwered them, that he was bound to obey the magiſtrates, and that he would obey them, even tho' he were reduced to the neceſſity of being devoured by the wolves in the woods. While he was upon the road, he was ſeized with the Plague at Pinczow; where he met with many charitable offices from one of the bretheren, named Philippovius. His two ſons and his daughter (41) died of the Plague. But he recovered himſelf, and continuing his journey towards Moravia, died three weeks after at Slavonia (42). Theſe are all the circumſtances we have from Lubienietſki. I cannot find in any good author that Ochinus was ever in Tranſylvania: for Father Maimbourg, who affirms that he was, is not a ſufficient witneſs of it. He was forced, ſays he (43), to quit Poland . . . . and after wandring ſome time in Tranſylvania, he retired at laſt, oppreſſed with miſery and poverty, to a village, where he died of the Plague, abandoned by all the world. Some quote the biſhop of

(39) Oper. Tom. III, pag. 190.

(40) Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, lib. ii, cap. iv, pag. 110. See likewiſe Budzinius, Hiſtor. Eccleſiar. Polonicar. MS. cap. xxvi, apud Biblioth. Anti-Trin. pag. 3.

(41) Gratiani ſays, on the contrary, his two daughters and his ſon.

(42) As I take it, we ought to read Slaucovia.

(43) Hiſtory of Arianiſm, Tom. iii, pag. 352.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google published for changing his religion [Q]. He inscribed it to the Pope; and filled it full of things altogether injurious to Popery. This piece met with an answer. The public acknowledgement he made is remarkable: he confessed in a preface, that if he could have continued to preach the truth, as he had done for some time, without the hazard of his life, he would never have quitted the habit of his order (q); but that finding he had not courage enough to expose himself to martyrdom (r), he had fled to the Protestants. They do him wrong who assure us, that he was the author of the book de tribus Impostoribus [R]. It is said that he promised the cardinal de Lorrain to convince the Protestant churches of twice twelve errors [S]. I find that authors have oftentimes exaggerated what relates to Ochinus [T]. Mr Varillas has Seckendorf, in Supplementis Indicis I, Historiæ Lutheran.

(r) Cum se ad mortem sponte obeundam non satis firmum esse deprehenderet. In eadem Præfatione.

necessity. He turns and winds all ways imaginable in order to find an out-let, and meeting with none, he concludes every time with a fervent prayer to GOD, that he would be pleased to deliver him from those abysses. However, in the sequel of the work, he attempts to furnish out-lets from this prison; but he concludes, that the only way is to say with Socrates, unum scio quod nihil scio. We ought to be silent, says he, and to think, that in points of that nature, GOD requires of us, neither the affirmative, nor the negative. The title of the last chapter is this: Qua via ex omnibus supradictis Labyrinthis cito exiri possit, quæ docta ignorantiæ via vocatur. De Aubigné mentions a book of Ochinus, which he represents as a very curious piece. His words are these (52): first, that the service should be in French, provided some jests were taken out, that would set the people a laughing; as to begin the mass by an, &, and other absurdites, which are handsomely and subtilly written by Bernard Ochinus in his treatise della Nativita della Missa: as for the ornaments, that the most ridiculous should be laid aside; and as for the rest, it should be answered, says Ochinus, that it is the LORD's Supper disguised, which turned a nun, per parer più santa, - - - in order to be more holy. To speak properly, I fancy he ought to have said not treatise but sermon della Nativita della Missa; for in running over Ochinus's twelve sermons upon the LORD's Supper (53), I find the title of the seventh runs thus, Missæ tragœdia, ac primum quomodo concepta, nata, baptizata fuerit, - - - The Tragedy of the Mass, and first how it was conceived, born, and baptized. The title of the eighth is, Quemadmodum nutrita educataque fuerit Missa, adoleveritque, & ornata, ditataque ad summam dignitatem præstantiamque pervenerit. - - - How it was maintained, educated, and brought up to it's dignity and splendor. The title of the ninth is, Missæ accusatio ejusdemque responsio, & adversus eam acta. - - - The Accusation and Defence of the Mass, with the whole Trial. The title of the tenth is, Sententia à Deo contra Missam lata. - - - - The Sentence pronounced by GOD against the Mass. This dramatic way of preaching savours too much of the genius of the Italians. Sleidan observes, that, in 1549, there appeared a bloody satire against Paul III, which was not composed by Ochinus, tho' his name was put in the title. He gives an abstract of it: Prius quam decederet libellus exiit Italicus vehemens in illum atque gravis, titulo quidem Bernardini Ochini, sed ab aliis, ut creditur, compositus cum præfatione ad Ascanium Columnam quem ille profligarat (54). I have already taken notice of the thirty dialogues which were the cause of Ochinus's banishment: but I must add here, that Mr Simon speaks of them very much to the purpose (55). He owns, that the author does not openly declare his Anti-trinitarian Heresies: he does not there declare himself altogether an Unitarian; he only states the arguments pro and con . . . . In the dialogue of the Trinity he produces at length the arguments of the Catholics, and of the Anti-Trinitarians; those of the latter he pushes very far, under pretence of answering them (56). Bullinger assures us (57), that these dialogues were burnt in a considerable city.

(52) Confession Catholique de Sancy, book ii, chap. ii, pag. 390, 391. See likewise, chap. vi, of the first book, pag. 346.

(53) Translated into Latin, and printed at Basil, with the Labyrinths of the same author.

(54) Sleidan, Hist. lib. xxi, fol. m. 602, vers.

(55) He is mistaken in dating Ochinus's call to Zurich from the year 1562, and in attributing the Life of Bullinger to Melchior Adam; for that Life was written by Josias Simler.

(56) Simon, Histoire Critique des Commentat. du Nouv. Testam. chap. lv, pag. 831.

(57) Apud Boxhorn. Histor. Universf. pag. 74, ad ann. 1552.

(58) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547, num. 22.

[Q] The apology he published for changing his religion.] One of the continuators of Baronius speaks of it in this manner: 'Genevam appulsus apologiam de fuga sua 'ad Pontificem scripsit, maledicentiis & calumiis in 'sedem Apostolicam & Ecclesiam Catholicam Rom. 'refertissimam (58). - - - - Being arrived at Geneva, he 'wrote an apology to the Pope for his flight, stuffed with 'reflexions and calumnies against the Apostolical See, and 'Catholic church of Rome.' Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, who was afterwards Pope by the name of Paul IV, wrote an answer to Ochinus, which was inserted in the history of the Theatins. 'Contra Ochini apologiam nonnulli stylum acuerunt; inter quos Joannes 'Petrus Caraffa Cardinalis Theatinus, qui deinde fuit 'Paulus Papa IV paræneticam egregiam scripsit epi'stolam, quam Joannes Baptista Acerrarum Episcopus 'Historiæ Theatinorum inseruit (59). - - - - Some 'took up their pen against the apology of Ochinus: among 'whom John Peter Craffa, cardinal of the order of 'the Theatins, who was afterwards Pope Paul IV, 'wrote an admirable Exhortatory Epistle, which John 'Baptista, bishop of Acerra, inserted in the history of the 'Theatins.'

(59) Id. ib. See likewise Varillas's History of Heresy, book xvii, pag. m. 64.

[R] They do him wrong who assure us that he was the author of the book de tribus Impostoribus.] He who wrote the notes upon the Religio Medici does not affirm it; he only doubts of it, 'nescio an Bernardinus 'Ochinus . . . . an alius hujus auctor sit (60). - - - I 'know not whether Bernardus Ochinus . . . or some other 'person was the author of it.' Micrælius also proceeds no further (61), but Scavenius affirms it. See what Rhodius says upon this head (62) towards the end of Placcius's book de Scriptoribus Anonymis. Among other things he declares, he does not know that ever any objection was raised against the other twenty-nine dialogues of Ochinus. It is strange that so learned a man as he should say so. I have already (63) produced several instances which evince the contrary.

(60) In Sect. xix, pag. m. 126.

(61) Syntagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. m. 863.

(62) Pag. 33.

(63) See the remarks [F], [H], and [K].

[S] It is said that he promised the cardinal de Lorrain to convince the Protestant churches of . . . . errors.] The matter of fact, as we have it from Simlerus, is this (64); Ochinus met the cardinal upon the road to Schaffhousen, and told him he was so unhappy as to be banished for a book, which he had writ with intent to vindicate, against the objections of the adversaries, thirty difficult points of faith he had met with in the Reformed religion. He presented the cardinal with some copies of his Dialogues, and prayed him to read them. We shall consider them, replied the cardinal, and if they do not please us, we shall throw them into the fire. Ochinus added, that he would engage to convince the Reformed churches of twenty-four errors. Throw twenty of them aside, replied the cardinal, and the remainder will be but too many. Beza relates the same fact, and gives it for certain; but he carries the number of false doctrines much higher, which Ochinus promised to refute. This cardinal despised a monk, who relapsed so often into apostacy. Vix Basilea egresso (quod narro scito me non ut rumorem incertum, sed ut certam historiam narrare) occurrit Lotharingus Cardinalis ex Italia rediens, cui sese operamque suam omnem obtulit, pollicitus sese centum errores istorum inter quos tamdiu hæsisset hæreticorum demonstraturum. Sprevit hominem toties apostatam Cardinalis (65).

(64) In Vita Bullingeri, ol. 40.

(65) Beza, ubi supra.

[T] Authors have oftentimes exaggerated what relates to Ochinus.] Besides what I have hinted in other remarks (66), I shall add here, that they do not faithfully represent his doctrine, when they say, with Gratiani, that he endeavoured to prove by examples, and by arguments taken from Scripture and Politics, that it was proper every one should endeavour to people the world, and beget a numerous family; and that it is not only allowable, but a duty incumbent upon Christians to marry as many wives as they please (67). If you read the beginning of his dialogue de Polygamia, you will find the state of the question to be this: A man who wishes for children, and is married to a wife barren, sickly, and with whom he cannot agree, may he marry another wife without a divorce from the first? Ochinus supposes that he is consulted upon this case of conscience; he declares himself on the negative side: and, after putting into the mouth of the person, who consults him, the most plausible arguments for a plurality of wives, and faintly returned some pretty good answers, concludes with advising him to have recourse to prayer; and assuring him, that, if he prays with faith to GOD for the gift of continence, he will obtain it; and in fine,

(66) The above remarks [F] and [H].

(67) Life of Cardinal Commendon, pag. 211.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(s) Orat. III, pag. 91, 92, Edit. 1696. See likewise, pag. 505.

has told a great many falſities of this Ex- always done him juſtice [X]. Palearius (s) l monk.

fine, by telling him, that, if GOD does not grant him continence, nor the faith that is neceſſary for praying for it with ſucceſs, he may, without ſin, follow the inſtinct which he will certainly know to come from GOD. Now, does this amount to a poſitive aſſertion, that the Goſpel commands Chriſtians to marry as many wives as they pleaſe? Doubtleſs Ochinus is in an error, and introduces Enthuſiaſm; but ſtill we muſt do juſtice to all the world, and own that there is a great deal of unfairneſs in the writings that mention his doctrine.

[U] Mr Varillas tells a great many falſities relating to this Ex-Capuchin.] We ſhall draw them up in diſtinct articles.

I. I do not doubt but his whole account of quarrels between Calvin and Ochinus is a romance, that he has either invented or ſtole: but I will warrant for truth that he is in error, when he affirms (68), that, at Geneva, Ochinus writ againſt the Trinity, and renewed the hereſy of the Arians .... and that he publiſhed upon that ſubject an hundred extravagances, in libels compoſed by him in Italian, and tranſlated by his friends into Latin. This I can demonſtrate to be falſe. Ochinus left Geneva before 1547, as we are aſſured by the words of Sleidan quoted above. Calvin ſpeaks of him with an encomium in a book (69) he publiſhed in 1550. He was not therefore at that time apprized of thoſe horrible hereſies of Ochinus; and beſide, would an unfrocked Capuchin who had been known to adhere to Tritheiſm or Arianiſm, have been ſent into England in 1547? But we need no other proof againſt Varillas, than the paſſages of Beza, which teſtify, that Ochinus concealed for a long time the hereſies he entertained in his mind, and that they were not diſcovered till the impreſſion of his dialogues. Now this impreſſion was not before 1562. 'Sceleratus hypocrita 'Arianorum clandeſtinus fautor, polygamiæ defenſor, 'omnium Chriſtianæ religionis dogmatum irriſor, 'quum eo tandem audaciæ erupiſſet ut ſua portenta in 'publicum ederet (juſto ſanè Dei judicio ne LATERE 'diutius tantum malum poſſet) delatus ad Magiſtratum '... juſſus eſt è Tigurinorum agro faceſſere (70). --- 'This wicked hypocrite, the ſecret favourer of Arianiſm, 'the patron of Polygamy, the burleſquer of all the doctrines 'of the Chriſtian religion, when he had attained to that 'pitch of inſolence as to publiſh his monſtrous opinions (by 'the juſt judgment indeed of GOD, that ſo great a de- 'gree of wickedneſs might no longer LIE CONCEALED), 'being carried before a magiſtrate ...., was commanded 'to depart out of the canton of Zurich.' It is with theſe words that Beza begins his anſwer to Dudithius's complaints. This paſſage evidently proves, that the opinions of Ochinus were not diſcovered till his dialogues were printed. The friendſhip Bullinger (71) had for him till this edition, is another inconteſtable evidence of the ſame fact. Beza ſeldom mentions Ochinus, without taking notice that he was a long time a hypocrite. 'Favit etiam illis, ſed NIMIUM SERO de- 'tectus, Bernardinus ille Ochinus, impuriſſimus hypo- 'crita (72). ------ One favourer of theirs, but diſ- 'covered too late, was that Bernardinus Ochinus, a 'moſt abominable hypocrite.' When he ſays that Peter Martyr made a voyage to England, in 1547, and that Ochinus accompanied him, he adds (73), 'Maxi- 'mi prius in Italia nominis monachus & Capucino- 'rum (quos vocant) ordinis auctor, idemque quod 'MULTIS demum POST annis patefecit, ſceleratus 'hypocrita. - - - - A monk, formerly of great reputation 'in Italy, and founder of the Capuchins (as they are called), 'and who a great MANY YEARS after appeared to 'be a wicked hypocrite.'

II. Another fiction is this: 'It is aſtoniſhing that 'Calvin contented himſelf with cauſing him to be ex- 'pelled Geneva, and did not put him into the hands 'of juſtice to be burnt, as he ſince did Servetus for 'the ſame crime (74).' Mr Varillas enquires into the reaſons of ſuch different conduct, and alledges two or three for it; after which he adds, that Ochinus was baniſhed Geneva by a decree of the ſenate, and retired to Baſil. A man muſt have had a great deal of leiſure time upon his hands when he ſearches after reaſons for a chimera. He ſhould firſt have proved the fact, and

(68) Hiſt. of Hereſy, book xvii, pag. m. 65.

(69) That de Scandalis.

(70) Beza, ubi ſupra.

(71) See his Life done by Joſias Simlerus, fol. 28 verſo, 39 verſo.

(72) Epiſt. lxxxi, Operum, Tom. iii, pag. 295.

(73) In Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

(74) Varillas, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

In the firſt edition of this article there was nothing ſaid againſt Florimond de Remond. Yet he is a writer who has not been exact with reſpect to Ochinus [Y]. It was on his authority that Bzovius ſaid, that the wife of this Monk was forced to turn laundreſs for bread [Z]. But he has enriched himſelf more amply with the ſpoils of the Annaliſt of the Capuchins. He borrows from him a long narration of the apoſtacy and pretended martyrdom of our Ochinus [AA]. This deſerves to be conſidered.

diſciples behind him, any more than Lyſerus. VI. It is falſe, that Ochinus retired from Germany to Tranſylvania; and yet falſer, that he made that retreat, becauſe he could not find means in Germany to ſatisfy his ambition and vanity. After having been baniſhed from Zurich, he fled to Baſil, from whence he was likewiſe baniſhed. He would have met with the ſame uſage in all the cities of the world where the miniſters had any intereſt: ſo that he had no choice left; the only way he had left was to march towards Poland, and throw himſelf into the arms of the heretics in that part of the world. If GOD has not been merciful to him, thoſe who were ſo zealous in baniſhing him and promoting his exile, are accountable for the loſs of his ſoul. VII. He ſhould not have quoted Pratolus V. Polig. for he ſays not a word of Ochinus in that place.

[Y] Florimond de Remond . . . . has not been exact upon the head of Ochinus.] He ſays (82) that this Monk quitted Geneva, and retired to Zurich, from whence he was ſoon after baniſhed as well as from Baſil; of which Dudithius complains in his letter to Beza. This man, adds he, being expelled Switzerland, went from thence to Germany, and after that to Poland. He wrote a book of Polygamy, dedicated to king Sigiſmund II. That doctrine was preached by him at Cracow, as Reſcius the Polander informs us. All the female ſex in that country, took the alarm, as hot as the Roman dames of old, when deceived by young Papyrius. So that poor Ochinus, whom they charged with having left his wife at Geneva, though indeed ſhe had died of her fall, was conſtrained to fly the city, and retire to Tranſylvania. He publiſhed ſome dialogues, that have ſince appeared in divers languages. Caſtalio tranſlated them into Latin. All this is full of anachroniſms and falſities; of which any one may be convinced by reading what I have ſaid, either againſt Spondanus or againſt Varillas, or againſt the other copiers of Florimond de Remond, who is the purveyor-general of the Roman catholic writers, who ſpeak of the reformers of the XVIth century.

(82) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, book iii, ch. 9, pag. m. 293, 294.

[Z] . . . . It was from him that Bzovius ſaid, that the wife of this Monk was . . . a laundreſs.] There is nothing that Florimond de Remond loves ſo much as to banter Monks wives. Let us ſee how he expreſſes himſelf upon the ſubject now before us. Their arrival at Zurich and Baſil, ſays he (83), ſpeaking of Peter Martyr and Bernardin Ochinus, gave ſome ground of ſuſpicion. The people ſurpriſed to ſee theſe two preachers, whoſe names rung all over Italy, feared they might be ſly Sinons that came creeping into their cities, with intent to form ſome treacherous deſign, and to ſeduce the ſouls they had reformed. They were freed from this their jealouſy by Bernardin Ochinus's bringing along with him a handſome young Italian wench, whom he had debauched under a promiſe of marriage; and by his habit, for inſtead of his former hairy garment he was dreſſed like a ſoldier. To enter into an indiſſoluble contract with hereſy, he gave his hand to that girl, and married her. This is the Gordian knot which attaches to this party thoſe whom the tranſports of pride and luſt eject out of convents. This Ochinus ſojourned ſome time at Geneva, with his wife, who was ſoon after forced to earn her bread by mean and abject ſervices; for neither the one nor the other had brought with them much money. This was Madam Ochinus the laundreſs . . . . . (84) Martyr had brought along with him (85) his Nun to alleviate his watchings and fatigues. He had not done like Ochinus, who, weary of his laundreſs, had made away with her: for, though Beza ſays ſhe broke her neck, calling to witneſs Alciatus, that other Arian who did ſo much miſchief in Poland, it was not without the ſuſpicion of Ochinus's having accelerated her end, which they would not inquire narrowly into, becauſe he had not yet declared himſelf an Arian, but behaved himſelf as a good brother in CHRIST. This is what Florimond has the aſſurance to ſay, without the allegation of any one proof, great or ſmall, and without citing any author whatſoever. This ſaves me the trouble of any farther criticiſm.

(83) Id. ib. pag. 293.

(84) Id. ib. pag. 296, 297.

(85) That is, when he went to England.

Bzovius (86) has copied faithfully, and word for word, almoſt ſix pages (87) of the hiſtory of Peter Martyr and of Benardin Ochinus out of Florimond de Remond (88). He has not forgot the paſſage which imports, That Martyr was poſſeſſed with the ſame paſſion with Luther, transferring his devotions upon theſe Nuns, according to the cuſtom of thoſe who throw off their monaſtic habit: And conſequently has ſighed ever ſince for theſe cloyſtered laſſes, who by the help of their veils the better preſerve the beauty of their Complexion. But, he has not copied, which I wonder at, this other paſſage (89), though Peter Martyr 'was already very much 'in years, yet not being able to bridle his luſt, he 'went to Geneva to meet a Nun, whom the ſame 'paſſion had drawn out of her convent; namely, 'Catherine Meranda, one who was recommended to 'him, and whom accordingly he married. He would 'have no other but the ſpoil of monaſteries . . . . 'Brentius attacked him very roughly; and Martyr 'nettled at the boldneſs of Brentius, who had uſed 'him with no great meaſure of Chriſtianity, was pre'paring a reply, when, worn out with the ſervices he 'was obliged to perform for his new Nun, he ſicken'ed and died in the ſame city of Zurich.'

(86) Bzovius, Annal. Tom. xx, pag. 87, & ſeq. ad ann. 1542. He cites the author, whom he copies.

(87) That is, in the edition in quarto, of Florimond de Remond.

(88) Flor. de Remond, ubi ſupra, pag. 293.

(89) Id. ib. pag. 297.

As for the reſt, if it was true that Ochinus paſſed the Alps with the woman who was afterwards his wife; we ought to judge charitably, that he only carried her along with him to Switzerland; becauſe he was apprehenſive ſhe would not meet with an opportunity of getting out of Babylon. For he muſt have been guilty of too much folly and forecaſt, if he had thought it neceſſary to provide againſt the want of women in a reformed country. That ſcarcity is not to be feared there, any more than in any other climates; and he muſt have been perſwaded that in caſe marriage ſhould be neceſſary for him at the age of fifty-five, either to ſatisfy the deſire of nature, or to undeceive thoſe who might ſuſpect that he ſtill maintained the validity of his monaſtic vows, he would meet with officious perſons enough to procure him a wife. I believe we have no example of any converted Monk who continued a bachelor for want of finding a woman that he might marry.

[AA] Bzovius borrows from the Annaliſt of the Capuchins, a long narration of the apoſtacy, and pretended martyrdom of Ochinus.] I ſhall here confine myſelf to what concerns his martyrdom. Bzovius repeating the very words of Zecharias Boverius, the author of the Annals of the Capuchins, relates, that Ochinus living at Geneva fell ill, and was troubled with great remorſes, which obliged him to ſend privately for a neighbouring curate; to whom he confeſſed his ſins, and deſired to be re-united to the boſom of the Catholic church, as repenting of his departure from it, and of his having preached hereſy about fifteen years (90). The curate adminiſtered to him the ſacrament of repentance; and repreſented to him that he ought to make a public recantation of his hereſies. Ochinus promiſed to do it as ſoon as he ſhould recover; or if he did not recover, to make a free declaration of his converſion to his diſciples and viſiters. Upon this condition he was abſolved and re-united to the church. He deſired to communicate; but the Prieſt finding it hazardous to carry the Viaticum to him, comforted him with theſe words of St Auguſtin, crede & manducaſti, believe and you have eaten it. The ſick man quickly declared his converſion to the diſciples who came to ſee him, and earneſtly exhorted them to follow his example in quitting the hereſies he had taught them. They thought at firſt he was light-headed; but finding afterwards that he was in earneſt, they gave notice of it to the magiſtrates. The magiſtrates enjoined them to obſerve whether he perſiſted in thoſe ſentiments, and if he did, to kill him. The diſciples executed their orders: for after hearing the fine diſcourſes he made to them concerning repentance, they ſtabbed him in his bed. Others affirm, that, by virtue of a decree of the magiſtrates, he was dragged out of the city and ſtoned (91). The Annaliſt of the Capuchins alledges

(90) Obſerve this date; it would prove that Ochinus was killed at Geneva in 1557, or thereabouts; and we can prove, that he was expelled Zurich in 1563.

(91) Quare mox illi arreptis pugionibus quos occultos geſtabant in lecto jacentem & manus ad Cœlos tendentem confodiunt. Alii vero eum Magiſtratus edicto extra Urbem raptatum, lapidibuſque obrutum fuiſſe tradunt. Bzovius, ad ann. 1542, num. 68, pag. 96.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

alledges the testimony of seven persons, whose names and stations he sets down. The first of these seven witnesses is a Doge of Venice; and the rest are persons considerable, either by birth or by the offices they bore in monasteries. But not one of them affirms any thing otherwise than upon hear-say. To these testimonies the Annalist adds, what Theodore Beza owned (92), that at last Ochinus discovered himself to be a great hypocrite (93); but, as Theophilus Raynaud (94) has very well proved by a letter of Theodore (92) Beza, in Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

(93) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542, num. 70, & seq.

(94) Theoph. Raynaud, in Syntagm. de Libris propriis, num. 23, pag. 42. Apopompæi.

OCTAVIA, grand-niece of Julius Cæs one of the most illustrious ladies of antient R Marcellus, who was consul in the year 704 Perusian war. Soon after his death she marri friends having desired this marriage (b) as a the peace which was just concluded betwee virtuous lady was very well qualified for produ gave himself up so entirely to his passion for with him to hearken to reason. Before he fe were very serviceable (c). He left her in Ita at Tarentum in the year 717, and returned out, in order to meet him; and perceiving she would stop at Athens, she accordingly imposed upon her. Upon this she returned t husband's house, though Augustus desired it. every thing just as if she had been perfectly treated the children of Marc Antony and F and continued to educate them with equal vi mitted, upon any account in the world the a to become the cause of a civil war (g); a obedience to his orders she removed from his because she saw she should be looked upon this her excellent conduct she did her h will (i); for the people observing that (a) She was the daughter of Caius Octavius, and of Atia, the daughter of Atius Balbus, and Julia, the sister of Julius Cæsar.

(b) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 929.

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 932.

(e) Ib. p. 940.

(f) Ib. p. 941.

(g) Ib. p. 940.

(h) Ib. p. 942.

(i) See the remark [B], citation (8).

[A] Soon after her first husband's death she married Marc Antony.] The Roman laws prohibited widows to marry during the first ten months of their widowhood; but Octavia had a dispensation from that rule by a decree of the senate (1). This the publick good required; for there was but too much reason to fear that Marc Antony and Augustus would quarrel for ever, and perpetuate the civil war, unless peace were established between them by some good mediator; and no expedient appeared so proper to form this happy mediation, as the marriage of Marc Antony with Octavia. Upon this account the marriage was hastened, without even waiting till Octavia was brought to bed (2). Every thing was hoped for from her prudence and beauty. Τουτον ἅπαντες εἰσηγοῦντο τὸν γάμον, ἐλπίζοντες τὴν Ὀκταβίαν, ἐπὶ κάλλει τοσούτῳ σημνότητα καὶ νῦν ἔχουσαν, εἰς ταυτὸ τῷ Ἀντωνίῳ παραγενομένην, καὶ σερχθεῖσαν, ὡς εἰκὸς, τοιαύτην γυναῖκα, πάντων πραγμάτων αὐτοῖς σωτερίαν ἔσεσθαι καὶ σύγκρασιν. Has nuptias suaserunt omnes, quòd Octaviam sperarent, quæ excellentiæ formæ gravitatem & prudentiam habebat adjunctam, ubi Antonio conjuncta esset, atque ut talis fœmina haud dubiè ab eo adamata, omnium rerum ipsis salutem & concordiam allaturam (3). ---- All agreed in promoting this marriage, out of a perswasion, that Octavia, who was as prudent and grave as she was beautiful, by being married to Antony, must needs be beloved by him for those admirable qualities, and consequently conclude a general and lasting peace. This marriage was consummated in the year 714 (4). Three years after they saw the accomplishment of the hopes they had conceived. Augustus waged war with the son of Pompey, and wanted succours from Antony. Antony came from the East to Italy, with a much greater intent to inform himself of the state of affairs, and to take advantage of this juncture, than to second Augustus. Their correspondence grew colder and colder every day: they complained one of another, and their jealousies were like to have run higher; but Octavia dexterously struck in to reconcile them, and compassed her end (5). Plutarch is much more circumstantial in his account of this than Dion: he relates, that after these Triumviri had made peace with

(1) Plut. in Anton. pag. 929, 930.

(2) Dio, lib. xlviii, pag. m. 429, ad ann. 714.

(3) Plut. ibid. pag. 929, F.

(4) 713 according to Calvisius.

(5) See Dio, lib. xlix, sub fin.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Cleopatra [B], conceived a very great indignation and contempt for him. This war, as every one knows, ended in the entire ruin of Marc Antony. Fortune ſeemed to promiſe Octavia the higheſt pitch of human felicity. She had a very deſerving ſon, who married the daughter of Auguſtus, and was looked upon as the preſumptive heir of the empire. But he died in the flower of his age [C]; which proved ſo ſevere a blow

[B] They conceived great indignation againſt Antony, upon finding that he preferred to her ſuch a woman as Cleopatra.] Thoſe who had ſeen Cleopatra deplored, above all others, Marc Antony's infatuation, becauſe they found her neither ſo young nor ſo handſome as Octavia. He therefore diſcovered a great deal of folly in not giving the preference to Octavia, who infinitely ſurpaſſed the other in virtue and wiſdom. Ῥωμαῖοι δὲ ᾤκτειρον οὐκ ἐκείνην ἀλλ' Ἀντώνιον, καὶ μᾶλλον οἱ Κλεοπάτραν ἑωρακότες, ὅτε κάλλει τῆς Ὀκταβίας ὅτε ὥρᾳ διαφέρουσαν. Populum vero Romanum miſerebat non ita illius (Octaviæ) ut Antonii, atque impenſius eos qui Cleopatram viderant, neque forma Octaviæ neque ætatis flore præcellentem (7). The high eſteem they had for Octavia, who did all the good offices ſhe could to her huſband's children and friends, without reſenting his affronts, did Marc Antony a great deal of harm; inſomuch, that, contrary to her intention, this illuſtrious lady expoſed him extremely to the hatred of the Romans. Ἄκουσα δὲ ἐβλαπτε διὰ τοῦτων Ἀντώνιον· ἐμισεῖτο γὰρ ἀδίκων γυναῖκα τοιαύτην. Enim vero biſce rebus offecit invita Antonio. Invidia namque flagrabat, quod talem fœminam violaret (8). Accordingly it is ſaid that Auguſtus conſented to Octavia's voyage to her huſband, only out of hopes that he would put ſome great affront upon her; and he knew very well that ſuch an affront would paſs for a ſufficient ground for renewing the war. To this, we may add, that he did not doubt but it would complete the indignation of the people of Rome againſt Marc Antony. Ἐν δὲ Ῥώμῃ βαλομένης Ὀκταβίας πλεῦσαι πρὸς Ἀντώνιον ἐπέτρεψε Καῖσαρ, ὡς οἱ πλείους λέγουσιν οὐκ ἐκείνῃ χαριζόμενος, ἀλλ' ὅπως περιυβρισθεῖσα καὶ καταμελη θεῖσα, πρὸς τὸν πόλεμον αἰτίαν εὐπρεπῆ παρασχοί. Romæ inſtituenti ad Antonium navigare Octaviæ annuit Cæſar, non, ut plerique tradunt, quo illi indulgeret: verum quo contumelia affecta deſpectaque colorem præberet bello movendo honeſtum (9). Whatever good opinion Cleopatra might have of her own charms, ſhe was extremely apprehenſive of thoſe of Octavia; and for that reaſon had recourſe to the deepeſt artifices to hinder Marc Antony from ſuffering her to come near him. Αἰσθομένη δὲ ἡ Κλεοπάτρα τὴν Ὀκταβίαν ὁμόσε χωρῆσαν αὐτῇ, καὶ φοβηθεῖσα μὴ τῷ τρόπῳ τῇ σεμνότητι καὶ τῇ Καίσαρος δυνάμει προσκτησαμένη τὸ καθ' ἡδονὴν ὁμιλεῖν καὶ θηραπεύειν Ἀντώνιον. ἄναχος γένηται, καὶ κρατήσῃ παντάπασι τῆς ἀνδρὸς, ἐᾶν αὐτὴ προσεποιεῖτο τῷ Ἀντωνίῳ. At Cleopatra conferre ſecum pedem animadvertens Octaviam, veritaque ne cum gravitate morum & Cæſaris potentia placidam adjungens conſuetudinem & Antonii obſervantiam, inſuperabilis eſſet & ſemel potiretur viro, deperire ſimulabat ſe Antonii amore (10). She made her galant believe that ſhe could not live if he left her: ſhe took care to repreſent to him, that it was enough for Octavia to be a lawful wife, while Cleopatra, the queen of ſo great a people, bore only the name of his concubine: a name which ſhe could willingly bear (11), provided that Marc Antony's abſence might not throw her into deſpair. Ὀκταβίαν μὲν .... τὸ τῆς γαμετῆς ὄνομα καρπᾶσθαι· Κλεοπάτραν δὲ, τοσούτων ἀνθρώπων βασιλεύσαν, ἐρωμένην, Ἀντωνίῳ καλεῖσθαι· καὶ τοὔνομα τοῦτο μὴ φεύγειν μεδ' ἁπαξίαν ἕως ὁρᾶν ἐκεῖνον ἕξεσι καὶ συζῆν, ἀπελαυνομένην δὲ τούτου μὴ περιβιώσεσθαι. Octaviam enim .... nomine frui uxoris. Cleopatram vero, tam multorum Reginam mortalium, pellicem Antonii nominari: neque eam hoc defugere vel dedignari nomen quoad aſpicere illum & una liceat vivere: quo ſi orbaretur non ducturam ultra ſpiritum (12). Marc Antony's friends adviſed him to ſend Cleopatra back to Egypt, ſhe having followed him to Epheſus when every thing was preparing for the laſt rupture: but ſhe fearing that Octavia would once more reconcile her brother to her huſband (13), found out a man who perſuaded Antony to carry her along with him wherever he went. Her emulation was ſo ſtrong, that, coming to Athens, where Octavia had been received with very diſtinguiſhing marks of honour, ſhe was very liberal to the people in hopes to obtain the like (14).

[C] Her ſon died in the flower of his age.] His name was Marcus Claudius Marcellus; and his elogy is inſerted in the Æneid with ſo much ſkill, and ſo admirably well turned, that no reader can be ſo ſtupid as not to be moved with it. I have read it above a hundred times, and always with tranſports of admiration: and now that I read it once more in tranſcribing it here, I think it finer than it ever appeared to me before. Several excellent judges have aſſured me that they are of the ſame mind. I doubt not therefore but I ſhall be pardoned for giving it here entire.

Atque hic Æneas (unâ namque ire videbat
Egregium formâ juvenem, & fulgentibus armis;
Sed frons læta parùm, & dejecto lumina vultu)
Quis, pater, ille virum qui ſic comitatur euntem?
Filius? anne aliquis magnâ de ſtirpe nepotum?
Quis ſtrepitus circa comitum! quantum inſtar in ipſo eſt!
Sed nox atra caput triſti circumvolat umbrâ.
Tùm pater Anchiſes lacrymis ingreſſus obortis:
O nate, ingentem luctum ne quære tuorum:
Oſtendent terris hunc tantum fata; neque ultra
Eſſe ſinent: nimium vobis Romana propago
Viſa potens, Superi, propria hæc ſi dona fuiſſent.
Quantos ille virûm magnam Mavortis ad urbem
Campus aget gemitus! vel quæ, Tiberine, videbis
Funera, cum umulum præterlabêre recentem!
Nec puer Iliacâ quiſquam de gente Latinos
In tantum ſpe tollet avos: nec Romula quondam
Ullo ſe tantum tellus jactabit alumno.
Heu pietas! heu priſca fides! invictaque bello
Dextera! non illi quiſquam ſe impunè tuliſſet
Obvius armato; ſeu cùm pedes iret in hoſtem;
Seu ſpumantis equi foderet calcaribus armos.
Heu miſerande puer! ſi qua fata aſpera rumpas,
Tu Marcellus eris: manibus date lilia plenis:
Purpureos ſpargam flores, animamque nepotis
His ſaltem accumulem donis, & fungar inani
Munere (15).

Æneas, here, beheld, of form Divine,
A godlike youth, in glitt'ring armour ſhine:
With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face.
He ſaw and wond'ring aſk'd his airy guide,
What, and of whence was he, who preſs'd the hero's ſide?
His ſon, or one of his illuſtrious name?
How like the former, and almoſt the ſame!
Obſerve the crowds that compaſs him around:
All gaze, and all admire, and raiſe a ſhouting ſound.
But bov'ring miſts around his brows are ſpread,
And night, with ſable ſhades involves his head.
Seek not to know (the ghoſt replied with tears)
The ſorrows of thy ſons, in future years.
This youth (the bliſsful viſion of a day)
Shall juſt be ſhewn on earth, and ſnatch'd away.
The gods too high had raiſed the Roman ſtate,
Were but their gifts as permanent as great.
What groans of men ſhall fill the Martian field!
How fierce a blaze his flaming Pile ſhall yield!
What fun'ral pomp, ſhall floating Tiber ſee,
When riſing from his bed, he views the ſad ſolemnity!
No youth ſhall equal hopes of glory give:
No youth afford ſo great a cauſe to grieve.

The

(7) Ib. p. 942. D.

(8) Ib. p. 941.

(9) Ib. p. 940, B.

(10) Ibid. C.

(11) Compare what Heloïſa ſaid above, in the remark [U] of her article.

(12) Plut. ibid. pag. 942, D.

(13) Φοβηθεῖσα τὰς διὰ Ὀκταβίας πάλιν αὖθις διαλύσεις. Novam interprete Octavia timens reconciliationem. Id. ib. pag. 941. F.

(14) Ib. p. 942, C.

(15) Virgil. Æneid. lib. VI, ver. 860, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google blow to the mother, that ſhe remained ever ſ up entirely to ſolitude, and to a terrible melan the year 744 (k), leaving two daughters by advantageouſly (l). They who ſay ſhe had are miſtaken.

(k) Dio, lib. liv, pag. 625.

(l) See the article ANTONIA.

The Trojan honour, and the Roman boaſt;
Admir'd when living, and ador'd when loſt!
Mirror of antient faith in early youth!
Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!
No foe unpuniſh'd in the fighting field,
Shall dare thee foot to foot, with ſword and ſhield.
Much leſs, in arms, oppoſe thy matchleſs force,
When thy ſharp ſpurs ſhall urge thy foaming horſe.
Ah! cou'dſt thou break through fate's ſevere decree,
A new Marcellus ſhall ariſe in thee!
Full canifters of fragant lilies bring,
Mix'd with the purple roſes of the ſpring;
Let me with fun'ral flowers his body ſtrow,
This gift which parents to their children owe,
This unavailing gift I may at leaſt beſtow.

DRYDEN.

The recital of theſe verſes made the Emperor and Octavia melt into tears; and Virgil was obliged to acquaint them that he was come to the end of the book, otherwiſe they would have ſtopped his reading. He was liberally rewarded for them (16). Others ſay, Octavia ſwooned away at the words, Tu Marcellus eris, and was brought to herſelf again with great difficulty. She ordered the Poet a good ſum for each verſe (17). Marcellus died in the 731ſt year of Rome (18). All authors agree that he was very young; but few give his exact age. Propertius indeed has done it (19), and he allots him twenty years of age, in which point he is more to be credited than Servius, who makes him but eighteen (20). Glandorp is miſtaken in affirming that Servius makes him twenty-three (21). In another place (22), without citing any author, he aſſerts, that Marcellus died at the age of twenty-four.

(16) Et conſtat hunc librum tanta pronuntiatione Auguſto & Octaviæ eſſe recitatum, ut fletu nimio imperarent ſilentium: niſi Virgilius finem eſſe dixiſſet, qui pro hoc ære gravi donatus eſt, id eſt, maſſis. Servius, in Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 862.

(17) Tres omnino libros recitavit, ſecundum videlicet, quartum & ſextum; ſed hunc præcipue ob Octaviam, quæ cum recitationi intereſſet, ad illos de filio ſuo verſus, Tu Marcellus eris, defeciſſe fertur, atque ægrè reſocillata, dena ſeſtertia pro ſingulo verſu Virgilio dari juſſit. Donatus, in Vita Virgilii.

(18) Dio, lib. liii, circa fin.

(19) Propert. Eleg. XVII, lib. iii.

(20) Servius, ubi ſupra.

(21) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 233.

(22) Ib. p. 434.

(23) This does not agree with what I have mentioned in the preceding remark.

[D] She remained ever after inconſolable.] The circumſtances of her affliction were, in my opinion, well worth the notice of all Hiſtorians who have occaſion to mention her and her ſon: for they have a character of ſingularity which has all the appearance of ſomething very extraordinary. Octavia became ſuch a man-hater that ſhe courted nothing but ſolitude; the very glory of her brother was a trouble to her. The being a mother was enough to make one become the object of her indignation. She kept no picture of her ſon, and would not ſuffer any one to ſpeak of him, rejecting all the verſes that were made upon him (23). Seneca is the only author who informs us of theſe circumſtances. He is ſo very particular upon this ſubject that it will not be improper to tranſcribe his words. 'Octavia Marcellum, cui & avunculus & ſocer 'incumbere cœperat, in quem onus imperii reclinare: 'adoleſcentem animo alacrem, ingenio potentem; 'ſed & frugalitatis continentiæque in illis aut annis 'aut opibus non mediocriter admirandum; patientem 'laborum, voluptatibus alienum; quantumcumque im- 'ponere illi avunculus, & (ut ita dicam) inædificare 'voluiſſet, laturum. Benè legerat nulli ceſſura pon- 'deri fundamenta. Nullum finem, per omne vitæ 'ſuæ tempus, flendi gemendique fecit: nec ullas admi- 'ſit voces, ſalutare aliquid afferentes: ne avocari 'quidem ſe paſſa eſt. Intenta in unam rem, & 'toto animo affixa, talis per omnem vitam fuit, qua- 'lis in funere: non dico non auſa conſurgere, ſed al- 'levari recuſans: ſecundam orbitatem judicans, lacri- 'mas omittere. Nullam habere imaginem filii cariſ- 'ſimi voluit, nullam ſibi fieri de illo mentionem. O- 'derat omnes matres, & in Liviam maximè furebat: 'quia videbatur ad illius filium tranſiſſe, ſibi promiſ- 'ſa felicitas. Tenebris & ſolitudini familiariſſima; 'ne ad fratrem quidem reſpiciens, carmina celebran- 'dæ Marcelli memoriæ compoſita, alioſque ſtudiorum 'honores rejecit, & aures ſuas adverſus omne ſolatium 'clauſit, à ſolemnibus officiis ſeducta, & ipſam mag- 'nitudinis fraternæ nimis circumlucentem fortunam 'exoſa, defodit ſe, & abdidit. Affidentibus liberis, 'nepotibus, lugubrem veſtem non depoſuit; non ſine 'contumeliâ omnium ſuorum, quibus ſalvis orba ſibi

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Cicero's anſwer to an objection of Marc Antony againſt Octavius, and grounded upon his mother's being born in Aricia (34). Suetonius's evidence is poſitive againſt Plutarch: 'Decedens Macedonia (C. Octavius) prius 'quam profiteri ſe candidatum conſulatus poſſet, 'morte obiit repentina, ſuperſtitibus liberis, Octavia 'majore, quam ex Ancharia, & Octavia minore, item 'Auguſto, quos ex Atia tulerat (35). - - - Caius Octavius departing from Macedonia, before he could declare himſelf candidate for the conſulſhip died ſuddenly, leaving behind him Octavia the elder, his daughter by Ancharia, and Octavia the younger, and Auguſtus, his children by Atia.' See Mr Perizonius, who has ſet all theſe arguments in a clear light, in order to ſhew the error of Plutarch, adopted by Antonius Auguſtinus, by Juſtus Lipſius, and ſome other learned men (36). The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, has inſiſted at large upon this criticiſm, in giving an abſtract of Perizonius's book. But he has made a conſiderable miſtake in ſaying that Marcellus's wife was the daughter of Aricina (37). This expreſſion imports, that Aricina was the name of that lady's family, which is very falſe, it being only an epithet given her in regard to her native country Aricia. The learned Manutius pretends, that the mother of Octavia was not born in that place, and wonders how ſhe came to be deſcribed by that addition. 'Miror autem Aricinam Atiam eſſe dictam, cum nec ipſa nec pater 'ejus Balbus Ariciæ natus eſſet, fuit enim, Suetonio 'teſte, paterna ſtirpe Aricinus (38). - - - - I am ſurprized that Atia ſhould be called an Arician, when neither ſhe nor her father Balbus was born in Aricia, for he was, if we believe Suetonius, an Arician by the father's ſide.' But he is under a great miſtake; for if Atius and his daughter had not been of Aricia, Cicero would not have overlooked ſuch a fair plea to diſprove Marc Antony, who upbraided Octavia's mother with being born in that place. He was too well verſed in the art of refuting, and too dexterous in taking advantage of the leaſt circumſtances, to ſuffer his adverſary to run away with a falſity of this nature. Since therefore he grants the matter of fact, and only refutes the conſequence which Marc Antony drew from it, we need not doubt but that Manutius in this place has made a very falſe remark. But it may be aſked what ſhall we do with the paſſage of Suetonius? I anſwer, that Suetonius's phraſe in this place is of a piece with a way of ſpeaking uſual among the French writers. They ſay that ſuch a one is originaire (originally) of ſuch a place (39); by which expreſſion they mean, that not only his anceſtors, but himſelf was born there. I own indeed that in this latter ſenſe the expreſſion is not very exact. Originaire, in the politeſt authors, relates only to the country of one's father or grand-father, &c. But whoever told us that Suetonius was a nice obſerver of exactneſs in his ſtyle?

Perizonius has very juſtly cenſured Triſtan, who thought, that the mother of Marcellus, Auguſtus's ſon-in-law, was never married to Marc Antony. This thought he grounded upon the words of Seneca, touching that lady's affliction upon the death of her dear ſon. All that is here ſaid of Octavia, (it is Triſtan that ſpeaks (40) after rehearſing the paſſage of Seneca) can by no means, as I take it, be underſtood of her, of the two Octavia's, Auguſtus's ſiſters, who had Antony for her ſecond huſband. For that ſingular and ſavage way of living, of a woman who drowned her days in tears; and ſtifled the ſplendor and luſtre of her family in darkneſs, in retirement, and in flying ſociety and day-light as much as poſſible, covering that continual ſorrow with deep mourning, can never ſuit with what is ſaid of her marriage with Marc Antony, and what followed thereupon, of the diſtinguiſhing love and honour, ſhewn her by Auguſtus, of the marks of honour paid to her elſewhere, particularly at Corinth, where, as Pauſanias informs us, in his Corinthiaca, a temple was built to her honour; of the reputation ſhe had juſtly merited, for being a courageous, virtuous, and conſtant lady, and for having brought up the ſeven children of Marc Antony, which he had by her and by Cleopatra (41), as if they had been all her own, notwithſtanding his caſting her off; and in fine, of all the other honourable circumſtances relating to her, recorded by hiſtorians. He believes therefore, that of Auguſtus's two ſiſters, the eldeſt married Marcellus, and fell into the affliction mentioned by Seneca; and the youngeſt married Marc Antony. This is a falſe notion, and only raiſing ſcruples from nothing: for if he had but called to mind, that the marriage of Octavia with Marc Antony happened about ſeventeen years before the death of young Marcellus, he had found no difficulty in reconciling Seneca with the other authors (42). In the Journal des Savans (43) there is a learned diſſertation upon the true degree of conſanguinity between Auguſtus and Octavia. It was communicated to the journaliſt by a learned Antiquary (44), and a very honeſt gentleman. In that diſſertation he ſets the truth in a clear light, but he is a little out in his ſtating Triſtan's objection. Marcellus's Octavia, ſays he (45), whom Suetonius calls the younger Octavia (†), had been already propoſed for a wife to Pompey by her great uncle; ſo that ſhe was twice looked upon as an inſtrument of reconciliation. And this furniſhes us with an anſwer to the objection of ſome moderns, who finding in Seneca (‡) that Marcellus's widow was inconſolable upon the death of her huſband, will not allow her being married a ſecond time to Marc Antony: for we very well know that perſons of that rank are commonly victims of ſtate. Octavia, notwithſtanding her mourning, was forced to conſent to this ſecond marriage for the public good, and for her brother's intereſt; and it is very probable that on Marc Antony's ſide, it was pure Politics that moved him to marry a lady, whoſe extraction he had decried. And accordingly we ſee he threw her off ſoon after, to give himſelf intirely to Cleopatra. You ſee plainly he ſuppoſes that Triſtan quoted Seneca, to prove that this lady was inconſolable upon the death of her huſband. And yet he neither does, nor can, quote him for any thing elſe than to ſhew her extreme affliction for the death of her ſon. You ſee likewiſe, he ſuppoſes that Octavia doing violence to herſelf, married Marc Antony in the midſt of the affliction repreſented by Seneca. But if you conſult Seneca, you will ſee how groundleſs that ſuppoſition is.

(34) Ignobilitatem objicit C. Cæſaris filio: cujus etiam naturalis pater, ſi vita ſuppeditaſſet, Conſul factus eſſet. Arician mater. Ibid. pag. 781.

(35) Sueton. in Auguſt. cap. iv.

(36) Jacob. Perizonius, Animadverſ. Hiſtoric. pag. 116, & ſeq.

(37) Nouv. de la Repub. des Lett. ubi ſupra.

(38) Paulus Manutius, in Cicer. Philipp. III, pag. m. 782.

(39) Moreri often makes uſe of this expreſſion.

(40) Triſtan. Comment. Hiſtor. vol. i, pag. 54.

(41) Why does not Triſtan take notice of the children of Marc Antony and Fulvia, which Octavia brought up? how comes he to be ignorant of what Plutarch ſays in Antonio, pag. 955, that of the ſeven children left by Marc Antony, including the two daughters he had by Octavia, the eldeſt was put to death by Auguſtus, and the other ſix were brought up by Octavia?

(42) See Perizonius, Animadv. Hiſt. pag. 120; and the Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, ubi ſupra, pag. 598.

(43) Of the 21ſt of January 1686, pag. 25, & ſeq. of the Dutch edition.

(44) Mr Rainſſant, Phyſician of Rheims, keeper of the medals in the king's cloſet.

(45) Journal des Sçavans, ubi ſupra, pag. 27, 28.

† Sueton. Jul. 27.

‡ Senec. Conſ. ad Marc.

OCTAVIA, the daughter of Claudius the emperor, and of Meſſalina, was born in the 795th year of Rome [A]. She was betrothed very young to Lucius Silanus; but that contract was broke by the ambitious artifices of Agrippina, who had a mind ſhe ſhould be married to her ſon Nero. Some pretence or other was neceſſary to be made uſe of, and that ſhe was not without. Vitellius, a dexterous courtier, and a great flatterer, undertook the management of that affair, and invented ſpecious accuſations [B], by virtue of which he got Silanus diveſted of the Senatorial dignity. Soon

[A] She was born in the 795th year of Rome.] If we believe Tacitus; but there is ſome reaſon to think he is miſtaken. He ſays (1), that ſhe was in the twentieth year of her age when ſhe was put to death, and that ſhe was put to death in the conſulſhip of P. Marius, and L. Aſinius; that is, in the year of Rome 815. This ſhews therefore that ſhe was born in the year 795. But ſince he has placed (2) her marriage with Nero, under the conſulſhip of D. Junius and Q. Haterius, that is in the year of Rome 806, we muſt conclude ſhe was then at leaſt twelve years of age; and conſequently was born in 794. Add to this, that her father betrothed her to Silanus in the firſt year of his reign (3), that is in the year of Rome 793, and that Suetonius informs us that Britannicus was born after her (4). Now Britannicus was born the twentieth day of his father's reign (5).

[B] Vitellius, a dexterous courtier . . . . invented ſpecious accuſations.] One of the happieſt qualities of a courtier is to foreſee at ſome diſtance, who they are for whom fortune is preparing her moſt conſiderable favours: for the ſervices done them before-hand, while they are upon the execution of their ſcheme of grandeur, inſpire them with much more gratitude, than thoſe which are done after the actual poſſeſſion of authority. It was Vitellius's talent to foreſee the advancement

(1) Tacit. Annal. lib. xvi, cap. lxvi.

(2) Ib. lib. xii, cap. lviii.

(3) Dio, lib. lx, pag. 668, apud Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. i, pag. 1019.

(4) Sueton. in Claud. cap. xxvii.

(5) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Soon after Octavia was betrothed to Agrippina's as ſoon as he arrived at ſixteen years of age him, ſhe paſſed into another family by a feigned ad had been inceſtuous. She was very unfortunat of her [C], and divorced her under the pret married preſently after, ſuborned a man wh familiar with one of her ſlaves (c). The wo upon the rack, to oblige them to depoſe a reſiſt the violence of the torture charged her ſolution to declare her innocent; and one of expreſſion [D]. However Octavia was ſent a ſtrong guard. The common people, who places to loſe (d), murmured to that degree again. It is impoſſible to expreſs the joy wh recalled; or the honours which the people pa herſelf undone if ſhe did not ruin her; for w feet, and backed her petitions with ſuch polit
(f). Nero engaged the man who had got

(a) Tacit. Annal. lib. xii, cap. lviii.

(b) Dio, lib. lx, pag. 687, apud Tillemont, Tom. i, pag. 391.

(c) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. lx.

(d) Inde crebri queſtus, nec occulti per vulgum, cui minor ſapientia, & ex mediocritate fortunæ pauciora pericula ſunt. Ibid.

(e) Ib. cap. lxi.

(f) Ibid.

vancement which fortune was meditating. By this talent he knew that the emperor Claudius would marry Agrippina, and that ſhe would manage her huſband as ſhe pleaſed. The lady's cunning, and the huſband's weakneſs, were ſure foundations for this prognoſtic. It could not therefore be thought ſtrange that Vitellius left no ſtone unturned to ruin Silanus; for Agrippina's intereſt called for that ſacrifice: ſhe wanted to have Octavia at liberty to be betrothed to Nero, and that could not be done but by breaking her contract with Silanus. Silanus had a ſiſter very remarkable for her beauty and wantonneſs. They could not convict him of having lain with her: but Silanus had not been careful enough to conceal his paſſion for her. This gave Vitellius a handle to turn him out of the ſenate: for he was cenſor, and his poſt impowered him to degrade thoſe who miſbehaved themſelves. As ſoon as Silanus had received this mortification, Claudius broke off the contract of marriage, and obliged him to quit his prætorſhip. The words of Tacitus relate all this in a manner much more noble than I am able to expreſs. Igitur Vitellius nomine Cenſoris ſerviles fallacias obtegens, ingruentiumque dominationum proviſor, quo gratiam Agrippinæ pararet, conſiliis ejus implicari, ferere crimina in Silanum, cui ſane decora & procax ſoror Junia Calvina haud multum ante Vitellii nurus fuerat: hinc initium accuſationis, fratrumque non inceſtum, ſed incuſtoditum amorem ad infamiam traxit. Et præbebat Cæſar aures, accipiendis adverſum generum ſuſpicionibus caritate filiæ promptior. At Silanus infidiarum neſcius, ac forte eo anno prætor, repente per edictum Vitellii ordine ſenatorio movetur, quanquam lecto pridem ſenatu, luſtroque condito. Simul affinitatem Claudius diremit; adactuſque Silanus ejurare magiſtratum, & reliquus præturæ dies in Eprium Marcellum collatus eſt (6). Silanus killed himſelf on Claudius's and Agrippina's wedding day: his ſiſter was baniſhed, and expiations were enjoined for their inceſt. Every one ridiculed theſe expiations, in regard that the emperor, who injoined them, had himſelf ſo lately contracted an inceſtuous marriage (7).

(6) Tacit. Annal. lib. xii, cap. iv, ad ann. 801.

(7) Die Nuptiarum Silanus ſibi mortem conſcivit, ſive eo uſque ſpem Vitæ produxerat; ſeu delecto die, augendam ad invidiam. Calvina ſoror ejus Italia pulſa eſt. Addidit Claudius Sacra ex legibus Tullii Regis piaculaque apud lucum Dianæ per Pontifices danda: inridentibus cunctis quod pœnæ procurationeſque inceſti id temporis exquirerentur. Ib. cap. viii.

[C] Her huſband grew preſently weary of her.] His friends repreſented to him how much he was in the wrong in contemning his wife ſo ſoon, and depriving her of thoſe rites which the ſtate of matrimony required from him. Let her content herſelf (replied he) with bearing the name of my wife; that is an honour, that is a dignity, which ought to ſatisfy her: A fine conſolation!

‘ Octaviæ conſuetudinem cito adſpernatus, corripien-‘ tibus amicis, ſufficere illi debere reſpondit uxoria or-‘ namenta. Eandem mox ſæpe fruſtra ſtrangulare me-
‘ ditatus, dimiſit ut ſterilem: ſed improbante divor-
‘ tium populo, nec parcente convitiis, etiam relega-
‘ vit. Denique occidit ſub crimine adulteriorum, a-‘ deo impudenti falſoque, ut in quæſtione perneganti-
‘ bus cunctis, Anicetum pædagogum ſuum indicem
‘ ſubjecerit, qui dolo ſtupratam a ſe fateretur (8). ---
‘ Having ſoon ſhewn a diſlike to Octavia's embraces, up-
‘ on his friends upbraiding him for it, he anſwered,
‘ that ſhe ought to eſteem it honour enough to be his wife.
‘ In a little time after, upon being diſappointed in ſeve-
‘ ral deſigns he had formed to ſtrangle her, he divorced
‘ her under pretence of being barren: but the people diſ-
‘ approving of this divorce, and not forbearing even to

(8) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. xxxv.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that he had lain with Octavia; upon which she was confined to an island, and in a few days after forced to have her veins opened. Her head was cut off, and presently carried to her rival (g). Nero changed his language strangely; he had before complained that Octavia was barren, but then he accused her of having made herself miscarry [F]. This princess's lot was scarce any thing else, but a continued series of misfortunes. [G].

(g) Ib. cap. lxiii, lxiv.

was Nero's tutor; but according to Tacitus, he commanded the emperor's fleet at Misenum. After Nero had employed him in destroying Agrippina, he used him first a little coldly, and at last hated him: for the sight of those who have been instrumental to others in the execution of great crimes, is so far from being agreeable to them, that it seems to load them with continual reproaches (16). But now, having a fresh occasion to employ him again, he caressed him, taking notice of the former service he had done, as being of the last importance; and told him an opportunity presented of doing him another piece of service, which was not less necessary, and which required no more of him, but a bare confession that he had lain with Octavia. He promised him a good reward, but which it was not proper to give him for the present, and threatned to kill him if he refused. Accitum eum Cæsar operæ prioris admonet; solum incolumitati principis adversus insidiantem matrem subveniſſe; locum haud minoris gratiæ instare, si conjugem infensam depelleret. Nec manu aut telo opus. Fateretur Octaviæ adulterium. Occulta quidem ad præsens, sed magna ei præmia, & secessus amœnos promittit; vel si negavisset, necem intentat (17). This villain undertook to do all that was desired, and even told more lies than was required of him. He was banished to Sardinia, for form's sake, where he lived at his ease, and died a natural death (18).

(16) Levi post admissum scelus gratia, dein gravore odio: quia malorum facinorum ministri quasi exprobrantes adspiciuntur. Id. ib.

(17) Id. ib.

(18) In Sardiniam pellitur, ubi non inops exsilium toleravit, & fato obiit. Ibid.

It will not be improper, I imagine, to make some reflexions upon the relation of Suetonius. We cannot deny that author the glory of a skillful abbreviator, but sometimes his art of contracting is carried too far; by which means it comes to pass, that the times and distinctions of events do not always appear in his work. Of this we have an instance in the case now before us. He carries Nero's injustice to Octavia only through three degrees (19). She was first divorced under pretence of barrenness; then banished, because the people cried out against this divorce; and at last punished with death upon pretence of adultery, though all who were tortured upon that head denied it, and there was no other evidence but only Anicetus, who owned he had lain with her by stratagem. Now, do but consult Tacitus, and you will presently perceive that Suetonius is here faulty. According to Tacitus, the misfortunes of that princess ought to be ranged in the following order. Nero's love for Poppæa inspired that disgusted husband with the thoughts of a divorce. Accordingly, Octavia was divorced, as being barren, and he married Poppæa. After that, by virtue of Poppæa's intrigues, Octavia was charged with adultery; her servant-maids were put upon the rack; most of them maintained that she was a woman of honour: yet the divorce stood; and after she had received some presents (20), she was banished to Campania, and there confined. The murmurings of the common people, or else some remorse of conscience, obliged Nero to re-call her. This was so acceptable to the people, that Poppæa did not think herself safe, unless Octavia were made away with. With this view she applied so dexterously to the emperor, that he engaged Anicetus to declare he had lain with Octavia. After that, the unfortunate princess was transported to the island Pandataria, where she was put to death. It does not appear that she returned to Rome after her divorce; she was still in Campania, when the people gave such expressions of joy upon her being recalled (21). And as these expressions of joy moved Poppæa to sollicit Nero to make away with her, which was a point she obtained, it is not probable that the order for her return was ever put in execution. So that these words of Tacitus, Conjugem revocavit Octaviam (22), he recalled his wife, are somewhat fallacious. But Suetonius's faults are much more inexcusable. It is visible that he has confounded events, and omitted things, the suppression of which is not to be allowed in regard to any design of brevity. What probability is there that Nero's false-witness deposed he had made use of stratagems to compass his end with Octavia? Was not that extenuating this princess's crime? This is what Nero did not desire! Note, that Tristan supposes Octavia came actually back to her husband's house, and even that she was recalled from the island Pandataria (23): the first of which is not likely, and the other is notoriously false.

(19) See his words in the remark [C].

(20) Domumque Burri & prædia Plauti, infausta dona accipit. Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. lx.

(21) This appears from these words of Poppæa: Vitam ipsam in extremum adductam à clientelis & servitiis Octaviæ, quæ plebis filii nomen indiderint, ea in pace assis quæ vix bello evenirent. Arma illa adversus principem sumpta. Docem tantum defuisse, qui motis rebus facile reperiretur. Omitteret modo Campaniam & in urbem ipsam pergeret, ad cujus nutum ablentis tumultus cierentur. Ibid. cap. lxi.

(22) Ibid. cap. lx.

(23) Tristan. Commentat. Histor. Tom. i, pag. 138.

[F] Nero . . . . accused her of having made herself miscarry.] I have known some persons who found fault with Tacitus for taking these two pretences of Octavia's disgrace for a contradiction. 'At Nero 'præfectum in spem sociandæ classis corruptum, & in- 'cusatæ paullo ante sterilitatis oblitus, abactos partus 'conscientia libidinum, eaque sibi comperta, edicto 'memorat (24). - - - - But Nero declares by an edict, that 'his admiral had been corrupted in hopes of engaging 'the fleet, and forgetting the pretence of sterility he had 'before made use of, alledges that she had forced herself 'to miscarry to conceal her lusts, all which he had dis- 'covered.' Nero grounded Octavia's divorce upon the plea of her barrenness; and soon after he declared, that, to his certain knowledge, she had taken things to make herself miscarry. Now, here is no contradiction. When we do not observe that a married woman comes to be with child, we have reason to account her barren: but if we happen to discover that she forces herself to miscarry, we incur no contradiction in denying her sterility. Where then is Nero's contradiction? To these critics I made answer, that the historian does not charge the emperor with a formal contradiction; he only alledges, there was a great deal of imprudence in making use of the plea of miscarriage after having insisted so lately upon that of barrenness. The imprudence did not consist in Nero's giving the world ground to believe he was misinformed of Octavia's conduct when he divorced her; for he might have answered, that the wisest of princes are very often not quick-sighted enough to penetrate into all the secrets of their wives chamber, and that sometimes chance discovers in an hour what the most vigilant spies could not observe for many years: so many are the tricks of the sex for concealing their galantries. But the injustice of the divorce lay here. He manifestly discovered to all the world, that he had not discharged the conjugal duties to Octavia; for if he had, she need not to have had recourse to miscarriages to hide her adultery. Now, is it not a flagrant instance of injustice to divorce a woman upon pretence of barrenness, after having lived with her without any matrimonial commerce (25). For this reason, Tacitus says nothing that can reflect upon his great judgment, when he observes a contradiction between the emperor's first and second pretence. We must not forget one thing, which aggravates the iniquity of the husband, and that is, his being convinced of Octavia's virtue. The express words have been recorded, which he uttered, when he thought the opportunity of marrying Poppæa was come. 'Ipsa principis verba referam, says Tacitus (26), quin in- 'quit Nero deposito metu nuptias Poppææ ob ejusmodi 'terrores dilatas maturare parat, Octaviamque conjugem 'amoliri, quamvis modeste agat, & nomine patris, & 'studiis populi gravem? - - I shall repeat the very words 'of the emperor. Well, says Nero, my fear is over, and 'I will now have the nuptials celebrated forthwith, 'which have been all this while delayed upon that ac- 'count, and my wife Octavia dismissed, for all her modesty, 'and great popularity, both for her father's sake and her 'own.'

(24) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. lxiii.

(25) See, above, remark [A] of the article GUISE (CLAUDIUS DUKE OF).

(26) Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. lix.

[G] This princess's lot was scarce any thing else but a continued series of misfortunes.] The inhabitants of the island, to which she was banished, were more affected with her disgrace, than they had ever been with the misfortunes of the other Roman ladies who had been exiles in the same place. Those ladies were more advanced in years, and consequently more capable to bear the reverse of Fortune; besides, they might receive some comfort from the remembrance of their former felicity. But Octavia was scarce above twenty years of age, and had always been unfortunate. The first years of her married state were spent in deep mourning for the sad fate of her father, and her brother, who were poisoned. A mistress engrossed all the affection of her husband; she herself was divorced; and afterwards

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

wards exposed to the violent hatred of the new wife; and at last banished for a crime, the brand of which was more afflicting than death itself. Yet, after all, she was very unwilling to resign her life, tho' she saw herself every minute under the point of the soldiers swords, who were her guard; and when she received orders to put an end to her life, she prayed and begged incessantly, in order to shun the fatal hour. But all was to no purpose: they bound her, and opened her veins; but her fright was so great that she could scarce be made to bleed, insomuch that they were obliged to stifle her with the steam of a hot bath. Tacitus is so great a master in painting the passions, that every line is an inimitable stroke. We shall therefore make use of his own words (27). Non alia exsul visentium oculos majore misericordia affecit. Meminerant adhuc quidam Agrippinæ, à Tiberio; recentior Juliæ memoria obversabatur, à Claudio pulsæ. Sed illis robur ætatis affuerat. Læta aliqua viderant, & presentem sævitiam melioris olim fortunæ recordatione allevabant (28). Huic primus nuptiarum dies loco funeris fuit, deductæ in domum, in qua nihil nisi luctuosum haberet, erepto per venenum patre, & statim fratre. Tum ancilla domina validior. Et Poppæa non nisi in perniciem uxoris nupta. Postremo crimen omni exilio gravius. Ac puella vicesimo ætatis anno, inter centuriones & milites, præsagio malorum jam à vita exempta, nondum tamen morte acquiescebat. Paucis dehinc interjectis diebus, mori jubetur: cum jam viduam se & tantum sororem testaretur, communesque Germanicos, & postremo Agrippinæ nomen cieret, qua incolumi infelix quidem matrimonium, sed sine exitio pertulisset. Restringitur vinculis, venæque ejus per omnes artus exsolvuntur: & quia pressus pavore sanguis tardius labebatur, præfervidi balnei vapore enecatur. He has forgot to observe, that before she was married, she was witness to the violent death of Messalina, her mother. It is with this she commences the recital of her misfortunes in the tragedy which is called by her name, and which is printed with those of Seneca. From thence she proceeds to the severity of Agrippina, who was doubly her mother-in-law (29), and of a temper admirably well suited for acting the part of a step-mother, and for verifying all that is said of the antipathy of women to their daughters-in-law. If Homer could not admit, that there are any persons who are served by Jupiter, out of no other but the bad vessel (30), yet he might at least have allowed, that Jupiter does not mix above two or three drops out of the good vessel, in a full bowl, which he obliges them to drink out of the bad one. Such was the lot of our Octavia, and yet she had a mind to live: death was more frightful to her than all her calamities; for which ill taste her youth ought to plead her excuse.

(27) Ibid. cap. lxiii.

(28) This was pursuant to the precepts of Epicurus. On the other hand, a great many aggravate their adversity by calling to mind the prosperity they have been in; and say with one of the French Poets,

Felicité passée,
Qui ne peus revenir,
Tourment de ma pensée,
Que n'ai-je en te perdant perdu le souvenir!

Pass'd happiness which can return no more,
By memory torments me o'er and o'er.

(29) Tulimus
Sævæ jussa novercæ,
Hostilem animum, vultusque trucis.
Illa illa meis tristis Erinnys
Thalamis Stygios prætulit ignes,
Teque extinxit miserande pater.

(30) See the article MANICHEES, remark [C], from citation (35) to the end.

OECOLAMPADIUS (JOHN) one of the reformers of the Church in the XVIth century, was born at Winsperg in Franconia, in the year 1482. His mother was the cause of making him a scholar; for his father had designed him for a merchant, but at the request of his wife altered his resolution. They sent him to the college of Heilbrun, and afterwards to the university of Heidelberg; he there received the degreee of Bachelor at fourteen years of age. After this he was sent to Boulogne to study the Civil-Law, and after a residence of six months, he returned from thence to Heidelberg, where he applied himself to the study of Divinity. The authors whom he read with greatest assiduity were Thomas Aquinas, Richard, and Gerson: he despised the subtilities, of Scotus, and did not follow the humour which at that time prevailed in the universities. He had little regard to the wrangles of the schoolmen, and abstained from disputations: his endeavour was to furnish his mind with useful knowledge, without troubling himself about the honour that is to be gained by the public exercises in universities. He did nevertheless obtain the character of a very learned young man. This reputation, joined to that of virtue and prudence, induced the elector Palatine to appoint him preceptor to his younger sons. Having discharged this office some time, he grew weary of the court, and resumed his studies in Divinity.

OENONE, the daughter of a river in Phrygia, named Cebren (a), and wife of Paris, was, according to some, a noted sorceress [A]. Others content themselves with saying, that she was perfectly well acquainted with the virtues of herbs, and that this knowledge was imparted to her, by way of exchange for her virginity [B]. It

(a) Apollod. lib. iii: & Parthen. in Eroticis, cap. iv.

[A] She was .... a noted sorceress.] By the force of her enchantments the moon descended from the heavens, the lions became tame and gentle as sheep, and the rivers flowed back towards their sources. Paris declares himself an eye-witness of it (1).

(1) In the letter feigned by Sabinus, as written by Paris, in answer to that feigned by Ovid from Oenone to him.

Quod si vertendæ spem mentis concipis hujus;
Cur cessant herbæ, carmina curve tua?
Nam te nec Phœbi sollertior artibus ulla est;
Phœbeæque Hecates somnia vera vides.
Te cum sideribus, te cum deducere Lunam
Nubibus, & memini surripuisse diem.
Pascebam tauros: interque armenta leones
Obstupui placidos vocibus ire tuis.
Quid retro Xanthum, retro Simoënta vocatum
Adjiciam cursus non tenuisse suos?
Ipse pater Cebren, natæ male tutus ab ore,
Cantatus quoties restitit inter aquas!

But if you hope to disengage my love;
Why do you not your Magic secrets prove?
For Phœbus scarce in these more knowing seems,
Nor Hecate, his sister, skill'd in dreams.
At your command, I've seen, with wond'ring eye,
The day grow dark, and the moon quit the sky.
At your command, I've seen, in great amaze,
Tame lions tend my bullocks as they graze.
Why need I add, that, as you bade them go,
Xanthus and Simois wou'd backward flow?
Even your father Cebren check'd his flood,
And by his daughter's charms enchanted stood!

It is very probable that Apollodorus wrote that this nymph practised Magic; and consequently we may regard, as a false reading, those words of book III, Ἡ γὰρ Οἰνώνη ἰατρικὴν καὶ μαντικὴν ἤσκει. Siquidem Oenone medendi canendique artem callebat (2). For Oenone was skilled in the arts of Physic and Music. If we put μαγικὴν in the room of μαντικὴν, we shall make the author reason very justly. He had just said, that Oenone carried remedies to Paris when dangerously wounded; and if he subjoins, as the editions have it, for she practised Physic and Music, he loads his reasoning with a gross superfluity: but, if he says, for she practised Physic and Magic, it becomes much more proper and agreeable. Passerat took the matter very right; for he turned that passage thus; for she was perfectly well versed in Physic, and in the art of enchanting diseases (3).

(2) Apollod. Bibliotheca. lib. iii, pag. 227.

(3) See Mezirius upon the Epistles of Ovid, pag. 460.

[B] This knowledge was imparted to her by way of exchange for her maidenhead (4).] Read the letter which Oenone wrote to Paris; and there you will find this nymph boasting

(4) Compare this with what is said before of CASSANDRA, in remark [A] of her article.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It is likewiſe ſaid that ſhe had the gift of prophecy (b). With that advantage of knowing what was to come, ſhe did not fail to foreſee that her huſband's voyage to Helena would be the cauſe of an infinity of miſchiefs; and therefore ſhe uſed her utmoſt endeavours to divert Paris from that expedition. Finding her remonſtrances fruitleſs, ſhe foretold him that he ſhould be wounded [C], and that then he would be forced to have recourſe to her as the only perſon that could cure him (c). When he had received a wound from Philoctetes at the ſiege of Troy, he called to mind Oenone's prediction, and ordered himſelf to be carried to mount Ida, in order to get the remedy which ſhe alone could give him; but he died before he could get ſo far as to be relieved by Oenone (d). And ſome ſay, that, in order to have the pleaſure of revenge, ſhe made ſo little haſte [D], that ſhe gave death opportunity to prevent the remedy; and yet that ſhe made away with herſelf upon ſeeing her huſband's corps. This ſtory is variouſly related [E], and care has been taken to inform us, that ſhe applyed herſelf betimes to find out means of revenge. Upon this project ſhe employed her ſon [F]: ſome ſay ſhe ſent him to Greece, to excite the boaſting of being courted by the Satyrs, and by Faunus himſelf; but that ſhe diſappointed all their amorous deſigns. She owns that Apollo robbed her of her virginity, tho' ſhe ſtruggled as much as ſhe could, and ſcratched him all over the face. In fine, ſhe remarks that ſhe required of him no recompence, in gold or jewels, but that Apollo communicated to her all the ſecrets of Botany; inſomuch that ſhe could perform a thouſand wonderful cures, but without being able to find out any remedy for her love, there being no herbs of ſufficient virtue for that purpoſe.

(b) Apollodorus, & Parthenius, ibid.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid.

Me fide conſpicuus Trojæ munitor amavit,
Ille meæ ſpolium virginitatis habet.
Id quoque luctando, rupi tamen ungue capillos;
Oraque ſunt digitis aſpera facta meis.
Nec pretium ſtupri gemmas aurumve popoſci.
Turpiter ingenuum munera corpus emunt.
Ipſe, ratus dignam, medicas mihi tradidit artes;
Admiſitque meas ad ſua dona manus.
Quæcumque herba potens ad opem, radixque medendi
Utilis in toto naſcitur orbe, mea eſt.
Me miſeram, quod amor non eſt medicabilis herbis (5)!

(5) Ovid. in Epiſt. Oenon. ad Pard.

Troy's faithful fortifier fought my charms,
And boldly triumph'd in my virgin arms.
Nor did I tamely ſtoop to his embrace;
My nails mark'd my reſiſtance in his face.
Nor did I either gold or jewels claim;
Such baſe amends only increaſe the ſhame.
But of himſelf, the god, with grateful heart,
Made me his partner in the healing art.
Whatever cure in Phyſic can be done,
Either by herb or root, to me is known.
Yet wretched I this ſcience uſeleſs prove;
Since neither herbs nor roots are cures for love!

(6) According to Apollodorus, lib. iii. it was from Rhea that Oenone learned the art of Divination.

Ovid is not over and above obſervant of decorum and probability. Such confeſſions are ſeldom made to an huſband, nor was this a likely way to make Paris repent of his inconſtancy. To be told that he was taken for a cully, and that he had flattered himſelf with a falſe notion of having gathered the firſt flower of the nuptial-bed, could be no very agreeable news: the ſcratching of the ſpark's face, on one hand, and the ſecrets of Phyſic, on the other, are not ſufficient to repair the breach. What was Ovid therefore thinking on? If he had even added the gift of propheſy (6) to the knowledge of herbs, among the preſents beſtowed upon her by Apollo, he would not ſufficiently have gilded the pill. Clemens Alexandrinus was not ignorant that this nymph pretended to propheſy. See in the margin a conjecture upon his words (7).

(7) Ἕλενος δὲ καὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ Οἰνώνης, καὶ Βύττος ὁ Ἴλιος. Jam Helenus, & Laocoon, & Oenone, & Bitus in Ilio. Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. i, pag. 334. Inſtead of καὶ Βύττος, Canterus would read Καβύρος. But the better reading would be ἡ Κασσάνδρα, which would ſignify Oenone the daughter of Cebren. See Canterus upon Lycophron, ver. 57.

[C] She foretold him he ſhould be wounded.] Conon has confounded the circumſtance of time, and by that means greatly ſhocked the probability. He ſuppoſes, that Oenone did not make this prediction, nor ſtir from her huſband's houſe, till after Paris had killed her ſon Corythus (8). Now we muſt know that Corythus, the ſon of Paris and Oenone, was ſo great with Helena, that Paris grew violently jealous of him, and was from thence induced to diſpatch him. It is not at all likely, that Oenone would continue with her huſband after Helena had taken poſſeſſion of the houſe: ſo that Conon has unluckily entangled himſelf in a Chronology different from that of other authors.

(8) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186, pag. 434, 436.

[D] She made ſo little haſte.] The meſſenger who went to tell her, that Paris had ordered himſelf to be carried to mount Ida for a cure, was roughly ſent back with this jealous anſwer, That he might go and have his wound dreſſed by his Helena (9). A return of tenderneſs ſoon made Oenone repent of her unkindneſs: ſhe reſolved to go and meet her huſband, with the neceſſary remedies; but ſhe came too late. The anſwer ſhe gave to the meſſenger was faithfully reported to Paris, and ſhocked him in ſuch a manner that he expired immediately (10). When Oenone arrived, the firſt thing ſhe did was to kill the meſſenger, by throwing a ſtone at him, for daring to tell her that ſhe was the cauſe of her huſband's death. Then ſhe tenderly embraced the corps of her faithleſs huſband; and after much lamentation ſtrangled herſelf with her girdle (11).

(9) Conon, ibid.

(10) Parthen. in Eroticis, cap. xv.

(11) Conon, ubi ſupra.

[E] This ſtory is variouſly related.] We told you juſt now that ſhe ſtrangled herſelf with her own girdle. Apollodorus ſays (12) barely that ſhe hanged herſelf. Parthenius (13) contents himſelf with ſaying, that ſhe killed herſelf. Quintus Calaber (14) aſſures us, that ſhe threw herſelf into the funeral pile upon which her huſband's corps was burnt. Lycophron (15) ſays, ſhe threw herſelf headlong from the top of a tower. 'Dictys Cretenſis relates, that Paris being dead, his 'relations ordered his corps to be carried to Oenone, 'for her to take care about his funeral, but that 'Oenone was ſo affected with the ſight of the corps, 'that ſhe thereupon loſt her ſenſes, and being gradu- 'ally overwhelmed with ſorrow, ſhe died of grief, 'and was buried with Paris. This paſſage of Dictys 'makes me ſuſpect, that the Latin tranſlation of this 'author, though very antient, is not extreamly juſt, 'or rather is corrupted in ſeveral places: for Tzetzes 'upon Lycophron ſays expreſsly, that, according to 'the opinion of Dictys, Oenone ſtrangled herſelf; and 'Cedrenus, who always follows Dictys, in what 'relates to the wars of Troy, makes Oenone die the 'ſame kind of death: from whence I conjecture, that 'theſe two authors had Dictys's work in Greek, and 'that the Latin verſion, which we have, does not 'always agree with the Greek text (16).' This is ſo curious a piece of literature, that it deſerves to be inſerted here, as we have it in Meziriac. As for the reſt, Quintus Calaber ſuppoſes, that Oenone treated her huſband with the laſt degree of inhumanity (17), when he lay proſtrate at her feet (18), and almoſt at the laſt gaſp (19), imploring her aſſiſtance, and aſking a thouſand pardons for his faithleſſneſs; but that afterwards ſhe was extreamly concerned at his death, that ſhe threw herſelf upon the funeral pile, and was burnt alive with Paris's corps.

(12) Lib. iii, pag. 227.

(13) Ubi ſupra.

(14) Lib. x, ver. 467.

(15) In Caſſandra, ver. 61.

(16) Meziriac upon the Epiſtles of Ovid, pag. 509.

(17) Quint. Calaber. lib. x, ver. 306, & ſeq.

(18) Ὁ δ' ἄρ' αἶψα πίεσυ παρὰ ποσσὶ γυναικός. Ipſe vero ſtatim ad pedes uxoris ſe abjecit. Ibid. ver. 272.

(19) Καὶ β' ὁλοῦ βανέοντος τοῖον ποτὶ μῦθον ἔειπεν. Atque vix trahens animam hoc tandem ſermone illam affatur. Ibid. ver. 283.

(20) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 508, quoting the Scholiaſt upon Lycophron.

[F] She employed her ſon.] The reflexions which the river Cebren caſt upon Oenone, his daughter, for loving ſuch a faithleſs huſband, rouzed her in ſuch a manner to revenge, that ſhe ſent Corythus, her ſon, to the Grecian princes, with orders to excite them to a war againſt Troy, and to conduct them in that expedition (20). So ſays the Scholiaſt upon Lycophron (21). Conon (22) makes Corythus the inſtrument of Oenone's revenge after another manner. He ſays that Corythus was handſomer than Paris, his father,

(21) Upon theſe words of Lycophron, ver. 58. Στείλασα κοῦρον τὸν κατὴγορον χθονὸς. Miſſo juvene terræ proditore.

(22) Apud Photium, num. 86, pag. 436.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the princes to a war againſt the Trojans; others ſay ſhe concerted matters ſo, that he touched Helena's heart, in order to affect Paris with the torments of jealouſy.

father, and was ſent by Oenone to Helena, both to make Paris jealous, and to watch an opportunity of making away with Helena. She was preſently ſmitten with Corythus's charms, and grew more familar with him than was agreeable to Paris. The father became ſo jealous of his ſon, that catching him one day in the company of Helena, he killed him. Oenone muſt needs have been born under a very malignant planet: the means ſhe made uſe of to be revenged on her rival, coſt her the life of her only ſon, and contributed only to make Helena paſs ſome agreeable moments. Some ſay (23), Corythus was indeed beloved by Helena, and that he loved her again, and that Paris killed him; but they do not ſay that his mother had ſuborned him to enſnare her rival: they ſay he went to the relief of Troy. Others pretend (24) that Corythus was the off-ſpring of Paris and Helena's amours: which is very abſurd: for from the rape of Helena to the death of Paris, the time was not long enough to allow any of their ſons to attain an age ſufficient for the careſſes of a woman: and it is plain from the father's jealouſy, and Corythus's commerce with Helena, that Corythus was of ſuch an age when he was killed. However it be, here is a monſtrous inceſt (25) of that handſome woman, which few writers have mentioned.

(23) Hellanicus in Troicis, & Cephalon Gergithius, apud Parthenium, cap. xxxiv.

(24) Nicander apud Parthenium, ibid.

(25) Upon the ſuppoſition, that Corythus was Helena's ſon; for if he was only her ſon-in-law, her crime had often been precedented.

OGINSKI (CHARLES) a gentleman of Lithuania, made a Latin tranſlation of Faret's Honnête Homme, and publiſhed it at Franeker in the year 1643 (a). He dedicated it to SAMUEL OGINSKI, his father, who had a conſiderable office in the palatinate of Trocko in Lithuania. There is no reaſon to doubt but that Mr OGINSKI, of whom the public news papers have taken ſo much notice within theſe five or ſix years laſt paſt (b), and who is at the head of the party in oppoſition to the houſe of Sapieha, is of the ſame family with the tranſlator of Faret. If Mr Konig had ſeen this tranſlation, he would not have ſaid that Charles Oginſki invented in 1643 the Art of Pleaſing at Court (c), for the title of it would have informed him to the contrary (d). There was a certain perſon (e), who wrote a French ſonnet in praiſe of the tranſlator. This ſonnet is to be met with at the the head of the work, and is full of the groſſeſt faults that can be committed againſt the rules of Proſodia. The author of it obſerves that this book of Faret's had been already tranſlated into Italian, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and High-Dutch. The Latin tranſlation is a very good one; it is a pity it abounds with ſo many errors of the preſs.

(a) In 12mo: it contains 188 pages.

(b) I write this in 1703.

(c) Excogitavit Artem placendi in Aula, ann. 1643. Konig. Biblioth. pag. 586.

(d) The title is, Honeſtus Homo, ſive Ars placendi in Aula, et Gallico opere Fareti verſa in Latinum. - - - - The honeſt Man, or Art of pleaſing at Court, tranſlated into Latin from the French work of Faret.

(e) His name is A. Theſſerre.

OKOLSKI (SIMON) a Dominican Friar lived in the XVIIth century. He publiſhed a book intituled Orbis Polonus, which is worth reading. Mr le Laboureur quotes it more than once (a).

(a) See his Relation of the Voyage of the Queen of Poland, Part ii, pag. 50, 58.

OLEN, a Greek Poet, more antient than Orpheus (a), was a native of Xanthus a city in Lycia [A]. He compoſed ſeveral hymns, which were ſung in the Iſland of Delos upon grand religious ſolemnities (b), particularly in honour to the goddeſs Lucina (c), whom he called the mother of Cupid (d). He was the firſt who affirmed that Achaia came from the country of the Hyperboreans to the iſland of Delos (e). Others ſay (f) that he was one of the Hyperboreans who founded the oracle of Delphos, and that he firſt performed there the function of prieſt to Apollo, I mean, that of giving reſponſes to thoſe who conſulted the oracle. Theſe he delivered in Hexameter verſes. He is taken notice of in a paſſage of Pauſanias, which Romulus Amaſeus has not corrected [B]. We muſt make ſome remarks upon the Supplement to Moreri [C].

(a) Pauſan. lib. ix, pag. 302.

(b) Herodot. lib. iv, cap. xxxv.

(c) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 16.

(d) Ib. lib. ix, pag. 302.

(e) Ib. lib. v, pag. 154.

(f) Ib. lib. x, pag. 320, 321.

[A] He was a native of Xanthus a city of Lycia.] Herodotus and Pauſanias inform us, that he was a Lycian; but they do not tell us of what city. You will preſently ſee the name of it in theſe two verſes of Callimachus.

Οἱ μὲν ὑπαείδουσι νόμον Λυκίοιο γέροντος
Ὃν τοι ἀπὸ Ξάνθοιο θεοπρόπος ἤγαγεν Ὠλήν.

Namque ſenis Lycii recinunt hi carmina ſacra,
A Xantho quondam quæ vates vexerat Olen (1).

They ſung the Lycian Prophet's ſacred ſong,
Which Olen had from Xanthus brought along.

(1) Callimachus, Hymno in Delum, ver. 304, pag. 132. Edit. Græv. 1697.

[B] A paſſage of Pauſanias, which Romulus Amaſeus has not corrected.] The paſſage is this: Λύκιος δὲ ὃς ἦν ἀρχαιότερος τὴν ἡλικίαν Δήλιος ὕμνους καὶ ἄλλοις ποιήσας, καὶ ἐσ' Εἰλείθυιάν τε, Εὐλινόν τε αὐτήν ἀναπαλεῖ. At Lycius qui multo fuit ætate ſuperior patria Delius hymnis & in alios deos & in Lucinam ipſam conſcriptis Eulinon (quaſi dicas lanificam) appellat (2). - - - - But Lycius who was much more ancient, a Delian by birth, in hymns compoſed both upon other deities and upon Lucina herſelf, calls her Eulinon, that is to ſay Spinſter. Gregorius Gyraldus conjectures, that we ſhould read ὠλήν inſtead of Δήλιος (3), but it is not there that the correction ſhould be made; it ſhould come in immediately after Λύκιος δὲ, for inſtead of ὃς ἦν, we muſt read ὠλήν, and then inſtead of Δήλιος, Δηλίοις. This conjecture came into my head, before I met with the new edition of Pauſanias, which I have ſince ſeen, and there found a note of Mr Kuhnius's, which offers the ſame explication of this paſſage. Here we ſee one of the cauſes that have produced a great many chimerical authors; for here is a very ancient Poet, one Lycius of Delos that owes his being only to an error of the tranſcriber.

(2) Pauſanias, lib. viii, pag. 253.

(3) Pro Delion Olena legendum. Lilius Gregor. Gyraldus, de Poetar. Hiſtor. Dialogo III, init. pag. m. 118.

[C] We muſt make ſome remarks upon the Supplement to Moreri.] I. It is a fault to ſay barely, that Olen was of the city of Dyme in Achaia; for, though it is true, that Suidas call him Δυμαῖος, Dymæus, yet he adds, that it would be better to make him a native of Xanthus in Lycia, as Callimachus and Polyhiſtor have deſcribed him. II. There is not much exactneſs in theſe words. The Hymns of Olen were ſung in the iſland of Delos, during the ceremonies obſerved for the ſick, by throwing upon them duſt gathered from the ſepulchre of the goddeſs Ops or Cybele, whom the Greeks called Hecaerge. This ſeems to have been copied from a book of Gyraldus (4), where we are told, that the Hymns of Olen were ſung at Delos, while the duſt of the ſepulchre of Opis, ſirnamed Hecaerge, was thrown on an innumerable company of ſick perſons, who crowded near the altar. For this he quotes Herodotus,

(4) Gyraldus, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Herodotus, and adds, that Pauſanias ſays much the ſame thing (5): but it is certain, Gyraldus has been impoſed upon by Laurentius Valla's faulty verſion. The Greek text of Herodotus (6) does not ſay this; he is a little intricate, and may be underſtood in a ſenſe oppoſite to that of Laurentius Valla, as appears by another tranſlation, that has been put in the margin. Herodotus does not ſay, that Ops, or Opis, was ſirnamed Hecaerge; he does not ſpeak of Ops, the mother of the gods, but of a young woman that came from the country of the Hyperboreans, to the iſle of Delos, in company with another called Arge. Theſe two young women had undertaken this voyage to Delos, with intent to offer to Lucina, the preſents which had been dedicated to her, in order to obtain a ſpeedy and happy delivery in child birth (7). Pauſanias ſcarce takes any notice of all this; how then can it be ſaid, that he relates much the ſame thing with what Herodotus is ſuppoſed to have ſaid upon this head? The Continuator of Moreri would perhaps be hard put to it, if he were obliged to prove, that the goddeſs Cybele was ſirnamed Hecaerge; that is, one who poſſeſſes the virtue of operating at a diſtance: but if the ceremony he ſpeaks of were true, ſhould we not find an Aſh-day in Paganiſm as well as in Popery, and that attended with very ſingular characters of ſuperſtition? All ſorts of ſick perſons would have expected a cure by virtue of the aſhes taken from the ſepulchre of Opis; but ſtill they had been obliged to approach the altar, and that does not ſuit with the epithet of Hecaerge. See the learned notes of Spanhemius upon Callimachus (8), where you will find ſtrong proofs that Hecaerge was not the epithet of Cybele, or of that Opis who was one of the Hyperborean girls bringing offerings to Delos, but the name of her companion in that voyage.

(5) Idem fere ac Pauſanias. ibid.

(6) Herodot. lib. iv, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 236.

(7) Ἀντὶ τοῦ ἑαυτῆσαι. Pro partu maturando. Id. pag. 235.

(8) Ezech. Spanhemius, in Callimachi Hymnum in Delum, pag. 503.

OLYMPIAS, the mother of Alexander the Great, gave Philip king of Macedonia, her huſband, ſuch violent ſuſpicions of unchaſtity, that he divorced her [A]. It is even pretended ſhe owned to him that he was not the father of Alexander, and that ſhe embraced a ſerpent when ſhe conceived that ſon (a) [B]. Nor is ſhe the only woman who is ſaid to have received thoſe ſort of embraces (b). They who pretend that Nectanebus, who had been driven out of Egypt, and had received ſhelter in

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See the remark [H].

[A] She gave ſuch violent ſuſpicions of unchaſtity to Philip . . . . that he divorced her.] Juſtin goes no farther in the fifth chapter of his ninth book (1); but in another place he aſſures us, that the matter was carried ſo far as to conviction, and that the divorce was grounded thereupon. 'Namque mater ejus Olympias 'confeſſa viro ſuo Philippo fuerat, Alexandrum non 'ex eo ſe, ſed ex ſerpente ingentis magnitudinis con'cepiſſe. Denique Philippus ultimo prope vitæ ſuæ 'tempore, filium ſuum non eſſe palam prædicaverat. 'Qua ex cauſa Olympiadem, velut ſtupri compertam, 'repudio dimiſerat. - - - - (2) For his mother Olympias 'had confeſſed to her huſband Philip, that ſhe had con'ceived Alexander, not by him, but by a very great ſer'pent. And Philip himſelf, toward the latter end of his 'life, publickly declared that Alexander was not his ſon, 'for which reaſon he had divorced Olympias as an adul'tereſs convict.' Some wanton wives are ſtill mild and complaiſant to their huſbands; and that atones in ſome ſome meaſure for the ſin: but Olympias was croſs and peeviſh (3); ſo that it would have been too hard upon Philip to bear at once both the ill humours and adulteries of his wife.

(1) Cajus (Attali) ſororem nuper expulſa Alexandri matre Olympiade propter ſtupri ſuſpicionem, in matrimonium receperat. Juſtin. lib. ix, cap. v.

(2) Ib. lib. xi, cap. xi.

(3) Ἡ τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος χαλεπότης, δυσζήλου καὶ βαρυθύμου γυναικός. Olympiadis acerbitas ſuſpicioſæ mulieris, & triſtis. Plut. in Alexandro, pag. 669. A.

[B] And that ſhe embraced a ſerpent when ſhe conceived that ſon.] Beſides the teſtimony of Juſtin juſt now mentioned, we may alledge what Plutarch relates, that a great ſerpent was ſeen extended upon Olympias while ſhe ſlept; that the king viewing this through a ſmall chink in the door, loſt the eye that he made uſe of for this purpoſe (4); that from this time he found his affection for Olympias to diminiſh, and lay with her but very ſeldom, whether it was that he feared ſhe would bewitch him, or out of regard to the god who had been thus embracing the queen, under the form of a ſerpent. Ὤφθη δὲ ποτε καὶ δράκων, κοιμωμένης τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος, παρεκτεταμένῳ τῷ σώματι. καὶ τοῦτο Φιλίππῳ τὸν ἔρωτα καὶ τὰς φιλοφροσύνας ἀμαυρῶσαι λέγουσιν, ὡς μηδὲ φοιτᾶν ἔτι πολλάκις παρ' αὐτὴν ἀναπαυσόμενον. εἴτε δείσαντα τινὰς μαγείας αὐτῷ καὶ φάρμακα τῆς γυναικὸς εἴτε τὴν ὁμιλίαν, ὡς κρείττονι συνούσῃ ἀφοσιούμενον. Viſus eſt draco etiam ad dormientis Olympiadis corpus expreſſus: idque præcipue Philippi erga eam amorem & familiarem conſuetudinem ajunt extenuaſſe, ut raro cubitum ad illam commearet, quia vel timeret faſcinationes ejus & veneficia, vel conſuetudinem ejus, ut quæ conſueſceret cum majore, devitaret (5). We are likewiſe told, that Eratoſthenes declared that Olympias diſcovered this great ſecret to none but Alexander, and that ſhe waited till he was going upon his war-like expedition, before ſhe made the diſcovery. Approve your ſelf worthy, ſaid ſhe, of ſo high a birth. Ἡ δὲ Ὀλυμπιὰς (ὡς Ἐρατοσθένης φησὶ) προπέμπουσα τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπὶ τὴν στρατείαν, καὶ φράσασα μόνῳ τὸ περὶ τὴν τέκνωσιν ἀπόῤῥητον, ἐκέλευεν ἄξια φρονεῖν τῆς γενέσεως. Olympias (ut Eratoſthenes eſt auctor) quum euntem ad bellum proſequeretur Alexandrum, arcanum ortum ejus ſoli detexit, hortata ut pro natalibus gereret animos (6). Note, that, according to Juſtin, the commerce of the ſerpent with Olympias was only a dream. The queen dreamed that a great ſerpent enjoyed her that night that ſhe conceived Alexander (7). One of our beſt Critics, commenting upon this paſſage of Juſtin, obſerves, that there were ſerpents in Macedonia which grew ſo tame and familiar, that the women put them round their arms and necks, like bracelets and necklaces, either for diverſion, or to cool themſelves. He alledges upon this the authority of Lucian. Hoc autem non abs re fuerit meminiſſe, (nam ex nihilo, ut ajunt, nihil) reperiri in Macedonia ſerpentes, qui tam facile manſuefieri poſſint, ut ex iis olim & puellæ & matronæ ſibi armillas, ſibi monilia facerent, vel ut animulas ſuas oblectarent, vel ad corpuſculum frigerandum. Hujus rei auctorem ciere poſſum Lucianum in Alexandro, ſive Pſeudomanti (8). Lucian ſpeaks neither of thoſe bracelets or necklaces, but he ſays what is equally ſtrange. He affirms, that the women of Pella brought up great ſerpents ſo very tame, that they ſuckled them, and let them lie with their children. He conjectures, that the vulgar traditions about Olympias was grounded upon this reaſon. Ἐνταῦθα ἰδόντες δράκοντας, παμμεγέθεις, ἡμέρους πάνυ, καὶ τιθασσοὺς, ὡς καὶ ὑπὸ γυναικῶν τρέφεσθαι, καὶ παιδίοις συγκαθεύδειν, καὶ πατουμένης ἀνέχεσθαι, καὶ θλιζωμένους μὴ ἀγανακτεῖν, καὶ γάλα πίνειν, ἀπὸ θελῆς κατὰ ταυτὰ τοῖς βρέφεσι, πολλοὶ δὲ γίνονται τοιοῦτοι παρ' αὐτοῖς, ὅθεν καὶ τὸν περὶ τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος μῦθον διαφοιτῆσαι πάλαι εἰκὸς, ὁπότε ἐκύει τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον, δράκοντι τινὸς οἷμαι τοιούτῳ συγκαθεύδοντι αὐτῇ, ὑφῆνται τῶν ἑρπετῶν ἐν τῷ κάλλιστον, ὀλίγων ὀβολῶν. Ibi cùm immani magnitudine dracones conſpicerent, cicures ac manſuetos, adeo ut à mulieribus alerentur, & cum pueris cubarent, & ſe conculcari ſuſtinerent neque ſe premi indignè ferrent, denique infantum more lac è papilla ſugerent (quales apud illos ſunt permulti) unde veriſimile eſt olim de Olympiade fabulam increbruiſſe, quando concumbente cum illa hujuſmodi puto quopiam dracone, Alexandrum conceperat, unum ex his ſerpentibus, qui eſſet pulcherrimus, paucis obolis emunt (9). According to Plutarch (10) the women of that country made uſe of thoſe ſerpents in the feſtivals of Bacchus, which they affected to celebrate with all the appearances of the moſt furious Enthuſiaſm. They made theſe creatures creep upon the Thyrſus's they carried in their hands, and the crowns they had upon their heads; under the notion that this would ſtrike a greater terror into the men. He obſerves, that Olympias affected more than all the reſt to be tranſported with fury at this anniverſary. Ἡ δὲ Ὀλυμπιὰς μᾶλλον ἑτέρων ζηλώσασα τὰς κατοχὰς, καὶ τὰς ἐνθουσιασμὸς ἐξάγουσα βαρβαρικώτερον, ὥστε μεγάλως χειρώθεις ἐφείλκετο τοὺς θιάσους. Olympias autem, præ cæteris motum lymphaticum æmulans, & fanaticum peragens ritum horridiore ſpectaculo, ſerpentes manſuefactos trahebat thiaſis ingentes (11).

(4) Ἀνοβαλεῖν δὲ τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτὸν τὴν ἑτέραν, ἢ τῷ τῆς θύρας ἀμιῷ τρυπήσαντα, κατασταθῆναι ἐν μυχῷ δρακοντα, συνευναζόμενον τῇ γυναικὶ τὸν Θεόν. Amiſiſſe vero eum alterum oculum, quem rimæ oſtii admovens Deum conſpexit ſerpentis figura cum uxore ſua concubantem. Plut. in Alex, init., pag. m. 665.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Qua nocte cum mater Olympias concepit, viſa per quietem eſt cum ingenti ſerpenti volutari (others read voluptari.) Juſtin. lib. xii, cap. xvi.

(8) Tanaquillus Faber, in Juſtin. pag. 291. Edit. Græviana 1683.

(9) Lucianus, in Pſeudomanti, pag. 863, Tom. i, Edit. Salmurienſis 1619.

(10) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

(11) Ibid.

[C] Thoſe

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in the court of Macedonia, debauched Olympias are miſtaken [C]. She was ſo incenſed againſt her huſband, for marrying another wife, that ſhe inſtigated Pauſanias to kill him. Nay, ſhe was deſirous the world ſhould know what part ſhe acted in that parricide [D]. At firſt ſhe did not ſeem diſpleaſed to have the world believe that Jupiter was the father of Alexander (c): but afterwards ſhe made a jeſt of that opinion. This appears from a letter ſhe wrote to that prince [E], when ſhe heard that he publickly called himſelf the ſon of Jupiter, and aſſumed divine honours [F]. In Alexander's abſence Antipater was almoſt always at variance with her;

(c) See the remarks [A] and [B].

[C] Thoſe who pretend that Nectanebus . . . debauched Olympias are miſtaken.] We learn from Plutarch (12), that Nactanebus, or Nactanabus, abandoning his kinſman Tachus, who had given him the command of his army, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Egypt (13); and that Ageſilaus took his part. The Perſians defeated him and drove him out of Egypt. Some alledge, he fled to Æthiopia, others ſay he went to the court of Macedonia, in hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance from king Philip againſt the Perſians; but he was, ſay they, ſo ungrateful to that prince for his kind reception, that he left no ſtone unturned to debauch Olympias; and for that end had recourſe even to the impoſtures of Magic, of which he was a great maſter. (14). By this means he overcame the queen, and begot Alexander upon her. They add, that Philip diſcovered ſomething of the matter, and from that time very much ſuſpected his wife's adultery, and that this was the true reaſon of the divorce. But theſe are all fables. For Chronology demonſtrates to us, that Alexander was ſix years old when Nectanebus was expelled his kingdom. This I have from the learned Freinſhemius, to whom I give all the honour of the diſcovery. Nec deſunt, ſays he (15) qui fabuloſum id quidem! non tamen adulterium matris falſo jactatum aſſerant. Quippe pulſum Ægypti regno Nectanebum, non, ut vulgo arbitrantur, in Æthiopias conceſſiſſe; ſed quum adverſus vim Perſicam in Philippo maxime præſidium ſperaret, in Macedoniam vectum, magicis præſtigiis inluſiſſe Olympiadi, torumque hoſpitis temeraviſſe. Suſpectam quidem exinde Philippo, neque aliam tam intimam divortii, quod inter eos ſequutum eſt, cauſſam, pro comperto poſtea fuiſſe . . . . (16) Ceterum Nectanebi fuga temporibus hiſce non congruit: ſexennis enim jam erat Alexander, quum ille ab Ocho victus, avitis opibus exciderat.

(12) Id. in Ageſilao, pag. 617.

(13) See the article TACHUS.

(14) We read of a certain Magician, called Nectanebus, who having made ſeveral ſhips and gallies of wax, made his enemies ſhips ſink every time he drowned his wax veſſels in a large baſin of water. Vigenere en the ſtatue of Æſculapius in Philoſtratus, fol. 157, Tom. ii, Edit. in 4to.

(15) Freinſhemius, Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. i, cap. i, num. 15.

(16) Ib. n. 19.

[D] She was deſirous the world ſhould know what part ſhe acted in that parricide.] The ſcandal of her divorce, and her huſband's marrying again (17) provoked her ſo extremely, that ſhe ſollicited the king of Epirus, her brother, to declare war againſt Philip. And ſhe had obtained her end, if Philip had not prevented it by marrying his daughter to that monarch (18). She put Pauſanias upon the aſſaſſination of her huſband; ſhe took care to have horſes in readineſs for that aſſaſſin; and the very night that ſhe returned into Macedonia to be preſent at the funeral of this prince, ſhe cauſed a crown to be put upon the head of Pauſanias, who was then hanging upon a croſs. Some days after ſhe gave him a funeral, then built him a tomb, and inſpired the people with a religious obſervation of an anniverſary ſolemnity to the honour of this murderer. After that, ſhe cauſed her huſband's daughter by Cleopatra to be killed on her mother's lap, and then had the mother hanged in her own preſence (19). In fine, ſhe conſecrated to Apollo the dagger with which Pauſanias had killed Philip, and gave the ſame name to the dagger, which ſhe herſelf had born in her infancy. All theſe things ſhe did ſo publickly, that one would think her chief fear was, that there ſhould not be ſufficient evidence of her being the author of them. See if this be not the ſenſe of Juſtin (20). His ſtimulis irarum atrique (21) Pauſaniam, de impunitate ſtupri ſui querentem, ad tantum facinus impulſiſſe creduntur. Olympias certe fugienti percuſſori equos quoque præparatos habuit. Ipſa deinde, audita regis nece, cum titulo officii ad exequias cucurriſſet, in cruce pendentis Pauſaniæ capiti, eadem nocte qua venit, coronam auream impoſuit: quod nemo alius audere, niſi hæc, ſuperſtite Philippi filio, potuiſſet. Paucos deinde poſt dies, refixam corpus interfectoris ſuper reliquias mariti cremavit, & tumulum ei eodem fecit in loco, parentarique eidem quotannis, incuſſa populo ſuperſtitione, curavit. Poſt hæc Cleopatram, à qua pulſa Philippi matrimonio fuerat, in gremio ejus prius filia interfecta, finire vitam ſuſpendio coëgit, ſpectaculoque pendentis ultionem potita eſt, ad quam per parricidium feſtinaverat. Noviſſime gladium, quo rex percuſſus eſt, Apollini ſub nomine Myrtalis conſecravit: hoc enim ante Olympiadis parvulæ fuit. Quæ omnia ita palam facta ſunt, ut timuiſſe videatur, ne facinus ab ea commiſſum non probaretur.

(17) He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Attalus, according to Juſtin, lib. ix, cap. v, or niece, according to Plutarch in Alexandro, and Diodor. Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. xciv.

(18) Taken from Juſtin, lib. ix, cap. vii.

(19) Juſtin's words will bear this ſenſe, but they may likewiſe be underſtood, as if Olympias had only ſeen Cleopatra hanging.

(20) Ib. pag. m. 204, 205.

(21) That is, Olympias and Alexander her ſon.

[E] This appears from a letter ſhe wrote to that prince.] In writing to his mother he had taken upon him the title of the ſon of Jupiter Hammon; and the anſwer ſhe ſent him was this. Pray, my ſon, be quiet, do not accuſe me before Juno, ſhe will do me ſome great miſchief, if you own me for her rival in your letters. The knowledge of this we owe entirely to Aulus Gellius; for we have not Varro's book, out of which he copied it, nor the ſeveral other pieces in which it was mentioned. Aulus Gellius's words are theſe (22). In pleriſque monumentis rerum ab Alexandro geſtarum, & paulo antè in libro M. Varronis, qui inſcriptus eſt Oreſtes vel de inſania, Olympiadem Philippi uxorem feſtiviſſimè reſcripſiſſe legimus Alexandro filio. Nam quum is ad matrem ita ſcripſiſſet: Rex Alexander Jovis Hammonis filius Olympiadi matri ſalutem dicit. Olympias reſcripſit ad hanc ſententiam: Amabo, inquit, mi fili, quieſcas: neque deferas me neque criminere adverſum Junonem. Malum mihi prorſum illa magnum dabit, quum tu me litteris tuis pellicem illi eſſe confiteris. Freinſhemius is miſtaken when he affirms, that Olympias wrote to Alexander, that ſhe had not deſerved to be expoſed to Juno's reſentment: Miſſaque epiſtola petiviſſe, ne ſe nihil tale commeritam odiis Junonis objectare pergeret (23). Moreri, who never went to the ſpring-head, has, by truſting to the tranſlation of Freinſhemius, given us a falſe account of the contents of this letter (24). I own indeed, that Olympias's words carry with them an air of raillery; but when all is done, if we keep to the literal ſenſe of the words, we muſt firmly and poſitively maintain, that this princeſs does not deny her former converſation with Jupiter, and that ſhe only deſires her ſon would not boaſt of it; for fear Juno, who perhaps would otherwiſe never hear of it, or not trouble herſelf about it, while no noiſe was made of it, ſhould rouſe up all the fury of her jealouſy, upon finding this new baſtard of her huſband, proclaiming all over the earth the favours ſhewn to Olympias. Since therefore, according to the literal ſenſe of them, Aulus Gellius's words imports no more, they ought not to be quoted in Italic, as if they contained a formal declaration of Olympias's innocence. The terms (25) made uſe of by Plutarch, import only that ſhe would have her ſon hold his peace: now there is a great deal of difference between ſaying, I would not have an accuſation be brought againſt me before Juno, and ſaying, I have done nothing to offend Juno. Ἕτεροι δέ φασιν αὐτὴν ἀφροσιῶσθαι καὶ λέγειν, Οὐ παύσεταί με διαβάλλων Ἀλέξανδρος πρὸς τὴν Ἥρᾳ. Alii hoc illam ajunt abdicaſſe ac dixiſſe, non deſinet Alexander in crimen me apud Junonem vocare (26). Ælian tells us one thing which ſhews, that one day Olympias reflected with great concern upon Alexander's weakneſs in deſiring to paſs for a god. Being told that he had been dead ſome days, and was not yet interred (27), ſhe cried out, Oh, my poor ſon! you have uſed all your efforts to have a place among the gods, and now you have not ſo much as the honour of a ſepulture, which is common to all mortals. Ἀλλὰ σὺ μὲν ἡρανὸν μετασχεῖν βιαζόμενος, καὶ τοῦτο σπεύδων, νῦν οὐδὲ τῶν κοινῶν δήπου, καὶ ἴσων πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις μετασχεῖν ἔχεις, γῆς τε ὥμα, καὶ τάφης. Tu vero quum inter cælites locari volueris, & id perficere ſummo ſtudio conatus ſis, nunc neque illorum quidem, quorum omnibus mortalibus æquale & par jus eſt, particeps fieri potes, terræ ſepulturæque (28). This puts me in mind of a piece of raillery of Theocritus the Sophiſt (29), who hearing of Alexander's death ſaid to his countrymen, Take courage, gentlemen, you ſee the gods die ſooner than the men.

(22) Aulus Gellius, lib. xiii, cap. 4.

(23) Freinſhem. Supplem. lib. i, cap. i, n. 20. He cites Agel. 13, 4.

(24) Done by du Rier, and joined to Vaugelas's Q. Curtius.

(25) That is, that which he attributes directly to Olympias.

(26) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

(27) See Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. xii, cap. 64.

(28) Ælian. Hiſt. lib. xiii, cap. 36.

(29) Clem. Alex. Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 61.

[F] Alexander called himſelf the ſon of Jupiter, and aſſumed divine honours.] He had ſeveral views in this uſurpation of divine honours, and among others that of vindicating Olympias, who had been eſteemed irregular in the article of chaſtity. Of this I ſhall produce

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google her; and indeed it was very difficult for a woman of ſuch a jealous and ill temper (d), to agree with the governour of Macedonia. This was the poſt Alexander beſtowed upon Antipater, when he went upon the expedition to conquer Aſia. After the death of this conqueror his mother was obliged to retire into Epirus; from whence Polyperchon recalled her ſix years after. Arideus, and his wife Eurydice, who then reigned in Macedonia, oppoſed her return: but their efforts were in vain; for the Macedonians declared for her, and by her orders made away with both of them (e). She put to death Nicanor, Caſſander's brother, and having ſingled out a hundred Macedonian nobles who were Caſſander's friends, cauſed them all to be maſſacred. This cruelty quickly loſt her the affection of her ſubjects, and then every body called to mind Antipater's laſt words; and regarded, as an oracle, the exhortation he made upon produce a witneſs, who at the ſame time will be an evidence of the venality of the Pagan oracles. I am going to ſhew you, that Alexander bribed the prieſts of Jupiter Hammon, to engage them to anſwer, as he would have them, in regard to his filial relation to Jupiter. 'Igitur Alexander cupiens originem divini-'tatis acquirere, ſimul & matrem infamia liberare, 'per præmiſſos ſubornat antiſtites, quid ſibi reſpon-'deri velit. Ingredientem templum ſtatim antiſtites 'ut Hammonis filium ſalutant. Ille lætus dei adop-'tione hoc ſe patre cenſeri jubet. Rogat deinde, an 'omnes interfectores parentis ſui ſit ultus; reſponde-'tur, patrem ejus nec poſſe interfici, nec mori; re-'gis Philippi peractam plene ultionem eſſe (30). - - - - 'Alexander therefore deſiring to be thought of divine ex-'traction, and at the ſame time to clear the reputation 'of his mother, ſuborns the prieſts, by meſſengers ſent 'before-hand, to anſwer him according to direction. 'As ſoon as he entered the temple, the prieſts ſaluted 'him as the ſon of Jupiter Hammon. He overjoyed 'with this divine adoption, commanded that all ſhould 'give him this title. Then he aſked, if he had reveng-'ed himſelf of all the murderers of his father; they 'anſwered, that his father was neither dead nor ca-'pable of being murdered; but that he had completely re-'venged the death of Philip.' I have ſaid elſewhere (31) that it was a fine piece of policy which moved Alexander to deſire to paſs for a god: he owns it to his father in one of Lucian's dialogues (32). I have likewiſe obſerved, that he was more reſerved, touching that pretenſion toward the Greeks than toward the Barbarians: but I muſt add here, that at laſt he threw off that caution, and would have the Grecian cities paſs decrees relating to his deity. The reſolutions they took upon this head were different: the decree of Lacedæmon was conceived in theſe terms; Since Alexander has a mind to be a god, let him be a god. Ἄλλοι, μὲν οὖν ἄλλα ἐψηφίσαντο. Λακεδαιμόνιοι δὲ ἐκεῖνα, ἐπειδὴ Ἀλέξανδρος βούλεται θεὸς εἶναι, ἔστω θεός. Itaque aliis aliter ſtatuentibus, Lacedæmonii decretum ejuſmodi fecerunt: Quoniam Alexander Deus eſſe vult, eſto Deus (33). The author I here cite did not know all that the Athenians did; he only tells us of their oppoſition to the decree propoſed to them by Demades, that Alexander ſhould be from thenceforth the thirteenth of the great gods (34). He was fined for daring to propoſe ſuch an impiety. Ælian knew nothing more than this; but it is very probable that Demades purſued his propoſal further, and that the decree paſſed at laſt (35). He repreſented to the Athenians, that they ought to take care not to loſe the earth, by their ſhewing too ſcrupulous a regard to heaven. Eraſmus has not rightly underſtood the ſenſe of this orator. 'Quum Athenienſes, ſays he (36), 'vellent Alexandro divinos honores decernere, videte 'inquit (Demades) ne dum cœlum cuſtoditis, terram 'amittatis. Alexander enim ambiebat monarchiam. 'Abſurdum autem erat eos ſic alium donare cœlo, ut 'ipſi terra ſua pellerentur. - - - - When the Athenians 'were for decreeing divine honours to Alexander, take 'care, ſaid Demades, while you would appear the 'keepers of heavenly rights, that you do not become loſers 'of earthly ones. For Alexander was aiming at monar-'chy. And it was abſurd for them to make ſuch a 'preſent of heaven to any one, as might give him a 'pretence to claim their earth.' Eraſmus ſuppoſes that Demades oppoſed Alexander's divine honours, and makes him reaſon confuſedly. Here are two faults. The truth is, that Demades adviſed this deification, and inſiſted upon this argument, that it was to be feared Alexander would conquer Attica, to chaſtiſe thoſe who had refuſed him heaven. See Diogenes Laërtius, book 6, pag. 345: you will there find that the Athenians decreed to Alexander the divinity of Bacchus. Ὑφισαμένων Ἀθηναίων Ἀλέξανδρον Διόνυσον, κἀμέ, ἔφη Σάραπιν ποίησατε. Athenienſibus Alexandrum Liberum Patrem decernentibus, & me, inquit (Diogenes) Serapin facite. - - - - Upon the Athenians decreeing Alexander to be Bacchus, pray, ſaid Diogenes, deify me too, and make me Serapis. I have ſaid, in the remark [F] of the article of this conqueror, that there is ſcarce any probability of his ever being able to be firmly perſuaded of his own pretended divinity; for he owned that two things principally reminded him that he was a man; his lying with women, and his ſleeping; which two infirmities he took to be incompatible with the divinity. How therefore could he believe that Jupiter had begot him? A wound alſo gave him to know that he was a man, and from thence he took occaſion to rally a little thoſe flatterers who paid him divine honours.

(d) See the remark [A], citation (3).

(e) See the article EURYDICE, the daughter of Amintas in the text.

This is true blood, which flows from mortal veins,
Not Ichor which from wounds immortal drains, ſaid he, ſhewing them what flowed from his wound (37). Some ſay it was not he, but Calliſthenes who was the author of this raillery. See, upon this whole matter, Freinſhemius's commentary upon the ſeventh Chapter of the fourth book of Quintus Curtius. What Zonaras ſays, that this prince finding himſelf at the point of death, deſired to be thrown into the Euphrates, to make the world believe his tranſlation to heaven, is not at all improbable; for what arts did not he uſe, to perſwade the world that he was a god, and to eſtabliſh the worſhip of his pretended divinity? 'Jamque omnibus præparatis quod olim prava mente 'conceperat tunc eſſe maturum, quonam modo cœ-'leſtes honores uſurparet, cepit agitare. Jovis filium 'non dici tantum ſe, ſed etiam credi volebat, tanquam 'perinde animis imperare poſſet ac linguis. Itaque 'more Perſarum Macedonas venerabundos ipſum ſa-'lutare proſternentes humi corpora, &c. (38). - - - - 'And now having prepared every thing neceſſary for 'executing the impious ſcheme he had formed, he began 'to think of aſſuming divine honours. He determined 'not only to be ſtiled, but alſo to be eſteemed the ſon of 'Jupiter, as if he could command mens thoughts as 'well as their tongues. Therefore the Macedonians were 'forced to ſalute him after the manner of the Perſians, 'by proſtrating their bodies to the ground, &c.'

Here Naudé furniſhes me with matter for a criticiſm. Alexander, ſays he (39), gave out . . . . that when he came into the world, the goddeſs Diana aſſiſted ſo aſſiduouſly at his mother's delivery, that ſhe forgot to take care of the temple ſhe had at Epheſus, which, in that interval was intirely conſumed by an accidental fire (40). Some captives having acquainted him with a remedy proper to be made uſe of againſt the Indians poiſoned arrows, he gave out, before he publiſhed it, that GOD had revealed it to him in a dream. But this inſatiable deſire having carried him ſo far as to require adoration, he was at laſt convinced, by the remonſtrances of Calliſthenes, by the obſtinacy of the Lacedemonians, and the wounds he received every day in engagements, that all his power would never be ſufficient to eſtabliſh that new Apotheoſis; and that a greater fortune is required for gaining a ſmall place in heaven, than for vanquiſhing here below, and lording it over all the earth. It is not true that Alexander ſaid Diana was ſo overbuſy at Olympias's delivery, that ſhe ſuffered her temple at Epheſus to be burnt. That was the thought of an hiſtorian whom Plutarch banters (41): no body ſays it came from Alexander. Did the Lacedemonians oppoſe

(30) Juſtin, lib. xi, cap. xi, pag. 341, 342. See likewiſe Oroſius, lib. iii, cap. xvi.

(31) In the article MACEDONIA, at the remark [F].

(32) Lucian. Tom. i, pag. m. 256.

(33) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xix.

(34) Ib. lib. v, cap. xii. See Ekkiaſte Athenæi, lib. vi, pag. 251.

(35) See Plutarch, in Vita Lycurgi Oratoris, pag. 842. Clem. Alexandr. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 61. Chryſoſt. Homil. XXVI, in poſter. ad Corint. Believe, by an overſight, he attributes to the Romans what he has ſaid of the Athenians, as Salmaſius obſerves, in Lamprid. Alexandr. cap. lxiii.) & Cyril, in Jun. lib. vi.

(36) Eraſm. Apophthegm. lib. v, pag. m. 499.

(37) Τοῦτο μὲν πληγὴς εἶς τὸ σκῶλος, ὡς πολλὰ συνέδραμον τῶν πολλάκις εἰωθότων αὐτὸν θεὸν προσαγορεύειν, διαχυθεὶς τῷ προσώπῳ. Τοῦτο μὲν, αἷμα εἶναν ὁρᾶτε καὶ οὐκ ἰχῶρ, - - - οἷς τότε τε βέλει μακαρέσσι θεοῖσιν. Jaculo crus ictus multis concurrentibus eorum qui ipſum ſæpenumero ſolebant Deum ſalutare, renidente vultu, hoc quidem, inquit, ſanguis eſt, ut videtis, non ille Humor qui ſuperum manat de corpore divum. Plut. in Apophthegm. pag. 180, D.

(38) Q. Curtius, lib. viii, cap. v.

(39) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, ch. iii, pag. m. 318.

(40) It was not accidental; for a villain confeſſed he had ſet fire to the temple to make the world ſpeak of him.

(41) See the article FONTARABIA, citat. (9).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google upon his death-bed never to ſuffer a woman to aſcend the throne [G]. Olympias, miſtruſting the affection of her people, went and ſhut herſelf up in Pydna, as ſoon as ſhe heard of Caſſander's arrival. There ſhe was beſieged, and obliged by famine to capitulate. She was promiſed her life; but Caſſander did not obſerve that article of the capitulation. He called a general convention of the people, and put the queſtion to them what ſhould be done with that princeſs. Upon this ſome perſons who had been ſuborned by him, and who were near relations of thoſe ſhe had put to death, demanded that ſhe ſhould be puniſhed for her cruelties. In compliance with their demand, ſhe was condemned to die (f). She bore the execution with great courage and marks of modeſty [H]. I have no where read, but in a modern poſe his deification? Did not they make a decree in his favour (42)? And though they gave it an unlucky turn, we cannot ſay that they were any obſtacle to his deſign.

(f) Taken from Juſtin, lib. xiv, cap. v, vi. See likewiſe Diodorus Siculus, lib. xix, cap. li.

(42) See Ælian, above, citation (33).

[G] The exhortation Antipater made upon his death-bed, never to ſuffer a woman to aſcend the throne.] This is a fact preſerved to us by Diodorus Siculus (43). Lambinus has inſerted, in one of his books, the whole chapter in which that ancient hiſtorian diſplays all the barbarities of Olympias, and without doubt his only end in inſerting it, was to add the greater weight to the concluſion. 'Talibus & tam atrocibus, atque 'injuſtis facinoribus iram ſuam explens (Olympias) 'citò hoc efficit, ut Macedones ejus crudelitatem abo- 'minarentur. Omnes enim Antipatri verba memoria 'repetebant, qui tanquam oracula fundens, & vatici- 'nans, Macedones moriens hortatus eſt, UT NE 'UNQUAM MULIEREM SINERENT REGNI 'CLAVUM TENERE. Hactenus Diodorus. - - - - 'Olympias taking her revenge by ſuch lawleſs and ter- 'rible methods, ſoon made herſelf odious to the Macedo- 'nians for her cruelty. For they all remembered the 'words of Antipater, who, as he was dying, delivered 'this caution as an oracle, or prophecy, THAT THEY 'NEVER SHOULD SUFFER A WOMAN TO 'ASCEND THE THRONE.' Now ſee what he adds to juſtify this remonſtrance of Antipater. 'Præclare 'verò Antipater. Nam ſi mulieres omnes jure civili 'propter infirmitatem conſilii in tutorum ſunt pote- 'ſtate, neque ſuarum rerum gerendarum ſunt dominæ 'aut arbitræ, & quod mulier ſine tutore autore pro- 'miſerit, id ratum non eſt, neque debetur, quanto 'minus debet mulieri reipub. procuratio, & regni ad- 'miniſtrandi poteſtas permitti, aut committi? & ſi 'viri interdum, quorum maximè propria eſt fortitudo, 'quique ſapientiores & cordatiores ſolent eſſe natura, 'imperium adepti, tamen licentia corrumpuntur, ac 'depravantur: quid à mulieribus, quibus nihil natura 'finxit mollius, neque mobilius, neque infirmius, ex- 'pectandum (44)? - - - - And very juſt was Antipater's 'advice. For if all women, by the Civil Law in regard 'to the weakneſs of their reſolutions, are in the cuſtody of 'guardians, and not miſtreſſes of themſelves in the ma- 'nagement of their affairs, and what a woman with- 'out her guardian contracts for, is void, how much 'more unreaſonable is it, that a woman ſhould ever be 'permitted to take upon her the public government, and 'adminiſtration of a kingdom? and if men ſometimes, 'whoſe proper character is fortitude, and who are na- 'turally wiſer and ſteadier, when once they become go- 'vernors, are yet corrupted and depraved: what can be 'expected from women, who are formed by nature ſo 'weak and inſtable?' There cannot be a ſtronger cenſure on the conduct of thoſe people, who lodge the ſovereign authority in the hands of women; and yet Lambinus publiſhed his book at Paris, by the king's authority, and even dedicated it to Charles IX, when Catherine de Medicis governed all. It is no wonder that ſuch thoughts ſhould come into his head in thoſe days; for this queen's ill conduct was enough to infuſe them into thoſe very people, who were leaſt prepoſſeſſed in favour of the Salic law: but it is ſurpriſing that he ſhould have the courage to publiſh theſe thoughts of his, and that he did not ſuffer by ſo doing. There was no notice taken of his reflexion, and thence it comes that Francis Hotomanus (45) aſked his adverſaries why they made ſo much noiſe againſt his Francogallia (46) printed beyond the Alps, and took no notice of Lambinus, whoſe work had been printed at Paris itſelf.

(43) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xix, cap. xi.

(44) Dionyſ. Lambin. in Cornel. Nepot. pag. 345, Edit. of Paris 1569.

(45) See Matagonis de Matagonibus adverſus Italogalliam ſive Antifrancogalliam Antonii Matharelli, pag. 245, 246.

(46) It is a piece, in which he condemns the regency of women. See HOTMAN, citat. (19), and remark [I].

[H] She bore the execution with great courage and marks of modeſty.] So true it is, that the moſt reprobate ſouls do more readily renounce virtue itſelf, than the appearances of virtue. Here we have a woman divorced for her adulteries, and beſides guilty of the greateſt crimes, who employs her laſt care in ſo compoſing herſelf, that her cloaths, when ſhe was upon the ground, might cover what modeſty forbids to expoſe. 'Inſuper exſpirans capillis os, veſte crura 'contexiſſe fertur, ne quid poſſet in corpore ejus in- 'decorum videri (47). - - - - It is further remarked, 'that when ſhe was dying, ſhe covered her face with her 'hair, and gathered her garments about her legs, that 'her body might not be ſeen in any indecent manner.' The like care is leſs to be admired at in Polyxena, who was a young girl and a very virtuous perſon. Euripides has not failed to obſerve, that ſhe took the utmoſt care to have her fall accompanied with decency (48).

(47) Juſtin, lib. xiv, ſub fin.

(48) She had likewiſe the courage to ſee the fatal blow given. See Drelincourt, pag. 126, of his Achilleus Index, the third edition. You will there meet with an accurate and extenſive learning upon Polyxena.

- - - - Ἡ δὲ, καὶ θνήσκουσ', ὅμως
Πολλὴν πρόνοιαν εἶχεν εὐσχήμως πεσεῖν.
Κρύπτειν θ', ἃ κρύπτειν ὄμματ' ἀρσένων χρεών'

- - - - Hæc vero etiam moriens, tamen
Magnam ſollicitudinem habuit decenter ut caderet,
Et occultaret, quæ occultare oculos virorum convenit (49).

Yet dying ſhe employ'd her utmoſt care,
To form her fall with ſuch a decent air,
That no rude eye might now behold her bare.

(49) Euripides, in Hecub. ver. 568. pag. m. 35. See likewiſe Ovid's Metam. lib. xiii, where he ſays of Polyxena,

Tunc quoque cura fuit partes velare tegendas
Cum caderet, caſtique decus ſervare pudoris.

Pliny the younger makes the ſame remark upon the famous veſtal virgin, whom Domitian condemned to be buried alive. 'Quinetiam quum in illud ſubter- 'raneum cubiculum demitteretur, hæſiſſetque deſcen- 'denti ſtola, vertit ſe, ac recollegit. Cumque ei car- 'nifex manum daret, adverſata eſt, & reſiluit: fœ- 'dumque contactum quaſi planè à caſto puroque cor- 'pore noviſſima ſanctitate rejecit: omnibuſque nume- 'ris pudoris, πολλὴν πρόνοιαν εἶχεν εὐσχήμως [illegible] 'σεῖν (50). - - - - Beſides as ſhe was letting down into 'her ſubterraneous cave, her cloaths ſticking and gather- 'ing up about her, ſhe turned herſelf round and compoſ- 'ed them in order again. And when the executioner 'offered his hand to aſſiſt her, ſhe ſtarted back and re- 'fuſed his help; rejecting his baſe touch, with the laſt 'degree of ſanctity, as tho' her body had been wholly 'pure and undefiled; and agreeably to the moſt conſum- 'mate chaſtity, ſhe took great care to fall decently.' I ſay nothing of the Amazon Penthefilea; for the poet obſerving that ſhe fell from her horſe ſtretched out at full length, without making any diſcovery, leaves us room to believe it might be the effect of chance.

(50) Plin. Epiſt. XI, lib. iv, pag. m. 240.

- - "Η δ' ὧκα μίγη κονίῃ, καὶ ὀλέσθρῳ,
Εὐσαλέως ἐειπῦσα κατ' ἴδηΦ ἐδέ οἱ αἰδὼς
Ἥσχυνεν δέμας ἠὺ τάθη δ' ἐπὶ νηδύα μακρὴν,

- - Quæ mox cum pulvere & morte commiſcetur,
Compoſitè cadens ad terram, nec pudor
Formoſum corpus dedecorat, ſed extenditur in latum ventrem (51).

Her dying body was conceal'd ſo well,
That the moſt prying eye no tale cou'd tell,
While prone to earth, at her full length ſhe fell.

(51) Quintus Calaber, in Supplem. Homeri, lib. i, ver. 219, pag. m. 168.

But what ſhall we ſay of Cæſar, the moſt unchaſte man upon earth, who yet uſed the ſame precaution with that of Polyxena? 'Utque animadvertit undi- 'que ſe ſtrictis pugionibus peti, toga caput obvolvit: 'ſimul ſiniſtra manu ſinum ad ima crura deduxit quo 'honeſtius

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google modern author, that the ſerpent, which lay with her, left upon her body ſuch ſpots as were never defaced [I]. It was ſo ſaid of the mother of Auguſtus.

'honeſtius caderet, etiam inferiore corporis parte ve-
'lata (52). - - - - And as he obſerved himſelf attacked
'on all ſides with drawn daggers, he covered his head
'with his gown, and at the ſame time with his left
'hand gathered the lower part of it about his legs,
'that he might fall the more decently, with his whole
'body covered.' We muſt needs own, not only that leudneſs has its bounds in thoſe over whom it gets the aſcendant; but alſo that there are ſome perſons very diſſolute and irregular in their actions, who in their words and all other external demeanour, are at the ſame time religious obſervers of decency (53). As for the courage which Olympias ſhewed at her exit, it is finely deſcribed in the following words: 'Sed
'Olympias ubi obſtinatos venire ad ſe armatos vidit,
'veſte regali, duabus ancillis innixa ultro obviam pro-
'cedit. Qua viſa, percuſſores attoniti fortuna maje-
'ſtatis prioris, & tot in ea memoriæ occurrentibus
'regum ſuorum nominibus, ſubſtiterunt; donec à
'Caſſandro miſſi ſunt, qui eam confoderent, non re-
'fugientem gladium, nec vulnera, aut muliebriter
'vociferantem, ſed virorum more fortium, pro gloria
'veteris proſapiæ, morti ſuccumbentem, ut Alexan-
'drum poſſes etiam in moriente matre cognoſcere (54).
'- - - But Olympias when ſhe ſaw ſome perſons armed ad-
'vancing in a reſolute manner, went to meet them in
'her royal robes, and attended by two of her maids.
'The aſſaſſins upon ſeeing her, made a full ſtop, aſto-
'niſhed at the thought of her former majeſty, and with
'the memory of ſo many of their kings, whoſe names
'her perſon recalled to their mind: till others were ſent
'by Caſſander, who ſtabbed her, while ſhe, without ei-
'ther ſhrinking from their ſwords, or making the leaſt
'female outcry, ſubmitted to death with the valour of a
'hero, to the glory of her great family, ſo that even in
'the dying mother you might eaſily behold an Alexander.'
This ſhews, that thoſe who ſay cruelty is a mark of cowardice, and that nothing is ſo mean and cringing as a barbarous and criminal ſoul when reduced to the laſt extremity, may be confuted by great examples.

[I] I have no where read, but in a modern author, that the ſerpent which lay with her, left upon her body ſuch ſpots as were never defaced.] The modern author I here ſpeak of is Savaro, whoſe words I ſhall inſert after firſt giving the text of Sidonius Apollinaris, upon which he has commented.

Magnus Alexander, nec non Auguſtus, habentur
Concepti ſerpente Deo: Phœbumque, Jovemque
Diviſere ſibi: namque horum quæſiit unus
Cynifia ſub Scyrte patrem maculis genitricis.
Alter Phœbigenam ſeſe gaudebat haberi,
Pæonii jactans Epidauria ſigna draconis (55).

Their birth from ſerpents of celeſtial frame,
Both Alexander and Auguſtus claim:
And ſharing to themſelves the gods above,
One chuſes Phœbus, and the other Jove.
To clear his mother's ſpots, in Lybian ſands,
The former an immortal ſire demands.
The latter to atteſt his father's rays,
The ſerpent's Epidaurian marks diſplays.

Savaro's remark upon the fourth of theſe ſix verſes is this. 'Hæc de Alexandro dicta ſunt, non de Augu-
'ſto, ut vir doctus (56) ſcribit, qui quidem Alexan'der quærebat patrem ſuum inſignitum ſerpentis ma-
'culis, quibus inſignita erat Olympias mater, qua
'cum Jupiter Hammon ſub ſpecie ſerpentis concubue-
'rat, & ſerpentinas maculas inuſſerat ſui concubitus
'teſtes. Idem, de Accia Auguſti matre, Sueton. cap.
'94. - - - - This is ſaid of Alexander, not of Auguſtus
'as a learned author writes, for it was Alexander who
'ſought a father diſtinguiſhed by ſpots like a ſerpent, his 'mother having been marked with ſuch, ever ſince Ju-
'piter Hammon lay with her in the form of a ſerpent,
'and left the impreſſion of thoſe ſerpentine ſpots upon her
'as a proof of his embraces. He is in the right to maintain that this verſe relates to Alexander, and not to Auguſtus. But where did he ever read that Olympias bore upon her body the marks of the animal, whoſe form Jupiter aſſumed? no author mentions any ſuch thing, therefore I take the ſpots, ſpoken of by the Poet, to be the blemiſhes of the queen's reputation: his meaning without doubt is, that Alexander ſought for his father in the temple of Jupiter Hammon in order to wipe off thoſe ſpots, that is, to ſcreen his mother's honour: the words of Juſtin, quoted above (57), lead us to this ſenſe. This obſervation I had made before I conſulted Freinſhemius's Commentary, where I meet with the ſame cenſure on that thought of Savaro. 'Neſcio num ita potius accipiendus ſit Sidonius
'Carm. 2. 124. ubi dicit quæſiſſe Alexandrum Cyni-
'fia ſub Syrte patrem maculis genitricis, quam, ut ex-
'plicat Vir doctiſſimus, de maculis à concubitu dra-
'conis, in matris corpore relictis; ut nimirum Sido-
'nius velit, eum per infamiam matris, quam eo mo-
'do adulterii ream agebat, Hammonem ſibi patrem
'quæſiviſſe. Certe enim de maculis ejus generis ſer-
'pentinis nihil recordor legiſſe, quod ad Olympiadem
'pertineat (58). - - - - I am uncertain whether we
'ought not rather to underſtand in this ſenſe Sidonius
'Apollinaris, where he ſays that Alexander ſought in
'the ſands of Africa a father for the ſpots of his mother,
'than as a learned author explains it, by marks left
'upon his mother's body, by her lying with a ſerpent;
'Namely that Sidonius's meaning is, that he ſought
'Hammon for his father in regard to the infamy of his 'mother, whom he therefore looked upon as guilty of adul-
'tery.' If this related to Atia, the mother of Auguſtus, we muſt ſpeak otherwiſe; for we read in Suetonius, that the ſpots ſhe had upon her body after her believing that a ſerpent had embraced her, hindered her all the reſt of her life from going into a bath: ſhe durſt not appear naked with ſuch a checkered ſkin. This adventure is ſo ſtrange and aſtoniſhing, that, if it were certain, it would puzzle all our wits. Give me leave to copy the paſſage. 'In Aſclepiadis Mende-
'λεγομένῳ libris lego, Atiam, cum ad ſolenne A-
'pollinis ſacrum media nocte veniſſet poſita in templo
'lectica, dum cæteræ matronæ dormirent, obdormiſſe,
'draconemque repente irrepſiſſe ad eam, paulloquepoſt
'egreſſum, illamque expergefactam quaſi à concubitu
'mariti purificaſſe ſe, & ſtatim in corpore ejus extitiſ-
'ſe maculam, velut depicti draconis, nec potuiſſe un-
'quam exigi, adeo ut mox publicis balneis perpetuo
'abſtinuerit (59). - - - - In the work of Aſclepiades of
'Mendeſium, intituled Θεσμοφορουμένων, we read that
'Atia going at midnight to Apollo's feſtival, there being
'a bed placed in the temple, while ſhe and the other
'matrons ſlept, a dragon ſuddenly crept upon her, and
'leaving her a little after, ſhe awaked and purified her-
'ſelf as if ſhe had lain with her huſband, and preſent-
'ly there appeared upon her body a ſpot reſembling a
'dragon, nor could it ever be taken off, ſo that ſhe from
'that time continually abſtained from the public baths.'
If ſuch ſtories had been vented only once, and in a Philoſophical Age, we ſhould not ſo readily venture to make a jeſt of them: but when we reflect that they owe their original to fabulous times, and have only been revived in ſeveral ſucceeding ages, we never ſcruple to affirm, that they derive their being from poetical fiction; and that ſeveral copies of them have been drawn by flatterers, ſometimes in favour of one and ſometimes of another. The Meſſenians gave out that Ariſtomenes was born of a god, metamorphoſed into a ſerpent. The Sicyonians declared the ſame thing of Ariſtodamas (60). The Romans were willing their Scipio ſhould partake of the ſame privileges with Alexander; and after that there were flatterers who did Auguſtus the like honour. This ſort of birth appeared ſo glorious, that the emperor Galerius, the ſon of a peaſant (61), boaſted of it (62) to render himſelf ſomething extraordinary. Obſerve that Scipio was willing ſuch a ſtory ſhould be believed of his mother; and I do not know whether the wiſer Romans did not contribute in ſome meaſure to promote this opinion: for in the circumſtances to which Rome was reduced by Hannibal, it was uſeful that thoſe popular errors ſhould revive the hopes of the people, and make them look upon Scipio, as a man deſigned by the gods for great things. Conſider theſe admirable words of Livy. 'Fuit enim Scipio, non veris tantum virtutibus mira-
'bilis, ſed arte quoque quadam ab juventa in oſtenta-
'tionem earum compoſitus: pleraque apud multitu-
'dinem aut per nocturnas viſa ſpecies, aut velut divi-
'nitus mente monita, agens: ſive & ipſe capti quadam
'ſuperſtitione

(51) Sidon. Apollinaris, Carm. II, ver. 121.

(52) Sueton. in Cæſare, cap. lxxxii.

(53) Compare the article NAPLES (ALPHONSO), remark [H].

(54) Juſtin, lib. xiv, cap. vi, pag. m. 328, 329.

(56) That is, Caſaubon, in Sueton. Auguſt. cap. xcv.

(57) In the remark [F], citation (30).

(58) Freinſhemius, in Q. Curtium, lib. iv, cap. vii, num. 25.

(59) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. xciv.

(60) Velandæ ignominiæ repetitum ex antiquis fabulis de dracone commentum: idem enim olim de Ariſtomene Meſſenios, de Ariſtodama Sicyonios jactaviſſe. Freinſhem. Supplem. in Quint. Curtium, lib. i, cap. i, num. 17.

(61) Aurel. Victor. in Epitome, pag. m. 222.

(62) Is inſolenter affirmare auſus eſt matrem more Olympiadis Alexandri Magni creatricis compreſſam dracone ſemet concepiſſe. Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ ſuperſtitione animi, ſive ut imperia conſiliaque velut
‘ ſorte oraculi miſſa, ſine cunctatione aſſequeretur. Ad
‘ hoc jam inde ab initio præparans animos, ex quo
‘ togam virilem ſumſit, nullo die prius ullam publicam ‘ privatamque rem egit, quam in Capitolium iret, in‘ greſſuſque ædem conſideret : & plerumque tempus
‘ ſolus in ſecreto ibi tereret. Hic mos, qui per om-
‘ nem vitam ſervabatur, ſeu conſulto, ſeu temere, vul-
‘ gatæ opinioni fidem apud quoſdam fecit, ſtirpis eum
‘ divinæ virum eſſe ; retulitque famam, in Alexan-
‘ dro Magno prius vulgatam, & vanitate & fabula pa-‘ rem, anguis immanis concubitu conceptum, & in ‘ cubiculo matris ejus perſæpe viſam prodigii ejus ſpe-‘ ciem, interventuque hominum evolutam repente, at-
‘ que ex oculis elapſam. His miraculis nunquam ab
‘ ipſo eluſa fides eſt : quin potius aucta arte quadam, nec
‘ abnuendi tale quicquam, nec palam affirmandi. Mul-
‘ ta alia ejuſdem generis, alia vera, alia aſſimulata,
‘ admirationis humanæ in eo juvene exceſſerant modum :
‘ quibus freta tunc civitas, ætati haudquaquam maturæ
‘ tantam molem rerum tantumque imperium permi-
‘ ſit (63). - - - - - For Scipio was not only to be admired
‘ for his real virtues, but was alſo remarkable from his ‘ youth for the art of ſetting them forth : pretending almoſt
‘ every thing he tranſacted with the people, to be either
‘ the warning of ſome dream, or the effect of a divine
‘ inſpiration : whether he was inclined to ſuperſtition ‘ himſelf, or that his counſels and commands might be ‘ more readily obeyed by being believed to be a ſort of ora-
‘ cles. For this purpoſe having prepared his meaſures
‘ from the beginning, as ſoon as he was of ſufficient years
‘ to be his own maſter, he never on any day undertook a ‘ thing, either public or private, without firſt entring
‘ the capitol, and ſtaying ſome time there, and he ſpent ‘ moſt of his time there all alone. This cuſtom which he ‘ obſerved all his life long, whether contracted deſigned-
‘ ly or accidentally, gave riſe to a vulgar notion, that ‘ he was of divine original ; and revived a ſtory former- ‘ ly told of Alexander the Great, and no leſs vain than ‘ fabulous, that he was conceived from the embraces of
‘ a ſerpent, and that ſuch a monſtrous appearance has been ‘ often ſeen in his mother's chamber, and upon any body's ‘ coming in, has ſuddenly vaniſhed and diſappeared. He ‘ never impeached the credit of theſe miracles : but ra- ‘ ther promoted it, by his artful way of neither denying,
‘ nor openly affirming them. Many other things of the like ‘ kind, ſome true, others pretended, which were ſaid of this ‘ young man, exceeded all bounds of human admiration :
‘ it was from the credit of theſe, that the city at that
‘ time committed into the hands of ſo very young a man,
‘ ſo weighty a charge and ſo great a command. ’ There are ſome great families in Europe, which pretend to be ſprung from the commerce of a woman with a ſpirit. The marſhal de Baſſompierre relates this of the head of his family. See his Memoirs, and Le Comte de Gabalis. See likewiſe the article PLATO.

(63) T. Livius, lib. xxvi, pag. m. 442. See alſo Aulus Gellius, lib. vii, cap. i.

OMNIBONUS, in Italian Ognibuono, was one of the noted Grammarians of the XVth century. He took the ſirname of Leonicenus from his being born at Lunigo (a), in Latin Leonicum, in the Vicentine. He was a diſciple of Victorinus of Feltri one of the firſt reſtorers of antient Latin (b). He ſtudied Greek at Venice under Emanuel Chryſoloras (c). He wrote commentaries on Lucan, Saluſt, Valerius Maximus, Quintilian, Cicero de Officiis, and Oratore, &c. He tranſlated into Latin part of Æſop's Fables ; Xenophon's treatiſe de Venatione, and that of St Athanaſius contra Gentes & Hæreticos (d). Theſe are only part of his writings.

(a) Leandro Alberti, Deſcription of all Italy, folio 470, Edit. Venice 1561, in 4*to*.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Geſner. in Bibliotheca, folio 527.

(d) Epitome Biblioth. Geſneri, pag. 641.

OREGIUS (AUGUSTIN) a great Philoſopher, was ordered by cardinal Barberini (a) legate of Bologna, to examine whether Ariſtotle taught the mortality of the ſoul. The legate's intention was, in caſe Ariſtotle had been found guilty of that impiety, to induce the Pope to forbid the reading lectures upon that Philoſopher relating to this head. But Oregius declared him innocent. See his book De immortalitate Animæ (b). He wrote a book, de Angelis, and another de Operibus ſex dierum, which was printed at Rome in 1632.

(a) He who was ſince made Pope by the name of Urban VIII.

(b) In chap. v. Conſult Fromondus, Philoſ. Chriſt. de anima, pag. 761.

ORICELLARIUS (BERNARD) a Florentine, related to the houſe of Medicis (a), was advanced to the beſt poſts in his native country (b). He flouriſhed towards the end of the XVth century. By what you will find quoted in the remarks, it is evident that his works are written in a very good ſtyle. He wrote the expedition of Charles VIII into Italy, with great partiality (c). I take him to be the ſame perſon with Bernard OCRICULARIUS (d), of whom Eraſmus has ſaid one thing worth knowing [A]. Pierius Valerianus mentions

(a) See the remark [B].

(d) Konig makes them two ſeveral authors.

(b) Vir conſularis graviſſimus. Pocciantius, de Sciptor. Floreni. pag. 32. (c) Qua in Hiſtoria moderatio ſcriptori probo conveniens, & alienus à ſtudiis partium animus deſiderantur. Mabill. Muſæi Ital. Tom. i, pag. 169.

[A] Eraſmus has ſaid one thing worth knowing.] He could never engage him to ſpeak Latin; not that Ocricularius did not underſtand it, but becauſe he had ſtudied the purity and beauty of it, and was afraid of ſlipping into barbariſms, if he ventured to ſpeak it extempore. Eraſmus takes occaſion to tell us this from an apoptthegm of Pollio. This orator owned that, by pleading well, he had acquired the facility of pleading, and that by pleading often he had rendered himſelf the leſs capable of pleading well. Now, the ſame thing happens to thoſe who ſpeak Latin often ; they acquire the facility of ſpeaking, and loſe the habit of ſpeaking exactly and politely. ‘ Pollio dicebat, Commode agendo factum eſt, ut
‘ ſæpe agerem : ſed ſæpe agendo factum eſt ut minus
‘ commode, quia ſcilicet aſſiduitate nimia facilitas magis
‘ quam facultas, nec fiducia ſed temeritas paratur. Quod
‘ accurate factum velimus, raro faciendum eſt. Hac
‘ ratione duci videntur Itali quidam eruditi, qui licet
‘ pulchre calleant Latine, tamen vix unquam adduci
‘ poſſunt ut in familiari congreſſu Latine loquantur.
‘ At ſi quando compellit neceſſitas, dicunt exacte, qua-
‘ ſique de ſcripto. Novi Venetiæ Bernardum Ocricu-‘ larium civem Florentinum, cujus hiſtorias ſi legiſſes,
‘ dixiſſes alterum Salluſtium, aut certe Salluſtii tem-
‘ poribus ſcriptas (1). Nunquam tamen ab homine
‘ impetrare licuit, ut mecum Latine loqueretur ; ſubin-
‘ de interpellabam, ſurdo loqueris vir præclare, vul-
‘ garis linguæ veſtratis tam ſum ignarus quam Indi-
‘ cæ. Verbum Latinum nunquam quivi ab eo extundere
‘ (2). - - - - It was a ſaying of Pollio, pleading elo-
‘ quently was the cauſe of my pleading frequently ;
‘ but pleading frequently was the cauſe of my plead‘ ing leſs eloquently : for by too great frequency we ‘ acquire a readineſs rather than an ability, and a raſh-
‘ neſs rather than a freedom. What we would do ac- ‘ curately, ſhould be done but rarely. This reaſon ſeems
‘ to prevail with ſome learned Italians, who tho' they ‘ are great maſters of the Latin tongue, yet can ſcarce
‘ ever be perſuaded to ſpeak it in common converſation.
‘ But if they happen to be obliged to it, they ſpeak it as ‘ exactly, as if they were reading what they had com-
‘ poſed. I knew at Venice one Bernard Ocricularius, a ‘ citizen of Florence, whoſe Hiſtories if you had ever
‘ read, you would call him another Salluſt, or think them
‘ written at leaſt in the time of Salluſt. And yet I never ‘ could prevail with him to ſpeak to me in Latin : ſome-
‘ times, I have preſſed him. Learned Sir, I do not ‘ underſtand

(1) Here is what Pocciantius ſays of Bernardus Ocricellarius, pag. 33, de Script. Florent. Dictavit quinetiam Florentinas hiſtorias, quas adeo phrasi extulit eloquentiſſima, quod (teſte Michaele Urbinate) ipſum Saluſtium ſuperaſſe videatur.

(2) Eraſm. Apophth. lib. viii, pag. 634, Edit. 1556.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mentions our Bernard [B], and so does Petrus Crinitus [C]. John della Casa had a sister who was married to one Oricellarius. The sons of this sister took care of their uncle's funeral and manuscripts. I make this remark only to have the opportunity of correcting an error that relates to Naogeorgus [D].

Thuanus

Why some learned men decline the speaking of Latin.

'understand your Italian any more than Chinese. But I 'never could get one Latin word from him.' This precaution of the Italians continued a long time; for we learn from Scioppius that it was impossible to force three or four Latin words out of Paulus Manutius without a great deal of trouble; which occasioned the Germans, who went to see him, to value their own learning more than his. They talked Latin more readily than he, and from thence concluded that he was not equal to them. Father Maffeus durst not enter into conversation with Scioppius, because he was obliged to answer him in Latin. The unwillingness of these gentlemen did not proceed so much from the difficulty of explaining themselves, as from the fear of accustoming themselves to barbarisms, which are almost unavoidable to those who speak Latin in conversation. I assure myself that it will not be disagreeable to have Scioppius's words inserted here after that passage of Erasmus. The conformity of the subject authorises me to do it. 'Nihil non faciunt (Itali) ut evitent omnia, unde aliquid infuscandæ & contaminandæ orationis periculi oftenditur. Latine igitur nunquam loquuntur, quod fieri vix posse persuasum habeant, quin quotidianus ejus linguæ usus, ad instar torrentis lutulentus fluat, & cujusquemodi verborum sordes secum rapiat, quæ postea quodam familiaritatis jure, sic se scribentibus ingerant, ut etiam diligentissimos fallant, & haud dubie pro Latinis habeantur. Hoc eorum consilium cum haud intelligant Transalpini, id eorum insciticæ perperam adsignant. Sic recte Paulo Manutio usu venit, ut quoniam vix tria verba Latina in familiari sermone proferre poterat, eum Germani complures, qui loquentem audituri ad eum venerant, vehementer præ se contemnerent. Huic tamen nemo, qui sanus sit, ad puritatis & elegantiæ latinæ summam quicquid (3) defuisse dixerit (3). . . . Mihi quoque Petrus Maffeus Jesuita nomini atque famæ parum respondere visus est, cum ad eum Romæ undeviginti abhinc annis salutatum venissem. Neque enim inducere animum poterat, ut Latine mihi respondendi aleam subiret. Postea vero lecta, relectaque ejus historia, quam de rebus per Lusitanos in India gestis condidit, consilium hominis sibi parum fidentis, labemque nomini suo metuentis intelligere mihi visus sum, quod etiam facere non potui, quin prudentissimum judicarem (4). '---The (Italians) *take all the pains imaginable to avoid 'every thing, that may hazard the obscuring and corrupting their stile. For this reason they never talk 'Latin, which they are of opinion can never be done, 'but that the daily use of this language will make it 'flow muddy, like a torrent, and sweep along with it 'the impurity of any sort of words, which afterwards 'by becoming familiar, will insinuate themselves in writing, and even deceive the most cautious composers, by 'passing currently for true Latin. The learned on this 'side the Alps not knowing this motive, of theirs, falsely 'ascribe it to their ignorance. Paulus Manutius was 'a remarkable instance of this, for because he could scarce 'ever be brought to speak three Latin words in common 'conversation, several Germans, who went to make him 'a visit in expectation to hear him speak, looked 'on him as not near so learned as themselves. But 'no person in his senses will say, that he came short of 'the very summit of purity and elegancy in the Latin 'tongue. . . . I thought myself that Peter Maffæus, the 'Jesuit, was far from answering his great character and 'reputation upon my going to see him at Rome about 'nineteen years ago. For he could not prevail upon him 'self to run the hazard of answering me in Latin. 'But afterwards when I came to read over and over 'again his History of the Transactions of the Portuguese in 'the Indies, I then found it was the effect of his modesty and great caution, not to stain his high reputation 'by any unpolite expression, for which I could not but 'extremely commend his prudence.' I believe I may justly say, that Thuanus observed the same conduct with these Italian Purists; for in a modern author I meet with these words. The Jesuit Maffeus . . . . . repeated the Breviary in Greek, for fear the solecisms and the low and simple way of speaking, as Origen calls it *, in which the scriptures are delivered, should prejudice the elegancy and beauty of style which we admire in his writings: and for the same reason, Thuanus, who spoke Latin with the fluency and majesty of Livy, never answered the harangues and compliments made to him in that language, but by an interpreter (5).

(3) Scioppius, in Judicio de Stilo Historico, pag. m. 57.

(4) Ib. p. 58.

* Περὶ σολικισμοῦ καὶ εὐτραπελοῦς φράσεως τῆς γραφῆς.

(5) Girac, Reponse à la Défense des Oeuvres de Voiture, Sect. xviii, pag. 120.

[B] Pierius Valerianus mentions our Bernard.] It is when he mentions the deceitful expectations of John Oricellarius the son of Bernard. He aspired to a cardinal's cap, under Leo X, and yet more under Clement VII. But after divers delays, which fowred him, but did not tire out his patience, death came and mowed down his fortune both present (6) and to come. 'Eodem in albo reponendus Johannes 'Oricellarius summæ vir integritatis, quique literarum 'studia vel à teneris unguiculis sectari cœperat, & 'apud Bernardum patrem eruditissimum virum, & 'apud Mediceos hujusmodi studiis in ea domo florentibus educatus fuerat. Erat is Leoni Decimo Pont. 'Max. amitinus frater, neque ullus erat, qui tum 'morum, tum literaturæ, nobilitatis, & consanguinitatis 'gratia non eum speraret ad cardinalatus apicem in 'in horas evehendum. Sed fortuna illi quosdam 'oppositerat (7) . . . . . Adridere mox Joanni visa 'fors melior . . . . Hic igitur Oricellarius, dum se 'totum litterarum studiis restituit, & fortunæ demum 'fallacias declinasse haud temerè sibi persuadet, dumque 'Clemens de more quodam suo cunctator ordinandi 'hominis diem de die ducit. Ille in rapidissimam 'illapsus febrem magnæ doctorum hominum spei 'præreptus est (8). - - - - In the same class is to be ranked John Oricellarius, a person of the greatest integrity, 'and who was a scholar from his cradle, having been 'educated by his father Bernard, among the family of 'Medicis, which was then famous for it's love of learning. He was cousin-german to Pope Leo X, and all 'the world was in hopes of seeing him soon advanced to 'the purple, in regard to his virtue, learning, nobility, 'and family. But fortune raised him up enemies . . . 'John's expectations afterwards seemed to take a more 'favourable turn. . . . . This same Oricellarius therefore 'while he was retiring closely to his studies, and at last 'very prudently resolving to give fortune no farther opportunity of deceiving him, and while Clement after his 'usual manner was putting off his design of promoting 'him from day to day. He fell into a violent fever, 'which cut him off from all those expectations which 'the learned world had conceived for him.'

(6) He was governour of the castle of St Angelo under Clement VII. Pier. Valerian. de Literator. Infelicitate, lib. ii, pag. m. 74.

(7) Ib. p. 73.

(8) Ib. p. 74.

[C] . . . . . and so does Petrus Crinitus.] Poccianti having said that the letters of Marsilius Ficinus, and those of Petrus Crinitus, attest the learning and abilities of Bernard Oricellarius, adds; 'Posteritati transmisit '(teste eodem Crinito) in primis libros quos de urbe 'Roma intitulaverat, in quibus admodum elaboravit 'in illustrandis atque observandis antiquorum monumentis (9). - - - - The principal work he transmitted to 'posterity, was that he intituled Of the City of Rome, in 'which he took great pains in illustrating and remarking on the antient monuments.'

(9) Pocciant. de Scriptor. Florentin pag. 32.

[D] An error that relates to Naogeorgus.] By the inscription upon the tomb of John della Casa (10) it appears that HORATIUS ORICELALRIUS took care to have that monument built for his uncle by the mother's side. Horatius Oricellarius avunculo optime merito P. A German author observes, that the Latin verses which were made by John della Casa, against those who accused him of praising Sodomy, are not to be met with in the collection of his works intituled, Joannis Casæ Latina monumenta. He believes, that Alexander Strozza, Inquisitor of the faith, was the cause of leaving them out of that collection. He recites the licence for printing, granted by that Inquisitor the seventh of June 1564, and says, that Hannibal Oricellarius was the collector of these remains of John della Casa (11). He gives us the verses which were suppressed; and fancies that the author made them, in answer to a satire which Naogeorgus had added to the second

(10) See Imperialis, in Museo Histor. pag. 28. Ghilini Theatr. Part i, pag. 79.

(11) Daniel Francus, Disquisit. Academ. de Papistarum Indicibus Librorum prohibitorum, pag. 111.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Thuanus mentions one HORATIUS ORICELLARIUS a Florentine, who amaſſed prodigious riches by managing the taxes of France; and perceiving he became odious on account of his great gains, he returned to his own country. The Great Duke ſent him as proxy for his marriage with one of the daughters of the duke of Lorrain in 1588 (e). There was at the ſame time one CHARLES ORICELLARIUS, a member of the academy of Florence, and canon of the Metropolitan church, very much eſteemed by Peter Victorius, who gives him a large encomium in the preface to his commentary on the third book of Ariſtotle's Ethics (f). Note that the common name of that family is Rucellai. I ſhall bring proofs of it, not ſo much to clear a doubtful fact, for this is not ſo, as to have an opportunity of mentioning ſome perſons of that name [E].

I add, that 'Catherine de Medicis introduced the firſt of this family into France, 'which is now eſtabliſhed there, and that it is not long ſince an envoy from Florence '(g) . . . . claimed ſome privileges which were due to him on account of his anceſtors 'when they firſt ſettled in the kingdom . . . .;' that this queen had a very tender affection for this whole family; that ſhe regarded them in ſome meaſure as relations, for they were deſcended, on the female ſide, from the Viconti's, and were related by this means to the houſe of Medicis (b).

(e) Thuan. lib. xcii, pag. 230.

(f) See the 247th page of An Hiſtorical Account of the famous Men of the academy of Florence, printed at Florence in 4to, in the year 1700, and compoſed by Jacobo Rilli.

(g) He was of the family of Rucellai.

(b) Mercure Galant, for Febr. 1703, pag. 318, & ſeq.

ſecond edition of his Regnum Papiſticum (12). But he is miſtaken; for John della Caſa wrote that poem, only with intent to take from the Germans the bad impreſſions which Vergerius had given them of him, in charging him with being the author of an elogium upon Sodomy. I ſhall here ſubjoin a paſſage which proves manifeſtly, that he does not complain of a ſatire publiſhed by a German, but of the diſcourſes of a fugitive.

(12) Scripſerat in iſtum Caſæ juvenilem, ut ipſe quidem excuſat, librum Thomas Naogeorgus, ſatyram regno papiſtico ſecundæ editionis quæ Baſileæ 1559 prodiit, adjectam. In hunc ergo Caſa ſequenti quod ſubjiciemus carmine inſurrexit. Ibid. pag. 109.

Quare habere transfugæ
De me fidem nolite perditiſſimo:
Sed enecate eum indies magis ſiti,
Pedoribuſque & eſuritionibus:
Quod belle adhuc feciſſe vos exiſtimo,
Virtute natio & fide atque induſtria
Et literis clara, ingeniique gloria (13).

(13) Theſe verſes are the concluſion of the poem recited by Daniel Francus. It is to be met with in Tom. i, Delitiarum Poëtarum Italorum, pag. 702.

As to myſelf, I hope you'll ne'er believe
The ſlanders of a curſed fugitive.
I doubt not but you will diſpatch him firſt,
By ſlow degrees, with hunger, dirt, and thirſt.
All glorious nations ſuch examples make,
Where virtue, faith, and learning, are at ſtake.

Paul Vergerius is the fugitive he ſpeaks of. See at the end of the Anti-Baillet the diſcourſe in proſe which John della Caſa made againſt him.

[E] The name of that family is Rucellai. I ſhall bring proofs of it. . . . . to have an opportunity of mentioning ſome perſons of that name.] Mr Rilli, in his Hiſtory of the Academiſts of Florence, calls the ſame learned man Carlo Rucellai, whom Peter Victorius names Carolus Oricellarius. You have ſeen in the preceding remark one Horatius Oricellarius, and one Annibal Oricellarius, who were the ſons of a ſiſter of John della Caſa. They are called Rucellai in cardinal d'Oſſat's letters (14): 'the ſecond thing wherewith '. . . . cardinal Aldobrandin charged us, on the 'part of the Pope, was, that the king would be 'pleaſed to let the biſhop of Carcaſſone enjoy the 'fruits both of the ſaid biſhopric, and of an abbey '(15) which he has in Champagne: adding, that his 'holineſs acknowledged the ſaid biſhop, and his brother Horatio Rucellai to be his friends and to have 'been always friends to his family, and well affected to 'France.' Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie, commenting on this, tells us (16). I. That this biſhop of Carcaſſonne was Annibal Rucellai, a gentleman of Florence, formerly governor of Rome, and known at the French court by the negotiations in which he had been employed by the Popes, Paul IV, and Pius V. That in the year 1567, he was ſent by Charles IX to Venice, to demand of the ſenate money, but he could obtain none, becauſe of the Turkiſh war with which the Republic was then threatened. 2. That Horatio Rucellai was high-ſteward to Ferdinand, grand-duke of Tuſcany. 3. That the Aldobrandins, and the Rucellai's were always of that party, which was called in Florence, THE LIBERTINES (17), that is to ſay, good Republicans, and Anti-Mediceans; who were for preſerving the liberty of their country. From hence proceeded the great affection, which Clement VIII had for theſe two brothers, whoſe father, as well as his own, had ſuffered very much under the pontificate of Leo X, and Clement VII, by whom the ſovereignty came into the houſe of Medicis. This biſhop of Carcaſſonne died the 28th of January, 1601 (18). Horatio Rucellai, his brother, one of the ableſt men in the world (19), ſent immediately a courier to the French court (20). Catel takes notice that Hannibal d' Oricellai was biſhop of Carcaſſonne in the year 1569 (21). The abbot Rucellai, who was ſo much ſpoken of in France, under the reign of Lewis XIII, was, without doubt, the ſon of this Horatio; for John della Caſa was his great uncle (22), and (23) he was born of a father, who enriched himſelf (24) by the correſpondence he had with Zamet, Bandini, Cenami, and other Italians, who then had farms in France. You will find in the Miſcellanies of Vigneul de Marville (25) what Mr de Baſſompierre, and the author of the duke of Epernon's Life, have ſaid that is curious, concerning this abbot. Here is a paſſage which concerns one of that family. 'We are promiſed from Florence a 'work, in which the author, who is named Rucellai, 'has included all that the Antients have writ on that 'ſcience, and has collected no leſs than ſix and thirty 'ſyſtems of Natural Philoſophy, all different from each 'other. As this work which he writ in Italian, and 'contains twelve volumes, could not appear before his 'death, there is reaſon to fear that it will not be 'publiſhed very quickly, after the loſs which learning 'has ſuſtained in the perſon of cardinal de Medicis, 'who alone was capable of forwarding the impreſſion (26).' The book from whence I take theſe words was printed in 1676. I do not doubt but that they mean the ſame Horatio Rucellai, of whom Mr de Crescimbeni ſpeaks thus: 'Il Sonetto moderno lo tor'remo dal ſecolo del ſecento ora corrente, e da uno 'de' più illuſtri Letterati, ch'egli abbia annoverato, 'cioè dalle Rime ſcritte a mano appreſſo di me del 'leggiadro Poëta, e profondo Filoſofo Orazio Rucellai 'Florentino Cavaliere, e priore di ſua Patria, il quale 'à fiorito a noſtri tempi, ed a laſciato all' eruditiſſimo 'Signor Prior Luigi ſuo figlivolo un' opera nobiliſſima 'di Dialoghi filoſofici, la quale ſe un giorno vedrà la 'luce, conoſceranno i Poſteri quanto per ſi chiaro in'telletto queſto ſecolo ſia degno d'invidia (27). - - - - 'The late Poem compoſed about the concluſion of the XVIth 'century, by one of the moſt celebrated ſcholars of his time, 'that is, the verſes in manuſcript of that excellent Poet, 'and profound Philoſopher, Horatio Rucellai, a Florentine 'knight, who was in high authority in his country, and 'flouriſhed in our memory, and left behind him, to his 'learned ſon, an admirable work of Philoſophical Dia'logues; which, whenever it comes to be publiſhed, will 'ſhew poſterity how much the preſent age deſerves to be 'envied for producing ſo great a genius.' The ſame author tells us, that Giovani Rucellai compoſed at Rome in 1524, a poem, intituled, le Api, which was printed in the year 1539, and afterwards at Florence, by Philip Giunti 1590, with notes of Robert Titius, and with la Coltavazione of Lewis Alamanni (28). He does not ſpeak of the Paris edition in 1546, by Robert Stephens. It is to be found in the library of Thuanus (29). This John Rucellai was a Florentine (30), and we have no reaſon to doubt that he was of the family of the Oricellarius's. See the article RUCELLAI.

(14) The thirty-fourth letter of d'Oſſat, pag. 176, of the firſt Tome, Paris Edit. 1698. This letter is dated the twenty-fifth of October 1595.

(15) It was that of Jard near Melun. Amelot de la Houſſaie, ubi infra.

(16) Amelot de la Houſſaie's Notes upon this paſſage of Cardinal d'Oſſat.

(17) Corroborate this with the paſſage above quoted, citat. (12) of the article MACHIAVEL, concerning COSIMIN RUSCELLAI.

(18) D'Oſſat, Letter CCLVII, pag. 299, Tom. ii.

(19) Ib. Letter CCLXVII, pag. 341.

(20) Ib. Letter CCLVII.

(21) Catel, Memoirs of the Hiſtory of Languedoc, pag. 1009.

(22) See Vigneul Marville, in the firſt Tome of his Miſcellanies, pag. 173, of the firſt edition at Roan.

(23) Vigneul Marville, pag. 271, of the ſecond Tome, Dutch Edition.

(24) He got 1700000 livres by the exciſe of France. Scaligerana at the word Rucellai.

(25) Tom. i, ubi ſupra.

(26) Rapin's Reflections upon Phyſics, num. 7, pag. 418, Dutch Edit.

(27) Giovanne Mario de' Crescimbeni l'Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, pag. 35, Edit. of Rome 1698, in 4to.

(28) Ib. pag. 327.

(29) At pag. 339, of the ſecond part of the catalogue.

(30) Crescembeni, ubi ſupra, 272.

ORICHOVIUS

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ORICHOVIUS, or ORECHOVIUS (STANISLAUS), a Poliſh gentleman, was born in the dioceſe of Premiſlau, in Ruſſia, about the beginning of the XVIth century. He was called the Poliſh Demoſthenes on account of the freedom and force of his eloquence. He ſtudied at Wittenberg under Luther and Melancthon, and afterwards at Venice under John Baptiſt Egnatius. Returning home to his country, he dedicated himſelf to the church, and became canon of Premiſlau. He made no ſecret of his attachment to Luther's doctrine, and was often cenſured for it in full chapter by his biſhop; but he made a jeſt of thoſe cenſures, and abandoned his benefice, and married. He was anathematized by his prelate, and ſo little regarded it, that he not only took up the pen againſt the Eccleſiaſtics, but alſo diſturbed them in the poſſeſſion of their eſtates, and putting himſelf at the head of their antagoniſts, by the readineſs of his wit, and the great command of his tongue, he cauſed violent commotions. He changed his meaſures ſome years after, and was again received into the boſom of the Catholic church at the ſynod of Warſaw in the year 1561. Some time after he delivered publickly the confeſſion of his faith in the ſynod of Petricow, and printed it, from which time he appeared very zealous againſt the ſectaries, both in his writings, and verbal diſputations. He diſputed againſt Andrew Fricius in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Gneſna, and then againſt Stancarus before the king of Poland, and afterwards upon ſome other occaſions, but always triumphantly (a), if we are to believe the author who furniſhes me with what I have been relating. I have obſerved elſewhere (b), that Orichovius would inſinuate that if he had married while he was a prieſt, he would not have broke with his church upon that account, becauſe he would have ſubmitted to the penalty which ſhe impoſes, by abſtaining from his ſacerdotal function: but he contradicted himſelf very groſsly; for he had put at the head of his book a confeſſion of his adherence to the Lutheran party [A]. I ſhall cite ſomething of a treatiſe he compoſed to procure liberty for prieſts to marry [B]. I ſhall alſo give the titles of his writings [C].

(a) Taken from Starovolſcius, in Elogiis centum Polonorum. num. 58, pag. m. 78, 79.

(b) In the remark [M] of the article STANCARUS.

[A] He had put at the head of his book a confeſſion of his adherence to the Lutheran party.] The book I am ſpeaking of is intituled, Chimæra, ſive de Stancari funeſta Regno Poloniæ Secta. It was printed at Cologne apud Maternum Cholinum, in the year 1563, in 8vo. At the beginning of it is to be ſeen a declaration of the author, by virtue of which he ſubmits both his perſon and writings to the moſt holy council of Trent. He compares himſelf to the prodigal ſon returning home to his father's houſe. It will be ſufficient to recite ſome of his expreſſions. 'En ego à finibus terræ ad 'vos clamo dum anxiatur cor meum ..... ſupplex 'manus tendo cum principe publicanorum illo, in 'conſpectu, confeſſuque veſtro fraudata compenſans 'quadruplo. Namque ego honorem debitum, non 'homini, ſed ordini veſtro, ſæpe detraxi: atque com-'mune veſtrum patrimonium multum vexavi, dicendo 'in vos, quæ non oportuit: ſcribendo de vobis, quæ 'non licuit: agendo contra vos, quæ non decuit agere, 'dicere ſcribere. Defraudavi igitur vos, cum hære-'ticis dum conjuro, dicto ſcripto, facto. In quibus 'tot, ac tantis damnis, detrimentiſque veſtris, ex au-'ctoritate veſtra reſarciendis, nolite, pro indulgentia 'veſtra, aliud à me expectare velle, præter illud qua-'druplum, Pater peccavi in cœlum coram te (1). ---- 'Behold I cry unto you from the ends of the earth while 'my heart is in trouble .... I ſtretch out my ſupplicant 'hands with that great publican, reſtoring four-fold what 'I have unjuſtly taken from your aſſemblies; for I have 'often detracted from the honour due not only to your per-'ſons, but to your order: and have greatly diſturbed 'your common patrimony, by ſaying thoſe things againſt 'you, which ought not to have been ſaid; by writing 'thoſe things of you, which it was not lawful to write: 'by acting thoſe things which it was not lawful to act, 'ſpeak, or write. Therefore by my adherence to Here-'retics, I have injured you in ſpeaking, writing, and 'acting. All which my ſo many and great offences againſt 'you, that they may be forgiven by your authority, I be-'ſeech you to expect no more from me out of your great in-'dulgence than this ſatisfaction, Father, I have ſinned 'againſt heaven, and before thee.

(1) Orichovii Chimæra, fol. 2, verſo.

[B] I ſhall cite ſomething of a treatiſe he compoſed to procure liberty for prieſts to marry.] 'Staniſlaus Ori-'chovius, biſhop of Ruſſia, preſented a petition to 'Pope Julius III, in the year 1551, for liberty to 'marry; remonſtrating to him the injuſtice of Syri-'cius's law, as contrary to all divine right; alledging 'even that Pope Paul II had condemned it among 'his friends; eſteeming it hard to be obliged to re-'gard as a baſtard, a daughter of his own, whom the 'divine law would allow him to acknowledge as legi-'timate; inſomuch that he was reſolved to break 'through it had not death prevented him: reproach-'ing him with the children of Paul III, worthy, ſays 'he, of a legitimate marriage, and not ſparing even his 'own particular leudneſs (2).' Theſe are the words of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai: I do not find that the title of biſhop is due to Orichovius: and however if it was, he ought to have determined it to ſome particular ſee, and not to deſcribe it by the general name of a country: for if any one ſhould ſay that ſuch a perſon is biſhop of Italy, or of France, it would be thought a very improper expreſſion. Mr du Pleſſis publiſhed another book ten or twelve years after, in which he has mentioned a baſtard of Paul II: he quoted two verſes of Pannonius, and added, and in fact, Stephen Orichovius, biſhop of Ruſſia, tells us, that ſhe being acknowledged for his by every body, it often created in him a deteſtation of Celibacy, which obliged him to look upon her with diſhonour, who might have been otherwiſe his legitimate daughter (3). Bulengerus and Fronto du Ducæus, who animadverted upon the faults of the firſt book of this learned Proteſtant, and Coëffeteau, who wrote an anſwer to the laſt, have made no remark upon the pretended title of biſhop given to Orichovius. But Gretſer, in his Examination of the Myſtery of Iniquity (4), criticiſes Mr du Pleſſis for metamorphoſing into Stephanus Orichovius (5) biſhop of Ruſſia, him whom Bale names Staniſlaus Ruthenus. The author of the State of the Church relates (6), that it is affirmed in a book of Staniſlaus Ruthenus, that Paul II having ſome verſes made againſt him and his daughter, began to lament and condemn among his friends the rigour of the law of his predeceſſors. I conjecture from thence, that this author has followed the rigour of the letter more ſtrictly than Mr du Pleſſis has done, in copying the paſſage of Bale. Note, that Mr Rivet believed Orichovius to have been a Ruſſian biſhop, and named Stephen (7).

(2) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Inſtitution de l'Euchariſtie, livr. ii, chap. x, pag. m. 322. He quotes St Orich. de Lege Syricii ad Jul. 3. Orich. Epiſc. Ruffienſ. de Celibat.

(3) Du Pleſſis, Myſt. d'Iniquité, pag. 544.

(4) Pag. 536.

(5) It was perhaps Orichovius in the Latin edition, which Gretſer refuted; but it is Orichowius in the French edition.

(6) Pag. m. 484, ad ann. 1465.

(7) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reſponſe au Myſt. d'Iniquité, Tom. ii, pag. 618.

[C] The title of his writings.] Let us make uſe of the very words of Starovolſcius. 'Scripſit multa, & 'in re civili, & in noſtrorum hominum laudibus; ſed 'præcipuè tamen in Oſores Religionis Catholicæ, ut 'puta: Quincuncem, Latinè & Polonicè. Apologiam 'Quincuncis. Fidei Confeſſionem. Hymæram. Hanc Con-'cilio Trid. dedicavit. Mediatorem. Fricium. Dialogos 'Lat. & Polonicè. Fidelem ſubditum. Orationes de notis 'Eccleſiæ. Exequias Tarnovii. Geſta ſui temporis, id eſt 'regnantibus apud nos Sigiſmundo Seniore & Auguſto 'F. ſuo. *Panegyrim nuptiarum ejuſdem Regis Auguſti. 'Panegyrim nuptiarum Jo. Tarnovii Exercituum Gene-'ralis. Orationem pro dignitate Sacerdotali. De præ-'ſtantia Legum Polonicarum. In obitum Sigiſmundi ſe-'nioris. Turcicas, ad Regem, Senatum, & Equites. Pro '& contra

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

& contrà Celibatum. Pro Ecclesia Christi, contra M. Lutherum præceptorem suum. Institutionem Principis. Apocalypsim suam, seu faciem perturbatæ & afflictæ Reipubl. ejusque restaurandæ rationem, quæ nuper Anno 1625, prodiit, edita in lucem à Nicolao Orichovio nepote suo. Epistolas familiares quoque scripsit, sed harum pars maxima adhuc in obscuro est ut & Liber de summa Regni. Audio & alia quædam de Repub. authographa ipsius à quibusdam privatim, cum nominis ejus forsan certè cum publicæ utilitatis jactura, detineri (8). - - - He wrote a great many things, as well on civil subjects, as in praise of our party; but principally in opposition to the adversaries of the Catholic religion; as for instance, the Quincunx, in Latin and Polish. The Apology for the Quincunx. A Confession of Faith. Hymæra; this he dedicated to the Council of Trent. The Mediator. Fricius. Dialogues in Latin and Polish. The Faithful Subject. Orations on the Marks of the Church. The Funeral Solemnities of Tarnovius. The History of his own Times, that is, during the reigns of our kings, Sigismund the elder, and Augustus his son. An Epithalamium on the Marriage of the same Augustus. An Epithalamium on the Marriage of John Tarnovius, General of the Army. An Oration on the Sacerdotal Dignity. On the Excellency of the Laws of Poland. On the death of Sigismund the elder. Turkish Letters to the King, to the Senate, and to the Knights, for and against Celibacy. A Defence of the Church of CHRIST against M. Luther his Master. The Institution of a Prince. His Apocalypse, or a Representation of the troubled and afflicted State of the Republic, and the manner of restoring it; which was lately published in the year 1625, by Nicolas Orichovius his nephew. He wrote also familiar Epistles, but the greatest part of these are still unpublished, as is also a book on the Sum and Substance of Government. I hear there are other manuscripts of his in private hands, perhaps to the detriment of his own fame; but certainly to that of the public.'

(8) Simon Starovolscius, in Elogiis centum Polonor. pag. 79. I suspect the pointing to be inaccurate throughout, and take Hymæram to be a mistake for Chimæram.

ORIGEN, one of the most copious writers, and one of the finest genius's that flourished in the primitive church, lived in the IIId century. He is mentioned so largely in Moreri's Dictionary, and so many authors are there pointed out (a) easily to be met with, who give his whole History, that I ought to be but short upon this article. I confine myself to these four things. I. I point out two French authors (b), who give us a full account of the actions and opinions of Origen. In the IId place, I say that a remark of Daillé upon Mr Cottibi's quoting St Origen, was attended with consequences which deserve to be known [A]. III. I observe, that

(a) Especially in the Dutch Edit.

(b) La Motte, The Lives of Tertullian and Origen, printed at Paris in 1675, in 8vo. Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. Tom. i, pag. 121, & seq; the Dutch Edit. 1690, in 4to. The Dutch Edit. of Moreri does not cite these two authors.

[A] A remark of Daillé upon . . . . St Origen, was attended with consequences which deserve to be known.] Mr Cottibi, minister of Poitiers, having changed his religion in 1660, wrote a letter to his Consistory, containing some reasons for his change. Daillé was desired to answer it, which he did with great accuracy. His answer was printed in 1660, with the letter of Mr Cottibi, under this title, Lettre escrite à Mr le Coq Sieur de la Talonniere sur le changement de Religion de Monsieur Cottiby. Among other things he observed, that the new convert, who had pretended to speak of the Fathers, and to cry up the Primitive Church, knew but very little of them. This he convicts him of by divers proofs; the second of which is taken from the epithet of Saint, which he had given to Origen. This language betrays him, and shews that he is stranger both in the Republic of Antiquaries, who never speak in that manner of a man condemned by an œcumenical council; and above all in the archives of the Popes, in which poor Origen was so far from obtaining the title of saint, that from the year 494, he has been there stiled Schismatic; and all his works, excepting a very few, were condemned by Gelasius †. It is not quite 200 years since, that Johannes Picus Mirandulanus, having published at Rome, among his nine hundred propositions, that it is more reasonable to believe Origen's salvation than his damnation, was thereupon reprimanded by the doctors of Divinity, who affirmed, that this conclusion is rash and blameworthy, that it favours of Heresy, and is contrary to the determination of the universal church; as we have it from himself in his Apology ‡. What would they not have done, if he had placed Origen among the saints, as Mr Cottiby has done? They who could not suffer him to doubt of his damnation, or to think that his salvation was more probable than his damnation (1). This is what we call a victorious criticism; and if we were not otherwise satisfied, that the minister of Poitiers knew nothing of the doctrine of the Fathers, but what he had acquired by reading some books of controversy; this very remark of Daillé would convince us of it. Let us continue the history of this censure, we shall learn from hence that an author discovered in an error, and manifestly convicted of being mistaken, can take no wiser course than frankly to own it, or at least to say nothing; for the efforts he makes to justify himself, are almost always down-right extravagances. Mr Cottibi replied, that perhaps the title of Saint was not in the original of his letter, or that with a stroke of his pen he might let it pass in the croud, Origen being placed among many other antient Fathers, to whom the epithet of Saint is really due (2). Here are two evasions which were invincibly refuted. Daillé maintained, that the words Saint Origen, stood in the author's original manuscript, and proved that they could not slip in by oversight. Who will believe, says Mr Daillé (3), that he did not copy over fair, and revise oftner than once, a letter written to a consistory, the religion and ministry which he had abandoned? A letter in which he undertook to persuade them to follow his example, which he knew must affect them both with grief and indignation? A letter, which, of consequence, he could not doubt, would be narrowly examined by persons provoked and angry with him? Certainly, he either has not common sense, or he has carefully polished and corrected this letter, and revised the copy several times before he sent it, in order to let nothing pass, which might furnish matter of derision to his enemies, or of disgust to his friends. And yet, after all this, Saint Origen stands in the letter, such as he sent, and such as we saw. Assuredly the author was not apprised that this was not Origen's lawful title. Had he been so, he would have dashed it out of his letter: and if he could not find out a secret, that is so common among those who are no strangers in Antiquity, I cannot see how I can trust the promises he made me, &c. The sequel of Mr Cottibi's Apology is yet worse, for he falls into the common place of the hatred that Ministers bear to the saints, and says a hundred things quite foreign to the purpose, as appears from the following passage. 'But, 'as the Ministers seem hired to make war upon the 'saints, so you thought it your duty to attack this 'one, tho' he had only the out-side and appearance of 'saintship; for to appear in that habit, and bear that 'name, is enough to expose one to your attacks. If 'you dispute this glorious title with those who have 'highly merited it, and whose praises are sung by the 'church every day, it is no wonder you could not 'bear it in a man to whom it never was formally given. 'So that I am in no danger of being surprized at your 'charge against me; for I find, in effect, it is highly 'your interest to oppose the augmentation of the 'number of saints: you very well foresee, that the 'more saints there are in Heaven, the more enemies 'will you have, and the more intercessors will the 'church have. I would only have those who make 'St Paul say ‡, The children of the Faithful are saints 'from their mothers womb, not to refuse this elogium 'to him who was the son of a father and mother, who 'were not only faithful, but Martyrs; and who, 'after suffering persecution himself, in his most tender 'youth, for the name of CHRIST, gave testimony 'of such pious and ardent desires to crown his first 'labours with the glory of martyrdom. That fine 'genius *, whose authority you respectfully make use 'of, had so much esteem for the wisdom of Socrates, that

(3) Daillé, Reply to Adam and Cottibi, Part iii, chap. ix, pag. 190.

† Conc. Rom. Gelas. Tom. 3, Concil. p. 662. col. 2. B. C.

‡ Joan. Pic. Apol. c. 7. p. 199.

(1) Daillé, Lettre à Monsr. le Coq, p. 70, 71.

(2) Cottibi, Reply to Daillé, pag. 221, 222.

‡ In the form of the administration of Baptism.

* Erasmus.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that a miniſter in Holland has lately made a very ſolid obſervation upon one of

'that, every time he thought of that great man, he 'was very near crying out in his tranſports, St Socrates, 'pray for us. It would not therefore be an unpardon- 'able ſin in me, if my ſoul ſhould be touched with the 'veneration of the virtues of a Chriſtian, which are 'rendered precious by the Goſpel; ſince the eyes of 'your friend were dazzled by the actions of a Pagan, 'which, after all, were no more than ſhining ſins ††: 'If ſome have found ſpots in the ſun, I think it not 'ſtrange that this doctor had his; and I ſhall not un- 'dertake his apology, ſince ſentence has been pronounced 'againſt him by councils. However, I ſhall ſay with 'that noble writer ‡‡, who offered to defend him 'publickly at Rome, at twenty-four years of age, 'that Origen was above ſixty before he determined his 'opinions in his writings, and he might have enter- 'tained errors without the imputation of hereſy, as 'having never obſtinately retained them, nor rebel- 'liouſly defended them, ſince they were not con- 'demned till after his death; and even he himſelf 'had repented of them before he died. It is in vain 'therefore that you ſtrive to raiſe up againſt me all the 'doctors of Divinity: that young count gives me en- 'couragement, who informs me, that he had the 'Pope on his ſide §§, with a great number of the 'members of the Apoſtolical ſenate, while ſome en- 'vious heads muttered againſt his propoſitions. But 'at the worſt; if I were to incur the diſpleaſure of the 'holy Conclave, by your intereſt and ſollicitations, I 'had much rather it ſhould be, for innocently putting 'an extraordinary doctor in the catalogue of ſaints, 'without their approbation, or conſent, than for op- 'poſing, as you do, the glory of thoſe whom they 'have canonized, and endeavouring, by the moſt 'enormous ſacrilege, to raze their names both out of 'the calendar of the church, and out of the memory 'of men (4).' All this deſerved no other anſwer than what follows. Teach him (5) what difference there is in the ſtile of the Romiſh court and church, between a conſiſtory and a conclave. This is a pardonable fault in a novice. The miſchief is, that in all theſe wild digreſſions, into which he rambles out of the road of our diſpute, he can find no ſort of proof that men learned in Antiquity ever call Origen a ſaint.

†† St Auguſt. ſpeculida peccata.

‡‡ Joann. Picus Mirandulæ Comes, in Apolog. Conc. 7.

§§ Summi Pontificis & ex Apoſtolico Senatu conſiphurium judicio contentus, videbar facile & odium poſſe negligere, & convicia hominum improborum. In Præfat. Apol.

(4) Cottibi, ubi ſupra, pag. 222, & ſeq.

(5) Daillé, addreſſing himſelf to Father Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 191.

Father Adam reſolved to enter the liſts upon this article, in the defence of Cottibi, and performed it ſo ſorrily, that more impertinent ſophiſtical turns were, perhaps, never ſeen. The paſſage I am going to quote is pretty long, but becauſe it contains ſome facts relating to the hiſtory of Origen, and beſides may ſerve for a remedy to thoſe writers who are apt to write at random, I ſhall give it you entire. Daillé, addreſſing himſelf to the Jeſuit, John Adam, ſpeaks thus (6).

(6) Daillé, ibid.

'Finding this a ſlippery place (7), you do not care to 'keep in it; and as you are as bold and reſolute as 'any man can be in your coat, you quit that incon- 'venient poſt and fall foul upon me, according to 'your wonted ſtrain, charging me  with ignorance, 'and a magiſterial boldneſs that is only a ſwelling, and 'not real knowledge and good plight. Then † deſiring 'me to weigh what you are going to ſay, you give 'me a lecture upon the difference between the perſons 'who err, and their errors, bringing in St Auguſtin 'and St Jerom, Janſenius and St Cyran, and their o- 'pinons. Then you fall upon Origen, and the errors 'of which he was ſuſpected, particularly Arianiſm; 'from which you ſay St Athanaſius vindicated him. In 'the next place ‖ you praiſe the incomparable inno- 'cence of his youth, his chaſtity, his zeal: you ſay ‡ 'that, if I have read Hiſtory, I muſt know, that 'when he ſaw martyrs carried out to execution, he went 'out of his houſe, and, falling upon his knees before 'the executioners, conjured them to behead him with the 'other Chriſtians. You alſo ſay, I know very well, 'that he filled the world with his works; that his 'father and his mother were martyrs, and that oftentimes his mother, drawing the curtain of his bed, as he 'lay aſleep, kiſſed her ſon's breaſt with theſe words, 'I kiſs the temple of the Holy Ghoſt. You mention St 'Gregory of Neocæſarea, Chryſoſtom, and Baſil, who 'had a great eſteem for him: (I ſuffer Chryſoſtom, 'tho' junior to St Baſil, to take place of him, to ſhew 'you I am not ſo cenſorious as you repreſent me.) 'You aſk me what proof I can give that this great 'man died without repentance, and trump up an 'old ſtory, in order to confute that opinion. This is

(7) That is, the ſuppoſition that Mr Cottibi had uſed an equivocal expreſſion.

 Ad. p. 267.

† Ibid. pag. 268.

‖ Pag. 269.

‡ Pag. 270.

'the abſtract of your diſpute upon Origen. In regard to 'which I ſhall obſerve to you in the firſt place, that 'you do me wrong in imputing to me the knowledge 'of his entreating the executioners to cut off his head. 'This is what I knew nothing of, having read no 'ſuch thing in Euſebius *, who, in his ſixth book, 'gives the hiſtory of Origen at large. You charge 'me again with equal injuſtice, with knowing that 'his mother kiſſed his breaſt while he lay aſleep. I 'have learned indeed from Euſebius, that Leonidas, his 'father, did ſometimes carreſs him after that rate in 'his infancy, kiſſing his breaſt with reſpect, as being 'a ſanctuary conſecrated to the holy Spirit, and that 'he called himſelf happy for having ſuch a wonderful 'child. I do not doubt but you have met with 'theſe ſtories exactly as you relate them, in the ſame 'author who taught you that Athanaſius was once 'highly eſteemed and commended by the Arians. But 'the moſt cruel injury you have done me, is, that to 'gain an opportunity of venting theſe common places 'and hiſtories, you charge me †† with believing, and 'affirming for a certain truth, that Origen is damned. 'You make the errors of his doctrine, ſay you ‡‡ to me, 'to affect his perſon, and ſpeak of his damnation, as if 'you had been in Hell beforehand, and had found Origen 'there: and two pages lower §§, I cannot bear, ſay 'you, that you ſhould take part with thoſe who maintain 'that Origen is damned; and at the end of the chapter, 'you have embraced, ſay you, the opinion of thoſe who 'hold that Origen is damned. But to wave theſe ſallies 'of your paſſion, who told you that I hold that Origen 'is damned? Where have I declared that to be my 'opinion? God forbid that ſuch an unjuſt preſump- 'tion ſhould ever enter into my mind. I leave to the 'Almighty his own ſecrets, and am not ſo raſh as to 'take the liberty to determine what no man can know 'with a certainty of faith. But, to conclude, if it is 'lawful for us to judge of things by appearances, I 'believe of Origen what I wiſh, that God, whoſe 'mercies are infinite, has pardoned his errors, and 'not ſuffered to periſh, among unbelievers, a veſſel 'which he had adorned with ſo many admirable gifts, 'and whoſe genuine works, ſo much as we have left of 'them, breathe only an extraordinary faith and piety; 'the very errors with which they are ſometimes 'ſtained, (for that is undeniable) being always accom- 'panied with a raviſhing modeſty and humility; not 'to ſpeak of his virtues, and the purity of his life. 'This is my opinion, and I never entertained any 'other; and thoſe who are intimately acquainted with 'me, know to what degree I have always admired 'that great and incomparable genius; and what I 'have wrote in ſome paſſages of my little works may 'give teſtimony of it. If I have related what the 'count of Mirandola wrote , that the Divines of 'Rome would not ſuffer his damnation to be doubted 'of, it is manifeſt I did it only to ſhew, how far the 'doctors, whoſe communion Mr Cottibi has em- 'braced, are from calling him a Saint. This is by 'no means out of any approbation of their inhuman 'preſumption. If I took notice of the title of 'Saint, given him by Mr Cottibi, I did it only to 'ſhew his ignorance in matters of antiquity, and in 'the way of ſpeaking uſual among thoſe who are 'verſed in it. I did not accuſe him upon that head 'of offending againſt faith or good manners. The 'ignorance of Antiquity is not incompatible with 'either the one or the other: I allow him, with all my 'heart, to entertain as advantageous ſentiments of 'Origen, as he pleaſes. But the laws of your 'church, and thoſe of its ſtyle, and the common 'and notorious cuſtom of all the learned, that is to 'ſay, the ſovereign law of their language, not 'permitting him to ſay Saint Origen, whatſoever 'opinion he has of his perſon, he cannot ſpeak in 'this manner without betraying the ignorance which 'I have laid to his charge.'

* Euſeb. Hiſt. lib. vi, cap. ii, pag. 203, A.

†† Ad. p. 267.

‡‡ Ad. p. 269.

§§ Pag. 271.

 L. à M. de la Tal, pag. 70, 71.

We meet with a thouſand examples of this nature in Polemical writings; and, as I have ſaid already, oftner than once, it would not be amiſs to make a collection of them. This might be of uſe to check the liberty which ſome authors take in ſtraggling to the right and left from the ſtate of the queſtion. I cannot tell whether any other example can equal this in the multitude of digreſſions.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of Origen's opinions [B]. If the author o

[B] A minister . . . has made a very solid observation upon one of Origen's opinions.] Before I recite the words of the minister, I shall first give you a copy of those of his adversary, which gave occasion to his reflexion. It is a considerable fault to compare the opinion of Origen, concerning the non-eternity of punishments, with the doctrine of the Socinians upon that article. Origen did not deny the immortality of the soul, and never taught that the wicked should perish, body and soul, after death. Origen's error is dangerous, but at least it has no impiety in it; but the Socinian opinion is the Epicurean impiety (8). Now the censure of this passage is as followeth. ' (9) There is more ' danger, as to Morality, in saying, the reprobate ' shall be one day saved, than in saying, they shall ' be annihilated. Origen has put the devils and the ' damned almost in the same class, where the Papists ' put the faithful and the regenerate, who die ' under the guilt of a great number of venial sins, ' and have not wherewithal to procure masses for ' shortening or mitigating their punishment in pur- ' gatory; the fire of which differs from that of ' Hell only in the duration. So that the Libertines ' who continue to death in their Libertinism and ' crimes, may, according to Origen's Theology, ' have very nearly the same hopes and the same ' fears, which the best Catholics have, according ' to the doctrine of their Priests and Monks. Time ' is nothing in comparison to eternity. A temporal ' Hell can never be made to balance an eternal Para- ' dise. It is true, present evils deface the idea of fu- ' ture good in the minds of worldly people; and the ' sense of the former is commonly stronger and live- ' lier, than the desire and hope of the latter. But ' this proceeds from the folly and corruption of men, ' and not from the nature of the objects. Besides, ' we must know, that future evils are considered al- ' most after the same manner with future good; that ' is, heedless and brutish people are scarce touched ei- ' ther by the one or the other: but the wise and re- ' flecting part of mankind take a nearer view of the ' pains and joys of the other life, and form to them- ' selves a just idea of them. The consequence of ' which is, that the former will not be more frighted ' by the hell or purgatory with which Origen threat- ' ens them, than they will be encouraged and com- ' forted by the end of their torments, and the en- ' joyment of an eternal beatitude in paradise, which ' this doctor gives them room to expect: and, that, ' on the other hand, those who have more serious and ' penetrating thoughts, will judge of future ease and ' torment by their duration, and will readily resolve ' to pass through some ages of uneasiness, if they are ' assured to find, after that, an eternity of happiness and ' infinite pleasure. As for the doctrine of the Soci- ' nians, it gives no other consolation to hardened sin- ' ners, beside their annihilation. But such is the ' make of men, that they had rather be unhappy and ' happy successively, than not to be at all. And ac- ' cording to the rule of right reason, there is an in- ' finitely greater advantage in being eternally gratified ' with happiness, after suffering some time, than in ' returning into nothing, and seeing one's self depriv- ' ed for ever of an infinite beatitude, the possession of ' which might be insured, and is only lost by negli- ' gence . . . . (10) Origen's error may inspire some ' with a contempt of repentance, and that of the So- ' cinians may retain others in impiety. However ' both the one and the other is very pernicious: and ' it is making use of false weights, and false measures, ' and a too visible respect of persons, to say, that ' Origen's error, though dangerous, has nothing of ' impiety in it; but that the Socinian error is the ' Epicurean impiety. Had Origen annihilated the ' reprobate after a long purgatory, his Theology had ' indulged impenitent sinners less than that of the So- ' cinians, who annihilate them without making them ' undergo any considerable punishment (11). But the ' paradise which he promises them at the end of their ' hell, and which will render them for ever like to ' the apostles, the martyrs, and the greatest saints, is ' a powerful counterpoise against the terror of a pu- ' nishment, which is to be succeeded by eternal joy ' and felicity.'

(8) Jurieu, apud Saurin, ubi infra.

(9) Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 688.

(10) Saurin, ibid. pag. 690.

(11) Mr Saurin seems to agree with what his adversary advances, that the Socinians teach, that the souls of wicked men are annihilated at the very moment of their death. But the doctrine of that sect is otherwise related below, citation (18). But it is true Mr Saurin expresses himself after such a manner, as may import that he does not impute that to this sect.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google use of it [C], he would have greatly enforced one of his objections. IV. That there are a great many Divines in the Romish communion who believe that this Father is in Hell [D].

Since

'the Arian heresy not to be so. Who would dare to place 'Arnobius in hell, for believing that the souls of the 'wicked are at last consumed by the fires in which they 'are punished.' You see he observes, that Origen's doctrine confines the divine justice more than that of the Socinians, in regard the latter end the punishment with an act of severity, namely, the annihilation of the sinner; whereas Origen makes it terminate in an act of sovereign bounty, namely, the transportation of the damned spirits to the enjoyment of sovereign bliss: You see, I say, that he observes this difference; but he does not lay it open with so much accuracy as Mr Saurin has done. Besides, he starts an objection to himself, which he might have overthrown by Mr Saurin's remark, and yet has given it a quite different answer. He supposes (14), it will be objected to him, that the denial of the Trinity is not so pernicious to the common-wealth, as the denial of the eternity of future torments; and contents himself with answering, that we must not judge by that rule whether an heresy is fundamental or not; for otherwise it might be alledged, that the grossest and most scandalous errors would be but a trifle, provided they were but proper to keep the subject in obedience (15). This is all the answer he gives. He has forgot the best part of the reply to this objection; he has not said, that Origen's opinion is more pernicious to the common-wealth, than that of the Socinians: Origen's opinion, I say, which Mr. Jurieu looks upon as an error very excuseable (16). Had Larebonius thought of Mr Saurin's reflexion, he would have charged home upon his adversary. Let us recite one passage more of the Utrecht pastor. 'Mr Jurieu would fain excuse the errors of 'Origen, by reason of his great zeal; but if any one 'should at this time of day undertake to broach the whims 'of that antient author, Mr Jurieu would not think 'himself obliged to allow him any toleration. If these 'whims are heresies and instances of impiety, which 'change Hell into a purgatory, and by that means 'annihilate the fear of eternal punishments, and the 'fear of GOD, why should they be countenanced in 'Origen? Where is that doctor's great zeal if he 'was an heretic, and a teacher of heresy? If these 'errors were not fundamental in Origen, and in the 'third century, by what contrivance are they be'come fundamental in the seventeenth Century, and 'in the modern doctors? We shall see presently that 'there is a difference between Origen's opinion, and 'that of the Socinians, with reference to the pains of 'Hell; and that this difference, which Mr Jurieu 'would turn in favour of Origen, is altogether against 'him (17).'

(14) Ib. p. 97.

(15) Aliquin mutatis vicibus pro innocuis deberemus habere errores non paucos crassissimos atque fœdissimos, unde multum emolumenti capit Respublica, in multas perturbationes cæcura per introductionem quarumdam veritatum. Ibid.

(16) See Saurin, ubi supra, pag. 682.

If the author of Janua Cælorum has not made use of his advantages; so Mr Saurin, on the other hand, has suffered two gross faults to pass uncensured in his adversary: One is, in charging the Socinians with teaching, that the soul dies with the body; and the other, in affirming their doctrine of the destruction of the soul to be the Epicurean impiety. The first of these faults is a lie, or rather a calumny (18). The second is an inexcuseable ignorance. The Socinian sect do not teach that the wicked shall suffer nothing after death: they only say, that their torments will at last terminate in the annihilation of their souls. And, granting there were some Socinian authors (19), who taught the annihilation of the soul immediately upon its quitting the body, his doctrine would not be the same with that of Epicurus; for that Philosopher believed, on the one hand, that the Gods had no concern either in the life or death of men; and, on the other, that the soul dies with the body, as consisting only in a certain mixture of atoms. Now, the Socinians we are speaking of, on the contrary, would maintain, that the souls of the wicked are naturally immortal, and that they only cease to be, because GOD, in punishment of their crimes, annihilates them. The Divines who are most orthodox with respect to the nature of the soul, agree, that GOD can annihilate it every moment. Here take notice, that it is an indispensable rule of natural equity, not to impute to a sect the opinions of some particular persons.

(17) Saurin, ibid. pag. 683, 684.

(18) The author was advertised of it in 1690, in the Avis sur le Tableau du Socinianisme, pag. 44.

(19) There are some such.

[D] There are a great many Divines in the Romish communion, who believe that Origen is in Hell.] We have already seen the complaints which were made against Picus Mirandula, for maintaining the contrary sentiment: The Jesuit Stephen Binet publishing a book at Paris in 1629, concerning the salvation of Origen, durst not take the affirmative side without trembling. He examines the matter in the form of a rehearing of his trial. He produces the witnesses, and pleaders pro and con, and intermixes the conclusions of the king of Heaven's counsel. At last he pronounces this judgment. Considering all that has been said on the one side and on the other, together with the conclusions of the king of Heaven's counsel, it is decreed, that the affair be left to GOD's secret determination, to whom the definitive sentence is reserved. Nevertheless, by provision, and for the benefit of Origen, it is judged, upon the balance of the whole, that the proofs of his salvation are stronger and more conclusive than those of his damnation; and therefore his salvation is more probable than his damnation (20). The witnesses he produces for Origen, are, James Merlin (21), and Erasmus (22). The advocates whom he makes to plead for that Father, are Genebrard (23), and John Picus of Mirandula (24). After that, Cardinal Baronius (25), in the name of Cardinal Bellarmin and all Origen's accusers, harangues the judges, demanding sentence against the person accused, whose heresies and crimes he enumerates. Some of his heresies are these. 1. That souls had sinned before they entered the body (26). 2. That after the resurrection, the bodies of the saints would become round and luminous like the sun (27). 3. That the sun, the moon, and the stars are living. 4. That at the day of judgment the guardian angels will be chastised, if they have not well performed their duty in guarding the men committed to the care of their charity (28). 5. That before the creation of this world there were several others, and when this should be reduced to dust, several would be created one after another (29). 6. That the stars are books in which may be read the good fortune of mankind, that the angels by them calculate the nativity of men, and learn their fortune, and that they have taught men part of that judicial Astrology, in order to calculate nativities, but without restraining free-will or doing any violence to liberty (30). 7. That the earth is a large animal capable of good and evil (31), and in consequence, worthy of reward or punishment; whence it is that GOD blesses or curses it, according as it behaves itself well or ill, and renders it self capable of the one or the other (32). 8. 'That after the day 'of judgment the women will be transformed into 'men, and the human bodies into very pure souls, 'and that there will be then no more men with 'glorified bodies; but that all will be pure spirits 'like the angels in Heaven.' Baronius's chief reason is this (33): 'The general council did not content it'self, as usual, with condemning his doctrine, but 'proceeded so far as even to condemn his person, 'thundering an anathema against him personally, and 'condemning him by name *, these are the words of 'the holy council. The emperor having required, ut 'cum erroribus suis autor ipse Origenes damnaretur, - - - 'that Origen might be condemned together with his er'rors. The holy council, † after mature consideration 'of the affair, and invocation of the assistance of the 'Holy Ghost, did, in fine, pronounce these words, 'or rather these claps of thunder. In the first place, 'it ‡ discharged ten anathemas against the venemous doctrine of Origen; and then going farther 'pronounced, Anathema etiam ipsi Origeni qui dicitur 'Adamantius, - - - cursed be Origen himself who is called 'Adamantius. They added this last word on purpose, lest the world should mistake, as if they spoke 'of the other Origen, and not of the true Origen, 'whom they covered with anathemas as a reprobated, 'condemned, and damned person.' Let us see a specimen of the eloquence of that time. Binet supposes, that Baronius making use of a vision which is related in the Pratum Spirituale, spoke after this manner (34): Must we at last come to this extremity, that I should be forced to open Hell, and shew you that Origen is there, otherwise you will not believe it? Is it not enough that I have shewn you his guilt, his miserable death, his sentence of condemnation pronounced by the Emperors, by the Popes, by the Saints, and

(20) Stephen Binet, of the Salvation of Origen, pag. 468.

(21) In Præfat. ad Originem, ann. 1512.

(22) In Vita Origenis.

(23) In Origen.

(24) Apologia, Q. VII, de Salute Origenis.

(25) Binet, pag. 155, cites him, Annal. Tom. iii, ann. 533, &c.

(26) Binet, pag. 158, ex S. Leone Epist. decret. 11.

(27) Ib. pag. 160, & seq. ex Niceph. lib. xvii, cap. xxvii. Præf. in Conc. v, Constantinop.

(28) Orig. Hom. 20, in num. apud Binet. pag. 166.

(29) Orig. in cap. i, Eccl. ex Methodio & Genebr. apud Binet. pag. 168.

(30) Orig. in Genes. Philocal. cap. xxv, apud Binet. pag. 168.

(31) Compare, with the above, remark [D], of the article KEPLER.

(32) Orig. Hom. 4, in Ezech. apud Binet. ibid.

(33) Binet, pag. 191.

* Baron. an. 400. an. 538. an. 553.

† 5. Synod.

‡ Niceph. lib. xvii, cap. xxvii, xxviii. Sur. 11. Janu. Cedren. in Annal. Cassiod. I, div. inst. Prat. spirit. cap. xxvi, Baron. an. 532.

(34) Binet, pag. 195, & seq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Since the first edition of this Dictionary two pieces have been published, which oblige me to make some additions to this article. One of them, under the title of Parrhasiana, was published at Amsterdam in 1699, by a learned person who disguises himself by the name of Theodorus Parrhasius. The other was printed at Paris in 1700, and intituled, Histoire des Mouvemens, &c. That is, The History of the Commotions which have happened in the church on account of Origen and his doctrine. Father Doucin, a Jesuit, is the author of the latter. In the Parrhasiana we meet with some reflexions upon the controversy between the Manichees and the Orthodox. They are ushered in with an observation which is as agreeable as could be expected from a very honest man (c). They are ushered in, I say, with a judgment every way agreeable to equity, truth, and reason, with reference to the views with which I took the liberty to state the objections of the Manichees, and to own that natural light is not sufficient to enable Christians to resolve them, whether they follow St Austin's system, or that of Molina and the Remonstrants, or have recourse to that of the Socinians. Theodorus Parrhasius maintains the contrary, and pretends (d), that an Origenist may stop the mouth of the Manichees . . . . If a man of this character, continues he, can put a Manichee to silence, what would not they do, who should reason infinitely better than the disciples of Origen? We shall examine below, what he supposes an Origenist could say, after having considered all the objections of the Manichees [E]. As (c) Parrhasiana, pag. 302.

(d) Ibid. pag. 304.

and by the fifth general council, besides others, and as it were by the mouth of God himself? But since it remains only to descend to Hell, to give you a sight of this reprobate, this damned Origen: Let us go, gentlemen, I am content to do it, to run the matter to the last conclusion: let us go, in God's name to Hell, to see whether he is there or not, and so give the last decision of the point. The fifth general council † has cited a book, and by citing it has authorized it, as a book proper to furnish good and effectual arguments for confirming the decisions of the council upon the article of Images. And why should not we make use of it after the council, to determine this question, which is already otherwise but too plain and evident? There it is said, that a good man, under great concern for the salvation of Origen's soul, did, after some ardent prayers of a holy old man, manifestly see a sort of Hell laid open to him, where he distinguished and knew the Heresiarchs, who were all called over before him by their names, and in the midst of these he saw Origen, who was damned among the rest, and covered with horror, flames, and confusion. Now let us insert part of the answer which was made to this objection. ' Does the church ' ground her canons upon the visions of a hermit; ' she who teaches, that the visions of private per- ' sons lay no obligation upon any one to believe them, ' and that articles of faith are never founded upon ' such visions? So that I admit, the Pratum Spiri- ' tuale tells us, a good honest Abbot saw Origen in ' Hell; but is he the first who has been mistaken? ' What Origen does he speak of, our Origen, or the ' other infamous Origen? And of what authority is ' this book, the Pratum Spirituale? Let us put the case, ' that the seventh general council quoted it for some ' particular purpose, as upon the article of Images, ' does that imply that they rendered it canonical as to ' every thing that is in it: and how many simple ' things, are there in that little book, which appear ' ridiculous and incredible to the wiser part of man- ' kind (35)?' Just one word more: Here the vision of a simple Abbot is alledged, and I alledge the vision of a great Saint, called Mechtildis , to whom God revealed that he would not let the world know what was become of Samson, Solomon, and Origen, in order to strike the greatest terror into the strongest, the wisest, and the most learned, men of this world, by keeping them in suspence and uncertainty (36).

† Baron. an. 432, Mosch. in Prat. cap. xxvi.

(35) Binet, pag. 129.

 Lib. vitæ S. Mecht. Edit. an. 1627.

(36) Binet, pag. 219.

Note, That Robert de Corceone, an English Cardinal who flourished in the beginning of the XIIIth century, wrote a book upon the question of Origen's salvation. Bale speaks of it.

[E] We shall examine . . . . what he supposes an Origenist could say, after having considered all the objections of the Manichees.] Though the arguments he puts into the Origenist's mouth are short and close, yet I imagine, I shall preserve their full force in reducing them to these three propositions. 1. God ' has made us ' free, to make room for virtue and vice, for praise ' and reproach, for reward and punishment (37).' 2. He damns nobody purely for having sinned, but for not having repented (38). 3. The physical and moral evils of mankind, are of so short a duration, in comparison to eternity, that they cannot hinder us from esteeming God as beneficent, and as a friend to virtue (39). It is in this last proposition that the whole force of the Origenist consists, and the reason is this: he supposes that the torments of Hell are not of eternal duration; and that God, after judging that free creatures have suffered enough, will render them eternally happy (40). The eternal happiness which will be bestowed upon them, fills up the idea of infinite mercy, tho' preceded by several ages of sufferings; for several are nothing in comparison with infinite duration; and there is infinitely less proportion between the time of the duration of this earth and eternity, than there is between a minute and a hundred millions of Years (41) . . . ' Among men, those who have the care of a child ' that is ill, and who cure him by a bitter remedy, ' only smile at the complaints he makes of this bitter- ' ness, because they know it will be tasted but a very ' little time, and that the remedy will do him good. ' There is an infinitely greater disproportion between ' God and the most knowing men, than there is be- ' tween these and the simplest children. So that we ' cannot reasonably think it strange that God looks ' upon the evils we suffer as almost nothing: he, who ' alone has a compleat idea of eternity, and looks upon ' the beginning and end of our sufferings as infinitely ' nearer, than the beginning and end of a minute. ' After the same manner ought we to reason about ' vices and vicious actions; which, with respect to ' God, are of short duration, and at the bottom, ' cause no change in the universe. If a Clock- ' maker should make a clock, which being once ' wound up, would go very well for a whole year, ' abating two or three seconds, which might not be ' exactly equal on its first setting out; could any one ' say, that this workman should not pretend to skill ' and exactness in his workmanship? In like manner, if ' God does one day, for all eternity, redress the dis- ' orders which the ill use of liberty shall have caused ' among men, can we think it strange that he suffers ' them to continue, during the moment that we shall ' continue here on earth (42).'

(37) Parrhasiana, pag. 306.

(38) Ib. p. 307.

(39) Ib. p. 308.

(40) Ib. p. 312.

(41) Ib. p. 309.

(42) Ib. pag. 310, 311.

Let us see what a Manichee might answer to this discourse of an Origenist.

I. The first thing he might say is, that we do not find in our minds the idea of two sorts of goodness; one of which consists in making a present, whose bad effects are foreseen, without preventing them, though that is in the power of the giver; the other, in granting a favour of such a nature as will always be advantageous to the receiver. It is needless to observe, that by the idea of goodness we do not understand an imperfect sort of goodness, such as we meet with in the heart of a sinner; but a goodness which in a logical abstracted sense is clear of all failure. This ideal goodness is not a genus containing under it the two species just now described. Its essential and distinguishing attribute is so to dispose its subject as to bestow favours, which by the shortest and surest means it can make use of, may render the condition of the receiver happy. This ideal goodness essentially and necessarily excludes all that can suit with a malicious being. Now it is certain that such a being would readily incline to dispense

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As for Father Doucin's book, I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying that it contains a large and curious diſcuſſion of the ſubjects mentioned in the title, and alſo an epitome of the life of Origen. One cannot read it without deploring the extravagancies to which the human mind is ſubject. Origen's converſation and manners were admirably pure:

diſpenſe favours, the uſe of which it knew would prove fatal to thoſe who ſhould receive them. We read of a certain Roman who preſented very fine cloaths to thoſe whom he hated.

Eutrapelus, cuicunque nocere volebat,
Veſtimenta dabat pretioſa: beatus enim jam
Cum pulchris tunicis ſumet nova conſilia & ſpes:
Dormiet in lucem: ſcorto poſtponet honeſtum
Officium, nummos alienos paſcet: ad imum
Thrax erit, aut olitoris aget mercede caballum (43).

(43) Horat. Epiſt. XVIII, lib. I, ver. 31.

Eutrapelus, whene'er on miſchief bent,
A preſent of the richeſt garments ſent:
Fine cloaths will make the fop new meaſures take:
Change day for night: grow a conſummate rake:
Becomes the uſurers prey, then in deſpair
Turn Gladiator, or cry garden-ware.

Bad princes, who want a fair opportunity of gratifying their deſire to ruin ſome great lord, would gladly give him the government of a province, if they knew that by abuſing that truſt he would render himſelf moſt odious to all mankind, and moſt worthy of an exemplary puniſhment: But a romantic heroe formed for a model of royal perfection, a prince, I ſay, drawn after ideas even more exactly than Cyrus by Xenophon (44), will never lay a ſnare by his liberalities. When he diſpoſes of places, he pitches upon ſuch as are moſt ſuitable to thoſe he has a mind to gratify, and does not give them ſuch places as he apprehends they will miſmanage. He gives quickly, which is a character of goodneſs that multiplies the favour beſtowed (45). He does not oblige the ſuitors to long ſollicitations; this deſtroys the merit of the benefit (46), and is only ſuitable to ſuch an indifferent ſort of goodneſs as ſcarce deſerves to be diſtinguiſhed from unkindneſs. Thoſe who have given us the character of Cardinal Mazarin, have mentioned as a conſiderable foible, the cuſtom he had of ſpinning out the execution of his promiſes to ſuch a length of time, that all the pleaſure was waſted in the expectation, and his favours were all cancelled by the application which was neceſſary, in order to extort them. Promiſſis largus, quibus multoties non ſtetit; aut ſi implevit faſtidio & mora diu libratum beneficium improbe extortum elumbavit, longo voto conſumens gaudia (47). Had they deſigned his panegyric, and meant to flatter his memory with the character of a conſummate liberality, they would have ſaid, that his readineſs to oblige prevented ſollicitations, and ſpared his clients the trouble of aſking. Illud atque in vulgus, principem obiiſſe .... liberalem in primis, & qui raro exemplo hujus ævi preces anteverteret, ut conſuleret accipientium pudori (48). A panegyriſt that means to keep cloſe to ideal perfection, in order to attribute it to his heroes, would not fail to preſerve in the character their liberality, an inſeparable connection between beſtowing the art of making good uſe of a favour, and granting the favour itſelf.

Thus we ſee what are the properties of ideal goodneſs, what it excludes, what it includes. Now, if we conſider this idea of goodneſs, we do not find that God, who is a principle of infinitely good, could put off the felicity of his creatures till the termination of ſeveral ages of miſery (49), or beſtow upon them a free will, which he was very ſure they would uſe to their own deſtruction. Had they deſired any ſuch preſent of him, he could not have granted it without contradicting his own eſſence. And much leſs could he give it, when it was not aſked. Would they have willingly taken it, if they had been aſked the queſtion? And if they had known the conſequence of it, would they not rather have cried out (50).

May ſuch kind preſents fall to thoſe we hate.

But if the infinite goodneſs of the Creator did permit him to endow his creatures with a liberty, of which they might make a bad as well as good uſe, we muſt at leaſt ſay, that it would engage him to watch their ſteps in ſuch a manner, as not to ſuffer them to be guilty of actual ſin. His infinite love for virtue, his infinite hatred for vice, in a word, his ſanctity, would unite its intereſts with thoſe of his goodneſs, and by the concurrence of thoſe two divine attributes, the bad uſe of free-will would be diverted as often as it ſhould be ready to appear. Thoſe fathers who cannot refuſe their children to go all alone, or to clime a ladder, or to mount a horſe, when it is viſible they will fall, if they are not taken care of, never fail to give ſuch orders, that which way ſoever they reel they may always find a ſupport. If a finite goodneſs, a goodneſs which cannot inviſibly communicate its aſſiſtance to the faculties of a little child, does always prevent the child's falling, when it can, or hinder its wounding himſelf with a knife which muſt be given him to prevent his crying; how much more ought we to be perſuaded that God would have hindered the ill uſe of Free-will; he who is infinitely good, infinitely holy, and can infallibly incline his creature towards good, without violating the privileges of liberty (51). Such is the anſwer that a Manichee might give to an Origeniſt, upon the firſt of theſe propoſitions laid down above. It is eaſy to apprehend, without my mentioning it, that he would ſometimes make uſe of what are called Argumenta ad hominem.

(51) See, above, remark [G] of the article MANICHEE.

As for the reaſon alledged by the Origeniſt, that there is a neceſſity of allowing the creature free-will in order to make room for virtue and vice, for praiſe and reproach, for reward and puniſhment: it might be very eaſily and effectually refuted. It would ſuffice to reply, that ſuch a reaſon is ſo far from obliging a being infinitely holy and infinitely liberal, to grant free-will to creatures, that, on the contrary, it ought to divert him from it. Vice and reproach ought to have no place in the works of a cauſe infinitely holy; all the avenues to them ought to be ſtopped, all ought to be laudable; virtue ought to fortify every poſt in ſuch a manner, that her adverſary might never be able to make any invaſion. And as all ought to be happy under the empire of a ſovereign Being infinitely good and infinitely powerful; ſo pains or troubles ought to have no place in the ſame. In travelling thro' this vaſt empire, we ought to meet with no valley of tears, no veſtibulum, ſuch as a great Poet has thus deſcribed.

Veſtibulum ante ipſum, primiſque in faucibus Orci,
Luctus, & ultrices poſuêre cubilia curæ:
Pallenteſque habitant morbi, triſtiſque ſenectus:
Et Metus, & maleſuada Fames, & turpis Egeſtas,
(Terribiles viſu formæ) Lethumque, Laborque:
Tum conſanguineus Lethi Sopor: & mala mentis
Gaudia, mortiferumque adverſo in limine Bellum:
Ferreique Eumenidum thalami; & diſcordia demens,
Vipereum crinem vittis innexa cruentis (52).

(52) Virgil. Æneid. lib. VI, ver. 273.

Juſt in the gate, and in the jaws of Hell,
Revengeful cares, and ſullen ſorrows dwell:
And pale diſeaſes, and repining age,
Want, fear, and famine's unreſiſted rage;
Here toils, and death, and death's half brother ſleep,
Forms terrible to view, their centry keep:
With anxious pleaſures of a guilty mind,
Deep frauds before, and open force behind:
The furies iron beds, and ſtrife that ſhakes
Her hiſſing treſſes, and unfolds her ſnakes.

Without paſſing through Places filled with horror, we ought at firſt ſetting out to fall in with the ſcenes of felicity.

Devenêre locos lætos, & amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum, ſedeſque beatas.
Largior hîc campos æther, & lumine veſtit
Purpureo: ſolemque ſuum, ſua ſidera norunt (53).

(53) Ibid. ver. 638.

(43) Bis dat qui cito dat.

(44) Cyrus ille a Xenophonte non ad hiſtoriæ fidem ſcriptus, ſed ad effigiem juſti imperii. Cicero, ad Quint. frat. Epiſt. I, lib. i, fol. m. 98, D.

(46) Gratia quæ tarda eſt, ingrata eſt; gratia namque Cum fieri properat, gratia grata magis. Auſon. Epigr. lxxxii. See likewiſe Epigr. lxxxiii; and the authors quoted in the commentary upon theſe words of Auſonius of the Amſterdam Edition 1671.

(47) Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, Annal., ſub fin. fol. m. 392.

(48) Famian. Strada, Prolus. II, lib. II, pag. m. 256. He ſpeaks of Leo X.

(49) This we ſhall touch upon in paragraph IV.

(50) Hoſtibus eveniant talia dona meis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google pure: his zeal for the gospel was ardent to the last degree. He ruined his health with

- - - - - - - - - They took their way,
Where long extended plains of pleasure lay.
The verdant fields with those of heaven may vye,
With Æther vested, and a purple sky:
The blissful seas of happy souls below,
Stars of their own, and their own suns they know.

Virtue, praise, and happiness, may very well exist, though vice, reproach, and punishment, have no other existence, than what we call ideal and objective. This the Origenist cannot deny, since he acknowledges an eternal felicity for all free creatures, which shall succeed after some ages of suffering. Virtue, praise, and benefits, will take place, during the infinite duration of that happiness; but vice, blame, and punishment, will there have no existence out of the intellect. If the Origenist replies, that these benefits would not be rewards, if the creatures had not been endowed with liberty; we shall answer, that there is no proportion between an eternal felicity and the good use man makes of his free-will; and for that reason the eternal happiness which God bestows upon a good man cannot be considered, properly speaking, as a reward; it is a favour, a free gift. So that, taking the terms in a strict sense, we cannot pretend that free-will was necessary to be given men, in order that they might merit the happiness of paradise, and obtain it as a reward. This might as well be said, if there were only a subordination between virtue and eternal happiness; that is a chain or connection of thoughts necessarily virtuous, in which happiness would be the consequent, and virtue the antecedent. Not to mention that the more eternal felicity were remote from the notion of reward, the more it would suit with the character of infinite Goodness.

II. The answer to the second proposition cannot stop us long. The Manichee would not fail to observe, that impenitence being nothing but the bad use of liberty, it is all one, whether you say that God condemns men for not repenting, or that he damns them purely for having sinned. I own, that, generally speaking, it has an appearance of mercy, to be ready to remit the punishment of those who are sorry for their fault: but when a promise of Pardon, upon condition of repenting, is made to those of whose impenitence we are well assured; this, properly speaking, is promising nothing, and the resolution to punish them is just as absolute as if no favour had been offered them: if you would in good earnest exempt them from punishment, you should hinder their impenitence, which is a very easy matter to him who has the command of their hearts. Here again Argumenta ad hominem.

III. As for the third proposition and its proofs, the Manichee might ask, in the first place, whether the Origenist would dare to determine the duration of the torments which precede the happy eternity. He would not venture the determining it, not only because he is ignorant of it, but also because he would be afraid to make it either too short or too long. If he made it too short, an hundred years, for instance, he would apprehend the being accused of giving a loose to sinners; and if he made it a million of years, he would dread the not having given a just idea of God's mercy, and the not having removed all the scandal of the pretended cruelty of the doctrine of hell. He can never trust therefore to the nullity of proportion between a million of ages, and an infinite duration; and the difficulty does not appear to be removed by saying, There is infinitely less proportion between the duration of the earth and eternity, than between a minute and a hundred millions of years. This may be equally affirmed of as many millions of ages as there are drops of water in the ocean. This number of ages multiplied as often as you will, is a finite thing, but there is no proportion between a finite and an infinite; and consequently there is none between eternity and any number of ages whatsoever. Yet, no body can forbear judging, that the Divine Justice would be less severe, if it put an end to the misery of the reprobate, in order to introduce them into paradise, at the termination of an hundred years, than if it did not make this change till after an hundred thousand ages. Take what pains you will, you can never satisfy reason, by telling it, that God will indeed be appeased at last, but not till the infernal punishments, such as they are usually described, shall have lasted as many millions of years, as there are drops of water in the sea. This number of years, which is nothing in comparison with eternity, appears nevertheless a very long duration, when considered by itself, and with respect to the person suffering. Let this proceed from what it will, whether it be that our reason is too dull to be deceived, or that there is really some source of illusion and sophism in the ideas of time: you can never beat it out of the head of a Philosopher, who reasons only philosophically, that the punishment of a creature continued for a hundred thousand million of ages is incompatible with the sovereign bounty of the Creator. We must suppose that an Origenist is sensible of this, and for that reason he would not venture to say, that the purgatory of the damned shall last so long. But see how a Manichee might, in my opinion, urge him. Since you think so long a punishment cruel, take half the time only, and if you find any thing else in that supposition, but a diminution of the severity, you impose upon yourself; for fifty millions of years differ only in the degree of more or less from a hundred thousand millions, and we can never rise from cruelty to infinite goodness, by a bare diminution of cruelty. Qualities in summo gradu (54), for instance, heat does absolutely exclude all the degrees of cold; and therefore goodness, in summo gradu, must needs exclude all degrees whatsoever of the opposite quality. You cannot therefore rise to the supreme goodness of God, but by abridging to the very last minute the punishments of hell. For what God can be for a moment, that he may be for two hours, and two ages, and through all eternity; but whatever would be incompatible with his nature in eternity, is always so in every instant of the duration of things. The qualities of a creature are susceptible of the degrees of more or less, and incapable of perfection; but we call them perfect, when their imperfection is not very sensible. We commend the exactness of a Clockmaker, if his pendulum does not err above two or three seconds in a year. But the exactness of an artificer infinitely perfect, absolutely excludes all exceptions; his holiness, his wisdom, &c. are absolutely simple, and without any mixture of contrary qualities: I say, without the least mixture which can be conceived, or which can possibly exist in the nature of things.

IV. The idea of this goodness excludes all the weakness which are commonly met with in the way of mens doing good to one another. Some take pleasure in delays (55), others cannot be serviceable without going about, and in spite of their own wills, are constrained to make those pass through evil, whom they mean to lead to good. Fathers who cannot correct the bad inclinations of a child without the lash of the rod, make his body feel the smart of it; but this they would by no means do, were they persuaded that a boundless complaisance would be a more effectual means of correction. They force him to swallow a medicine, which is intolerably bitter to the taste, and griping in the operation, but this they would not do, if they knew how to cure him otherwise. They would give sugar and every thing agreeable to the taste, if they thought they would prove a more certain remedy. The administring a disagreeable potion being unavoidable, they sweeten and qualify the bitterness as well as they can with little cheats (56); and though they regard the complaints made of the ill taste, as a ridiculous weakness, because they know the bitterness will soon go off, and the remedy do good, yet notwithstanding this, I say, these would very gladly save the child this trouble, and cure him, if they could, with the most palatable liquors in the world. One may be sensible of such a tender disposition of soul without being a father. There is neither a Physician nor an Apothecary, who does not apologize for the bitterness of his remedies, and protest, that if it were possible, he would grudge no pains to make them as pleasant as the most agreeable sweatmeat which the Confectioner can prepare, but that a necessity, insurmountable by all the art of man, obliges him to give disagreeable medicines. Without doubt this language is sincere, even when used to a patient he never saw before. Put this question to a Surgeon who sets the arm of a person unknown

(54) I shall speak more of this below, citat. (59).

(55) See, above, citat. (47). These delays are sometimes so uneasy, that at all a ready denial is asked as a favour. Jam, satis est, finem O Cæsar pro munere posco. Remque meam in dubio, perfica finem neget. See Balzac, Entret. XXVII, pag. m. 276.

(56) Pueris absinthia tetra medentes
Cùm dare conantur, prius oras poculo circùm
Contingunt mellis dulci flavoque liquore,
Ut puerorum ætas improvida ludificetur
Labrorum tenùs, interea perpotet amarum
Absinthi laticem, deceptaque non capiatur;
Sed potiùs tali factò recreata valescat. Lucret. lib. I, ver. 935, & lib. IV, ver. 11.

- - - - - For as Physicians [illegible] In giving children draughts of bitter juice,
To make them [illegible] take it; and [illegible] cup with sweet [illegible] To cheat [illegible] this first [illegible] eager taste.
And [illegible] on, and take the bitter draught.
And [illegible] lishly deceived [illegible] For by [illegible] they give them [illegible] strength, and [illegible] Their former health, and [illegible] the disease.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with faſtings and watchings. Thirſting after martyrdom (e) he underwent, with incredible conſtancy, the torments which the perſecutors of the faith inflicted upon him [F]; torments known to him, if you could perform this operation without cauſing any pain, would you not do it? He will reply, that there is no queſtion to be made of it, and that it muſt be taken for granted, that a man of his profeſſion, who knows how to dreſs a wound two ways, equally good, the one painful and the other eaſy, and ſhould prefer the former to the latter, would be a monſter of cruelty, a tyger, a cannibal, that ought to be immediately broke upon the wheel (57). Generally ſpeaking, your Schoolmaſters are none of the beſt tempered men in the world; and yet I doubt whether there is any pedantry ſo ſavage, as to prefer the rod to good words, even where it is certain that mildneſs and complaiſance would improve their ſcholars as much as correction. Do they not give ſugar-plums to little boys, to conquer their ſtubbornneſs (58). To have recourſe to chiding and the ferula without neceſſity, I mean, without finding that method more profitable than good words and preſents, is certainly brutiſh.

(e) See, above, remark [A], citat. ‡.

(56) Compare what I quote from Seneca, in the article CALISTRATUS, citation (7) and (8).

(58) Ut pueris olim dant cruſtula blandi Doctores, elementa velint ut diſcere prima. Horat. Sat. I, lib. I.

This induction might be amplified without end, and will furniſh a conſequence ſufficient to put an Origeniſt out of countenance; for we may from hence conclude, that both the ideas of experience and metaphyſics concur in demonſtrating, that to hurt any one, though it be for never ſo ſhort a portion of time, and in order to procure him the greateſt benefit, is altogether incompatible with goodneſs, unleſs it be abſolutely impoſſible to find out a ſtrait path to lead him from good to good, in a conſtant and invariable manner. Let it be urged never ſo much, that the torments of the damned, after laſting for a certain time, which is ſhort in compariſon with eternity, ſhall be followed with endleſs felicity: yet this will appear to be ſo much the more incompatible with the goodneſs of God, as his goodneſs is infinite, and infinitely perfect, which cannot ſuffer the leaſt diminution or interruption without ceaſing to be perfect. Let us but call to mind the doctrine of the ſchoolmen about the nature of firſt qualities. Heat, in ſummo gradu (59), or ut octo, as they expreſs it, ceaſes to be a firſt, ſimple, and perfect, quality, as ſoon as it is joined to the leaſt degree of cold which can poſſibly exiſt. From that moment it aſſumes the nature of ſecond or compound qualities. Eſſences conſiſt in indiviſibili, in an indiviſible point, take never ſo little from them, and you deſtroy them entirely. They muſt have all or nothing; ſo that how ſmall ſoever the mixture may be of the bad quality with the good, this goodneſs loſes the eſſence of perfect goodneſs: it changes its ſpecies, and paſſes into that of imperfect qualities. This is evident from the philoſophical axiom quoted in the margin (60). It is neceſſary therefore, if the Origeniſts mean to get clear, they muſt add a new Hereſy to the former; they muſt maintain, that it was impoſſible for God to lead free creatures to eternal happineſs, without their previous ſuffering the miſeries of this life, and afterwards for a limited time, thoſe of hell. They might allege, that as fiſh cannot live in the air, nor men under water, ſo the ſouls of men cannot ſubſiſt in paradiſe, while they are incumbred with the filth which ariſes from their union with elementary matter; that there is a neceſſity therefore of purifying them in the infernal furnaces, after which they are qualified to live happy in the cœleſtial regions. According to this ſuppoſition the goodneſs of God, may be entirely conſiſtent with the torments of the creature, juſt as a Surgeon preſerves his friendſhip for the patient who undergoes his operation, notwithſtanding the violent pain he puts him to, which it is not poſſible for him to prevent. But the having recourſe to this hypotheſis, is only adopting part of the error of the Manichees; it is ſaving the goodneſs of God at the expence of his power, and admitting that Matter is an uncreated principle ſo eſſentially bad, that it is not in the power of God to rectify its defects. This therefore inſtead of anſwering the objections of the Manichees, is making them triumph. The obſervations made upon phyſical evil, with reſpect to the goodneſs of God, may eaſily be applied to moral evil, with regard to the divine ſanctity.

(59) Compare what is ſaid above, citation (54).

(60) Bonum ex integra cauſa, Malum ex quocunque defectu. Good conſiſts in all perfection, Evil in any imperfection.

V. We muſt take notice, that if Origen could anſwer the objection of the Manichees, it would not follow, that they might be ſolved yet more effectually, by principles much better and more orthodox than his. For all the advantage he can have in his controverſy, proceeds from the falſe poſitions, peculiar to him, which, on the one hand, give a large extent to the power of free-will, and on the other hand, ſuppreſs everlaſting miſery, and ſubſtitute in its place eternal bliſs. The ſtrongeſt argument of the Manichees is grounded on this hypotheſis, that all men, except a very few, ſhall be eternally damned.

VI. There is no ſect now in being, which gives ſo ſmall a handle to the Manichees, as the Socinian; and that is only owing to their departing farther than all the reſt from the hypotheſis of the Particulariſts (61). But ſo long as they ſcruple to go yet further, they will ſucceed no better in this diſpute than the Origeniſts; they muſt ſink under it, unleſs they join to their other impieties, that of holding matter to be a principle which God can only diſpoſe of to a certain degree, beyond which he muſt of neceſſity yield to its reſiſtance, and accommodate himſelf to the incorrigible defects which he finds in it. If the Socinians do not farther charge themſelves with that piece of blaſphemy, they will ſee themſelves reduced to an abſurdity, I mean to deny truths evident from experience; and that after this manner. They deny the eternity of Hell, becauſe they cannot conceive how it ſhould conſiſt with the infinite goodneſs of God. They cannot conceive that ſuch goodneſs is compatible with a Hell of a hundred times a hundred thouſand millions of years. So many ages of miſery appear to them a moſt horrid cruelty. But as they will never riſe from cruelty to infinite gooodneſs by retrenching a thouſand ages, and then another thouſand, &c. ſo long as they leave any years of torment behind (62); they muſt ſay, if they mean to avoid the inconſiſtency, that under a God infinitely good there can be no Hell. This proves too much; for after this theſis is laid down, it is not conceivable that men can be liable to diſeaſes and afflictions. So that from theſe principles there would follow a falſhood, and even the impoſſibility of a thing which exiſts beyond all diſpute, and of which we have but too ſad experience. If you ſay, that under the beſt monarchs there are dungeons, tortures, gibbets, and executioners, frequently made uſe of: I anſwer, that none of theſe things could take place, if it were in the power of thoſe monarchs to inſpire all the world with a firm reſolution of demeaning themſelves as they ought. How can you get clear of this labyrinth, if God diſpoſes of matter as he thinks fit, and is the free author of the laws that ſubject man to ſickneſs and uneaſineſs? There is no eſcaping therefore, but by ſaying, that God cannot do every thing he would; and that matter contains the ſeeds of evil, which ſhoot up one way or other, whether he will or not, and in ſpite of any combination or texture whatſoever, which he may may make of its particles.

(61) Theſe are the men who inſiſt moſt ſtrictly upon the literal ſenſe of St Paul, about the doctrine of abſolute Predeſtination, the neceſſity of Grace, and the loſs of Free-will.

(62) See the proofs of this above, remark [E]. paragraph III.

VII. This is the way of teaching thoſe their duty, who mean to ſubject Theology to Philoſophy. You muſt ſhew to them the abſurd conſequences of their method, and by that means bring them back to this maxim of Chriſtian humility. That metaphyſical notions ought not to be the rule, by which we are to judge of the conduct of God; but that we ought to conform our ſelves to the oracles of the ſcripture. As for thoſe who may apprehend any danger to the true faith, from ſhewing, that by the bare light of Philoſophy we cannot make a ſtand againſt the objections of the Manichees; I refer them to the explanations which I thought proper to ſubjoin to the end of this work.

[F] The torments which the perſecutors of the faith inflicted upon him.] Of all the martyrs put to death under the ſeventh perſecution (63), *none was attacked with more obſtinacy than Origen . . . . He was thrown into a dark dungeon, * chained with a large collar of iron round his neck, extended for ſeveral days upon a ſort of a rack, which, by pulling his feet aſunder, diſlocated his members, in ſuch a manner, that he paſſed the reſt of his life in extreme pain. He was then ſixty-ſeven years old . . . . Every day they invented new cruelties, related by himſelf in his letters, to which the ancients refer us, but which are ſince loſt. They often threatened to burn him gradually, and at ſeveral times; and, during this cruel and long martyrdom, which laſted, ſo far as*

(63) That of the emperor Decius, ann. 250.

* Euſeb. lib. vi, cap. xxxix. Niceph. lib. v, cap. xxxii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google torments ſo much the more inſupportable becauſe they were of long duration; for there was great care taken to prevent his expiring in the midſt of the torture (f). His genius was great, fine, and ſublime, his knowledge and reading were vaſtly extenſive, and yet he fell into a prodigious number of Hereſies, the very leaſt of which is monſtrous (g), and probably he fell into them by endeavouring to protect the truths of Chriſtianity from the Inſults of the Pagans, and to render them credible even to the Philoſophers; which he wiſhed for with the moſt ardent zeal, not doubting, but that with them he ſhould convert the univerſe (b). So many virtues, ſo many admirable talents, and ſo great a degree of zeal, could not prevent his dying a Heretic, and his memory from being abhorred by an infinite number of Chriſtians. There are but few in the Romiſh communion who dare to doubt of his eternal damnation. And yet how many voluptuous, worldly, lazy, and vicious doctors are there, who being at the ſame time very orthodox, receive every day thouſands of benedictions for their unſhaken conſtancy in the true faith? So impenetrable are the judgments of GOD! It is not commonly apprehended that the errors of Origen have any connexion with one another; they ſeem to be the product of a wandering and irregular mind: but it is more rational to aſſert, that they all ſpring from one ſource [G], and that they are ſyſtematical falſities, which form a chain of conſequences. Some of his followers have carried them even to the ſenſualities we have ſince ſeen among the Molinoſiſts [H]. But that (f) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, pag. 81.

(g) Id. ib. pag. 36.

(b) Id. ib. pag. 37.

as we can judge, till the death of Decius, he never let ſlip one ſyllable unworthy of a ſoldier of JESUS CHRIST. Happy! if in ſurrendering his ſoul in ſo glorious a fight, he could have waſhed off the errors of his doctrine with his blood. But GOD did not permit it ſo to be. † He ſuffered much, ſays St Epiphanius, and did not arrive at the point to which martyrdom leads. He touched the crown with his hand, without being able to ſet it upon his head; and he, who in all appearance was only ſhort of martyrdom, in not expiring in the midſt of his torments, the marks of which he bore to his death, is an Hereſiarch, rejected and abhorred by the church, for not believing as ſhe does. But this ought not to ſurpriſe us, ſince we read in the acts of the holy prieſt Pionius, who ſuffered martyrdom at that time at Smyrna, that a Marcionite was burnt by his ſide, whoſe ſect was not leſs heretical, though it inſpired him with a deſire of martyrdom; for theſe falſe martyrs died, adhering to their errors. What makes the martyr, ſays St Auguſtin admirably well, is not the puniſhment, but the faith which makes him bear it. Now there is no faith in him who riſes in oppoſition to the doctrine of the church. Where are the men of this character, whom they would give us for ſaints, tho' we meet with nothing in their lives that comes near the virtue, or the ſufferings of the martyrs; but only a more notorious obſtinacy, than that of the ancient Hereſiarchs (64).

† L. de Ponder. & Menſuris.

(64) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, pag. 81, & ſeq.

I have inſerted this long paſſage of Father Doucin, without omitting the reflexion; for I thought it would ſerve for a ſupplement to what I have related above (65) concerning the charge againſt Maimbourg, with regard to the Marcionite martyrs. I apprehended farther, that this would afford me an opportunity of remarking, that the eaſieſt means of diſcerning a good cauſe, ſlip from us ſooner or later. It would ſuit the capacity of the people much more, to diſtinguiſh the true religion by certain external marks, than to enter into a ſevere ſcrutiny of the doctrine. Now of all external marks, the conſtancy of martyrs is the moſt capable of making an impreſſion. It was altogether ſerviceable in advancing the Chriſtian faith; the aſhes of martyrs were the ſeeds of juſt men, and produced innumerable proſelytes to the goſpel. But this proof became equivocal after Chriſtianity was ſplit into ſeveral communions: each of them had their reſpective martyrs; and ſo, to avoid the being impoſed upon, there was a neceſſity of entering into the diſcuſſion of their doctrine, and to diſclaim this compendious rule of truth, viz. ſuch a communion has martyrs, therefore it is good.

(65) In the remark [E] of the article MARCIONITES.

[G] It is more rational to aſſert, that all the errors of Origen ſpring from one ſource.] It is in his three books of principles (66) that he has explained and eſtabliſhed them, and ſo connected one with another, that they may all be ſeen to ſpring from one ſole principle (67).

(66) He compoſed them, ann. 217. See Father Doucin, ubi infra.

(67) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, pag. 31.

‘ It is eaſy to demonſtrate, in the firſt place, that ‘ what is heretical and deſerves cenſure, in his books ‘ of principles, is not one or two propoſitions foreign ‘ to his ſubject, but the very body of the doctrine, ‘ the ſubſtance of the work, the fundamental propoſitions upon which the whole ſyſtem is ſupported, ‘ and which cannot be removed without overturning ‘ the whole edifice. It is demonſtrable, in the ſecond ‘ place, that the ſame errors which ſtain his book of ‘ principles, are diſperſed through all the other writings of the author; inſomuch, that the ſame ſpirit ‘ reigns throughout, the ſame ideas every where appear. In order to remove his errors you muſt deſtroy the very firſt elements of his doctrine (68). ‘ . . . . Such is the condition of any one who dares to ‘ ſteer a new courſe in religious matters: a dreadful ‘ ſeries of abyſſes and precipices opens, every ſtep he ‘ goes. The more ingenious he is, the more does the ‘ itch of reaſoning conſequentially oblige him to ſwallow abſurdities; and that which at firſt view ſeemed ‘ only a ſlight ſingularity, and not worthy to be ‘ taken notice of, proves in the end the general overthrow of all the Chriſtian doctrines. So fatal it is ‘ to indulge invention, where we have nothing to do ‘ but to believe (69).’ The author from whom I have theſe words, ſays in another place; ‘ That which ‘ principally deſerves our regard, is the imperceptible, ‘ and yet real, connexion of all theſe errors, which ‘ from one to another obliged the author to invent ‘ that terrible multitude of novelties, of which his ſyſtem is compoſed. For, as St Jerom has very well ‘ ſaid, upon this ſubject, we muſt not imagine, that ‘ Origen was either a madman or a fool; † and moſt ‘ of thoſe who have read him, would not have charged him with ſuch frequent contradictions, if they ‘ had conſidered him more cloſely. It is true, his ‘ book of principles, as it now appears, is not always ‘ conſiſtent with the reſt of his works; but that is ‘ not chargeable upon the author himſelf ‡. We ‘ all know what pains Rufinus took to ſuppreſs in his ‘ tranſlation whatever he thought might occaſion its ‘ being condemned in the Weſt. It is by this means ‘ that Origen, in Latin, ſometimes attacks thoſe very ‘ errors, which he eſtabliſhes in Greek in his other ‘ writings. As for the reſt, we ſhall find Origen ‘ clear of ſelf-contradictions, if we trace him to the ‘ ſource of his ideas, and ſearch for the key, as we ‘ may call it, of his writings; for aſſuredly they have ‘ one, and we muſt not think that ſuch a train of hereſies is any thing elſe, but the conſequences of the ‘ firſt error; the diſcovery of which ſeems as yet not ‘ to have been duly purſued (70).’ Father Doucin afterwards propoſes his conjectures, and the manner in which he conceives the doctrine of Origen to be connected. This is worth the reading in the original.

(68) Ib. p. 36.

(69) Ib. p. 37.

† Non eſt futurus Origenes. Et ego novi. Contraria ſibi loqui non poteſt. Hier. Apol. lib. ii.

‡ Quæ cùm legiſſem contrariæ ſemque cum Græco, illicò animadverti quæ Origenes de Patre & Filio & Spiritu ſancto impiè diſſeruit, & quæ Romanæ aures ferre non poterant, non me interpretem ſed interprete commutata. Hier. Apol. lib. ii. Si ideò interpretaris ut eum hæreticum arguas, nihil de Græco mutes. Ibid. lib. ii.

[H] Some of his followers have carried them even to the ſenſualities we have ſince ſeen among the Molinoſiſts.] I ſhall make uſe of Father Doucin's own words. They are full of grounds of reflexion, and point out the uſe we may make of them, with relation to the preſent time. ‘ While thoſe who read him leſs attentively fell inconſiderately into all the chimera's of Origen; others who were more diſcerning, and at the ‘ ſame time more corrupted, perceived their conſequences to be very favourable to their diſorderly ‘ lives; and from this poſition, that the fleſh is only ‘ the priſon of the ſoul, and by no means any part of ‘ us ſanctified by the union with Chriſt, or appointed ‘ to reign with him in glory, they concluded that the ‘ uncleanneſs

(70) Doucin, ubi ſupra, p. 33, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that carnal Origeniſm was but of ſhort duration, and was eaſier to ſuppreſs than the ſpiritual Origeniſm which was a ſort of Quietiſm [I]. We muſt remember that one of the things which gave Origen's ſect the greateſt run, was, that his errors ſeemed to be of ſufficient force to refute the Manichees [K], who by their objections very

' uncleanneſs of the fleſh could not taint the purity of ' the ſpirit, or deprive it of the grace of the Creator. ' It is very evident to what abominations this deteſt- ' able principle leads, which formed in the Eaſt a ſe- ' cond ſort of Origeniſts, whoſe leudneſs was ſo no- ' torious, that they were named infamous and diſſolute ' ‡. This double Origeniſm, the one carnal, the ' other ſpiritual, is atteſted by St Epiphanius. So ' that it ought not to be taken for the invention of an ' hiſtorian who would diſcover in paſt ages, the ori- ' ginal picture of what happens in ours. Much leſs ' ſhould it be looked upon as a piece of artifice to pro- ' cure an opportunity of entering into an explanation ' upon the preſent ſtate of affairs .... If the exe- ' crable Molinos, as much the reverſe as he was of ' the chaſte Origen, yet became as well as he the head ' both of a ſpiritual, and of a carnal hereſy, we need ' not wonder at it. †‡ The moſt ſpiritual hereſy, ' if it has never ſo little relation to the rule of mora- ' lity and practice, opens the way to the moſt mon- ' ſtrous diſorders. One groans and accuſes himſelf ' after the commiſſion of a bad action, which, he ſays, ' he could not avoid, GOD having denied him his ' grace. Another, from that notion, that GOD denied ' him the means of avoiding that action, concludes ' that it cannot be criminal, and ſo he commits it ' without bluſhing. The difference between the one ' and the other is often only in the way of ſpeaking. ' This ſpeaks as he thinks himſelf, and the other as ' he would have the world to think of him (71).'

‡ Hæreſ. 63, 64. Horum vero hæreſis ad Epiphanii dogma conformata videtur de quo in Gnoſticorum ſecta ſermonem antea fecimus.... nuptias repudiant neque tamen obſcenis libidinibus modum ullis adhibent, adeoque omni genere ſpurcitiæ & corpus ſuum, & mentem animumque contaminant. Ib.

†‡ See what Huetius ſays to prove that there was only one Origen.

(71) Doucin, ubi ſupra, pag. 139.

[I] That carnal ſort of Origeniſm .... was eaſier to ſuppreſs than the ſpiritual Origeniſm which was a ſort of Quietiſm.] ' This ſeems incredible, and yet de- ' ſerves to be carefully obſerved, viz. that a carnal ' hereſy is leſs to be feared by the church (72), than ' thoſe which follow the ſtricteſt regulation of morals. ' Of this the double Origeniſm is alone a ſufficient ' evidence. The carnal laſted but a very ſhort time, ' and was abhorred by all the world; even thoſe who ' were infected with it did not dare to produce ſuch a ' dreadful doctrine in the face of the world: whereas ' the ſpiritual Origeniſm, the followers of which ' were, according to * St Epiphanius himſelf, irre- ' proachable as to the purity of their lives, could not ' be extinguiſhed till two centuries after its firſt ap- ' pearance: ſo effectually did the probity of thoſe ' who profeſſed it, cover obſtinacy and pride, under ' the ſpecious appearance of an exemplary piety (73).'

(72) See the Penſees Diverſes ſur les Cometes §. cxxxix, cxc.

* Nam licet nullum ſectatoribus ſuis uſum turpitudinis imponat. Hæreſ. 64.

(73) Doucin, ib. pag. 141.

I ſhall borrow one paſſage more from Father Doucin. Evagrius .... deacon of the church of Conſtantinople went to Jeruſalem, and from thence to Egypt, to ſhut himſelf up in ſolitude .... His head was full of nothing but his Origen .... Scarce had he entered his deſert, when the Origeniſt Monks, ſenſible of his worth, placed him at their head, and for that reaſon the church has ſince condemned him as one of the heads of that ſect. He ſpent his time in writing ſpiritual books which were infinitely eſteemed, and by the fragments remaining of them to this day appear in reality to be very fine. By this means the error made inconceivable progreſs, which was ſoon perceived by St Epiphanius, and St Jerome, on his ſide, cautioned the faithful againſt it. ' Evagrius, ' ſaid he, that man who comes from the North, who ' from his ſolitude writes letters all over the world, ' ſends inſtructions to virgins, to monks, and to her ' whoſe name ſeems to import the darkneſs and blackneſs ' of hereſy (he ſpeaks of Melania) that man has thought ' fit to publiſh a book of maxims, by which he pretends ' to ſtrip man of all ſenſe of paſſions.' This is juſt the pretended perfection of the Quietiſts. ' That is to ſay, ' adds St Jerome, Evagrius will, of his perfect man, ' make either a god or a ſtone (74).'

(74) Doucin, ubi ſupra, pag. 177. & ſeq.

[K] The errors of Origen ſeemed to be of ſufficient force to refute the Manichees.] Upon this head eſpecially it will be proper for me to make uſe of borrowed expreſſions. Palladius was brought up by Evagrius in a monaſtic life; and he knew at leaſt as well as he how to ſucceed in the art of making the moſt of a ſect. ' The women, eſpecially ſuch of them as could ' read, loved to converſe with him, and were eaſieſt ' gained by his artful language. His cuſtom was to ' begin with raiſing a ſuſpicion of the orthodox belief ' by repreſenting it as full of abſurdities, from which ' it could not be cleared but by Origen's principles. ' He would aſk them, for inſtance,  What ill has ' that child done, who you ſee is ſo tormented and ' poſſeſſed by the Devil? At what age ſhall we riſe ' again? Muſt it be the ſame age at which we die? ' &c (75)..... Thus it was, that Palladius made ' Origeniſm paſs for a ſyſtem neceſſary to the eaſy ' and plain explication of that, which till then had ' ſeemed to be the ſtumbling-block of our religion. ' A doctrine, thus ſet forth by the greateſt men of ' the age, could not but meet with great reception; ' eſpecially conſidering the diſpoſition of the minds ' of men which then prevailed. Their whole ſtudy at ' that time was to anſwer the Manichees, whoſe ſect was ' become more numerous and more flouriſhing than ' ever. If there is but one GOD, ſaid thoſe heretics, ' who is omnipotent and infinitely good, how can he ' permit this deluge of evils which happen in the ' world, and in which ſo many are involved from ' their nativity, while others are born in proſperity ' and affluence of fortune. Notwithſtanding the ap- ' parent abſurdity of the doctrine of two principles, ' the one good, the other bad, equally powerful and ' independent of one another, it found an infinite ' multitude of followers, who were of the opinion ' that the evils of this life could not be accounted for, ' without it. It is well known what efforts St Auſtin ' made to ſatisfy them upon that head. We know ' likewiſe, that Pelagius, who came after him, and ' whoſe doctrine was preſently very much reliſhed, ' applyed himſelf particularly to remove that very ' ſcandal, and to anſwer the queſtion then ſo much ' canvaſſed: Whence comes evil, and what is the ori- ' gin of it? Now this origin of evil, and of the di- ' verſity of what each perſon ſuffers, was accounted ' for by none with more probability than by the Ori- ' geniſts (76).'

 Hier. Ep. 27.

(75) Doucin ib. pag. 180.

(76) Doucin, ib. pag. 182.

Note, That the Origeniſt of the Parrhaſiana makes an eternal beatitude to ſucceed the torments, which the damned ſhall undergo for ſome ages (77). That takes off the moſt ſhocking of all the difficulties urged by the Manichees, namely, the eternity of the moral and phyſical evil of Hell. But Father Doucin gives a different account of Origen's doctrine, and makes it leſs apoſite for anſwering theſe heretics; for he affirms, that he equally rejected the eternity of bliſs. Beſides that Origen ' thought it ſavoured of cruelty to make ' the puniſhment of the damned eternal, this eternity of ' puniſhment appeared to him inconſiſtent with the eſ- ' ſential character of created Beings, which is inſtabi- ' lity. He would have it therefore that juſt as much ' as GOD is incapable of change, ſo much the crea- ' ture is incapable of being fixed to any thing that is ' permanent and eternal, whether it be happineſs or ' miſery. Accordingly he pretended, that when all ' the ſpirits purified from their ſtains, ſhould have re- ' entered the divinity †† of which, according to ' him they are an emanation, they would go off anew ' from his boſom, like ſparks from a furnace, and by ' way of puniſhment for this levity ‡‡ be con- ' demned to re-enter new bodies; for which there ' would be a neceſſity of creating new worlds, and ſo ' through all eternity there would be nothing but pe- ' riodical revolutions, like to thoſe of the ſeaſons (78).' Father Doucin's marginal note is worth our reciting, for it informs us, that there was in the Origeniſm a branch of Spinoſiſm, namely, the identity of all ſpi- rits with the Deity. This is what this author ob- ſerves, After citing St Jerome: ' That Ruffinus ' has ſuppreſſed this paſſage in his tranſlation. Read ' the laſt chapter of the third book, where theſe words, ' & erit Deus omnia in omnibus, are explained at large. St Jerome goes on thus: ' Ne parvam eſſe putaremus ' impietatem eorum quæ præmiſerat, in ejuſdem vo- ' luminis (quarti) fine, conjungit omnes rationabiles ' naturas, id eſt, Patrem & Filium & Spiritum ſanctum, ' Angelos, Poteſtates, Dominationes, cæteraſque Vir- ' tutes, ipſum quoque hominem ſecundum animæ dig- ' nitatem unius eſſe ſubſtantiæ .... Et qui in alio ' loco

(77) See the remark [E], citat. (40).

†† In libro quoque tertio περὶ ἀρχῶν & poſt diſputationem longiſſimam ad extremum intulit, & erit Deus omnia in omnibus, ut univerſa natura corporea in eam redigatur ſubſtantiam quæ omnibus melior eſt in divinam ſcilicet, quâ nulla eſt melior. Origen. apud Hier. Epiſt. ad Avit.

‡‡ Hier. Ep. ad Avit. & Apol. 2.

(78) Doucin, ubi ſupra, pag. 338.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google very much embarraſſed the Orthodox. One anſwer to Celſus the Philoſopher, which w

I have ſpoken of ſome other editions in
See the margn (i).

(i) His treatiſe of Prayer, never printed before, was publiſhed in G publique des Lettres, for June 1686, Art. VIII. It is ſaid in the Pre but the truth is, as I have ſince learned from a letter of Mr Huet bought it about the year 1636, of Mr Rums, the queen of Bohemia's the library of Worms. This manuſcript paſſed from the hands of Iſa it into the archives of Trinity-College in Cambridge. See Dr Cave, ‘ loco Filium & Spiritum ſanctum non vult de Patris

‘ eſſe ſubſtantia, ne divinitatem in partes ſecare videa-
‘ tur, naturam omnipotentis Dei Angelis hominibuſ-
‘ que largitur. Ex quo concluditur (inquit) Deum &
‘ hæc quodammodo unius eſſe ſubſtantiæ. Unum ad-
‘ dit verbum, quodammodo, ut tanti ſacrilegii crimen ‘ effugeret. See l. 3. cap. 16 (79). - - - - That we ‘ may not ſuppoſe thoſe things which he had premiſed in
‘ the end of that fourth volume, to have contained a ſmall
‘ degree of impiety, he ſubjoins that all rational natures,
‘ that is, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, Angels, Pow-
‘ ers, Dominions, and other Virtues, and alſo even man
‘ himſelf, as to the dignity of his ſoul, are of one ſubſtance.
‘ . . . . And he who in another place will not allow
‘ the Son and Holy Ghoſt to be of the ſubſtance of the Fa- ‘ ther, for fear the Divinity ſhould ſeem divided into ‘ parts, diſpoſes of the nature of the omnipotent GOD to ‘ angels and to men. From whence we may conclude ‘ (ſays he), that GOD and theſe Beings are all in ſome
‘ meaſure of one ſubſtance. He adds, that cautious ex-
‘ preſſion, in ſome meaſure, the better to avoid the charge
‘ of that ſacrilegious impiety.

(79) Doucin, Miſt. de l'Orig. pag. 339.

(80) He is a native of Rochelle. In the epiſtles of Tanaquillus Faber he his called Elias Boherellus.

(81) See the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Dec 1699. pag. 519, and the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Jan. 1700, p. 3.

[L] Origen's anſwer to Celſus the Philoſopher, was publiſhed in French.] The author of that verſion is Mr Bouhéreau (80) ſo well known by the learned letters written to him by Tanaquillus Faber of Samur. The merit of that performance being ſufficiently made known by our Journaliſts (81), it is unneceſſary for me to take notice of it. I ſhall only ſay one thing to confirm an obſervation I have oftentimes made, that

OROBIO (ISAAC) a Jewiſh Phyſicia
Bibliotheque Univerſelle (a).

(a) Tom. VII, pag. 289. & ſeq.

OROSIUS (PAUL) a Spaniſh prieſt century. Conſult Moreri; to avoid the re bear giving the Hiſtory of Oroſius, but errors relating to him. Thoſe who have n the year 471 [A], are even more miſta
Pagan [B], and as much as ſome others that St Auſtin deſired him to write the
the time of JESUS CHRIST [C], and tha

[A] Thoſe who have made him a Monk, and placed his death in the year 471.] You will find their names in Philip Elſſius, whoſe credulity did well deſerve this cenſure of Father Labbe: ‘ Ut omittam fabuloſos quoſ-
‘ dam Hiſpanos ſcriptores, quos citat ſequiturque Phi‘ lippus Elſſius, qui Auguſtinianis ſuis Eremitis ac-
‘ cenſet, vitamque ejus prorogat uſque ad annum 471, ‘ quo centenario majorem in Carthagine Spartaria in ‘ Hiſpaniis obiiſſe contendit, atque inde Romam aſpor-
‘ tatum, & in Eccleſia S. Euſebii, ubi partruus ejus ja-
‘ cebat, ſepultum. Sed hæc penitus incerta dubiæque
‘ fidei. Quid quod & nonnulli Legionenſem Epiſco-
‘ pum fuiſſe putent (1)? - - - - That I may paſs by ſome
‘ fabulous Spaniſh writers, quoted and credited by Philip ‘ Elſſius, who places him among his Monks of St Auſtin,
‘ and extends his life to the year 471, inſiſting that he ‘ died above an hundred years old at Carthagena in Spain,
‘ from whence he was carried to Rome, and buried in ‘ his uncle's grave, in the church of St Euſebius. But
‘ all this is of very doubtful and uncertain credit. As alſo,
‘ what ſome have believed, that he was Biſhop of Leon.

(1) Philippus Labbe, Differt. de Script Eccleſ. Tom. II. p. 175.

[B] Theſe who have made him a Pagan.] Father Garaſſe has been guilty of this blunder, and that upon the occaſion of his endeavouring to convince impious men from the teſtimony of infidels. The ſecond wonder of nature, ſays he (2), which I ſhall here bring for an evidence, ſhall be the aſhy apples of Gomorrah, and the pillar of ſalt, two authentic facts, atteſted not onl

(2) Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, pag. 192.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google death of St Auſtin [D]. Iſaac Caſaubon is not juſtly to be blamed for his contempt of he deſired an univerſal collection of the greateſt calamities, which had been recorded in hiſtory. 'Præceperas mihi, it is Oroſius that ſpeaks (4) uti adverſus vaniloquam pravitatem eorum, qui alieni à civitate dei, ex locorum agreſtium compitis & pagis pagani vocantur, ſive gentiles, quia terrena ſapiunt: qui cum futura non quærant, præterita autem aut obliviſcantur, aut neſciant, præſentia tantum tempora veluti malis extra ſolitum infeſtiſſima, ob hoc ſolum, quod creditur CHRISTUS, & colitur deus, idola autem minus coluntur, infamant: præceperas ergo ut ex omnibus, qui haberi ad præſens poſſunt, hiſtoriarum atque annalium faſtis, quæcunque aut bellis gravia, aut corrupta morbis, aut ſanè triſtia, aut terrarum motibus terribilia, aut inundationibus aquarum inſolita, aut eruptionibus ignium metuenda, aut ictibus fulminum plagiſque grandinum ſæva, vel etiam parricidiis flagitiiſque miſera, per tranſacta retrò ſæcula reperiſſem, ordinato breviter voluminis textu explicarem. - - - - You enjoined me, in order to oppoſe the malicious and vain clamours of thoſe, who being ſtrangers to the city of God, from the ſtreets and villages in the country, take the name of Pagans, or that of Gentiles, becauſe of their regarding only the things of this world; who making no enquiries into futurity, and either forgetful or ignorant of the paſt, deſame only the preſent times as more than ordinary calamitious, for this ſole cauſe, becauſe CHRIST is confeſſed, GOD worſhipped, and Idolatry declining: you enjoined me therefore, to extract out of all the hiſtories and annals now remaining, as many inſtances, as I could find, of times paſt, either diſtracted with wars, or viſited with diſtempers, or truly tragical, or alarmed with earthquakes, or extraordinary for inundations, or terrified with fiery eruptions, or puniſhed with hail and thunder, or made miſerable by crimes and parricides, and to compoſe a volume of them in a ſhort and regular method.' Of the ſeven books of which that volume of Oroſius conſiſts, only the laſt treats of thoſe events which happened ſince the time of Chriſt. Beſides, I make ſome doubt whether this author undertook to ſhew, that the Roman empire was never more exempt from misfortunes than ſince Chriſtianity. He would have found it a very difficult taſk to prove this. Gennadius ſeems to me to give a much better account of this Hiſtorian's deſign, he makes it appear, ſays he, that the Chriſtian religion is the cauſe why the Roman government, which did not deſerve ſo long a duration, continued ſtill in being (5). I know very well, that Oroſius challenges the Infidels to mention any period of time, ſo remarkable for proſperity, as that under Honorius; but this does not juſtify what I have been here criticiſing. 'Ex quo utcunque conceſſerim, ut licenter Chriſtiana tempora reprehendantur, ſi quid à conditione mundi uſque ad nunc ſimili factum felicitate doceatur. Manifeſtavimus, ut arbitror, atque oſtendimus non magis verbo pene quàm digito innumera bella ſopita, plurimos extinctos tyrannos, compreſſas, coanguſtatas, addictas, exinanitaſque immaniſſimas gentes minimo ſanguine, nullo certamine, ac pene ſine cæde (6). - - - - From whence however I may grant, that the Chriſtian times may freely be branded, if any age ſince the creation of the world can be ſhewn comparable to the preſent, in regard to proſperity. We have proved I think and demonſtrated, not only by deſcribing in words but by pointing out even with the finger, what a great number of wars have been ſuppreſſed, how many tyrants have been taken off, and the moſt barbarous nations reſtrained, reduced, ſubdued, and extinguiſhed, almoſt without blood or reſiſtance.' Perhaps Mr du Pin, in ſpeaking of Oroſius's ſcheme, was thinking of a paſſage of another Father which he did not remember ſo diſtinctly as to forbear aſcribing it to Oroſius. It is aſſerted in this paſſage, that the goſpel had abated the fury of war, which had cauſed ſo many deſolations in the world before the time of the apoſtles. 'Quanquam iſta quæ dicitis bella Religionis noſtræ ob invidiam commoveri, non ſit difficile comprobare, poſt auditum Chriſtum in mundo non tantum non aucta, verum etiam majore ex parte furiarum compreſſionibus imminuta. Nam cum hominum vis tanta magiſteriis ejus acceperimus ac legibus, malum malo rependi non oportere; injuriam perpeti quam irrogare eſſe præſtantius; ſuum potius fundere, quam alieno polluere manus & conſcientiam cruore: habet à Chriſto beneficium jamdudum orbis ingratus, per quem feritatis mollita eſt rabies, atque hoſtiles manus cohibere à ſanguine cognati animantis occæpit. (7). - - - - Altho' you charge our religion with being the cauſe of wars, it is not difficult to prove, ſince the time of CHRIST, wars are not only not increaſed, but very much abated as to their fury. For ſince the violence of men had been reſtrained, by it's maxims, that evil ſhould not be repaid with evil; that it is better to bear with injuries, than to return them; that we ſhould rather part with our own, than pollute our hands and conſciences with the blood of others: the ungrateful world has long ſince received this benefit from CHRIST; that thro' him barbarity has been aſſuaged, and men have begun to leave off embrewing their hands in the blood of their fellow creatures.' The argument of Arnobius may be reduced to this: thoſe who have embraced the goſpel have learned to bear injuries, and not to oppoſe force to force; they have thrown off the ſentiments of violence; they are become meek and peaceable: ſo that ſince the publication of the goſpel, the effuſion of human blood, and the fury of war, are leſs than before, ſince a great number of perſons have embraced Chriſtianity. Arnobius adds, that the reaſon why wars are not altogether at an end, is, becauſe all men have not followed the precepts of of Chriſt Jeſus. Quod ſi omnes omnino, qui homines ſe eſſe non ſpecie corporum, ſed rationis intelligunt poteſtate, ſalutaribus ejus pacificiſque decretis darem vellent commodare pauliſper, & non faſtu & ſupercilio luminis, ſuis potius ſenſibus, quam illius commonitionibus crederent: univerſus jam dudum orbis mitiora in opera converſis uſibus ferri, tranquillitate in molliſſima degeret, & in concordiam ſalutarem incorruptis fœderum ſanctionibus conveniret (8). Now if an author ſhould miſtake the one for the other, I mean aſcribe to Oroſius what belongs really to Arnobius, he might eaſily advance, that Oroſius makes it appear, that the Roman empire was never freer from misfortunes, than ſince the nativity of Jeſus Chriſt. But after all it ought to be obſerved, that Arnobius does not at all prove this; for, beſides that a bare aſſertion, without any deduction of particular facts, is not of ſufficient force to ſatisfy the complaints then made by the Heathens, it muſt be agreed, that Arnobius here offers but a very ſlender proof. Suppoſing part of the inhabitants of a vaſt empire ſhould diſclaim all revenge, and induſtriouſly cultivate the meek ſpirit of the goſpel, can that hinder foreigners from invading and ravaging that empire, and introducing ſuch confuſion and calamity as it never felt before? Now this is the very complaint that Arnobius pretends to refute (9). He alledges other very pertinent reaſons againſt the ſame aſperſion of the Heathens, as well as againſt that which was founded upon the peſtilences and famines which infeſted the Roman empire: but at the ſame time we muſt acknowledge, that he likewiſe makes uſe of ſuch ſcandalous arguments, that I do not believe Epicurus or Lucretius could have attacked the Divine providence with greater force, or have ridiculed thoſe who attribute the afflictions of mankind to the divine wrath, more than he has done.

[D] . . . . and that Oroſius compoſed that hiſtory after the death of St Auſtin.] Andreas Schottus, the Jeſuit, falls into this error. 'Defuncto, ſays he (10), hac 'mortali vita S. Auguſtino Romæ degebat, ubi ſeptem 'contra Gentes libris res Græcorum Romanorumque 'domi militiæque geſtas fideliter eo potiſſimum conſilio contexuit, quo ethnicorum calumniam quæ Chriſtianis mala calamitateſque temere imputabat refelleret. . . . floruit autem anno à nato Chriſto CCCCXL. '. . . . He lived at Rome after the death of St Auſtin, where he compoſed ſeven books againſt the Gentiles containing the tranſactions of the Greeks and Romans, the principal view of which was to refute the calumny of the Gentiles, in raſhly imputing all misfortunes and calamities to the Chriſtians. . . . He flouriſhed in the year of Chriſt 440.' St Auſtin died in 430. Now, it is certain that Oroſius put the finiſhing hand to his book (11), when Vallia, king of the Goths, was concluding a treaty of peace with the emperor Honorius, that is, in 416. The laſt words of his hiſtory are addreſſed to St Auſtin, as being then in perfect health; and we learn from another paſſage (12), that St Auſtin had publiſhed no more than the ten firſt books of his De Civitate Dei, when Oroſius was compiling his work, according to the ſcheme laid down for him by that ſaint.

[E] Ca-

(4) In Præmio Libri i. See likewiſe the concluſion of the work.

(5) Oſtendit magis Chriſtianæ obſervantiæ eſſe quod contra meritum ſuum Reſp. Romana adhuc duraret, & pace culturæ Dei patratum retineret imperium. Gennadius in vita Oroſii.

(6) Oroſius, lib. vii.

(7) Arnobius, lib. i. pag. 5.

(8) Id. ib. p. 6.

(9) Nam quod nobis objectare conſuestis bellorum frequentium cauſas, vaſtationes urbium, Germanorum & Scythicas irruptiones, cum pace hoc veſtra & cum bona venia dixerim, quale ſit iſtud quod dicitur, calumniarum libidine non videtis. Id. ib. pag. 5.

(10) Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, pag. 206.

(11) See the concluſion of his Hiſtory.

(12) Oroſius in Præmio Hiſtoriæ.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of this performance [E], though after all it is in some measure useful, and has bore several editons [F]. That which I make use of is of Cologne, in 1572, and does not contain so many of Francis Fabricius's notes as I could wish.

It is believed Orosius gave his work the title De Miseria Hominum; which is a very proper one, and agreeable to History in general, as a judicious author has very well observed [G].

[E] Casaubon's contempt of this performance.] He has expressed it in very civil terms, and with great encomiums on Orosius's zeal. 'Orosium ex quo 'multa in hoc sermone describi, scriptorem alioquin 'optimum & zelo domus Dei plenum, si nimiæ fa- 'cilitatis in talibus credendis postulaverimus, non dee- 'runt viri præstantissimi, quorum exemplo factum tuea- 'mur: non rationes validissimæ, quibus sanctum virum 'ταχυπιθίας, & nimiæ credulitatis, reum peraga- 'mus. Taceo rerum Romanarum ignorationem ali- 'quando mirificam; etiam Baronio teste non semel (13). '.... If we should accuse Orosius of too great credulity, 'in regard to a great many things delivered in this work 'of his, tho' otherwise an excellent writer, and full of 'zeal for God's house, there would not be wanting either 'the authority of the greatest men, to support this charge 'by their own example, or the most powerful arguments 'to prove this holy man guilty of a too easy and super- 'stitious belief. I pass by the surprising ignorance he 'sometimes shews in the Roman affairs; which even 'Baronius more than once acknowledges.' Lipsius has not treated him so gently; for after taking notice that Orosius thought that Tiberius had imprisoned Drusus, he adds, 'At me non valde movent ejusmodi scrip- 'tores legitimæ historiæ (dicam iratis quorumdam au- 'ribus) dehonestamenta (14).---- But I am not 'much concerned about such sort of writers, who are the 'disgrace of true history.' In another place, after regretting the loss of some books of Tacitus, he cries out in this apostrophe. 'Adeo bonis illis patribus cura 'otiumque fuit describere Orosios & Vopiscos & hu- 'jusmodi quisquilias præ tuo auro (15).---- So much 'care and pains did those good fathers take to describe the 'Orosius's and Vopiscus's, and such sort of trumpery be- 'fore thy valuable treasure.' This sally of Lipsius does not please me so well as the moderate censure of Casaubon and Vossius. The latter contents himself with telling us, that Orosius did not understand Greek; that he often errs in Chronology, and that he is too apt to rely on popular reports. Est Orosius scriptor plane utilis: sed qui scriptores Græcos non legerit: imo Græcarum literarum expers fuerit. In temporibus etiam crebro fallitur. Ut vel illa ostendunt, quæ in eo castigavit Scaliger in animadversionibus Eusebianis. Sæpius etiam vulgares sectatur opiniones, quam historicum (16). Perquirat, cujus est omnia ad veritatis trutinam expendere (17).

[F] It has bore several editions.] The history of Paulus Orosius was printed at Paris in 1506, by Petit, as Mr du Pin assures us (18). Gesner (19) does not mention that edition. The most antient that he speaks of, is that of Paris in 1524, apud Johannem Parvum aut Petrum Vidovæum in folio. He adds, that a more correct edition was printed at Cologne in 1536, apud Cervicornum in 8vo, and since that another at the same place, in 1542, apud Jasparem Genepæum, in 8vo. This last I have seen: Johannis Cæsarius wrote the Epistle Dedicatory to it, and made some corrections of the text. Francis Fabricius of Duren publishing this book in 1561, at Cologne, apud Maternum Cholinum, in 8vo, speaks of two former editions which were full of faults; one of which two editions must be that of 1526 (20), as appears from Fabricius's words (21); 'Hoc dico, dolendum 'fuisse, tanti viri tam fructuosam Historiam adeo men- 'dose hactenus in manibus versari. Contulerat eam 'cum aliquot manuscriptis exemplaribus ante annos 'XXV Gerardus Bolsuinge: laboravit deinde in ea- 'dem emendanda doctiss. vir Johannes Cæsarius: sed 'profecto necesse est, ut vel eorum exemplaria non 'fuerint diligenter satis descripta, vel ipsi parum ac- 'curate opus perspexerint. Tot menda relicta ab 'illis deprehendi, postquam eorum libros cum tri- 'bus manuscriptis conferre cœpi.---- This I say, that 'it was much to be lamented, we should hitherto 'have met with no more correct editions of so useful a 'history, composed by so great a man. Gerard Bol- 'suinge had collated it with some manuscript copies 'twenty-five years before: then the most learned John 'Cæsarius undertook the correction of it: but in 'good truth it must have happened, either that their 'copies were very incorrect, or themselves very careless 'in their performances. So many errors have escaped 'them, as I have found upon comparing their editions 'with three manuscripts.' The edition of Fabricius was published again at Cologne in 1572, in 8vo, and printed by the same Bookseller; to which was added the apology de Arbitrii libertate (22). Father Labbe (23) speaks of this last edition, as if it had been published in 1574. I have a copy which bears that date. Mr du Pin (24) refers it to the year 1582. Father Labbe (25) makes mention of an edition at Paris in 1526, and of another at Mentz in 1615, cum notis Latii & Schotte (26), quam nondum vidi, adds he. I am apt to believe the figures are wrong printed, and so for one edition we have two or three. For instance, Mr du Pin's edition of 1506, and Father Labbe's of 1526, seem to me to differ only by an error of the press. But I leave the determination of this matter to those who can come at the several editions, and have the opportunity of comparing them.

Mr Van Dale, Physician at Haerlem, and famous for his treatise de Oraculis, &c. has been so kind as to acquaint me, that he has an edition of Orosius, printed at Venice, Opera & expensis Bernardini Veneti de Vitalibus anno ab incarnatione Domini MD. die XII, Mensis Octobris regnante Domino Augustino Barbadico.

[G] De Miseria hominum was a very proper title, and agreeable to history in general, as a very judicious author has very well observed.] This author is James Bongars: See the preface he has prefixed to the collection he has made of several Historians of the Crusades. He advertizes his reader, that there are none but impious and wicked men, who can ever urge in prejudice to virtue the instances of the wickedness, superstition, and impiety, recorded by those writers; for Historians, continues he, do not relate what ought to be done, but what is actually done: Annalium Conscriptores, says one of them (27), non qualia optant ipsi, sed qualia ministrant tempora, mandare solent literis ex officio. History is the mirrour of human life; now the condition of human life is such, that the number of wicked and impious men, as well as that of fools must be infinite; history is nothing else but a representation of the misery of mankind. 'Est humanæ 'vitæ speculum, Historia: humanæ vero vitæ, ea ra- 'tio, ut non stultorum tantum, sed improborum etiam * 'atque impiorum infinitus sit numerus. Itaquæ rectè 'omnino suam Paulus Orosius de Miseria hominum in- 'scripsit *. Etenim quid aliud Historia? cujus in ip- 'so limine, primi parentis stultum cupidinem, impium 'animum horreas: mox madefactam sanguine fra- 'terno magnam Matrem: inde in omne scelus præ- 'cipitatum genus humanum..... Itaque, ex usu & 'multitudine qui patrocinium vitiis quærit, is omnium 'ætatum, omniumque gentium historiographos, is ho- 'die hominum universitatem, à se habeat. Idem ve- 'ro sciat: cum de Veritate, cum de Virtute quæritur, 'illud discessionem locum non habere: Hæc pars ma- 'jor esse videtur; ideo enim pejor, qui major (28).' Observe carefully what Bongars says, that at the beginning of History we meet with the folly and impiety of the first man; this is the first step the reader takes: the next step is upon the earth soaked with the blood of one brother, shed by the other. What conformity is here to be seen between the foundation of the universe, and that of Rome (29)! I have taken notice elsewhere (30) of Malherbe's reflexion on the action of Cain.

(13) Casaub. exercit. I. in Baronium n. 12. pag. m. 85.

(14) Lipsius, in Tacit. Annal. lib. iv. pag. m. 193.

(15) Id. in lib. v. Annal Taciti, pag. 232.

(16) Here is a gross error of the press: Vossius had said without doubt, quam Historici officium requirat, or something like it. A little after, there follows, I think, another mistake, Haut inutilis Orosius. Sed Tranquillus ad Tacitum?

(17) Vossius, de Histor. Latinis, pag. 217.

(18) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheque, Tom. III. pag. 156.

(19) In Biblioth. fol. 539, verso.

(20) In effect, it is so, for I have seen and perused it. It is printed at Cologne apud Eucherium Cervicornum in fol.

(21) Franciscus Fabricius Marcoduranus in Epist. nuncupatoria Orosii.

(22) See Vossius, de Histor. Lat. pag. 218.

(23) De Script. Eccles. Tom II, pag. 176.

(24) Nouv. Bibl. Tom. III. pag. 156.

(25) De Script. Eccles. tom. ii. pag. 175.

(26) He should have said, Ludovici Lauti & Andreæ Schotti.

(27) Gulielmus Tyrius.

* Ita in antiquissimo libro inscriptam Orosii Historiam vidimus.

(28) Bongarsius, Præfatione ad Gesta Dei per Francos, in fine.

(29) Fraterno primi maduerunt sanguine muri. With brother's blood the first form'd walls were stain'd. Lucan. Pars. lib. i, ver. 95.

(30) In the remark [E] of the article CAIN.

SMAN,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OSMAN, emperor of the Turks, was excluded the ſucceſſion to Achmet, his father, by reaſon of his non-age: but Muſtapha, his uncle, who was placed on the throne after the death of Sultan Achmet, in November 1617 (a), ſoon manifeſting himſelf unworthy of ſo high a poſt, was remanded to his cell, and the empire conferred upon Oſman. He propoſed to ſignalize his reign by a grand expedition againſt Poland; but it proved unfortunate. This made him conceive an averſion to the Janizaries; and it was believed that, under the pretence of a religious journey, he ſought a fair opportunity of diſbanding that Militia. But they prevented him; for in 1622 they mutinyed in ſuch a manner that they expelled him from his throne [A], non ſine Theſeo, I mean that religious intrigues had a good ſhare in it (b). Muſtapha being reſtored put him to death, and governed ſo fooliſhly, that he was once more depoſed (c). This ſecond depoſing ought to be placed to the account of the Alcoran [B]; for it was effected in purſuance of a decree of the Turkiſh Pope: as the Mufti may very properly be called.

(a) See the Merc. François, Tom. v, pag. m. 185, of the year 1617, and pag. 511, of the year 1618.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) Note, that the firſt depoſing conſiſted in forcing him to ſay, that he voluntarily reſigned the empire. Oſman, in the letter he wrote to Lewis XIII, ſays, that Muſtapha had voluntarily laid down his dignity and deſpiſed it. That Letter is inſerted in the Mercure François, ad ann. 1618, pag. 208, 209.

[A] The Janizaries . . . mutinyed in ſuch a manner, that they expelled Oſman from the throne.] The particulars of that action, which we meet with in the hiſtory of Baptiſta Nani, are not too long to be here inſerted. 'The Turks have no ſort of mean or moderation in 'their paſſions; either they adore their princes 'as gods, or put them to death as tyrants. The em- 'peror Oſman, who ruled that vaſt ſtate, was in the 'flower of his age, and not meeting with the ſucceſs he 'expected in Poland, nor the glory which he had 'promiſed himſelf from his arms, very much hated 'the Janizaries, to whom alone he imputed all his ill 'fortune, and accuſed them of having been as cowardly 'in the field, as they were inſolent in Conſtantinople. 'After having concluded a peace upon terms not very 'honourable, he gave out that he would make a 'voyage to Mecca, on account of religion, which 'was looked upon by ſome as an idle diſcourſe, and 'only a pretence to find an opportunity for continuing 'longer at quiet in the Seraglio. Others imagined, 'that he concealed under it a deſign he had to remove 'the Janiſſaries from the capital city; to lead them 'into Aſia, and there deliver them up to the Spahi's, 'their competitors and enemies; to diſband them, 'and form a new militia. The baggage was ſhip- 'ping in the gallies; tents, pavillions, and ſtore of 'treaſures were carrying thither to ſerve for their 'voyage, and to honour the ſepulchre of their Pro- 'phet with preſents; when the Janizaries began to 'repreſent to one another, in their diſcourſes, the 'fatigue and hardſhips, to which, in ſo long a way, 'they were going to be expoſed, and of the conve- 'niencies they left behind; what made them moſt 'uneaſy was, their imagining, that the farther 'they went, the more they ſhould be expoſed to 'the hatred and cruelty of Oſman. From mur- 'muring in their quarters, they quickly came to 'mutiny; it was begun by a few, but, all fol- 'lowing, they rendevouzed in the place of the 'Hippodromus, to the number of thirty thouſand. 'From thence one party ran to the houſe of the Coza, 'ſo they call the Sultan's preceptor, who was thought 'to be the promoter of the voyage, but not finding 'him, they pillaged it in revenge; the reſt haſtened to 'the Seraglio with loud cries, demanding the heads of 'the Viſier, of the Chiſlar Aga, and of the Coza. 'They within were not only deſtitute of force, but 'alſo of counſel: and they, who by their authority, 'might have oppoſed the enraged multitude, were the 'objects of their hatred, and the very perſons de- 'manded, in order to be torn to pieces. The empe- 'ror, to appeaſe them, gave orders to tell them he 'had countermanded the voyage; but this availed 'nothing towards diſperſing this multitude, which is 'not to be appeaſed even by the conceſſion of things 'which were pretended to be the ground of their mu- 'tinying, nor would they have ſeparated at all, had 'there not happened to fall a violent rain, which that 'ſuperſtitious people look upon as a very unlucky 'omen. The night, probably, might have extin- 'guiſhed this fury, if ſome men of the Law, who 'are very much regarded by the ignorant vulgar, had 'not ſtirred up the Janizaries a-new, declaring Oſ- 'man fallen from the empire, for having violated the 'Alcoran, by ſacrilegious actions. After this, having 'loſt all reſpect for their prince, they threw ſtones at 'their Aga, who put them in mind of their oath of 'fidelity, and repulſed Cuſſain Baſſa, who, to quiet 'them, offered three hundred thouſand ſequins. Tho' 'the Seraglio, during the night, had been extraordi- 'narily fortified, yet they found means to force it. 'They killed at the firſt entry ſome eunuchs, with 'Chiſlar Aga their chief, and afterwards ſought for 'Muſtapha, uncle to Oſman, who had formerly 'ſerved rather as the ſhadow, than as the real head of 'that empire. They cut off the heads of all thoſe who 'did not ſhew them where he was, without informing 'themſelves whether they knew it or not. At laſt, 'conjecturing, by certain ſigns, that he muſt be in a 'cave under ground, they ſought him out, and found 'him there almoſt half dead, having been already 'kept for two days without ſuſtenance, when he was 'acquainted with their deſign to make him emperor: 'he begged above all things that they would give him 'a few drops of water; but no ſooner was he upon 'the throne, than he diſcovered that his thirſt was not 'altogether ſatisfied, but wanted to be quenched with 'the blood of his nephew. Oſman had hid himſelf, 'but being found in the night, and committed to the 'cuſtody of the Buſtangi Baſſa, he was afterwards con- 'ducted to the houſe of the Aga of the Janizaries, 'where was Caſſain Baſſa. Compaſſion began to ſuc- 'ceed reſentment in the minds of ſome, upon ſeeing 'this young prince fall from ſo high a ſtation, into ſo 'great a reverſe of ill fortune, who, in order to gain 'them over to him effectually, offered the Janizaries 'fifty ſequins a man. Several of them liſtened to 'this propoſal, and their chiefs conſulted together 'about the means to preſerve him, and to re-eſtabliſh 'him on the throne, when the furious multitude took 'him out of their hands, and preſented him to 'Muſtapha. Oſman, with tears, begged his life of 'his uncle, putting him in mind of the kindneſs he 'had ſhewn him, contrary to the cuſtom of the Otto- 'mans, in preſerving him for the throne. But, in 'imitation of the Barbarians, who make deſtiny the 'author of their villanies, Muſtapha excuſed himſelf, 'by ſaying, that he knew he had oftentimes decreed 'his death, but that GOD would never permit it. 'Thus was he abandoned to the Janizaries, and con- 'ducted to the Seven Towers, amidſt the execrations 'of the people, who having, during his reign, en- 'dured famine, peſtilence, and war, deteſted him, as 'the cauſe of all theſe calamities; and he was no 'ſooner got to his priſon, but his head was cut off (1).' We find in the Mercure François (2), a much more ample relation of the death of Oſman, and which does not in every point agree with that of Nani. I ſhall only borrow from it two particulars; one is, that the men of the law, and of the ſword, gave Oſman to know, that he could not go to Mecca, without violating the law of Mahomet (3). They had procured this deciſion in writing from the Mufti; but Oſman, paying no regard to it, tore the paper in pieces. The other circumſtance is, that after the election of Muſtapha, there were ſome ſome perſons, who cried up and down the city, Long live Muſtapha, Sultan of the Turks, and read, in a ſheet of paper, the cauſes of the depoſing of the Sultan Oſman, ſetting forth, that he was depoſed for being a Jour, that is, an Infidel, and for deſigning to put the empire of the Turks into the hands of the Chriſtian dogs, which they affirmed in order to render him the more odious to the people (4).

(1) Nani, Hiſtory of Venice, book iv, pag. 126, of the ſecond Tome.

(2) Tom. viii, pag. 357, & ſeq. ad ann. 1622.

(3) Mercure Françoiſe, ibid. pag. 360.

(4) Ibid. pag. 366.

[B] To the account of the Alcoran.] Muſtapha was a weak prince. The Prime Viſier, and other favourites, hid his weakneſs; they called it ſanctity, devotion, reſignation to the will of GOD. They obliged him to lift up his eyes towards Heaven, when he appeared in public; and forged ſome miracles. The Mufti was not catched in the nooſe. He cauſed a public decla- ration

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ration to be made, that the Alcoran forbad obedience to a fool, and that in the reign of ſuch a monarch all prayers were uſeleſs, all marriages invalid. It was become neceſſary therefore to depoſe Muſtapha; Amurath, the brother of Oſman, was advanced in his room. Il qual (Muſtapha) era huomo ſtolido, e la ſtolidezza di lui ſi ſpacciava per Saintità, e raſſegnatione in Dio da Daret Primo Viſir, e da gli altri corteggiani, facendolo ſempre guardar in cielo, quando uſciva in publico, e fingendo miracoli: fu depoſto, havendo il Muſti promulgato, che l' Alcorano vietava l' obbedienza ad un Re inſenſato, durante il quale erano inefficaci l' orationi, e invalidi i matrimonii (5). There is no nation in the world that ſpeaks more advantageouſly of their monarchs, and of the obedience due to them, than the Turks: they are utter ſtrangers to the great diſputes of the weſtern Politicians, concerning the origin of ſovereignty: they never ſpeak one word of any original contract between kings and their people; they never enquire whether the right of governing is derived from the people, nor how far it is communicable. According to their maxim, the beſt form of government is the deſpotic power of a monarch; to die in obedience to the Sultan, is a ſtep by which they are to aſcend to the higheſt ſtations of Paradiſe (6). Who would not believe, from all this, that the throne of the Grand Seignor is fixed upon an immovable foundation? And yet, if we conſult hiſtory, we ſhall find there are no monarchs in the world whoſe authority is more precarious than that of the Ottoman emperors. Their ſubjects are not ſatisfied with mutinying againſt them, with dethroning them, and ſtrangling them before the concluſion of their rebellion; they likewiſe make uſe of other means: they depoſe them very often by a legal proceſs; they deliberate upon their fate with tranquillity and gravity, they put it to the vote, and condemn them to perpetual impriſonment. Thus they ſerved Mahomet IV, in 1687; and we have now ſeen, that in 1622, they paſſed the ſame ſentence upon Muſtapha. The Alcoran is conſulted upon theſe occaſions, as the prophecies of the Sibyls were formerly at Rome: and if they can engage the head of their religion in their intereſts, they may be ſure of ſucceſs. If the Mufti declares, that the law of GOD does not allow them to pay allegiance to a prince who is ſick, fooliſh, unhappy, or in priſon (7), it amounts to as much, or more, than if the Pope ſhould excommunicate a Chriſtian prince.

(5) Giornale de Letterati, for Jan. 28, 1675, pag. 3, in the abſtract of the Memoire Iſtoriche de Monarchi Ottomani di Giovanni Sagredo Cavaliere, printed at Venice in 1673, in 4*to.*

(6) See Rycaut, Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, book i, chap. i, ii.

(7) Ne' libri di Mahometto ſi vieta l'obbedienza à Re fatti priggioni per obligarli à defenderſi. - - - - The books of Mahomet prohibit obedience to kings taken priſoners, in order to oblige them to defend themſelves. Giornale de Letterati, ubi ſupra, pag. 4.

OSORIUS (JEROME) . . . . . .

. . . . . .

His treatiſe de Gloria, and that de Nobilitate Civili & Chriſtianâ are much eſteemd [A].

[A] His treatiſe de Gloria, and that de Nobilitate Civili & Chriſtiana are much eſteemed.] They are each of them divided into five books, and have been printed ſeveral times. The edition of Cologne, 1577, has prefixed to it an Epiſtle Dedicatory, by Bartholomew Bodegemius, to Matalius Metellus Sequanus; in which are mentioned an edition printed at Florence, and another in Germany. This Epiſtle Dedicatory is to be ſeen in the edition of Baſil, ex Officina Pernea, in 1584, in 8vo; but not in that of Antwerp, apud Henricum Aertſſens, in 1635, in 12mo. But there is added to this laſt, the Life of Jerome Oſorius, compoſed by his nephew.

'OSSAT (ARNAUD D') was left at nine years of age without father or mother, 'or eſtate. Some years after he was taken into the ſervice of the lord of Caſtelnau de 'Magnoac in the dioceſe of Auch who was likewiſe an orphan, and ſtudied along 'with him; but ſoon ſurpaſſed him. After they had finiſhed their ſtudies, the young 'lord's guardian [A] thought fit to ſend him to Paris; and judged he could not 'do better than commit him to the care of Mr Arnaud d'Oſſat his preceptor and 'governour, as appears from the account this guardian gave to his nephew. Thus 'he became maſter to his maſter. They arrived at Paris on Friday the fifth of 'May 1559. After that two other minors [B], who were firſt-couſins to the young 'lord, were ſent to be under his care. They continued at Paris under the conduct 'of Mr d'Oſſat till the month of May 1562; and then Mr d'Oſſat ſending them back 'to Gaſcogny wrote to their uncle in ſuch terms, as deſerve mentioning [C]. Mr 'd'Oſſat applying himſelf to the Bar, was known and eſteemed by a great many 'perſons

[A] The young lord's guardian.] This pupil of Mr d'Oſſat was named John de Marca, being deſcended from the houſe of Marca in Bearn, by Jerome de Marca, the ſon of Peter de Marca, and of Margaret d'Andoins. Jerome was captain of fifty croſs-bow-men, and governour of Furnes in Flanders, as appears from his contract of marriage with Dame Ameline de Riviere, Lady of Doublet and of la Paliſſe, and of ſeveral other lands in the neighbourhood of Caſtelnau de Magnoac. This contract was ſigned at Cominges the twelfth of February 1341, in which, among other things, it is covenanted, that the ſaid Jerome ſhall make his ordinary reſidence upon the eſtate of the ſaid lady. From this marriage was born a ſon called Peter de Marca, who was contracted in marriage with the lady Catherine de Mun, the daughter of Bernard de Mun, and of Paula de Sariac, the ſeventh of May 1398. I am not acquainted with the ſequel of this Genealogy; but all that is here inſerted I (1) have copied from the originals.

(1) That is, Mr Baluze. Apply this note throughout, wherever there is occaſion for it, in this article.

The name of de Marca, which is the true name of this family, was changed into that of de la Marque, by the authority of Mr d'Oſſat. And that he did after this manner. In the ſuperſcription of the firſt letter, he ſent from Paris to his pupil's guardian, who appears, by thoſe he wrote to him, to have been a very conſiderable man; he directed, A Monſieur Thomas Marca. But thinking that too country-like, he changed it, and wrote afterwards, Monſieur la Marca, and at laſt, Monſieur de la Marque. And this is the name they now go by. But the late Madam de la Marque, Margaret d'Eſpenan, cauſed one of her ſons, whom ſhe deſigned for the church, to be called, The Prior de Marca. I have a letter of that lady, written to her ſon, the prior, December 12, 1659; in which ſhe tells him, that the late Mr de la Marque, her huſband, had often given her a very exact account of the Genealogy of the family of Marca in Bearn, and how the family of Caſtelnau deſcended from them; and that her huſband had learned all this from his father, who was above an hundred years old when he died. Mr d'Oſſat, being a cardinal at Rome, ſent his picture to la Marque, where it is ſtill preſerved.

[B] After that two other minors were ſent to be under his care.] Of whom Mr d'Oſſat, being himſelf at that time but twenty years of age, writing to their uncle, December 27, 1559, ſays thus to him; As for me, I promiſe to furniſh your nephews with good learning, and a good example, and with every thing elſe that is in my power, to the laſt moment of my life; which I would ſooner part with than ſuffer them to want the leaſt thing that I ſhould think neceſſary for them.

[C] In ſuch terms as deſerve mentioning.] They are theſe: Laſtly, Sir, as for the thanks you give me for the care I have taken of your nephews, I look upon it as the reſult of your wonted goodneſs; the conſideration of which makes me eſteem all the trouble and pains I have been at on their account very well employed: and I do aſſure you, Sir, that my conſcience ſhall never check me for having failed in doing for them all that was in the compaſs of my knowledge and ability. From whence we may obſerve the honeſty, and good ſenſe, of Mr d'Oſſat, which already began to diſcover themſelves in matters of little conſequence.

[D] They

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ perſons of note, and among others by Meſſire Paul de Foix, who was then coun-‘ ſellor in the parliament of Paris. His merit, aſſiſted by the intereſt of his friends,
‘ procured him the poſt of counſellor in the Preſidial of Melun, which he continued
‘ to be poſſeſſed of in 1588, as appears from a Letter of Attorney ſent by him to ‘ Paris, in order to receive a gratuity granted him by the king. In the king's ‘ warrant for that gratuity, he is ſtyled Abbot de Notre Dame de Varennes, which ‘ is an abbey in the dioceſe of Bourges. From whence it is eaſy to conclude, that ‘ they are miſtaken, who write that he was dean of Varenes in the dioceſe of ‘ Rhodez [D], when he was made biſhop of Rennes. The reſt of his life is ‘ ſufficiently known (a). Several original letters of Mr d'Oſſat, written towards
‘ the latter end of 1584, are to be ſeen in Mr Colbert's library, which have not ‘ yet been printed. They were written to the king, queen, and others (b).’

(a) This article, and the remarks belonging to it, are only a tranſcript of a Memoir communicated by the illuſtrious Mr Baluze. I have made no alteration in it.

(b) Ibid.

The beſt edition of this cardinal's letters (§ z) is that of Paris in 1698 in 4to Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie has added ſome notes to it, together with the author's life, very accurately and judiciouſly written. We are obliged to him for refuſing to follow the bad counſel of thoſe, who would have had him reformed Oſſat's language [E]. It is a ſcandal to the nation that there ſhould be ſo many perſons in France,

[(§ a) They have not, however, reſtored in it, a certain paſſage in a letter of the tenth of February, 1603, where this prelate tells the king, that he did not think his majeſty ought to procure his promotion (to the cardinalſhip) becauſe, by this means, becoming a creature of the Pope, it might be doubted, whether for the time to come, perhaps, he might be able to ſerve his majeſty at Rome, with ſo much fidelity as he had done in the time paſt. The author, who, in 1664, diſcovered and gave notice of the ſuppreſſion of this paſſage *, thinks it probable that it was not done without deſign; and according to my notion, it is very likely to be owing to Cardinal Richelieu. The ſuppreſſion we are ſpeaking of, happened in the year 1624. It is well known what were the views, and what the authority of this Cardinal from that time. As to the letter itſelf, ſuch as Mr Amelot de la Houſſaye has publiſhed it, according to the caſtrated editions, it contains only a complaint to the king, and in truth a very moderate one, that a penſion of 4000 crowns, granted the Cardinal out of the treaſury, had been very ill paid, principally, for two years laſt paſt; and this complaint falls upon the duke de Sulli, lord-treaſurer, againſt whom the editor has inſerted a note, as if this duke, by an unexampled barbarity, had ſtopped the courſe of the king's favours, in regard to ſo faithful a ſervant as cardinal D'Oſſat. But who knows whether the duke de Sulli was as well ſatisfied of the fidelity of this cardinal after his promotion, as the author of the note? Perhaps he was not, and it might be to evince the contrary, that the cardinal inſinuates, that, as to himſelf at leaſt, it would be doing him wrong, to believe that his being a creature of the Pope could ever prevent his ſerving the king, with as much fidelity as before. REM. CRIT.]

* Traité des Legats à latere, pag. 52, of the ſecond number, of Traité de l'origine des Cardinaux, Edit. of Cologne 1665.

[D] They are miſtaken who write, that he was dean of Varennes in the dioceſe of Rhodez.] In this paſſage of Mr Baluze's Memoir, there is ſomething to rectify, as I learn from a book (2) which has appeared ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary. Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie obſerves (3), that the firſt benefice Mr d'Oſſat ever had, was the priory of St Martin du Vieux-Belleſme, which was given him by cardinal de Joyeuſe, in January or February in 1588. And as to what relates to the abbey of Notre-Dame de Varennes, he never was poſſeſſed of it, though indeed he was nominated to it by Henry III. The proofs upon which Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie builds appear ſtrong. The laſt is taken from it's being affirmed in the funeral oration on this cardinal, that having with a good intention, accepted a conſiderable benefice, which Henry III had given him, and ſome difficulties being ſtarted about the poſſeſſion, he forthwith reſigned it, not being willing to have diſputes with any one. And it is probable the abbey of Varrennes which this oration hints at (4): and conſequently, adds Mr Amelot, they are miſtaken themſelves, who have written, that it is a miſtake to ſay, that Mr d'Oſſat was dean of Varen, in the dioceſe of Rhodez, as he ſtiles himſelf in the petition he preſented to the Pope in the name of Henry IV, as being his ſpecial proxy and deputy in the affair of his abſolution (5).

(2) The Life of Cardinal d'Oſſat, prefixed to the edition of his Letters, publiſhed by Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie, in 1698.

(3) Amelot de la Houſſaie, Life of Cardinal d'Oſſat, pag. 5.

(4) Ib. pag. 6.

(5) Ib. pag. 5.

[E] We are obliged to him for refuſing to follow the bad counſel of thoſe who would have had him reform Mr d'Oſſat's language.] Thus he expreſſes himſelf in his advertiſement to the reader: ‘ We have not at ‘ all altered the language, and thoſe who give out ‘ otherwiſe are the very perſons who would have had
‘ it altered; and taking it ill that their advice was ‘ not followed have maliciouſly ſpread that report,
‘ with intent to depreciate this edition among thoſe
‘ who they know are admirers of cardinal d'Oſſat,
‘ as are all ſtateſmen in particular. And this ill ‘ counſel I oppoſed the more ſtiffly, becauſe I always ‘ thought, the nervous ſtyle of an author, who was ‘ born for negotiations, and whoſe way of ſpeaking
‘ is entirely conſecrated to the cuſtoms of the cabinet,
‘ would be quite ſpoiled by making him expreſs him-
‘ ſelf differently from what he really ſpoke and wrote.
‘ Beſides that no body would have ſhewn the ſame ‘ reſpect for my ſtyle, which they have for that of ‘ this great cardinal. Witneſs what Mr Boileau has ‘ ſaid of a member of the French Academy, who had ‘ reviſed ſome of Plutarch's lives tranſlated by ‘ Amyot. Witneſs alſo the refuſal of ſeveral
‘ of the moſt knowing Bookſellers in Paris, to my ‘ knowledge, about twelve years ago, to print the ‘ Memoirs of Comines which an ingenious lady had ‘ put into better French. So true it is, that the ‘ world is invincibly perſuaded, that there are ſome
‘ books which cannot be reviſed without ſpoiling
‘ them; and which reſemble thoſe natural beauties
‘ that never ſhine more than in their undreſs. Ver-
‘ bum non amplius addam.’ I am of opinion that Comines, Montagne, and ſome other writers, whoſe principal beauties are inſeparable from their ſtyle, will be proof againſt the attempts of reviſers. I am likewiſe of opinion, that the Heptameron of the queen of Navarre, which is now done into modern French, will be rejected by perſons of good taſte (6), but I am of opinion at the ſame time that the Bookſellers will take more liberty with reſpect to many other books: they will give editions reviſed and corrected as to the antiquated phraſes, and by that means will encourage more and more the falſe delicacy and lazineſs of an infinite number of readers: for it is a ſhame that thoſe who pretend to read, ſhould not have a deſire to know how their anceſtors ſpoke. This abuſe increaſes and grows ſtronger every day: nothing that was written in the reign of Lewis XIII, will now bear reading. The Bookſellers find it neceſſary, in order to gain cuſtomers, to get the ſtyle of the writing of thoſe times reviſed or modernifed. Thus they ſerved, in 1699, the hiſtory of the laſt duke of Montmorenci compoſed by the Sieur du Cros (7). This practice has been long in uſe. I have ſeen an edition of Joſephus tranſlated into French by Genebrard, which the Paris Bookſellers had got emended as to ſeveral words, and antique expreſſions, and yet I do not think Genebrard had been dead thirty years. They have taken the ſame liberty with reſpect to Amyot's Plutarch, which the Sieur Sorrel very juſtly diſapproves. It is ſufficient, ſays he (8), to knew that Amyot's language was eſteemed by the brighteſt wits of his age. They do him a great deal of injuſtice in thinking to correct him by pruning ſome of his old words, and ſubſtituting others in their place. That is robbing him of all his ſtrength and ſimplicity. And yet it ſo happenned, that ſome Paris Bookſellers ſome years ago publiſhed an impreſſion of that antient tranſlation in a large folio, in which they have here and there lopped off the old words. Some were of opinion, that this would make the book more agreeable to read, that

(6) See, above, the firſt article NAVARRE, remark [N].

(7) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Decemb. 1699, pag. 670, & ſeq.

(8) Sorel, Bibl. Françoiſe, pag. 220, the Paris edition 1667.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

France, who are not able to bear the ſtyle of the XVIth century; however this bad taſte is not ſo univerſal, but that a great many readers may yet be met with, who are for preſerving the writings of that time, ſuch as they were compoſed by the authors. This appears from the apprehenſions the Paris Bookſellers were under, of not finding their account in printing Philip de Comines's Memoirs in modern French. This will be ſeen below in the remark [E]. I wiſh Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie had not even taken a fancy to alter the orthography of the original. It is not probable that Mr d'Oſſat checquered his writings with ſo many circumflex accents, and ſuppreſſed the letter ſ in ſo many places (c). This want of probability is not agreeable to a reader that loves exactneſs. I cannot paſs over in ſilence Mr de Wicquefort's judgment of our d'Oſſat's merit [F]. See alſo Mr Perrault's ſecond part of the Illuſtrious Men of the XVIIth century (d).

(c) Compare this with the remark [D] of the article ESPAGNET.

(d) Pag. 12, & ſeq. of the Dutch Edit.

and that they had done well to permit it. But others imagine, that greater veneration is due to good ands antient books, and that it is a ſort of ſacrilege to uſe them after that manner, eſpecially conſidering that thoſe who were employed in that work, were but ſorrily qualified for it. They think that the old tranſlation ſhould either continue as it is, or elſe another be made entirely new, if any one pretends to be able to publiſh a better according to the preſent taſte. Neither does he approve of the alteration of the original of Joinville. We ſhall give his own words (9). 'It is true, we find in the 'Hiſtory of Joinville a great appearance of the ſim- 'plicity of the age he lived in, and that thoſe of his 'rank, were but little acquainted with the manner of 'compoſing a diſcourſe. Nevertheleſs, I think they 'have done us an injury in changing many of the 'old words in his book, as we ſee they have done 'in divers impreſſions, becauſe it is no longer the 'ſame work, but an entire tranſlation of the old lan- 'guage into the modern language. This may in the 'end occaſion the loſs of the original, ſo that we 'ſhall be at a loſs to know with any exactneſs, how 'they ſpoke in the time when it was compoſed. It 'would have been much better to leave it in it's firſt 'dreſs: if there were any paſſages in it no longer 'intelligible, they might have been explained in the 'margin, or elſe in notes annexed; this variety had 'been very agreeable.' He had ſpoke much to the ſame purpoſe, in pag. 252, where note, he obſerves that Commines's Hiſtory, as well as that of Joinville, has been printed in ſeveral different forms, and that ſuch words as were taken to be obſolete were changed. How ancient this cuſtom has been among the French, you will ſee by the following paſſage of Stephen Paſquier. 'The 'like fault we meet with in our antient manuſcripts 'of our Roman de la Roſe, in each of which the 'French language is ſuch as was ſpoken when the 'copies were taken, except only in the rhyme of 'the verſes where they could not make any alteration. 'Nay, you will there ſee a ſtrange hobbling of what 'the copiers have put in, I mean ſome words of Pi- 'cardy, Normandy, or Champagne. Which are things 'that a reader ought to have a great regard to, be- 'fore he interpoſes his judgment (10).

(9) Ibid. pag. 321, 322.

(10) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, book viii, ch. xliv, pag. 756: Edit. of Paris 1621, in fol.

[F] Mr de Wicquefort's judgment of our d'Oſſat's merit.] He has in this done a great deal of honour to his own judgment. Theſe are his words (11): I have nothing to ſay of Arnauld cardinal d'Oſſat, becauſe it is impoſſible to ſpeak of him without doing him injuſtice, ſince Antonius Muretus, the moſt eloquent perſon of his age, comes ſhort in endeavouring to make his elogy in his funeral oration. I ſhall ſay nothing more of him, but that no miniſter ever diſcharged his truſt with ſo much affection, ſo much zeal, ſo much application, and ſo much fidelity, for the king, his maſter, as this prelate did. As for his capacity, we may judge of that by what we have of his negotiations; for which, as well as for ſeveral other excellent treatiſes, the public is obliged to the late Meſſieurs du Puy, who are the honour and ornament of our age. He has given proofs of his addreſs in his negotiation with the great duke of Tuſcany for the reſtitution of the iſland d'Iſ: in that with Clement VIII, for the reconciliation of Henry IV, to the church of Rome, for the declaration of the nullity of that king's marriage with queen Margaret de Valois, which had ſtood thirty years, and for the diſpenſation of the marriage of Catherine de Bourbon, king Henry's ſiſter, with the duke of Bar, and for ſeveral other very important and very difficult affairs. His diſpatches are not leſs neceſſary to an embaſſador, who expects to ſucceed in his poſt, than the Bible and the Corpus Juris are to Divines and Lawyers who would be eminent in their profeſſion. This judgment is given by a great maſter, for Mr de Wicquefort underſtood theſe matters very well; and quotes Mr d'Oſſat's letters ſo often, that it appears he had read them over and over very attentively. We muſt excuſe his miſtake in believing that Muretus made this cardinal's funeral oration. That Orator had been dead a long time, when the Jeſuit Gallutius in 1604, pronounced at Rome cardinal d'Oſſat's funeral oration. We muſt obſerve, that thoſe very letters which Mr de Wicquefort valued ſo much, are highly recommended to the Politicians by the Sieur Naudé. 'Omnium 'meritò cenſentur utiliſſime digniſſimæque, quæ Poli- 'ticorum mentibus atque oculis perpetuo obverſentur, 'Cardinalis Oſſati Epiſtolæ: utpote quæ graviſſimò 'ac planè ſenili cultu exaratæ ſunt, feraciſſimoque 'graviſſimarum rerum ac ſententiarum ingeniò, nuſ- 'quam laxæ, nuſquam molles, ſemper æquales, ſem- 'per lectoris animum demulcentes, detinentéſque ju- 'cundiſſimâ rerum ac rationum varietate (12). - - - - - 'Cardinal d'Oſſat's letters are juſtly eſteemed above all 'others moſt uſeful, and worthy to be perpetually read 'and meditated on by Politicians: as being compoſed 'with the greateſt gravity and the moſt conſummate 'advantages of old age, and with the moſt extenſive 'knowledge of important facts and ſentiments, never looſe, 'nor ſoft, but always of a piece, always entertaining 'and engaging the mind of the reader with the moſt 'agreeable variety of things and reaſonings.'

(11) Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, book ii, §. xvii, pag. m. 423, 424. See alſo §. x, of the ſame book; and §. vii, of the firſt book, pag. 173.

(12) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Politica, pag. 538, Edit. Cremii 1692.

OTHO III, was not above twelve years of age, when he ſucceeded his father, who died in 983. This was the cauſe, that the beginning of his reign was not exempt from troubles: but all theſe diſorders were happily ſuppreſſed; and when his years qualified him for ruling by himſelf, he ſhewed himſelf worthy of that poſt. His preceptor was the famous Gerbert a native of Auvergne (a), whom he made archbiſhop of Ravenna, and afterwards Pope by the name of Sylveſter II. The moſt perplexing affairs he had upon his hands were at Rome, where Creſcentius endeavoured to retain to himſelf the ſovereign power, and baniſhed from thence Pope Gregory V, the emperor's near relation [A]. Creſcentius made preparations for a vigorous defence, upon the news of Otho's march towards Rome to puniſh him; but he ſcarce made any reſiſtance, being obliged, in a few days, to ſurrender himſelf with the Anti-Pope he

(a) Du Cheſne, Lives of the Popes.

[A] Gregory V, the emperor's near relation.] His name was Bruno, and he was the ſon of Otho of Saxony, duke of Franconia and Suabia, which Otho was the ſon of Ludolphus and grand-ſon of Otho I: ſo that Bruno was great-grand-ſon of Otho I, grand-father of Otho III. Thoſe who make him the preceptor of Otho I have been ſeverely reprehended (1). Some may doubt whether the critic be in the right in giving

(1) See the Specimen Errorum, publiſhed by Perionius in 1693, pag. 119.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he had created. The Anti-Pope was whipped, and had his eyes put out, and at last was killed by the mob before the emperor had time to condemn him [B]. We shall see what was the punishment of Crescentius [C]. This happened in 998. Pope Gregory V being then restored, died some months after; and then it was that Otho preferred Sylvester II to the pontifical chair. The Romans taking courage from the absence of the emperor, upon his return to Germany, made a new insurrection; for they did not like to be governed by the Germans. Otho was under the necessity of trying once more to restore the tranquillity of that city; but he took the wrong course: he was in hopes, that if he appeared sola Majestate armatus, - - - armed only with majesty, every one would return to their allegiance; but he experienced the contrary. His example has shewn, that no prince ought ever to expose his majesty unguarded, to the discretion of a mutinous mob. The people of Rome took so great advantage of Otho's having no troops about him, that they blocked him up in his palace; and if Hugh marquis of Tuscany, and Henry duke of Bavaria, had not speedily repaired to Rome, and amused the people with several proposals of accommodation, till they concerted proper means for the emperor's escape, it is not known what might have become of him in that his unavoidable captivity. This happened in 1001. But as this prince had a body of good troops in Italy, whither he returned, only to expel the Saracens, from whom he retook Capua, he was not long in returning to Rome [D] with such a force that he punished them at pleasure. In the beginning of 1002 he set out upon his return to Germany, but died at Paterno, before he got out of Italy, on the twenty-eighth of January in the same year. His death was attributed to poisoned gloves, which the widow of Crescentius, one of the handsomest women of that age, gave him, to revenge his breach of promise. He enjoyed her upon a promise of marriage, and after he had gratified his passion, he made a jest of his promise (b). He was not fortunate in relation to women [E], for the lady whom he married (c) joined to her debaucheries another crime, for which he caused her to be giving the quality of duke of Bavaria to Otho the son of Ludolphus; for it is certain, on the one hand, that Bavaria being given, by Otho I, to his brother Henry, continued in the possession of the descendants of that Henry; and, on the other, that Otho the son of Ludolphus was duke of Suabia after his father: but at the same time it is equally certain, that Otho II, being at war with Henry II, duke of Bavaria, gave Bavaria to Otho the son of Ludolphus (2).

(b) Taken from Maimbourg, Decad de l'Empire, lib. ii.

(c) MARY OF ARRAGON. See her article.

(2) See the History of Bavaria, by Blanc, Tom. i, pag. 138.

[B] The Anti-Pope . . . was . . . . killed by the mob, before the emperor had time to condemn him.] Some say (3) that the mobb seized upon the Anti-Pope before Otho was received in Rome; that they pulled out his eyes, that they cut off his ears and his nose; that they set him upon an ass, with his face to the ass's tail; and that Otho, to whom they afterwards opened the gates, banished him to the remotest parts of Germany, where he died of grief soon after. Thus you see some apply to the Anti-Pope part of what others say of Crescentius. Some will have it (4), that it was Otho who ordered the Anti-Pope's nose to be cut off, his eyes to be put out, and thrown headlong from the castle of St Angelo. These variations give a cruel disrelish to the study of history, and are the dishonour of mankind; for if men deserved any regard, there would be a perfect uniformity among Historians upon facts so remarkable as these. But how should several Historians agree, when we find very often one and the same Historian differ with himself? Consult Matthias's Theatrum: there you will find in page 888, That the Anti-Pope was whipped, blinded, and at last killed by the Pope, before Otho had condemned him (5); and in the very next page you have it, that the emperor having caused the Anti-Pope's nose to be cut off, and his eyes put out, threw him head-long from the Capitol. Imperator anno Christi 998 Romam profectus est, antipapam naso & oculis privavit, & de capitolio præcipitem dedit, uti supra prolixius diximus. These last words are very strange; the author makes a false quotation of himself, for he had given a quite different account from what he gives in this place.

(3) Petr. Damian. Epist. II, ad Cad. Ciconius, Sigonius cited by Maimbourg, Decadence de l'Empire, lib. ii.

(4) Heiss, History of the Empire, Tom. i, pag. 122.

(5) Anti papa à vulgo virgis cæsus, oculis privatus, & demum confessus, priusquam de eo Otto sententiam tulit.

[C] We shall see what was the punishment of Crescentius.] They mounted him upon an ass, with his face to the asses's tail, and in that posture carried him through the city; and then cut off several of his limbs, and hanged him. His accomplices were punished, some one way, some another (6). Here follows the account some writers give of the matter (7) Crescentius having defended himself as long as he could in the fortress of Rome, endeavoured to prevent his destruction by going to throw himself at Otho's feet; but that prince ordered him to be carried back to the castle, that he might take him by main force. There Crescentius held out to the last extremity; at last the place was taken by storm, and all was put to the sword, excepting Crescentius, who was taken much wounded, and thrown head-long from the highest part of the fortress, dragged through the dirt, and then hanged up on so high a gibbet (8), as to be exposed to the view of all the city (9). According to Moreri he was only beheaded; but Heiss (10) says, that both he and twelve of his accomplices were hanged upon the highest tree that could be found.

(6) Ex Setho Calvisio.

(7) Glaber. lib. i, & Dithmar, lib iv, cited by Maimbourg, ubi supra.

(8) See the remark [B] of the article BABELOT.

(9) Maimb. ibid. pag. m. 123.

[D] He was not long in returning to Rome.] After having maturely weighed the account of several Historians, it seems evident to me, that Matthias is mistaken, when he says, that Otho designed to retire to Germany with intent to raise an army there, which might enable him to punish the rebellion of the Romans; but that he died by the way. Upon this foot he must have died without being revenged; but this is contradicting good authors (11). But after all, it would be very great rashness to rank this in the list of faults; for the history of that middle age is so perplexed, and has passed through so many bad hands, that we meet with authorities pro and con, and for a thousand sorts of variations. This deprives me of a large field of materials; for if I should venture to censure those who relate matters of fact one certain way, there would not be wanting authorities to oppose me. It is almost impossible to frame a lye (12) for these centuries. Do but tell the circumstances of any fact, according to your own fancy, or entirely at random, and you will seldom happen to be without an author to favour your account.

(10) Hist. de l'Empire, Tom. i, pag. m. 122.

(11) See Dithmar. apud Calvis. ad ann. 1001, 1002.

(12) That is, to advance things without proof or authority.

[E] He was not fortunate in relation to women.] In general it seems the sex was unlucky to him; for besides what I hinted of his wife and his mistress, I have read somewhere (13), that it was for the love of this mistress, I speak of the widow of Crescentius, that he entered Rome with so sorry a retinue, as to run the risque of a perpetual prison. Add to this, that Theophania, his mother, the daughter of an emperor of Constantinople, rendered him odious to a great many of the nobles (14); and that after the death of his mother (15), being bred up by Adelais, his grandmother, he found himself obliged to send her from court. This was not, in all probability, by advice of the wise men of his court, but out of an opinion, that it was necessary for the good of his affairs. But this did not hinder him from entrusting governments to women: during his expedition to Rome in 996, he gave the government of Saxony to Matilda, his mother's sister, and after her death to his sister Adelais.

(13) Huber. Histor. Civil. Tom. i.

(14) Cluver. Universal History in Otho III.

(15) Which happened according to Cluverius in 989, or according to Calvisius, Matthias, &c. in 991.

[F] This

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be burnt; and this lady whom he did not marry [F] was the author of his death. Thoſe, who ſay that the college of the ſeven electors was erected in his time, are miſtaken (d), whether they attribute it to Otho himſelf, or to Pope Gregory V. It may be ſaid with more reaſon, that Poland was made a kingdom by this emperor, as I have obſerved in the article of Boleſlaus I. There is a wonderful account given of this Otho's penitence [G]. He was ſo very devout as to undertake pilgrimages (e); and it is even ſaid that he made a promiſe to turn Monk (f). I ſhall not inſtance for a proof of his devotion, his garment, upon which the whole ſtory of the Revelations was embroidered (g).

(d) See the proofs for it in Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

(e) See the article BOLESLAUS I.

(f) Calvif. ad ann. Chriſti 1001.

(g) Matthias, Theatr. Hiſtor. pag. m. 886.

[F] This lady whom he did not marry.] A certain Hiſtorian, whoſe name is Glaber, ſays, Otho did marry her. But this is very certain, that after he had admitted her into his bed, he diſliked her and put her away.

[G] There is a wonderful account given of this Otho's penitence.] It is pretended, that he faſted a whole week, excepting Thurſday, and that he cried bitterly to expiate the guilt of his ſins. The Latin will expreſs it beſt. Plurima ingemiſcens facinora noctis ſilentio, vigiliis & orationibus intentus, lacrimarum quoque rivis abluere non deſtitit, ſæpenumero omnem hebdomadam excepta quinta feria jejunium producens, in eleemoſynis valde largus (16). Add to this what I have related elſewhere (17) of his pilgrimages.

(16) Dithmar. lib. iv, apud Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 128.

(17) In the remark [A] of the article BOLESLAUS I.

OTTOBONI (PETER) a native of Venice, was Pope in the XVIIth century, under the name of ALEXANDER VIII. Marc Ottoboni, his father, grand chancellor of Venice, bought a patent of nobility, which coſt him an hundred thouſand ducats, in 1646. Peter Ottoboni having purſued his ſtudies firſt at Venice, and then at Padua, and taking the degree of Doctor of Law at the latter of thoſe two places, went to Rome at the age of twenty. He had, under Pope Urban VIII, the government of Terni, Rietti, and Citta-Caſtellana, and the poſt of auditor of the Rota. He received the cardinal's cap under Innocent X, in the year 1652. Two years after he was made biſhop of Breſcia. He was datary under Alexander VII, and was at laſt choſen Pope, October the ſixth 1689, after the death of Innocent XI (a). The war which was kindled with ſuch violence between the houſe of Auſtria and France, contributed not a little to the election of Ottoboni; for the neutral cardinals did juſtly fear they ſhould too much expoſe the Catholic religion, by creating a Pope born a ſubject to the king of Spain, as the late Pope was, whoſe partiality againſt France had done infinite ſervice to the Proteſtants. They thought therefore, that Ottoboni, who was qualified for the chair, would be a more proper perſon than any other in that juncture, in regard he was a Venetian. The only advantage which France reaped from this election, was, that Pope Alexander VIII, did ſo ſtrenuouſly animate the Venetians to wage war with the Turks, and encouraged them with ſuch effectual aſſiſtance, that he quite fruſtrated all hopes of a peace, which the emperor was deſirous of concluding with the Porte, in order to employ all his troops againſt France. As for the reſt, Alexander VIII thought of nothing but the aggrandizing of his family [A]. He gave himſelf ſcarce any manner of concern about the differences between France and the court of Rome [B]. He

(a) Mercure Galant, for October 1689.

[A] He thought of nothing but the aggrandizing of his family.] What is commonly ſaid of beaſts, that they are never more dangerous than in their dying bites (1), may very properly be applied to Nepotiſm. As it ſtood upon its laſt legs, under Alexander VIII, ſo it gathered together all its ſtrength, to be the more capable of devouring. It might have been ſaid of the uncle, he is old, he makes haſte, knowing that he has but a ſhort time to ſtay. Mr Menage told a ſtory, that will come in here very à propos. Alexander VIII, (ſaid he) being elected Pope at ſeventy-nine years of age, and having preferred all his nephews in three weeks after, aſked one of his domeſtics, what people ſaid of him. The domeſtic made anſwer, that people ſaid he loſt no time in the advancement of his family. Oh, oh, ſaid the Pope, ſono vinti tre hore e mezza, I have but half an hour left out of four and twenty (2). To behave himſelf, as he did, with reſpect to an abuſe that his ſucceſſor ſhould have aboliſhed, was giving it an honourable funeral. Perhaps Pope Ottoboni's great age was not the only reaſon that obliged him to ſuch quick diſpatch in loading his whole family with riches; he conſidered perhaps, that Rome had had time to forget in ſome meaſure the diſorders of Nepotiſm, which had never appeared under the long reign of Innocent XI. Upon this conſideration the complaints of the people might be fainter, and he had to do with ſubjects, who had enjoyed an interval of repoſe after their antient fatigues. This calls to my mind the ſharping tricks of flatterers, and the dexterity with which, like true jugglers, they paſs backwards and forwards the moſt ſacred things: but that this criticiſm, which does not ariſe from my own bottom, may have more weight and authority, I ſhall give it from a book printed with licence at Paris (3). 'Among the Encomiums he (4) beſtows upon 'Innocent XI, that which he is moſt full of, is, his 'having kept his nephews in a private ſtation, in 'imitation of our Saviour, who knew no other rela- 'tions, but thoſe who did the will of his father. 'Alexander VIII, having had views directly oppoſite 'to thoſe of his predeceſſor, Palatio has found out a 'method to juſtify his ſollicitouſneſs in loading his re- 'lations, with riches and honours; and maintains, 'that in that point alſo the Pope imitated the example of 'our Saviour, who honoured his relations according to 'the fleſh, with the participation of his prieſthood, 'and intruſted them with the diſpenſation of his 'Goſpel: So fertile is eloquence in inventions, when 'it is employed in flattering the paſſions of gover- 'nors, and excuſing the greateſt irregularities in their 'conduct.'

(1) Ut quam maxime mortiferi eſſe morſus ſolent morientium beſtiarum, ſic plus negotii fuit cum ſeminuta Carthagine quam integra. - - - - As beaſts are uſed to give the moſt dangerous bites when dying, ſo Carthage, when half ruined, gave a great deal more trouble than in it's proſperity. Florus, lib. ii, cap. xv. Add to this theſe words of Seneca, Controv. Epit. IX. In gladiatoribus quoque conditio dura victoris eſt cum moriente pugnantis. Nullum magis adverſarium timeas quam qui vivere non poteſt, occidere poteſt. Concitatiſſima eſt rabies in deſperatione, & morte ultima in furorem animus impellitur. - - - In gladiatorial encounters, it is a very hard condition, that the victor muſt fight with a dying man. No adverſary is ſo much to be dreaded as he who cannot live, but yet can kill. Diſpair furniſhes the moſt violent rage, and the agonies of death drive the ſoul to madneſs.

(2) See the Menagiana, pag. 208, Dutch Edit.

(3) Journal des Sçavans, Decemb. 15, 1692, pag. 731, Dutch Edit.

(4) That is, John Palatius, author of a book in five volumes in folio, printed at Venice in 1691, and intituled, Geſta Pontificum Romanorum.

[B] He gave himſelf ſcarce any manner of concern about the difference between France and the court of Rome.] And yet that affair was of ſuch conſequence, as to require a ſpeedy concluſion; and if Alexander VIII, had had as much zeal for the intereſts of St Peter's chair, as for thoſe of his family, his conſidering as he did of the ſhort time he had to live, would have induced him much more to make haſte in accommodating the difference with France, than in enriching his relations. By delaying it he left to his ſucceſſor, the glory of re-eſtabliſhing in France the authority of the Pope upon the ancient foot; which it had been impoſſible to effect, had they waited till the king of France had been at peace with his neighbours. True Policy required,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He did nothing but amuſe the miniſters of Lewis XIV, and all of a ſudden, by the publication of a bull a little before his death [C], he diſcovered, that he had only deceived them. France changed her ſtyle, in hopes to procure his favour; for ſome time they had ſaid but little in praiſe of Innocent XI, and after that they had expreſſed a great many hard things of him: the Poets and the Orators began to cry up his ſucceſſor. But they found by experience that the ſureſt game, with reference to encomiums, would be to obſerve the maxim recommended by Solon for determining a man's felicity [D]. Cardinal Peter Ottoboni was ſo old when he came to the chair, that it is no wonder his reign was ſo ſhort. He enjoyed the papal dignity but fifteen or ſixteen months; for he dyed on the firſt of February 1691. A prediction was handed about in relation to his death, which has very much the air of an impoſture [E].

quired, that the court of Rome ſhould make the beſt uſe of the entangled ſtate of France; and that Innocent XII did very dextrouſly. Some fanatics who had conceived hopes, that the league formed againſt France in 1688, would be fatal to the Papacy, and that the approaching ruin of Catholicism would begin with the reformation of the court of France, were very much out in their meaſures; for that league has made France more Popiſh than it was in 1682 and 1688, and conſequently occaſioned the reparation of one of the breaches of Popery. What fools are they who credit ſuch creatures. See the Remark [C] of the Article BRAUNBOM.

[C] By the publication of a Bull a little before his death.] The Bull was ready the fourth of Auguſt, 1690; for it bears date on that day; but it was not publiſhed till January the thirtieth 1691. It thunders againſt all that had been done to the prejudice of the Pope's authority in the aſſembly of the clergy of France in 1682. It was not publiſhed ſooner, becauſe the Pope had a mind to amuſe Lewis XIV, and gain ſome advantages by the delay; but when he ſaw himſelf at the brink of the grave, he obſerved no further meaſures, but let fly his Bull. This was of very good uſe to the expounders of St Malachy; they did not know how to apply to Peter Ottoboni the Symbol Pœnitentia Gloriosa, which concerns him in the predictions of that pretended Prophet. They were not content with ſaying, that the election of this Pope was made on St Bruno's day, or that he bore the name of Peter, though the penitence of theſe two ſaints was altogether glorious: this they looked upon as too forced and far fetched: but the Bull gave them occaſion to ſay, that at laſt Alexander VIII, had gloriouſly repented of his indulgences for the court and clergy of France (5). I obſerve here, that the decree of the Inquiſition of the ſeventh of December, 1690, againſt thirty-one propoſitions, vexed the Divines of the Gallican church. See the letter of an abbot to a Prelate of the court of Rome (6).

(5) See the Leipſic Journal for 1691, pag. 151.

(6) It contains ſixty-ſix pages in 12mo, in my edition, which is the ſecond. The title bears, according to the edition of Toulouſe 1691.

[D] The maxim recommended by Solon to determine a man's happineſs.] This maxim is, that we can form no judgment of a man's felicity before he is dead; for thoſe who appear happy to us, may perhaps be plunged into the deepeſt miſery, before they leave this world. Ovid has expreſſed this thought of Solon very finely.

——— Sed ſcilicet ultima ſemper
Expectanda dies homini: dicique beatus
Ante obitum nemo ſupremaque funera debet (7).

(7) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. III, ver. 135.

But no frail man, however great or high,
Can be concluded bleſt before he die.

GARTH.

The inſtability, or depravity, of the heart of man, ought to induce us to delay the giving encomiums, till the perſon is no more. By this caution we ſhall ſave ourſelves the trouble of altering our language, and a great many other inconveniences. Salvian was not unacquainted with this maxim. Sapientia, inquit ſermo divinus, in exitu canitur. Cur eam non dixit cani in pueritia, non in juventute, non in ſtatu rerum incolumium, non in proſperitatibus ſecundorum? Silicet quia in his omnibus quicquid laudatur incertum eſt. Quàm diu enim quis ſubjacet mutationi, non poteſt cum ſecuritate laudari. Et ideo, ut ait, ſapientia in exitu canitur. Exiens enim quis de incertis periculorum, certum merebitur evaſa omni rerum varietate ſuffragium: quia tunc ſtabilis & firma laus eſt, quando meritum non poterit jam perire laudati. Sapientia, inquit, in exitu canitur (8).

(8) Salvianus, contra Avaritiam, lib. iv, pag. m. 145.

[E] A prediction was handed about in relation to his death, which has very much the air of an impoſture.] A Frenchman, whoſe name I conceal, had written from Geneva to his friends in Holland, towards the beginning of the winter of the year 1690, that at Milan a man had been with his confeſſor, to acquaint him, That he found his own end approaching; that he ſhould die in two days, his brother in four, the Pope at Chriſtmas, and the king of France at Eaſter. The writer of that news added, that the two brothers died at the time mentioned. As ſoon as they knew that the Pope was not dead at Chriſtmas, the news was dropt; but at the ſiege of Mons (9) it was revived again: and to give it the more weight, Chriſtmas was no longer mentioned as the time prefixed for the Pope's death, but it was given out, that the man at Milan only ſaid that the Pope would die in a few weeks. It were to be wiſhed, that ſome body had given himſelf the trouble of keeping a regiſter of theſe idle predictions. Had they been marked down year after year in our Chronicles, we ſhould perhaps have been leſs ſubject to be impoſed upon by them.

(9) In the month of March 1691.

OVIDIUS NASO (PUBLIUS) a Roman knight, was one of the beſt Poets of the Auguſtan age. I have a great collection of materials for this article, but am not able to digeſt them at preſent: I ſhall only give a ſmall part of them. Nature inſpired him with ſuch a ſtrong diſpoſition to Poetry that, out of love to the Muſes, he renounced all that application which is neceſſary for thoſe who would arrive at dignities. But if his inclination to Poetry extinguiſhed in him all the fire of ambition, on the contrary it fed and inflamed that of love. He was exceſſively addicted to venereal pleaſure [A], and that was almoſt his only vice. He did not conten himſelf

[A] He was exceſſively addicted to venereal pleaſure.] He informs us himſelf of the qualifications with which nature had endowed him for that exerciſe, and the uſe he had made of them.

Exigere à nobis anguſta nocte Corinnam,
Me memini numeros ſuſtinuiſſe novem (1).

(1) Ovid. Amor. lib. III, Eleg. VII, ver. 25.

He found himſelf freſh and gay in the morning, after paſſing a whole night in amorous embraces, and wiſhed to die in the actual fruition of that pleaſure. Nothing ſeemed to him more ſuitable to the life he had led, than to make his exit in the like exerciſe.

Sæpe ego, laſcivæ conſumto tempore noctis,
Utilis & forti corpore mane fui.
Felix, quem veneris certamina mutua perdunt!
Dî faciant, leti cauſa ſit iſta mei!
Induat adverſis contraria pectora telis
Miles, & æternum ſanguine nomen emat.
Quærat avarus opes; & quæ laſſarit arando
Æquora, perjuro naufragus ore bibat.
At mihi contingat Veneris langueſcere motu;
Cùm moriar, medium ſolvar & inter opus:

Atque

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſelf with loving and making conqueſts in the way of galantry; but likewiſe taught the public the art of loving, and of making themſelves beloved: that is, he reduced into a ſyſtem a pernicious ſcience, of which nature gives us but too many leſſons, and which only tends to the diſhonour of families, and of the poor huſbands in particular. He was baniſhed for writing ſuch books; but in all appearance, that was rather the pretence than the true cauſe of his exile [B]. He employed in vain all the turns of his wit to pacify the emperor, whoſe favour nothing could procure. He dyed in the country of the Getæ, where he had been confined. Of three wives whom he married, he divorced the two firſt (a), and thought himſelf very happy in the third (b). There have been ſome Critics who have contemned his Latin [C]. They

(a) Ovid. lib. iii, Triſtium, Eleg. X.

(b) Ib. lib. i, Eleg. iii, & alibi.

Atque aliquis noſtro lacrymans in funere dicat,
Conveniens vitæ mors fuit iſta ſuæ (2).

(2) Ib. lib. II, Eleg. X, ver. 27.

What can one ſay, what can one conceive more proper to expreſs the fury of a laſcivious conſtitution to the laſt degree? I do not believe that Laïs the courtezan (3), who died in the manner that Ovid calls ſo happy; I do not believe, I ſay, that ſhe deſired that fate. This Poet's writings on love are the obſceneſt pieces we have remaining of antiquity: not that we find in them the obſcene expreſſions of Catullus, Horace, and Martial, or the ſcandals of the ſin againſt nature, of which theſe three Poets ſpeak ſo freely; but the delicacy, the choice of terms, which Ovid has excelled in, render his works the more dangerous, in regard they, by this means, repreſent in a very intelligible and elegant manner all the moſt laſcivious tricks and impurities of love. He does not ſpeak upon the credit of others, but from his own practice. It is true, in his apology, which he compoſed in the place of his exile, he proteſts he had not committed the actions he deſcribed, and that his head had a greater ſhare in thoſe deſcriptions than his heart. He boaſts that he had engaged in no love intrigues which had given occaſion for ſcandal, and that among the common people he had given none of them occaſion to doubt their being the fathers of their wives children.

(3) See, above, citat. (60) of the article LAïS.

Sed neque me nuptæ didicerunt furta magiſtro:
Quodque parum novit, nemo docere poteſt.
Sic ego delicias, & mollia carmina feci,
Strinxerit ut nomen fabula nulla meum.
Nec quiſquam eſt adeo mediâ de plebe maritus,
Ut dubius vitio ſit pater ille meo.
Crede mihi; mores diſtant à carmine noſtro.
Vita verecunda eſt, Muſa jocoſa mihi.
Magnaque pars operum mendax & ficta meorum
Plus ſibi permiſit compoſitore ſuo.
Nec liber indicium eſt animi, ſed honeſta voluptas,
Plurima mulcendis auribus apta ferens (4).

(4) Ovid. lib. II, Triſt. ver. 347.

To reconcile this with the nineteenth elegy of the ſecond book de Amoribus, we muſt conceive that what he ſays there of himſelf, is a fiction. He there exhorts his miſtreſs's huſband to be jealous, and not to rob him by his indolence of the choiceſt ſweets of his good fortune. He would have that man not to be a contented huſband, but a rival.

Quid mihi cum facili, quid cum lenone marito?
Corrumpis vitio gaudia noſtra tuo.
Quin alium, quem tanta juvet patientia, quæris?
Me tibi rivalem ſi juvat eſſe, veta (5).

(5) Id. Amor. lib. II, Eleg. XIX, in fine.

It is certain, that a great many Poets relate as fortunate adventures, what are only fictions of their brain; but we are at a loſs to determine whether this is Ovid's caſe. We are at too great a diſtance from the age in which he lived, and we cannot doubt but that ſome people, when called in queſtion (6), will boaſt of their innocence, though they are guilty.

(6) That is, when they find their own poems brought in as evidence againſt them.

[B] His books . . . . were rather the pretence than the true cauſe of his exile.] He owns in ſeveral places of his works, that the two cauſes of his miſery, were, that he had compoſed ſome books on the art of love; and that he had ſeen ſomething. He does not tell us what it was that he ſaw, but gives us to underſtand, that his books contributed leſs to his diſgrace than that did; for he ſuppoſes, that upon his complaining to love, that, after labouring to enlarge his empire, he had obtained no other reward but that of being baniſhed among Barbarians. Love made anſwer to him. You know very well that was not the thing that did you moſt harm.

Utque hæc, ſi utinam defendere cætera poſſes,
Scis aliud quod te læſerit, eſſe magis (7).

(7) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. III, Epiſt. III, ver. 71.

He compares himſelf to unfortunate Actæon.

Cur aliquid vidi? cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi eſt?
Inſcius Actæon vidit ſine veſte Dianam,
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille ſuis (8).

(8) Id. lib. II, Triſtium, ver. 103.

He repeats in ſeveral places the ſame complaint (9) of having ſeen, without deſign, the crime of another; and declares, that it is not lawful for him to reveal this myſtery (10). Attempts have been made to conjecture what it was; and the more ſilent he is, the greater has been the curioſity to penetrate into this ſecret. Some perſwade themſelves, that he ſurpriſed Auguſtus in a flagrant crime with Julia, his daughter, and confirm this by a paſſage of Suetonius, from which they pretend to gather, that Caligula deſpiſed his mother, becauſe he believed her to be the offspring of the inceſtuous commerce of Auguſtus with Julia. Alteram ſubjiciunt alii, nempe eum vidiſſe Auguſtum turpiter cum Juliâ filiâ jacentem. . . . . Cui opinione favere viſus eſt Caligula, dum matrem ſuam ſpernebat, quaſi ex inceſto concubitu Auguſti, cum filia ſua Julia, prognatam (11). It is certain, Suetonius (12) relates, that Caligula would not own Agrippa for his grandfather by the mother-ſide: he thought he was of too mean a rank for that character, and affirmed, that his mother was the daughter of the emperor Auguſtus and Julia: but this did not give him any diſ-reſpect to his mother Agrippina; for, on the contrary, he would have deſpiſed her, if he had thought ſhe had been born legitimately. The abbot de Marolles (13) having ſaid, that Ovid ſurpriſed Auguſtus uſing too much familiarity with his daughter Julia, adds, upon the teſtimony of Suetonius, that it was believed the mother of Caligula ſprung from the inceſtuous embraces of Julia and Auguſtus. But, it is not true that Suetonius ſays any ſuch thing; he only ſays Caligula gave it out ſo. The ſame abbot (14) tells us, that Ovid was baniſhed for having read to Julia, Auguſtus's grand-daughter, the laſt verſes of his book de Arte Amandi, and for having ſurpriſed Auguſtus, uſing that young princeſs with too much familiarity. There is room to doubt of all theſe conjectures; for Ovid having, in the verſes he compoſed in his exile and ſent to Rome, omitted no manner of ſubmiſſion and flattery which might ſeem capable to mollify Auguſtus, we cannot think that he would affect to inſert in them what was moſt proper to aggravate the emperor's diſpleaſure. Now, if we ſuppoſe the Emperor's diſpleaſure to have been grounded upon the Poet's ſeeing ſome infamous action, we muſt likewiſe ſuppoſe, that Ovid could not but offend him grievouſly by the affectation of ſaying, that his eyes, being the witneſſes of a ſecret he durſt not reveal, were the cauſe of his exile. But I confeſs, that this is not a convincing reaſon. See, below, remark [K].

(9) Inſcia quod crimen viderunt lumina pleſtor: Peccatumque oculos eſt habuiſſe meum. Ib. lib. III, Eleg. V, ver. 49.

(10) Perdiderint cum me duo crimina, carmen & error, Alterius facti culpa ſilenda mihi eſt. Ib. lib. II, ver. 207. Et quid præterea peccarim quærere noli, Ut pateat ſola culpa ſub arte mea. Ib. lib. II, de Ponto, Epiſt. IX, ver. 73.

(11) Brietius, de Poet. Latin.

(12) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxiii.

(13) In the Life of Ovid.

(14) In his notes upon the laſt verſes of the third book, de Arte Amandi, which are ſo looſe that he did not tranſlate them into French.

[C] There have been ſome Critics who have contemned his Latin.] Paſſerat owns, that he had been a Profeſſor of the learned languages a long time without having explained any of Ovid's pieces; and that becauſe he found a reigning prejudice againſt that Poet: ‘ Inveteravit enim opinio, vulgique fama percrebuit, ‘ eum poetam eſſe non multæ doctrinæ, humiliſque & ‘ nimium luxuriantis ſtyli; atque etiam, ſi diis placet, ‘ Latinæ linguæ elegantiam nitoremque in eo requiri: ‘ adeo

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

They would have met but with a sorry reception from Alphonso king of Naples [D]. I refer several things to the place where I censure Mr Moreri [E].

The

' adeò ut Italus quidam vel hac re inprimis nobilis,
' cum humanioribus literis unicum gnatum imbueret,
' illa miro artificio contexta mutatæ ter quinque vo-
' lumina formæ in patrium sermonem converterit, ne,
' si Latine legeret, ex Ovidii scriptis sordes & barba-
' riem colligeret beata pueri vena, quæ jam tum ad
' exemplum Maronis properabat (15). - - - - For an opi-
' nion had prevailed, and was in every body's mouth,
' that he was a Poet of no great learning, that his stile
' was low and too luxuriant, and also, God bless their ' judgment, that his language wanted politeness and ele-
' gance: so that while a certain Italian who was emi-
' nent for his knowledge this way, was instructing his ' only son in polite learning, he translated these fifteen
' books of the Metamorphosis composed with such wonder-
' ful art into his mother-tongue, lest his son's happy stile,
' which very closely followed that of Virgil, should be
' corrupted by Ovid's incorrectness and barbarisms, if he ' was to read them in the original Latin.' Balzac was not ignorant of the whimsical taste of this Italian. I know, says he (16), that under the pontificate of Leo X, a Venetian gentleman (17) who was much esteemed by Fracastorius, and whose name he gave to his dialogue on Poetry, had a custom on his anniversary birth-day of solemnly burning the works of Martial, as an annual sacrifice to the manes and memory of Catullus. And I am not ignorant, that another nice cotemporary of his, maintained that the corruption of the Roman language commenced in the person of Ovid, whose Metamorphosis he translated on purpose for the use of his son, that he might learn the Mythology without any danger from the locution, and that in seeking after the riches of poetry he might not endanger the nobleness of his own style by a contagious reading. Scaliger observes, that Peter Victorius and Lambinus contemned Ovid extremely. ' Petrus Victorius de Ovidio non veritus sit dicere, eum ut ora-
' tione & versibus, ita vita & moribus enervatum . . .
' Non longe ab hac temeraria sententia discedit Dio-
' nysius Lambinus, qui imperitissime eum malum La-
' tinitatis auctorem vocat (18). - - - - Petrus Victorius
' did not scruple to say that Ovid was equally corrupted
' in his stile and poetry, as in his life and morals. . . . .
' Dionysius Lambinus does not come much short of this
' rash judgment, when he foolishly calls Ovid the author
' of corrupt Latin.' Another learned Critic (19) complains of the same taste, without mentioning any body.

(15) Passeratius, Orat. & Præfat. pag. m. 218, 219.

(16) Ouvr. diverses, pag. m. 406.

(17) His name was Andrew Naugerius. See Strada, Prolus. V, lib. II, pag. m. 334, 335; & Paul Jovius, in Eleg. cap. lxxviii, pag. m. 181.

(18) Scalig. in Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 217.

(19) Moretus, in Senec. Quæst. Nat. lib. III, cap. xxvii.

[D] They would have met but with a sorry reception from Alphonso king of Naples.] That Prince being with his army in the neighbourhood of Sulmo, asked if it was certain, that Ovid was born there, and the people answering, that he certainly was, he saluted that town, and paid his acknowledgments to the genius of the country which had produced so great a Poet. He added, that he would willingly resign part of his territories, to call to life again that man, whose memory was dearer to him than the possession of Abruzzo. Urbem salutavit, gratiasque genio loci egit, in quo tantus olim poeta genitus esset, de cujus laudibus cum non pauca disseruisset, tandem famæ ejus magnitudine commotus: Ego, inquit, huic regioni quæ non parva regni Neapolitani, nec contemnenda pars est, libenter cesserim, si temporibus meis datum esset hunc poetam ut haberent, quem mortuum pluris ipse faciam, quam omnis Aprutii dominatum (20).

(20) Jovianus Pontanus, de Principe, fol. 54, verso, Oper. Tom. I, Edit. Florent. 1520, in fol.

[E] I refer several things to the place where I censure Mr Moreri.] I. His first fault is a misrepetition of the distich, in which our Poet declares, that he will do honour to his country (21).

Mantua, Virgilio gaudet, Verona Catullo,
Pelignæ (22) dicar gloria gentis ego (23).

Mantua, Verona, share their Poets fame,
And I my self will honour Sulmo's name.

(21) Ovid. Amor. lib. III, Eleg. XV, ver. 7.

(22) Ovid was born at Sulmo in the country of the Peligni.

(23) Moreri has ego instead of ego.

(24) This is corrected in the Dutch edition.

II. In the second place it is a terrible barbarism to say he was of the Equestrian family (24). III. It is not true, that Ovid in the second elegy of the first book de Tristibus, says, that when he was young he bore arms under Marcus Varro, in his expedition to Asia. The two verses cited by Moreri does not imply that. They are these:

Non peto quas quondam petii studiosus Athenas,
Oppida non Asiæ, non mihi visa prius.

I seek not Athens thy known learned shore,
Nor Asian towns, nor places seen before.

The best editions put it non loca visa prius, instead of non mihi visa prius; which two readings are much the same, so that I cannot see how Ciofanus, who follows the second reading, could find in this distich a proof, that Ovid bore arms under Marcus Varro, with whom he went into Asia, and being returned from thence made a voyage to Athens to study there. Sub M. Varrone, qui cum Asiam petiit militavit: inde reversus studii causa Athenas se contulit. Qua de re sic lib. I. Trist. Non peto quas quondam, &c. (25). Any one may see, that this distich proves, neither that Ovid bore arms under Marcus Varro, nor that he went with him to Asia, nor that he went to Asia before he went to Athens. The Poet, praying the Gods to put an end to the storm, represents to them; among other things, that he was come to sea upon an afflicting occasion, to go to Scythia, and not to Greece, or any other place he had seen before. IV. It is not true, That Seneca was of opinion that he had pleaded some causes at the bar. When Seneca is cited without any addition, we take it for Seneca the Philosopher, and without doubt Mr Moreri meant it so; and yet we meet with nothing in Seneca the Philosopher able to prove, that Ovid pleaded at the bar. It is more likely to be found in Seneca's father; but neither is it there; for there we only find, that our Poet studied the art of Oratory under Arellius Fuscus, and declaimed very successfully in his school. ' Hanc controversiam me-
' mini me videre Nasonem declamare apud Rhetorem
' Arellium Fuscum cujus auditor fuit . . . . Oratio
' ejus jam tum nihil aliud poterat videri quam solutum
' carmen. Adeo autem studiose Latronem audivit, ut
' multas ejus sententias in versus suos transtulerit . . . .
' Tunc autem cum studeret, habebatur bonus decla-
' mator. Hanc certe controversiam ante Arellium
' Fuscum declamavit, ut mihi videbatur longe ingenio-
' sius, excepto eo quod sine certo ordine per locos dis-
' curreret (26). - - - - Upon this subject I remember to
' have heard Ovid declaim before Arellius Fuscus the
' Rhetorician, whose scholar he was . . . . His oration
' at that time could be thought no other than poetical
' prose. He heard Latro with so much care, that he ' inserted a great many of his sentences in his verses. . . .
' At that time of his studies, he was esteemed a good
' Orator. Upon this subject it is certain he declaimed
' before Arellius Fuscus, in my judgment, much the most
' ingeniously, except only that he was too subject to di-
' gressions and want of method.' Mr Moreri is probably beholden for this fault to the abbot de Marolles (27), who has cited Seneca to prove, that Ovid pleaded at the bar. The fact is certain; but instead of having recourse to the pretended testimony of Seneca, he should have cited Ovid himself, who affirms, that he has pleaded for people, arraigned at the tribunal of the Centumviri, and that being chosen arbitrator upon some law-suits, he decided them like a man of honour.

(25) Hercules Ciofanus, in Vita Ov. di.

(26) Seneca pater, Controvers. X, sive II, lib. ii, pag. m. 353.

(27) In the Life of Ovid.

Nec male commissa est nobis fortuna reorum
Usque decem decies inspicienda viris.
Res quoque privatas statui sine crimine judex;
Deque mea fassa est pars quoque victa fide (28).

Before the Decemviri I've appear'd,
And for the guilty with success been heard.
In private matters I've explain'd the laws,
Nor cou'd he blame his judge, who lost his cause.

(28) Ovid. Trist. lib. II, ver. 93.

V. Moreri should not have said, that, after the death of his father he applied himself intirely to poetry; for in giving an account of himself, he mentions no such circumstance. He only says, that out of deference to the remonstrances of his father, he checked in his inclination to versifying, and applied himself to such offices as were proper for a young person of his rank (29). He takes notice (30) even of the death

(29) Sæpe pater dixit studium quid inutile tentas? Mæonides nullas ipse reliquit opes. Motus eram dictis, totoque Helicone relicto, Scribere conabar verba soluta modis. Sponte sua carmen numeros veniebat ad aptos. Et, quod tentabam scribere, versus erat. Ovid. Trist. lib. IV, Eleg. X, ver. 21.

(30) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The fineſt of Ovid's works is his Metamorphoſis. This was the judgment of the author himſelf; and it was from thence that he principally expected his name would be immortalized. He foretold that this performance would be proof againſt the injuries of ſword, fire, thunder, and time [F]. And that prediction has not yet proved falſe. The exordium, or beginning, of that poem is one of the fineſt parts of it. It is a deſcription of the Chaos, and of the manner in which the univerſe was formed out of it. Nothing can be clearer or more intelligible than that noble deſcription, if we confine our ſelves only to the Poet's phraſes; but if we examine his doctrines, we ſhall find them incoherent and contradictory; they will make a more frightful Chaos than that which he deſcribes. This gives me the opportunity of performing a promiſe I have made (c). I ſhall enquire whether the ideas of the antients who ſpoke of the Chaos were juſt; and whether they could ſay that this ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer [G]. I ſhall make it appear, that the death of his eldeſt brother, as preceding his return to Parnaſſus; but he ſays no ſuch thing with reference to the death of his father. And indeed how could he have ſaid any ſuch thing, ſince he declares, that he ſoon re-imbarked in poetry, and that his father lived ninety years (31). VI. The emperor did not baniſh him to the province of Pontus in Aſia. He ſent him to Tomi an European city upon the Euxine ſea, near the mouths of the Danube. VII. He ſhould not have mentioned without cenſure the opinion of thoſe, who ſay he was baniſhed for having made love to Julia the daughter of Auguſtus, whom he loved under the name of Corinna. This opinion is very ancient; Sidonius Apollinaris approves of it.

(c) In the remark [H] of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(31) Ibid.

Et te carmina per libidinoſa
Notum Naſo tenet, Tomoſque miſſum,
Quondam Cæſareæ nimis puellæ
Falſo nomine ſubditum Corinnæ (32).

And Ovid too for wanton verſes known,
Baniſh'd to diſtant Tomi's wretched town,
His daring love, not ſparing Cæſar's fame,
But claſping Julia in Corinna's name.

(32) Carm. xxiii, ver. 157. Savaro approves of this opinion, Not. ibid. & in Epiſt. X, lib. ii.

But Aldus Manutius (33) has refuted it by three arguments. The firſt is, that Ovid inceſſantly repeats, that his exile was owing to two cauſes, namely, his writing amorous verſes, and a fault which he does not reveal, and was accidental and involuntary (34). This is what cannot be ſaid of his amours with Auguſtus's daughter, which were carried to the pitch of enjoyment. Our Poet went that length with Corinna, as he tells us himſelf (35).

(33) In Vita Ovidii.

(34) See the remark [B], citation (7), and (8).

Singula quid referam? nil non laudabile vidi:
Et nudam preſſi corpus ad uſque meum.
Cætera quis neſcit? laſſi requievimus ambo.
Proveniant medii ſic mihi ſæpe dies (36).

(35) He flattered himſelf with the opinion of being the father of the child with which ſhe went. Et tamen aut ex me conceperat, aut ego credo. Eſt mihi pro facto ſæpe, quod eſſe poteſt. Ovid. Amor. lib. ii, Eleg. XIII, ver. 5.

Aldus Manutius's ſecond argument is borrowed from Ovid's being very young when he ſerved his Corinna.

Carmina cum primum populo juvenilia legi,
Barba reſecta mihi biſve ſemelve fuit.
Moverat ingenium totam cantata per Urbem
Nomine non vero dicta Corinna mihi (37).

(36) Ovid. in Amor. lib. I, Eleg. V, ver. 23.

When firſt around my amorous verſes flew,
My chin but once or twice the razor knew;
Fir'd by Corinna, ſo admir'd by fame,
I drew her beauties, but conceal'd her name.

(37) Ib. lib. IV, Triſt. Eleg. X, ver. 37.

Theſe verſes import, that Ovid was but about twenty years of age when he ſung his amours with his pretended Corinna. Now, when Auguſtus baniſhed him he was fifty years old. What probability is there that this emperor would be ſo ſlow in diſcovering the commerce of his daughter with a Poet, and in puniſhing him? Laſtly, Manutius obſerves, that Ovid would not have mentioned his Corinna in his verſes juſt now quoted, with ſo much complaiſance, if ſhe had been the cauſe of the diſgrace, which he ſo heavily deplores. VIII. I do not know of any who ſay that he made his addreſſes to Livia, Auguſtus's wife, and that he compoſed his books de Arte Amandi, for her. They would deſerve to be refuted more ſeverely than Sidonius Apollinaris. IX. Thoſe who ſay, that the city Tomi, near which he was buried, is now called Kiour (38), are as groſsly miſtaken as thoſe who ſay it is called Tomiſuar. For which reaſons Mr Moreri ſhould not have mentioned theſe things, without acquainting his reader that they are falſe. The town of Tomi, to which Ovid was baniſhed, was on this ſide the Danube, with reſpect to Italy (39). This does not ſuit either with Kiovia, which is ſituated upon the Boryſthenes, or with Temiſwar, a city in Tranſylvania. X. What Moreri relates of Ovid's tomb being found at Sabaria, or Stain in Auſtria, upon the Save, is altogether falſe, as I ſhall make it appear ſome time or other. XI. It was in 1540, and not in 1548, that the queen of Hungary ſhewed our Poet's pen. 'Iſabella Pannoniæ 'Regina circiter annum M. D. XL. Ovidii calamum ex 'argento Tauruni, quæ eſt urbs inferioris Pannoniæ, 'oſtendit Petro Angelio Bargæo, qui hoc ipſum mihi 'narravit, cum hac inſcriptione OVIDII NASONIS 'CALAMUS; qui non multo ante id tempus ſub 'quibuſdam antiquis ruinis fuerat repertus. Eum Re- 'gina ipſa plurimi faciebat, & veluti rem ſacram, 'carum habebat (40). - - - Iſabella, queen of Hungary, 'about the year 1540, ſhowed to Peter Angelius Bar- 'gæus, as he told me himſelf, the pen of Ovid, at Tau- 'runum, a town of the lower Hungary, with this in- 'ſcription, OVIDII NASONIS CALAMUS; which had 'been diſcovered but a little before under ſome antient 'ruins. The queen ſet a great value on it, and eſteemed 'it as ſome holy relic.' In the article of this queen, I have taken notice of her learning.

(38) It ſhould be Kiow, or Kiova. Hofman has likewiſe called it Kiour. Mr de Marolles in the Life of Ovid calls it Xiovia.

(39) Ne timeam gentes quas non bene ſubmovet Iſter. Ib. Triſt. lib. ii. See likewiſe lib. III, Eleg. X.

(40) Herculeſ Ciofanus, in Vita Ovidii, pag. m. 29.

[F] He foretold that his Metamorphoſes would be proof againſt the injuries of ſword, fire, thunder, and time.] The nine verſes which make the concluſion of it are theſe.

Jamque opus exegi, quod nec Jovis ira, nec ignes,
Nec poterit ferrum, nec edax abolere vetuſtas.
Cùm volet illa dies, quæ nil niſi corporis hujus
Jus habet, incerti ſpatium mihi finiat ævi:
Parte tamen meliore mei ſuper alta perennis
Aſtra ferar, nomenque erit indelebile noſtrum.
Quaque patet domitis Romana potentia terris,
Ore legar populi: perque omnia ſecula famâ,
Si quid habent veri vatum præſagia, vivam (41).

(41) Ovid. Metam. lib. xv, in fine.

The work is finiſh'd, which nor dreads the rage
Of tempeſts, fire, or war, or waſting age;
Come ſoon or late, death's undetermin'd day,
This mortal being only can decay;
My nobler part, my fame, ſhall reach the ſkies,
And to late times with blooming honours riſe:
Whate'er th' unbounded Roman power obeys,
All times and nations ſhall record my praiſe:
If 'tis allow'd to Poets to divine,
One half of round eternity is mine.

WELSTED.

[G] I ſhall enquire whether the ideas of the Antients who ſpoke of the Chaos were juſt, and whether they could ſay, that this ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer.] To proceed methodically in this taſk, I muſt firſt of all give you Ovid's deſcription of the Chaos; which is only an imitation, or rather a paraphraſe, of what he had met with in the writings of the antient Greeks.

Ante

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the ſtruggle of the four elements did not ceaſe at the time of the production of the world,

Ante mare & terras, & quod tegit omnia cœlum,
Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe,
Quem dixêre Chaos; rudis indigeſtaque moles:
Nec quicquam, niſi pondus iners, congeſtaque eôdem
Non bene junctarum diſcordia Semina rerum.
Nullus adhuc mundo præbebat lumina Titan,
Nec nova creſcendo reparabat cornua Phœbe,
Nec circumfuſo pendebat in aëre tellus,
Ponderibus librata ſuis: nec brachia longo
Margine terrarum porrexerat Amphitrite.
Quâque erat & tellus, illic & pontus, & aër.
Sic erat inſtabilis tellus, innabilis unda,
Lucis egens aër: nulli ſua forma manebat.
Obſtabatque aliis aliud: quia corpore in uno
Frigida pugnabant calidis, humentia ſiccis,
Mollia cum duris, ſine pondere habentia pondus (42).

(42) Ib. lib. I, ver. 5.

Before the ſeas, and this terreſtrial ball,
And Heav'n's high canopy, that covers all,
One was the face of nature; if a face:
Rather a rude and indigeſted maſs:
A lifeleſs lump, unfaſhion'd, and unfram'd,
Of jarring ſeeds; and juſtly Chaos nam'd.
No ſun was lighted up, the world to view;
No moon did yet her blunted horns renew:
Nor yet was earth ſuſpended in the ſky;
Nor pois'd, did on her own foundations lie:
Nor ſeas around the ſhores their arms had thrown;
But earth, and air, and water, were in one.
Thus air was void of light, and earth unſtable,
And water's dark abyſs unnavigable.
No certain form on any was impreſt;
All were confus'd, and each diſturb'd the reſt.
For hot and cold were in one body fix'd;
And ſoft with hard, and light with heavy mix'd.
DRYDEN.

You ſee, that by the Chaos they underſtood a maſs of matter without form, in which the ſeeds of all particular bodies were jumbled together in the greateſt confuſion. The air, the water, and the earth, were every where confounded; the whole was at war; each part oppoſed each part; the cold and the heat, moiſture and drineſs, levity and gravity ſtruggled one with another, in one and the ſame body all over the vaſt extent of matter. Now let us ſee how Ovid ſuppoſes that this ſtate of confuſion was diſintangled.

Hanc DEUS, & melior litem natura diremit.
Nam cœlo terras, & terris abſcidit undas,
Et liquidum ſpiſſo ſecrevit ab aëre cœlum.
Quæ poſtquam evolvit, cæcoque exemit acervo,
Diſſociata locis concordi pace ligavit.
Ignea convexi vis & ſine pondere cœli
Emicuit, ſummâque locum ſibi legit in arce,
Proximus eſt aër illi levitate, locoque.
Denſior his tellus, elementaque grandia traxit,
Et preſſa eſt gravitate ſui. Circumfluus humor,
Ultima poſſedit, ſolidumque coërcuit orbem.
Sic ubi diſpoſitam, quiſquis fuit ille DEORUM;
Congeriem ſecuit, ſectamque in membra redegit:
Principio terram, &c (43).

(43) Ib. ver. 21.

But GOD, or nature, while they thus contend,
To theſe inteſtine diſcords put an end;
Then earth from air, and ſeas from earth were driv'n,
And groſſer air ſunk from ætherial heav'n.
Thus diſſembroil'd, they take their proper place;
The next of kin contiguouſly embrace;
And foes are ſunder'd, by a larger ſpace.
The force of fire aſcended firſt on high,
And took it's dwelling in the vaulted ſky:
Then air ſucceeds, in lightneſs next to fire;
Whoſe atoms from unactive earth retire.
Earth ſinks beneath, and draws a num'rous throng
Of pondrous, thick, unwieldy ſeeds along.
About her coaſts, unruly waters roar;
And riſing, on a ridge, inſult the ſhore.
Thus when the GOD, whatever God was he,
Had form'd the whole, and made the parts agree,
That no unequal portions might be found,
He moulded earth into a ſpacious round, &c.
DRYDEN.

You ſee he ſays this war of the confuſed and intangled elements, was determined by the authority of a GOD who parted them, and aſſigned to each their proper place; ranking fire in the uppermoſt region, the earth in the lowermoſt, the air immediately below the fire, and the water immediately below the air; and then forming a bond of friendſhip and concord between the four elements thus ſettled in ſeparate ſtations. By conſequence the analyſis of our Poet's diſcourſe may be reduced to theſe ſix propoſitions.

I. Before there was a heaven, an earth, and a ſea, nature was one homogeneous whole (44).

(44) Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe.

II. This whole was only a lumpiſh maſs (45), in which the principles of things were heaped up together in confuſion and without ſymmetry, and after a diſcordant manner.

(45) Nec quicquam niſi pondus iners, &c.

III. Heat ſtruggled with cold in the ſame body; moiſture and drineſs had the ſame quarrel, and levity and gravity had no leſs.

IV. GOD put an end to this war by parting the combatants.

V. He aſſigned them diſtinct habitations, according to the gravity and levity peculiar to them.

VI. He formed a ſtrict alliance between them.

I ſhall give a general view of the faults to be met with in this doctrine of Ovid. I do not know whether it was ever criticized upon, or whether the commentators have ever examined this part of the metamorphoſis, philoſophically: but methinks they might eaſily have perceived,

In the Iſt place, that the firſt propoſition is little conſiſtent with the ſecond; for if the parts of a whole are compoſed of contrary ſeeds or principles, that whole cannot paſs for homogeneous.

In the IId place, that the ſecond propoſition does not agree with the third; for we cannot call that whole a meer heavy maſs, in which there is as much levity as gravity.

In the IIId place, that this heavy maſs cannot be looked upon as inactive, pondus iners, ſince contrary principles are blended in it without ſymmetry; whence it follows, that their actual ſtruggle muſt terminate in the victory of one or the other.

In the IVth place, that the firſt three propoſitions being once true, the fourth and fifth are ſuperfluous; for the elementary qualities are a principle of ſufficient force to diſentangle the Chaos without the intervention of another cauſe, and to place the parts at a greater or leſſer diſtance from the center, proportionably to their gravity or levity.

In the Vth place, that the fourth propoſition is falſe upon another account; for, ſince the production of the heavens, of air, water, and earth, the ſtruggle of cold and heat, moiſture and drineſs, gravity and levity, is as great in the ſame body as ever it could be before.

In the VIth place, that for the reaſon laſt mentioned, the ſixth propoſition is falſe.

From whence it is manifeſt, that the deſcription of the Chaos, and of it's extrication, is compoſed of propoſitions more oppoſite to one another, than the elements were oppoſite to one another during the Chaos.

It is needleſs to enlarge upon each of theſe falſe doctrines of Ovid; but there are ſome of them which require a pretty long illuſtration.

REFUTATION of the doctrine of the Chaos, upon the ſuppoſition of its having been Homogeneous.

I. I ſay then, that nothing can be more abſurd than to ſuppoſe a Chaos, which has been homogeneous during all eternity, notwithſtanding it had the elementary qualities, both thoſe called Alteratrices, which are heat, cold, moiſture, and drought; and thoſe called Motrices, which are levity and gravity; the former cauſing motion upwards, and the other downwards. A maſs of this nature cannot be homogeneous, but muſt neceſſarily contain all ſorts of heterogeneity. Heat and cold, moiſture and drought cannot be together,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

world, as they ſuppoſe; and I ſhall ſhew, that however they ought to have excepted mankind ther, but that their action and re-action muſt temper them and convert them into other qualities which make the form of mixed bodies: and forasmuch as this temperament may ariſe, according to the innumerable diverſities of combinations, the Chaos muſt have contained an incredible number of ſpecies of compounds. The only way to conceive an homogeneous Chaos, would be to ſay, that the alteratrices qualities of the elements would modify themſelves to the ſame degree in all the moleculæ, or ſmall particles of matter, inſomuch that there would be all over preciſely the ſame luke-warmneſs, the ſame ſoftneſs, the ſame ſmell, the ſame taſte, &c. But this would be pulling down with one hand what is built with the other; this would be, by a contradictio in terminis, calling a Chaos the moſt regular work, the moſt marvellous in it's ſymmetry, and the moſt admirably well proportioned, that can be conceived. I own, that a diverſified work ſuits better with the fancy and reliſh of mankind, than what is uniform; but at the ſame time our ideas teach us, that the harmony of contrary qualities preſerved uniformly all over the univerſe, would be a perfection as wonderful as the unequal partition that ſucceeded to the Chaos. What knowledge, what power, would not that uniform harmony, ſpread all over nature, require? To put into each mixed body the ſame quantity of each of the four ingredients, would not ſuffice; ſome would require more, ſome leſs, according as the force of ſome is greater or leſſer for acting than for reſiſting (46); for it is well known, that the Philoſophers diſtribute action and re-action to the elementary qualities in a different degree. Upon the whole, every thing conſidered, it would be found that the cauſe which metamorphoſed the Chaos, would have taken it not out of a ſtate of war and confuſion, as is here ſuppoſed, but out of a ſtate of regularity which was the moſt accompliſhed thing in the world, and by which, by reducing the contrary forces to an Æquilibrum, kept them in a repoſe equivalent to peace. It is manifeſt therefore, if the Poets would ſave the homogeneity of the Chaos, they muſt ſtrike out all they have added concerning that phantaſtical confuſion of contrary ſeeds, and that indigeſted mixture, and perpetual war of jarring principles.

(46) Calor, qui maximè eſt activus, minimus eſt in reſiſtentia; è contrario autem ficcitas minor in activitate, major in reſiſtentia; frigus, quod ſecundo loco eſt activum, tertio eſt reſiſtitivum: humor denique penultimo loco activus, ſecundo reſiſtitivus. Arriaga, Diſputat. III, de Generat. §. xi, n. 178, pag. m. 500.

REFUTATION of the Chaos, upon the ſuppoſition of it's having continued an infinite ſpace of time.

II. But to wave this contradiction, we ſhall find matter enough to attack them in other points. We ſhall encounter them on that of eternity. Nothing can be more abſurd than to admit the mixture of the inſenſible parts of the four elements for an infinite time: for ſince you ſuppoſe in thoſe parts the activity of heat, the action and re-action of the four firſt qualities, and beſides that, the motion of the particles of earth and water towards the centre, and the motion of thoſe of fire and air towards the circumference, you, at the ſame time, eſtabliſh a principle, which will neceſſarily ſeparate thoſe four ſpecies of bodies, one from another, which will require for this purpoſe no more than a certain limited time. Do but reflect a little upon what is called the phial of the four elements. In that phial we put up little metallic particles, and then three liquors much lighter one than another. Shake all theſe together, and you will diſcern none of the four ingredients, the parts of each being blended one with the other; but then let the phial ſtand ſtill, and you will find each of them reſume their proper ſtations: all the metallic particles will meet at the bottom, thoſe of the lighteſt liquor in the uppermoſt ſtation; thoſe of the liquor which is heavier than the laſt, and lighter than the firſt, will poſt themſelves in the third; thoſe of the liquor which is heavier than the two laſt, but lighter than the metallic particles, in the ſecond: and thus you recover the diſtinct ſituations which had been confounded by ſhaking the glaſs. In making this experiment, you do not need much patience; a ſhort ſpace of time will ſerve for recovering the repreſentation of the ſituation which nature has given to the four elements in the world. Now, comparing the univerſe to this phial, we may conclude, that if the earth, reduced to powder, had been mixed with the matter of the ſtars, with that of the air, and of water, ſo that the very inſenſible parts of each of thoſe elements had been blended together, all of them would preſently have ſtrove to be diſentangled, and at the end of a certain prefixed time, the parts of the earth would have formed a maſs, thoſe of fire another, and ſo on, in proportion to the gravity and levity of each ſpecies of bodies.

We may yet make uſe of another compariſon, and ſuppoſe the Chaos like new wine fermenting. This is a ſtate of confuſion: the ſpirituous and terreſtrial particles are jumbled together, inſomuch that neither ſight nor taſte can diſtinguiſh what is properly wine, and what is tartar or lees. This confuſion excites a furious ſtruggle between theſe different parts of matter. The ſhock is ſo violent, that ſometimes the veſſel is not able to ſtand it: but in two or three days, more or leſs, this inteſtine war ceaſes. The groſs parts diſengage themſelves, and ſink by virtue of their gravity. The more ſubtile parts get likewiſe looſe, and evaporate (47) by their levities; and thus the wine comes to it's natural ſtate. This is the very thing which would have happened to the poetical Chaos. The contrariety of the principles confuſedly jumbled together, would have produced a violent fermentation, which, however, at the end of a certain ſpace of time would have cauſed the precipitation of the terreſtrial bodies, and the exaltation of the ſpirituous part; and in a word, the proper arrangement of each body according to it's gravity and levity. So that there is nothing more inconſiſtent with reaſon and experience than to admit a Chaos of eternal duration, tho' it had comprehended all the force which has appeared in nature ſince the formation of the world. For it ought to be well obſerved, that, what we call the general laws of nature, the laws of motion, the mechanical principles, is the very ſame thing with what Ovid, and the Peripatetics call heat, cold, moiſture, drought, gravity, and levity. They pretended, that all the force, and all the activity of nature, all the principles of the generation, and alteration of bodies, were comprehended in the ſphere of theſe ſix qualities. Since therefore they admitted them in the Chaos, they neceſſarily acknowledged in it all the ſame virtue which produces in the world generations and corruptions, winds, rains, &c.

(47) We always find an empty ſpace in the caſk after the fermentation is over, which is an evident proof, that ſeveral parts evaporated thro' the chinks of the caſk.

WHETHER it was a conſiſtent way of reaſoning to have recourſe to GOD for diſentangling the Chaos.

III. From hence ariſes another objection of almoſt as much weight as the preceding ones. Ovid, and thoſe whoſe opinions he has paraphraſed, had recourſe, without any neceſſity, to the miniſtry of GOD for diſentangling the Chaos; for they acknowledged, that it included all the internal force, which was capable of ſeparating the parts, and of allotting each element its proper ſituation; what occaſion therefore had they after this for calling in an external cauſe? Was not this imitating the bad Poets, who in their dramatical pieces introduced a god upon the ſtage, to remove a very inconſiderable perplexity? To reaſon right upon the production of the world, we ought to conſider GOD as the author of matter, and as the firſt and ſole principle of motion. If we cannot raiſe our thoughts to the idea of a creation, properly ſo called, we ſhall never get clear of all the difficulties which ſurround that ſubject; and to which ſoever ſide we turn, we muſt affirm things to which our reaſon cannot reconcile itſelf: for if matter is ſelf-exiſtent, we cannot well conceive, that GOD either could, or ſhould give it motion: it would be independent of any other thing, as to the reality of its exiſtence: why therefore ſhould it not have the power to exiſt always in the ſame place with reſpect to each of its parts? Why ſhould it be conſtrained to change its ſituation at the pleaſure of another ſubſtance? Add to this, that if matter had been moved by an external principle, it would be a ſign that its neceſſary and independent exiſtence are ſeparate and diſtinct from motion; the reſult of which is, that its natural ſtate is that of reſt, and conſequently GOD could not move it without diſordering the nature of things, there being nothing more ſuitable to order, than to follow the eternal and neceſſary inſtitution of nature. Of this I ſpeak more at large in other places (48). But of all the errors which are conſequent from that of rejecting the creation, there is none, in my opinion, ſo ſmall, as the ſuppoſing, that if GOD is not the cauſe of the exiſtence of matter, he is at leaſt the firſt mover of bodies, and in that quality the author of elementary properties, the author of the order and form we ſee in nature. The ſuppoſition of his being the firſt mover of matter, is a principle from whence this conſequence naturally flows, that he formed the heavens and the earth, the air and the ſea, and is the architect of this great

(48) See, above, the remark [D] of the article EPICURUS. See alſo the remark [A] of the article HIEROCLES, the Philoſopher.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mankind from their general rule, ſince this is ſubject to the moſt dreadful confuſions great and marvellous edifice which we call the world. But if you ſtrip him of that quality, of firſt mover, if you affirm, that matter moved itſelf independently of him, and had the diverſity of forms of itſelf; that, with reſpect to ſome of its parts, its motion tended to the center, and with reſpect to others, towards the circumference; that it contained particles of fire, particles of water, particles of air, and particles of earth: if, with Ovid, I ſay, you affirm all theſe things, you employ GOD needleſsly and to no purpoſe in the conſtruction of the world. Nature might have done very well without the aſſiſtance of GOD, it had ſufficient power to ſeparate the particles of the elements, and to aſſemble thoſe of the ſame claſs (49). Ariſtotle apprehended this truth very well, and had a much juſter notion of it than Plato, who admitted a diſorderly motion in the elementary matter, before the production of the world. Ariſtotle makes it appear, that this ſuppoſition deſtroyed itſelf, ſince unleſs we have recourſe to a progreſs in infinitum, motion in the elements muſt have been natural. If it was natural, ſome tended to the center, and others to the circumference; and conſequently ranged themſelves in ſuch a manner as was neceſſary for forming the world ſuch as it now appears: ſo that, during the time of that diſorderly motion, there was a world antecedent to the world, which is a contradiction. Theſe are his words: which I thought proper to produce, in order to give the reader an opportunity of examining more readily whether or not I have given their true ſenſe. Τὸ αὐτὸ δὲ τοῦτο συμβαίνειν ἀναγκαῖον· κἂν εἰ καθάπερ ἐν τῷ Τιμαίῳ γέγραπται, πρὶν γενέσθαι τὸν κόσμον, ἐκινεῖτο τὰ στοιχεῖα ἀτάκτως· ἀνάγκη γὰρ ἢ βίαιον εἶναι τὴν κίνησιν, ἢ κατὰ φύσιν. εἰ δὲ κατὰ φύσιν ἐκινεῖτο, ἀνάγκη κόσμον εἶναι, ἐάν τις βάλληται θεωρεῖν ἐπισήσας· τό, τε γὰρ πρῶτον κινοῦν ἀνάγκη κινεῖν αὐτὸ, κινούμενον κατὰ φύσιν· καὶ τὰ κινούμενα μὴ βίᾳ. ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις ἠρεμοῦντα τόποις, ποιεῖν ἥνπερ ἔχουσι νῦν τάξιν· τὰ μὲν βάρη ἔχοντα, ἐπὶ τὸ μέσον· τὰ δὲ κουφότητα, ἀπὸ τοῦ μέσου· ταύτην δ' ὁ κόσμος ἔχει τὴν διάταξιν. Hoc idem accidat neceſſe eſt, & ſi, ut in Timæo eſt ſcriptum, elementa inordinatè movebantur antea quàm mundus ortus eſſet. Motum enim aut violentum, aut ſecundum naturam eſſe, neceſſe eſt. Quod ſi ſecundum naturam movebantur, mundum eſſe neceſſe eſt, ſi quiſpiam velit cum diligentia contemplari. Primum nanque movens movere neceſſe eſt, ipſum ſecundum naturam ſubiens motum, & ea, quæ moventur non vi in ſuis quieſcentia locis, eum, quem nunc habent ordinem facere: ea quidem, quæ pondus habent, ad medium: ea verò, quæ levitatem habent, à medio ſuopte pergentia nutu. Hunc autem ordinem Mundus habet (50). - - - - The very ſame thing muſt neceſſarily happen; even though, as it is affirmed in Timæus, previouſly to the forming of the world, the elements had been moved irregularly: for motion muſt of neceſſity be either violent or natural. But if they were moved according to nature, there muſt be a world in courſe, if any perſon of judgment will conſider it. For the firſt mover muſt itſelf of neceſſity move, being moved according to nature: and thoſe things which moved without force, ſettling in their proper places, muſt compoſe the order which they now obſerve; thoſe which are heavy towards the centre; but thoſe that are light from the centre. Now this is the very order of the preſent world. He obſerves in conſequence of this, and with a great deal of reaſon, that Anaxagoras who admitted no motion antecedent to the firſt formation of the world, had a clearer idea of this matter than the reſt (51).

The modern Peripatetics, the moſt zealous for Evangelical Orthodoxy, could find no fault in this diſcourſe of Ariſtotle; for they own, that the alterative and motive qualities of the four elements are ſufficient for the production of all the effects of nature. They only introduce GOD as the preſerver of theſe elementary qualities, of which he is the firſt cauſe, or elſe make him only interpoſe his general concurrence; and they agree, that excepting this they perform the whole, and in the quality of a ſecond cauſe, are the compleat principle of all generations (52). So that a ſcholaſtic divine would readily own, that if the four elements had exiſted independently of GOD, with all the faculties which they now enjoy, they would have formed of themſelves this machine of the world, and kept it up in the ſtate wherein it now appears. He muſt therefore acknowledge two great faults in the doctrine of the Chaos: one, and indeed the principal is, that it takes from GOD the creation of matter, and the production of the qualities peculiar to fire, to the air, to the earth, and to the ſea: the other, is, that after taking this away from him, it introduces him without neceſſity upon the ſtage of the world to adjuſt the places of the four elements. Our new Philoſophers, who have rejected the qualities and faculties of the Peripatetic Philoſophy, would find the ſame faults in Ovid's deſcription of the Chaos: for what they call general laws of motion, principles of mechaniſm, modifications of the matter, figure, ſituation and order of the particles, import nothing elſe but that active and paſſive virtue of nature, which the Peripatetics underſtand, under the terms of alterative and motive qualities of the four elements. Since therefore, according to the doctrine of the Peripatetics, thoſe four bodies, placed according to their natural levity and gravity, are a principle ſufficient for all generations; the Carteſians, the Gaſſendiſts, and other modern Philoſophers, muſt maintain, that the motion, ſituation, and figure of the parts of matter, are ſufficient for the production of all natural effects, without excepting even the general diſpoſition which has placed the earth, the air, water, and ſtars, where we now ſee them. Thus, the true cauſe of the world, and of the effects produced in it, is not different from the cauſe which gave motion to the parts of matter, whether it aſſigned at the ſame time to each atom a determinate figure, as the Gaſſendiſts will have it, or that it only gave thoſe parts, being all cubical, an impulſe, which, by the duration of motion, reduced to certain laws, would afterwards make them aſſume all ſorts of figures, purſuant to the hypotheſis of the Carteſians. Both the one and the other muſt conſequently agree, that if matter had been ſuch before the generation of the world, as Ovid pretends, it would have been capable of diſengaging itſelf from the Chaos by its own proper power, and to aſſume the form of the world, without the aſſiſtance of GOD. They muſt therefore charge Ovid with having committed two blunders; one in ſuppoſing, that matter, without the aſſiſtance of the Deity, contained the ſeeds of all the mixt bodies, heat, motion, &c. and the other in ſaying, that without the divine interpoſition, it could not have brought itſelf out of its ſtate of confuſion. This is giving too much and too little on theſe two reſpective occaſions; it is neglecting help when it is moſt wanted, and ſeeking it when it is not neceſſary.

(49) Compare what was ſaid above, remark [C], num. VIII, of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(50) Ar ſt. de Cœlo, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 370, C.

(51) I have cited theſe words of Ariſtotle, above, citation (161) of the article EPICURUS.

(52) We muſt except the ſoul of man.

REFLEXION upon Des Cartes's notion of the manner in which the world might have been made.

I know ſome do not approve of Des Cartes's fiction concerning the manner how the world might have been formed (53). Some ridicule it, and think it, injurious to GOD; others charge it either with falſities, or with impoſſibilities. To the former it may be anſwered, that they do not underſtand the ſubject, and that, if they did, they would own, that nothing is more proper to give a lofty idea of the infinite wiſdom of GOD, than to affirm, that out of a matter that had no manner of form, he could make this world in a certain time, by the bare preſervation of the motion once given, and reduced to a few ſimple and general laws. As to what concerns thoſe who reject the particulars of Des Cartes's ſyſtem, as containing ſome things contrary to the laws of Mechanics, and the real ſtate of the celeſtial vortices as they have been diſcovered by Aſtronomers, I ſhall only reply to them, that this does not hinder the main of his hypotheſis from being juſt and reaſonable; and I am fully perſuaded, that Mr Newton *, the moſt formidable of all the animadverters upon Des Cartes, does not doubt but that the actual ſyſtem of the world might be the production of a few mechanical laws, eſtabliſhed by the author of all things: for if you ſuppoſe bodies determined to move in ſtreight lines, and to tend either towards the center, or towards the circumference, as often as the reſiſtance of other bodies obliges them to a circular motion, you eſtabliſh a principle which will neceſſarily produce great varieties in matter; and if it does not form this ſyſtem, it will form another.

(53) See Des Cartes's Principia, Part iii, num. 46, & ſeq.

* SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

OBSERVATION upon the Epicurean hypotheſis.

The very Epicurean hypotheſis, though ſo fooliſh, and extravagant, affords wherewith to form a certain world. Do but once allow them the different figures of atoms, with the inalienable power of moving themſelves,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſelves, according to the laws of gravity, and mutually repelling one another, and reflecting in ſuch or ſuch a manner, according as they ſtrike one another in a perpendicular or oblique direction: grant them but this, and you cannot deny that the fortuitous concourſe of theſe corpuſcles may form maſſes, containing hard and fluid bodies, cold and heat, opacity and tranſparency, vortices, &c. all that can be denied them, is, the poſſibility of chances producing ſuch a ſyſtem of bodies as our world; in which there are ſo many things which perſevere ſo long in their regularity, ſo many animal machines a thouſand times more ingenious than thoſe of human art, which neceſſarily require an intelligent direction.

We ſhall examine, by the By, a notion of the Sieur Lami, Doctor of Phyſic at Paris, who is as great a ſticklèr for atoms, as he is an adverſary to the Peripatetics, and to Des Cartes. All this appears by his work de Principiis rerum (54). Now this is the anſwer he gives to an objection commonly ſtarted againſt Epicurus's hypotheſis. The argument is built upon this compariſon; by throwing letters together at a venture, you would never compoſe Homer's Iliad, therefore the caſual concourſe of atoms could never produce a world. He anſwers that there is a very wide difference between theſe two things. The Iliad cannot be formed but by the preciſe and determinate junction of a certain number of letters; the method of compoſing it therefore is but one, out of an infinite number of various ways of ranging and adjuſting letters; ſo that we muſt not think it ſtrange, that chance ſhould never be able to hit upon this one way among an infinity of others. But for making a world in general, this or another, there is no neceſſity that the atoms ſhould meet and combine in one certain, preciſe, determinate manner; for in what manner ſoever they lay hold of one another, they will neceſſarily form heaps of bodies, and conſequently a world. He does not ſtop here, he gives the compariſon another turn. Let the junction of ſeveral letters, ſays he, be never ſo caſual, they will neceſſarily form ſyllables and words, therefore the fortuitous concourſe of atoms will neceſſarily form bodies. If you object to him, that theſe words, formed by chance, will have no ſignification, his anſwer will be that this is owing to words having no other ſignification but what man is pleaſed to give them; and that thence it comes, that in order to be ſignificative they muſt be ranged in conformity to human inſtitution: but that the virtue of atoms being independent of man, they producing conſiderable effects which may merit his admiration in whatſoever order they ſhall appear (55). There is no great neceſſity of diſcuſſing all this: we may grant him part of his pretenſions, and yet at the ſame time deny that our world, in which there are ſo many regular things tending to certain ends, can be the effect of chance. Obſerve, that Epicurus found himſelf obliged to own one inſtance of chance, at leaſt as wonderful as the Iliad would be, if produced by the fortuitous concourſe of certain letters. He aſſigned to the gods the figure of man, and believed them to be eternal: So that he was under a neceſſity of owning, that the fortuitous concourſe of atoms, by which the firſt men were compoſed, was an exact copy of a certain determinate and ſingle original, namely, the figure of the gods. Let us ſee what Cicero ſays on this head: ‘ Hoc dico, non ‘ ab hominibus formæ figuram perveniſſe ad Deos: ‘ Dii enim ſemper fuerunt, & nati nunquam ſunt, ſi- ‘ quidem æterni ſunt futuri. At homines nati: antè ‘ igitur humana forma, quàm homines eâ quâ erant ‘ formâ Dii immortales. Non ergo illorum humana ‘ forma, ſed noſtra divina dicenda eſt. Verùm hoc ‘ quidem, ut voletis: illud quæro, quæ fuerit tanta ‘ fortuna, (nihil enim ratione in rerum naturâ factum ‘ eſſe vultis) ſed tamen quis iſte tantus caſus, unde ‘ tam felix concurſus atomorum, ut repentè homines ‘ Deorum formâ naſcerentur? Semina Deorum deci- ‘ diſſe de cœlo putamus in terras, & ſic homines patrum ſimiles extitiſſe? vellem diceretis: Deorum ‘ cognationem agnoſcerem non invitus. Nihil tale dicitis: ſed caſu eſſe factum ut Deorum ſimiles eſſemus (56). - - - - This I affirm, that the gods could not receive their form from that of men: for the gods always exiſted, and never were born, their duration being eternal. But men are born: therefore before men had their human form, the immortal gods muſt have had their form ſuppoſing it were the ſame. Therefore their form ought not to be ſtiled human, but ours divine. But be this as you will: I aſk this queſtion, by what

(54) The Acta Eruditorum, for 1682, pag. 155, contain an abſtract of it, and obſerve, that it was printed at Paris, in 1680: but that was a new impreſſion; for I read it in 1678, and then it was no new book.

(55) Taken from the thirty-ninth chapter of the third book of William Lami, de Rerum Principiis.

(56) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxxii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Hæc quoque non perſtant, quæ nos elementa vocamus (59).

(59) Ib. ver. 57.

. . . . . .

. . . . . .

Omnia fiunt
Ex ipſis, & in ipſa cadunt: reſolutaque tellus
In liquidas rareſcit aquas; tenuatus in auras
Aeraque humor abit; dempto quoque pondere rurſus
In ſuperos aer tenuiſſimus emicat ignes.
Inde retro redeunt, idemque retexitur ordo:
Ignis enim denſum ſpiſſatus in aëre tranſit;
Hic in aquas; tellus glomerata cogitur undâ.
Nec ſpecies ſua cuique manet; rerumque novatrix
Ex aliis alias reparat natura figuras (60).

(60) Ib. ver. 244.

*Nor do thoſe things which elements we name,
Perſiſt immutable, and ſtill the ſame.*

. . . . . .

. . . . . .

*From theſe a being is beſtow'd to all,
And into theſe again the whole muſt fall.
By rarefaction, earth to water flows;
Vapours, refin'd from water, air compoſe;
The airy particles ſublim'd, acquire
The higheſt rank, and brighten into fire.
Nor do they long in thoſe new ſhapes remain;
But in like order return back again.
For by condenſing fire to air give's birth;
Air melts to water; water ſinks to earth.
Thus nature loves thro' different forms to range;
And varies all her works with endleſs change.*

He afterwards produces ſeveral inſtances of the conqueſt made by the water over the earth, and by the earth over the water, &c. Where is this pacification then, which he was ſo full of, in his firſt book? See the margin (61).

(61) It cannot be ſaid, in excuſe for this contradiction, that theſe ſentiments are here expreſſed in the perſon of the Philoſopher Pythagoras; for moſt of the things he makes him ſpeak, are either narrations, or opinions, agreeable to the hypotheſis of thoſe, who explained generation and corruption by the qualities of the elements.

Nay, though he had not contradicted himſelf, we might cenſure him with a great deal of reaſon; for the world being a ſtage of viciſſitudes, nothing could be more improper than to give peace to the four elements; and the ceſſation of the Chaos ſhould be ſo far from putting an end to their quarrels, that, on the contrary, it ſhould have ſet them one againſt another, if they had been in mutual peace during the Chaos. It is by their conflict that nature becomes fruitful; their concord would keep her barren, and without the implacable war which they make againſt one another, wherever they meet, we ſhould have no generations. The production of one thing, is always the deſtruction of another.

Nam quodcunque ſuis mutatum finibus exit,
Continuo hoc mors eſt illius quod fuit ante (62).

(62) Lucret. lib. I, ver. 671.

*For when things change, and keep their form no more,
This is the death of what they were before.*

Generatio unius eſt corruptio alterius. This is a philoſophical axiom. So that Ovid ſhould have pre-ſuppoſed, that the god, who allotted diſtinct ſtations to the four elements, enjoyned them to fight without quarter, and to act the part of ambitious conquerors, who leave no ſtone unturned to invade the poſſeſſions of their neighbours. The orders given them ſhould have been like Dido's wiſh.

Nunc, olim, quocunque dabunt ſe tempore vires,
Littora littoribus contraria, fluctibus undas
Imprecor, arma armis, pugnent ipſique nepotes (63).

(63) Virgil. Æneid. lib. IV, ver. 627.

*Our arms, our ſeas, our ſhores, oppos'd to theirs,
And the ſame hate deſcend on all our heirs.*

DRYDEN.

And in effect, they act juſt as if they had received ſuch orders, and as if they were inſpired with the warmeſt paſſion to put them in full execution. Cold enlarges its ſphere as much as ever it can, and there deſtroys its enemy: heat does the like; and theſe two qualities are by turns maſter of the field, the one in winter, and the other in ſummer: they imitate thoſe victorious armies, which after gaining a deciſive battle, conſtrain their enemy to fly to his citadels, and purſuing him thither, lay ſiege to him, and reduce him to extremity. In the ſummer, cold flies to caverns and ſubterraneous cavities; and to prevent being entirely deſtroyed, redoubles the efforts of its reſiſtance, and fortifies itſelf in the beſt manner it can, by the virtue called Antiperiſtaſis: and in winter heat takes the ſame courſe. The elementary Philoſophers, who thus explain the effects of nature, tell us, that each quality ſtrives in ſuch a manner to vanquiſh the ſubjects it attacks, that, not ſatisfied with making them its vaſſals, and ordering them to wear its livery, it endeavours to tranſmute them into its own ſtate; omne agens, ſay they, intendit ſibi aſſimilare paſſum - - - - every agent endeavours to aſſimilate to itſelf that which it works upon. Can one meet with a more hoſtile, and more ambitious, animoſity than this? Empedocles was miſtaken in annexing to the four elements amity and enmity, the one for union, and the other for diſunion (64). We agree with him, that the union and diſunion of parts are highly neceſſary for the productions of nature; but it is certain, that amity has no hand in them: the ſole diſcord, the ſole antipathy of the elements aſſembles bodies in one place, and diſperſes them in another. Theſe two qualities of Empedocles can be attributed at moſt but to living bodies; but air and fire, water and earth, have no other attendant, except enmity.

(64) See Ariſtotle, book viii, of his Phyſics, chap. i, and Diogenes Laërtius, lib. viii, num. 76, & ibi Aldobrandinus, & Menagius.

Living bodies act very conformably to the order which Ovid ſhould have ſuppoſed to be given, by the author of the diſentangling of the Chaos, viz. that of mutual deſtruction; for it is literally true, that they ſubſiſt only by deſtruction: every thing which ſerves for the ſupport of their life, loſes its form, and changes its ſtate and ſpecies. Vegetables deſtroy the conſtitution and qualities of all the juices they can attract: and animals commit the ſame ravage upon every thing which ſerves them for food. They eat up one another, and there are ſeveral kinds of beaſts which make war upon one another, for no other end but to devour ſuch of their enemies as they ſhall happen to kill. In ſome countries men follow the ſame courſe, and every where they are great deſtroyers. I take no notice here of the ſlaughter ariſing from ambition, avarice, or cruelty, or from ſuch other paſſions as are the cauſes of war: I ſpeak only of the effects of the care taken to feed the body. In this regard, man is ſuch a ruining, deſtroying, principle, that in caſe all other animals deſtroyed as much in proportion, the earth would not be able to furniſh them with proviſions. When we ſee in the ſtreets and markets of great cities, ſuch a prodigious multitude of herbs and fruits, and of an infinite number of other things allotted for the food of the inhabitants, would not one be ready to ſay, here is proviſion for a week? would one imagine, that this ſhew is to be renewed every day? Would one believe, that ſo ſmall an opening as the human mouth, were a gulf, an abyſs, large enough to ſwallow up all that in a little time? Nothing but experience could make us believe it. In the Saint-Evremoniana lately publiſhed, I met with theſe Words (65): it is ſaid, that at Paris there is four thouſand people who ſell oyſters, and that fifteen hundred large oxen, and above ſixteen thouſand ſheep, calves, or hogs, beſides a prodigious quantity of poultry, and wild fowls, are conſumed every day. Judge what may be the caſe in thoſe countries, where they feed more upon fleſh, and are greater eaters.

(65) Pag. 293, of the Dutch Edit. in 1701.

Such being therefore the condition of nature, that beings are produced and preſerved by the deſtruction of one another, our Poet ſhould not have affirmed, that the war of the elements was pacified when the world began, and the Chaos ended (66). It was enough to have ſaid, that the ſituation and power of the combatants were regulated and ballanced in ſuch a manner, that their continual hoſtilities ſhould not produce the deſtruction of the work; but only the viciſſitudes that are its ornaments, per queſto variar natura è bella, - - - - nature is beautiful by this variety, as the Italians ſay. Some perhaps will imagine, that the war, not ceaſing upon the regulation of theſe principles, it was not ſo much a ceſſation of the Chaos, as a rough draught of the diſentanglement; and that after this rough draught, that is, the world we live in, ſhall have continued a certain number of ages, it will be ſucceeded by a much finer world; from which diſcord will be baniſhed. And they will pretend, perhaps, that St Paul (67) confirms this opinion, in ſaying, that all creatures groan for their deliverance from

(66) See in the 18th Tome of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 23, a remark in oppoſition to what Gregory Nazianzen ſaid in his 12th oration, that the univerſe is maintained by peace.

(67) Epiſtle to the Romans, chap. viii, ver. 19, & ſeq. This is a paſſage which puzzles the commentators very much.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fuſions and contrarieties which could poſſibly have been in the Chaos [H]. They muſt be from the ſtate of vanity and corruption in which they find themſelves. But let them ſay what they pleaſe, I ſhall not amuſe myſelf with the examination of their notions.

It is to be obſerved, that from the mechanical principles, by which the new Philoſophers explain the effects of nature, it is eaſier to comprehend the perpetual war of bodies, than from the Philoſophy of the four elements. For all the action of the ſix elementary qualities, being nothing elſe, according to the new Philoſophy, but local motion, it is manifeſt each body attacks every thing it meets, and that the parts of matter tend only to ſhock, break, and compreſs, one another, according to all the rigour of the laws of ſuperior powers.

[H] they ought to have excepted mankind from the general rule, ſince it is ſubject to the moſt dreadful confuſions . . . which could poſſibly have been in the Chaos.] But if we ſet aſide the arguments produced in the foregoing remark, and grant that Ovid might affirm, generally ſpeaking, that the creatures were releaſed from the Chaos, yet we might ſtill be allowed to ſay, that he could not in particular include man within that favour. I here only conſider the views we may have when deſtitute of the light of revelation. In this ſtate, who can forbear thinking that the horrors of the Chaos ſtill ſubſiſt with regard to man? For, not mentioning the perpetual conflict of the elementary qualities, which reigns ſomething more in his machine than in moſt other material beings, what war is there not between his ſoul and his body, between his reaſon and his ſenſes, between his ſenſitive and his reaſonable ſoul? reaſon ought to calm this diſorder, and pacify theſe inteſtine jars; but it is both judge and party, and its decrees are not executed; but only increaſe the miſchief (68). This is what obliged one of the moſt ſolid and moſt ſhining genius's of the XVIIth Century, to prefer the condition of ſheep before that of men. Read what follows.

(68) Touching the complaints made againſt reaſon: ſee the New Letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 755, & ſeq; and below, in the remark [E] of the article PAULICIANS, ſome paſſages of Cicero.

Cependant nous avons la raiſon pour partage,
Et vous en ignorez l'uſage.
Innocens animaux n'enſoiez point jaloux,
Ce n'eſt pas un grand avantage.
Cette fiere raiſon dont on fait tant de bruit
Contre les paſſions n'eſt pas un ſeur remede,
Un peu de vin la trouble, un enfant la ſeduit,
Et dechirer un cœur qui l' appelle à ſon aide,
Eſt tout l'effet qu'elle produit.
Toûjours impuiſſante & ſevere
Elle s'opoſe à tout, & ne ſurmonte rien.
Sous la garde de votre chien
Vous devez beaucoup moins redouter la colere
Des loups cruels & raviſſans,
Que ſous l'autorité d'une telle chimere
Nous ne devons craindre nos ſens (69).

(69) Madam des Houlieres, Idylle on the Sheep, pag. 32, 33, Edit. de Amſterdam 1694.

Though we have reaſon's talent, which you want,
Sheep need not envy men that uſeleſs grant.
Proud reaſon, tho' it makes ſo great a noiſe,
Is far from being paſſion's counterpoiſe.
It yields to wine, is by a child betray'd,
And only breaks the heart, which ſeeks its aid,
Reaſon for ever impotent, and ſour,
Fights every thing, yet nothing can o'erpow'r.
Againſt the wolves your dog's a ſure defence,
While our grand guard leaves us a prey to ſenſe.

This is what we meet with in the poems of Madam des Houlieres. We there likewiſe find, that the condition of inanimate creatures ſeemed to her to be preferable to ours. See what ſhe ſays, addreſſing herſelf to a brook (70).

(70) The ſame, in the Idylle on the Brook, pag. 119, 120.

Avec tant de bonheur d' où vient votre murmure?
Helas votre ſort eſt ſi doux!
Taiſez-vous ruiſſeau, c'eſt à nous
A nous plaindre de la nature.
De tant de paſſions que nourrit notre cœur
Aprennez qu'il n'en eſt pas une
Qui ne traine après ſoi le trouble, de douleur,
Le repentir, ou l'infortune.
Elles dechirent nuit & jour
Les cœurs dont elles ſont maîtreſſes.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
De toutes ſortes d'unions
Que notre vie eſt éloignée!
De trahiſons, d'horreurs, & de diſſenſions
Elle eſt toûjours accompagnée.
Qu'avez-vous merité, ruiſſeau tranquill & doux,
Pour être mieux traité que nous?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Enfin dans cet horrible gouffre
De miſere & de vanité
Je me perds; & plus j'enviſage
La foibleſſe de l' homme & ſa malignité,
Et moins de la divinité
En lui je reconnois l'image.

O happy brook, why murmur you in vain!
Compoſe your ſtream, and let mankind complain.
The human heart a thouſand paſſions feeds,
While each to ſorrow or miſfortune leads.
Both day and night in turns they tyrannize,
And ſoon deſtroy the ſpring from whence they riſe.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
With treaſons, horrors, and diſſentions fill'd,
No drop of friendſhip does life's channel yield.
What merit, peaceful waters, can you claim,
Thus to be happier than the human frame.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
In this dire gulph of vanity and woe,
I loſe myſelf in ev'ry ſtep I go:
And while in man, follies and crimes abound,
The Deity is no where to be found.

The verſes I am going to quote furniſh us with a freſh proof of the Chaos, in which mankind remained: the two moſt oppoſite things in the world, light and darkneſs, continue in man; in him they follow one another, and tread upon one another's heels: the leſs he knows, the more he thinks he knows: and the more he really knows, the more he is ſenſible of his own ignorance, the more he is in danger of miſtaking his right road. Now, can any thing be the ſubject, or the ſtage of a more capricious conflict?

Que l'eſprit de l'homme eſt borné!
Quelque tems qu'il donne à l'étude,
Quelque penetrant qu'il ſoit né,
Il ne ſait rien à fond, rien avec certitude:
De tenebres pour lui tout eſt environné;
La lumiere qui vient du ſavoir le plus rare
N'eſt qu'un fatal éclair, qu'n ardent qui l'égare.
Bien plus que l'ignorance elle eſt à redouter.
Longues erreurs qu'elle à fait naitre
Vous ne prouvez que trop que chercher a connoitre
Ne'ſt ſouvent qu'aprendre à douter (71).

(71) The ſame, in the Réflexions diverſes, pag. 94, 95.

How very narrow is the human mind?
The fineſt parts, in ſtudy long confin'd,
Can yet in ſcience boaſt no certain ground,
Such clouds and darkneſs ev'ry where abound.
Learning's beſt light, is but a fatal ray,
An ignis fatuus form'd to lead aſtray.
Better had we in ignorance remain,
Than trace her errors in an endleſs train;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

These prove that all we gain by the pursuit,
Is often only learning how to doubt.

I should never have done, if I should resolve to collect every fine observation that has been made on the contrariety of ingredients in the human composition. The count de Bussi Rabutin tells us, 'that upon this head he always remembers what Father Senault said; that the 'soul and body are very closely connected, and yet 'always at variance: and that, in a word, they are two 'enemies who cannot part, and two friends who 'cannot agree. Nothing can be expressed better 'or with greater truth (72).' There is a greater freedom or vivacity, but not more strong sense, though indeed there is a great deal, in this passage of Balzac: but who do you think, good reverend father, was the author of these words? 'We are a composition of two 'enemies who never agree: the sublime part of our 'soul is always at war with the inferior part. Let us 'add farther, that MAN IS MADE OF A GOD AND 'A BEAST, TIED TOGETHER. If you guess the author 'of these four lines, I shall esteem you as great a Magus, 'as those who foretold the birth of king Sapores (73).

(72) Bussi Rabutin, Letter xxxi, of the fourth part, pag. 53, of the Dutch edition.

(73) Balzac, Dissertation to the reverend Father, Dom Andrew de St Denis, a Divine, of the congregation of the Feuillants, at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 193, 194.

There are some excellent things upon this subject, in two harangues of Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica in the XIVth century. They are written by way of dialogue, with pleadings, and a definitive sentence; the soul accusing the body, and the body on the other hand making it's defence, not purely by denying but colouring the fact, upon which is pronounced the sentence of the judges. I use the words of Claudius Espencæus, who made a French translation of these two declamations and published it at Paris in 8vo, in 1570. Du Verdier Vau Privas quotes some passages out of it (74). I shall here present you with a long passage, in which there are some very good things and also some faults. 'The Phi-'losophers.... were unacquainted with the disposi-'tion of the springs which put the heart of man in 'motion, and had no knowledge, no suspicion of the 'strange change wrought upon him, by which his 'reason became a slave to his passions.... It is true 'they are excusable for not knowing the cause of this 'change in man, but they can plead no excuse for not 'perceiving the change itself: for, tho' some persons, 'who live without thinking and reflexion are pardo-'nable, for not knowing what passes within themselves, 'it is inconceivable that the curious observers of na-'ture, men who use their utmost application to study 'and know themselves, should not have observed, 'that man is not at present governed and conducted by 'reason. In effect, how can we conceive that discern-'ing persons should not have discovered, by their 'knowledge and their own experience, that reason, 'with all it's power and application, is not able to de-'stroy one passion which is rooted in the heart of man, 'neither by the help of any number of years, nor by 'the influence of any examples, nor by the fear of any 'evil; and that they should not have perceived what 'the dullest persons see and are sensible of? A small 'measure of attention therefore to what they experien-'ced in themselves, might have been sufficient to inform 'them of the state of reason, to convince them of their 'weakness, and to make them apprehend, that 'man who was once seated in the most elevated part of 'the soul, who inhabited that serene and luminous re-'gion, from whence he saw and regulated himself 'within and without, is now in his present state, plung-'ed into sense, the pleasures of which he pursues, as 'if he was born for them. By the same means they 'might have perceived, that, though reason has lost 'the power it had in man, yet it's light is not quite 'extinguished, but some glimmerings are left sufficient 'to point out his duty (75).' The author who speaks after this manner, is Mr Esprit, in a piece he published in 1678. All he observes upon the weakness and slavery of reason is very true; but he is in the wrong in charging the Philosophers in general with the being strangers to that servitude, and entertaining no suspicion of the causes of it; for undoubtedly several Heathens had a notion of this matter which he supposes they had not. I know very well, that the Stoics spoke too pompously of the empire of reason, and that the idea of their wise-man warmed their imagination to such a pitch, that they let some things drop which might well seem extravagant, not in supposing, that if rescued from passions, he would constantly and invariably observe the laws of order and goodness, but in supposing that it was possible for men to extirpate all vicious passions. This was their grand error; it was here they betrayed their ignorance of the state of mankind. The other part of their doctrine was rational, namely, that if man had once subdued and extirpated his passions, he would find no difficulty in practising virtue, and attaining to perfection (76). However, Mr Esprit should have confined his censures to them, and not have given them so large an extent as he has done. Who told him that the Philosophers did not know that the soul of man is plunged in sense? Does Cicero seem ignorant of this, in those words of the third Book of his Republic, which St Augustin has preserved to us, and which contain so lively a description of the slavery of the soul under the empire of the passions. 'Homo non ut à matre, sed ut à no-'verca natura editus est in vitam, corpore nudo, & 'fragili, & infirmo, animo autem anxio ad molestias, 'humili ad timores, molli ad labores, prono ad libi-'dines, in quo tamen inesset tamquam OBRUTUS 'quidam divinus ignis ingenii, & mentis (77).... 'Man is brought into the world by nature, not as a 'mother, but as a step-mother, with a body naked, 'weak, and infirm, but with a mind sowered by uneasi-'ness, awed by fear, averse to labour, and inclined to 'lust, in which however appears, as it were, STIFLED, 'a certain divine ray of reason and understanding.' Had this author no knowledge, no suspicion of the strange change wrought upon man, by which his reason became enslaved to the passions? What then is the meaning of the words preserved to us by the same St Augustin, in which Cicero seems to approve of the antient Pagan, who believed, that the birth of man was a punishment for some sin, committed in another life (78). Does he not applaud a thought which he had met with in Aristotle, that the union of the soul with the body was a punishment like that made use of by some antient robbers, who tied living bodies to dead corps, mouth to mouth, belly to belly, and so on in other parts (79)? Was not this owning, that the soul is, by sin, reduced to the miserable condition which it experiences in the body? Was not this considering sin as the cause which had degraded the soul from it's natural state, and primitive nobility? Let us recite this fine passage of Cicero. Ex quibus humanæ vitæ erroribus, & ærumnis fit, ut interdum veteres illi sicle vates, sive in sacris, initiisque tradendis divinæ mentis interpretes, qui nos ob aliqua scelera suscepta in vita superiore, pœnarum luendarum causa natos esse dixerunt, aliquid vidisse videantur; verumque sit illud, quod est apud Aristotelem, simili non affectos esse supplicio, atque eos, qui quondam, cum in prædonum Etruscorum manus incidissent, crudelitate excogitata necabantur: quorum corpora viva cum mortuis, adversa adversis accommodata, quam aptissime colligabantur: ita nostros animos cum corporibus copulatos, ut vivos cum mortuis esse conjunctos (80). In fine, I do not conceive how Mr Esprit comes to affirm, that the Philosphers were ignorant that the power of reason is lost, and yet it's light preserved. Had not Euripides, the dramatic Philosopher, said, that after meditating a long time upon the corruption of men, he found that it was not owing to the frame of their understanding that they sinned, but to their swerving from what is good, at the same time that they very well know it, some through idleness, others through the love of voluptuousness? He puts these fine maxims in Phædra's mouth.

(74) See pag. 175, & seq. of the Bibliotheque Françoise.

(75) Esprit, Preface to his book of the Deceitfulness of human Virtues.

(76) See the New Letters against Maimbourg, pag. 758.

(77) See the Fragments of Cicero, collected by Andreas Patricius, pag. m. 70. He quotes this, as taken from St Augustin, lib. iv, contrà Pelagium.

(78) See the remark [R] in the article TULLIA.

(79) Compare citat. (68) of the article LEO X, where I quote a passage from Virgil.

(80) Cicero, in Hortensio, apud Augustinum, lib. iv, contra Pelagium. See the Fragments collected by Andreas Patricius, pag. m. 102, 103.

Ἦδη ποτ' ἄλλως νυκτὸς ἐν μακρῷ χρόνῳ
Θνητῶν, ἐφρόνησ', ἢ διέφθαρται βίος.
Καὶ μοι δοκοῦσιν οὐ κατὰ γνώμης φύσιν
Πράσσειν κάκιον. Ἔστι γὰρ τόγ' εὖ φρονεῖν
Πολλοῖσιν, ἀλλὰ τῇδ' ἀθρητέον τάδε.
Τὰ χρῆς' ἐπισάμεσθα, καὶ γιγνώσκομεν,
Οὐκ ἐκπονοῦμεν δ'. οἱ μὲν ἀργίας ὕπο,
Οἵδ' ἡδονὴν προθέντες ἀντὶ τοῦ καλοῦ
Ἀλλήν τιν'.

Jam sæpe mecum aliâs noctis in longo tempore
Cogitavi, quomodo corrupta sit hominum vita.
Et mihi videntur non secundum animi naturam: at præter eam
Deterius facere. est enim recta rerum cognitio
Multis. Sed sic spectanda sunt hæc.
Bona quidem tenemus, & novimus:
Sed non facimus: alii quidem propter ignaviam,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be very weak who take a certain poem d

Alii vero anteponentes voluptatem honeſto,
Aliam aliquam (81).

(81) Euripides, in Hippolyto, ver. 375, pag. m. 359. Note, that Farnaby, in Ovid. Metam. lib. vii, ver. 11, faſſly quotes this from Euripides's Medea.

Oft have I ſpent the tedious night to know,
From whence in human life corruptions flow.
And from thoſe ſtudies, this reſult I find,
That men do ill through no defect of mind.
For we are form'd ſufficiently wiſe;
But here the truth of this great matter lies.
Plainly we all perceive the path to good;
But ſloth, or pleaſure, makes us ſhun the road.

Is it poſſible to give a finer deſcription than in theſe words of Ovid, of the incapacity of reaſon to make us do what ſhe makes us approve?

Concipit interea validos Æetias ignes,
Et luctata diu, poſtquam ratione furorem
Vincere non poterat; Fruſtra Medea repugnas,
Neſcio quis deus obſtat, ait (82).

(82 Ovid. Metam. lib. VII, ver. 9.

- - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - -

(83) Id. ib. ver. 17.

Excute (83) virgineo conceptas pectore flammas,
Si potes, infelix. Si poſſem, ſanior eſſem;
Sed trahit invitam nova vis: aliudque Cupido,
Mens aliud ſuadet. Video meliora, proboque,
Deteriora ſequor (84).

(84) She owns in Euripides, that ſhe knows very well what crimes ſhe is going to commit; but that her paſſions prevails over her knowledge.

Mean while the daughter rages with deſire,
Nor pains, nor thoughts, avail to quench the fire:
In vain, Medea, you reſiſt, ſhe cries;
Some heavenly power all ſucceſs denies.
- - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - -
Extinguiſh, if you can, unhappy maid,
Theſe cruel flames which your fond heart invade.
O that I cou'd! Then might I be at reſt!
But a new tyrant lords it in my breaſt!
In ſpite of reaſon, paſſion rules my will:
I ſee, approve the good; yet muſt purſue the ill!

Καὶ μανθάνω μὲν οἷα τολμήσω κακὰ,
Θυμὸς δὲ κρείσσων τῶν ἐμῶν βουλευμάτων.
Et intelligo quidem qualia ſint ea mala, quæ ſum auſura.
Sed ira eſt potentior meis conſiliis.
I plain enough perceive the ill;
But paſſion overrules my will.
Euripid. in Medea, ver. 1078, pag. 319.

Here be pleaſed to obſerve, that ſhe imputes this irreſiſtible impulſe to ſome god. That was the uſual refuge of the Heathens, in accounting for the paſſions which hurry away man in ſpite of the light of his mind, and the knowledge of his true intereſt (85). They believed this to have ſomething divine in it, and almoſt always to be a puniſhment for ſome antecedent ſin: which ſhews that they were not ſo ignorant as Mr Eſprit makes them, and that they had ſome ſort of notion of what the Divines teach us concerning the loſs of Free-will, occaſioned by ſin, and concerning the deſertion of thoſe who abuſe the grace of God.

(85) See the remark [Y] of the article HELENA.

I could have cited, inſtead of Ovid, ſeveral writers who were Philoſophers by profeſſion: but I thought this much more proper, to ſhew Mr Eſprit's miſtake; for it is leſs excuſable to be ignorant of what is to be met with in ſuch a Poet, than of what is ſaid by the Greek authors. I could likewiſe have muſtered up ſeveral teſtimonies of ſufficient credit to convince us, that it was very well known that mankind grovelled ſtill in the Chaos: but the moſt nervous deſcriptions of the pagan Orators, Poets, or Philoſophers, are not able to give us ſo lively an idea of this matter, as that which St Paul has left us. We need only therefore caſt our eyes upon the picture, which that great Apoſtle, under the direction of eternal Truth, lays before us in his Epiſtle to the Romans. That which I do, ſays he (86), I allow not; for what I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I conſent unto the law that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but ſin that dwelleth in me: for I know that in me (that is, in my fleſh) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is preſent with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not: for the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now, if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but ſin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law, that when I would do (86) Epiſtle to the Romans, ch. vii, ver. 15, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I shall quote some verses (d) out of it, that those who have not the book may judge of the author's vein.

(d) In citation (90), below.

I shall begin my additions with explaining what I have said in contradiction to those who believe he was banished for having surprized Augustus in an execrable incest [K], and agreed to it; but he found it after all no such great favour that he had obtained, for he had only made himself master of a piece of antiquity. This occasioned him to take a resolution to change his course of life, and apply himself to solid studies.

This Poem, and another, intituled, Brunellus Vigelli, seu Speculum stultorum, were printed at Wolfembuttel, in 1662. The editor affirms in his Preface, dated the thirteenth of December, 1661, that they had been printed at Cologne almost two hundred years before. Naudæus knew nothing of this first edition; for he tells us, that this pretended Poem of Ovid had been twice printed; first, separately, and without the name of the place, or Printer, in 1534; and a second time, inter Ovidii erotica & amatoria opuscula, published at Frankfort in 1610, with a Preface not at all contemptible (92). He observes (93), that Robert Holcot has quoted several verses of this piece, in his Commentary upon the book of Wisdom, lecture sixty of the old Venice edition, and the sixty-first of that of Basil (94), without affirming or denying, that Ovid was the genuine author of it. 'An sit liber Ovidii, Deus novit, 'quamvis à Leone Protonotario Sacri Palatii Vastasii 'Principis, referatur liber ille extractus de sepulchro 'Ovidii, unde testamentum Ovidii nuncupatur; dicit 'enim quod inventus fuit in cœmiterio publico, in 'quodam sepulchro, in suburbano Dioscori Civitatis, 'quæ est caput Regni Colchorum; & quia ibi non 'erat copia Latinorum, eo quod Armenici linguam 'Latinam non intelligunt, Rex Colchorum misit illum 'librum Constantinopolim, ubi erat copia Latinorum. 'Refert etiam quod inter antiquorum sepulchra unum 'inventum est, in quo epigramma fuit scriptum litteris Armenicis, cujus inscriptio sic sonabat, Hic jacet 'Ovidius, ingeniosissimus Poëtarum, obiit autem anno 'Christi XVIII, sicut refert Guillelmus de Euange in 'Chronico suo, tertio anno, unde constat quod si veraciter liber suus erat, fuit pulcherrima prophetia de 'Christo. - - - - Whether it be the work of Ovid, God 'knows, tho' the book is affirmed by Leo the Protonotary 'of the sacred palace to the emperor Vastasius, to have 'been taken out of Ovid's tomb, from whence it is called 'Ovid's Will; for he says it was found in a public 'burying-place, in a certain tomb, in the suburbs of 'Dioscarias, the capital city of the kingdom of Colchis; and because there were no people there who 'understood Latin, the Armenians being strangers to it, 'the king of Colchis sent the book to Constantinople, where 'that language was very well known. He relates also, 'that among some antient sepulchres, one was found with 'an inscription in Armenian letters, to this purpose; Here 'lies Ovid, the most witty Poet, who died in the 'year of CHRIST XVIII, as William de Euange 'has it in his Chronicon, at the third year, from whence 'it is plain, that if it was really his book, it was a 'very fine prophecy of CHRIST.' A man, without being a great conjurer, may safely swear that Ovid never compiled such a barbarous poem as this, and that it is the production of some Christian of the lower empire.

(92) Naudé, Dialogue de Mascurat, pag. 226.

(93) Ibid. pag. 225.

(94) Note, that Naudæus censures Selden, who, in his treatise de Diis Syris, pag. m. 51, quotes for this the 21st lecture of Holcot, upon the book of Wisdom.

[K] I shall . . . . explain what I have said (95) in contradiction to those who believe Ovid was banished for having surprised Augustus in an execrable incest.] I cited Father Briet, who says that there are some who will have it, that Ovid surprised Augustus in a horrid crime with his daughter Julia, and I did not refute this, as I shall now do, with a demonstrative argument, which, is that our Poet was disgraced several years after Julia was gone from Rome, and become the object of her father's indignation (96). Instead of alledging this undoubted proof, I opposed that opinion only with a probability, namely that it was not at all probable, if the cause of Ovid's exile was such as they supposed, that he would so frequently have represented that what he had seen was the source of his misfortune. Nothing could have been more likely to aggravate Augustus's uneasiness, which the Poet would have made use of every turn of wit to sooth, and to flatter: but this objection, however specious it may be, is not without reply; for it cannot be denied that what Ovid had seen was something which concerned Augustus so nearly; that the recalling this object to his mind, was renewing his sorrow, and opening afresh his wound. Ovid himself confesses it in his address to that emperor.

(95) In the remark [B].

(96) See the remark of the article JULIA, the daughter of Augustus.

Perdiderint cum me duo crimina, carmen & error,
Alterius facti culpa silenda mihi.
Nam non sum tanti, ut RENOVEM TUA VULNERA, Cæsar
Quem nimio plus est INDOLUISSE semel (97).

(97) Ovid. Trist. lib. II, ver. 207.

These are the two causes he assigns for the ruin of his fortune, the one for having composed love verses, the other for having seen certain things accidentally. He justifies himself the best he can, and that very particularly and fully, as to the former (98); but he conceals the latter in silence, to prevent renewing Augustus's concern. He knew therefore that the memory of this accident must provoke him, and make him uneasy; and yet he revives it at every turn in his Poems: he had not therefore the prudence I suppose him to have had; and consequently I have made use of an argument that proves too much, for it proves that he must have avoided renewing all uneasy ideas, and it is certain he did not avoid it.

(98) Id. ib.

This objection lies much harder upon Aldus Manutius, than it does upon me; for the argument I have used is only aimed against those who will have it, that Ovid surprised Augustus, either with his daughter, or grand-daughter; but Aldus Manutius urges it in general against those who believe that this emperor was surprised in some indecent action: 'Ubique exilii causam tum libros de Arte, tum errorem fuisse commemorat (Ovidius): quis verò ille error fuerit, nunquam aperuit, ne magis Augustus sibi irascereturs verùm quia, ut ipse ait, Nitimur in vetitum semper, cupimusque negata; quidnam id fuerit, plurimi scire conati sunt, & conatur semper aliquis; quapropter 'suspicati sunt quidam turpe aliquod Augusti secretum casu vidisse Ovidium, quod non placet, quia toties objiciendo scelus, immitiorem reddidisset Cæsarem, 'quem lenire & placare studebat (99). - - - - Ovid every where assigns as the causes of his exile, both his book 'of the Art of Love, and some unlucky discovery; what 'this discovery was, never appeared, for fear of giving 'a fresh offence to Augustus; but because, as he himself 'says, we are always for pursuing what is forbidden, 'and desiring what is refused us, a great many have endeavoured, and some are always endeavouring to find 'it out: for which reason some have suspected that Ovid 'had accidentally seen some indecency of Augustus, which 'is by no means probable, because by so often mentioning 'his crime, he must have incensed Augustus, whom it 'was his study to soften and appease.' I might be in the right, though Aldus Manutius were in the wrong: there are some indecent actions which Ovid might have ventured to remind Augustus of, without allowing any possibility of inferring that he might be so imprudent as to renew in his mind the idea of a horrid incest. This remembrance must be infinitely more likely to provoke and incense him, than that of a simple act of galantry, in which he might have been surprised either with the daughter or wife of some magistrate; and yet such a discovery as this, might incur Augustus's displeasure, and inspire him with all that resentment which he expressed against Ovid. His age of seventy years, and a great many other circumstances, which may be supposed, might furnish sufficient reason to be angry with one who should have been eye-witness of this mystery of love. Closanius paid no regard to the sentiment of Aldus Manutius; but, on the contrary, declared himself of the opinion which I have just now espoused: 'Ejus 'exilii, sive potius relegationis causam longè veriorem 'eam esse puto, visum à se fortè fortuna Augustum 'Cæsarem in re quadam turpi atque obscœna. Testatur enim Aristot. Lib. II. De Arte dicendi, nullum esse tam magnum, tamque vehemens odium, 'quàm illud, quod ex eo nascitur, cùm quis in ejusmodi re turpi deprehenditur (100). - - - - I take it 'to be a truer cause of banishing him, or rather of relegating

(99) Aldus Manutius, in Vita Ovidii, apud Closanium Observat. in Ovidium, pag. m. 20.

(100) Closan. in Vita Ovidii, ubi supra, pag. 27.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and I ſhall demonſtrate that their conjectures a

'legating him, that he had accidentally diſcovered Augu-
'ſtus in ſome indecent and obſcene action. For Ariſtotle
'obſerves in book II of his Rhetoric, That no hatred
'is ſo great, as that which ariſes from the being ſur-
'priſed in an indecent fact.' Obſerve that neither of theſe two authors give the leaſt hint with regard to the inceſt; and remember that if the reaſoning I have made uſe of is liable to ſome objections, yet it muſt at leaſt be allowed that the conjecture concerning the inceſt is neceſſarily falſe with reſpect to Julia the daughter, ſhe being baniſhed a long time before Ovid offended the emperor: and it is to be obſerved, that ſhe was already baniſhed when he compoſed his Art of Love, and that it was eight or nine years after his writing that book before he himſelf was baniſhed. This refutes the Abbé de Marolles, who pretends that one of the cauſes of his diſgrace was his Art of Love which had given offence to the emperor by ſome paſſages of it which were meant of his daughter under the name of Corinna (101). See above (102) the arguments of Aldus Manutius againſt thoſe who hold that this Corinna was Auguſtus's daughter (103).

Let us examine theſe conjectures with regard to Julia the grand-daughter. There is no poſſible foundation for them from the paſſage of Suetonius (104); for if any handle were to be taken from the extravagance of Caligula, this at moſt could be only with regard to Julia the daughter of Auguſtus; and be pleaſed to take notice, that Suetonius in his account of this extravagance does not in the leaſt inſinuate that there were any reports of amours between Auguſtus and his daughter or grand-daughter. This however was a very fair opportunity for mentioning ſomething of it, and therefore ſince Suetonius has not ſaid one ſyllable about it (105), neither in this place, nor where he ſpeaks of the laſciviouſneſs of Auguſtus, and of his behaviour with regard to the two Julias, it is a ſign there was no ſuch report of the inceſt in queſtion; for if there had been any ſuch, that hiſtorian could not have been ignorant of it, and would certainly have mentioned it. His genius inclined him to diſcover ſuch ſecret hiſtories, and to inſert them without ſcruple in his work: for the proof of which we have a thouſand and a thouſand examples. But however it be, Chronology does not give me ſo great aſſiſtance here, as againſt the other conjecture; for the exile of Ovid, and that of Julia the grand daughter of Auguſtus happened much about the ſame time.

This Julia died in the year of Rome 781, twenty years after ſhe had been baniſhed (106). She muſt therefore be baniſhed in the year 761. Ovid was fifty years old at the time of his exile (107), which muſt therefore be in the year 761, for he was born in the year 711 (108): he ſays in an epiſtle where he mentions the death of Auguſtus, that he had then ſpent ſix years among the Getæ (109). This confirms what I have ſaid, ſince it is certain that Auguſtus died in the year 767. Now as we do not know the day on which the diſgrace of this Poet happened, tho' we find that in the month of December he paſſed the Adriatic ſea, in order to go to the country of the Getæ (110), and as we are equally ignorant of the day and month when Julia incurred the indignation of her grand-father, we are not able to refute by chronological arguments thoſe who ſhould ſay that the exile of theſe two perſons proceeded from the reſentment of Auguſtus in finding his inceſt diſcovered. Ovid, who had been the ſpectator of it was become odious, and, on the other ſide, Julia herſelf was alſo become odious; there was no enduring any longer two objects capable of renewing the ſhame of this diſcovery. They were both expelled from Rome, and to have the fairer pretence for doing it, Julia was convicted of having violated her conjugal faith (111), and Ovid was charged with preſuming to publiſh ſcandalous and pernicious verſes. Theſe are facts which we might refute perhaps invincibly, if we knew the preciſe dates of them; but ſo long as we continue ignorant of theſe, there is no refuting them by arguments borrowed from Chronology. Scaliger would be very ſerviceable on this occaſion (112), if he were not miſtaken when he ſuppoſes that Ovid in ſpeaking of Rome was full fifty-two years old. This would prove that he was not baniſhed till about the end of March 763.

But if we are at a loſs for chronological arguments, we have others with which we may oppoſe this con-

(101) Marolles, Life of Ovid, prefixed to the French tranſlation of the poem againſt Ibis, pag. 4.

(102) In the remark [E], num. VII.

(103) This has been again affirmed in a book printed in 1697. Soli Imp. Aug. inviſus (Ovidius) qui de ſollicitata ſub Corinnæ nomine Julia ſua ſuſpectum Tomos in exilium miſit. Jo. Alb. Fabricius, Bibl. Latina, pag. 35, 36.

(104) Which I have quoted in the remark [B].

(105) This will be mentioned afterwards, as the firſt of my reaſons.

(106) Per idem tempus Julia mortem obiit quam neptem Auguſtus convictum adulterii damnaverat projeceratque in inſulam Trimetum . . . illic viginti annis exilium toleravit. Tacit. Ann. lib. iv, cap. lxxi.

(107) Ovid. Triſt. lib. iv, Eleg. ult. But note, that by miſtake he gives five years to each Olympiad.

(108) Ibid.

(109) Ib. de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. xiii.

(110) Ib. Triſt. lib. i, Eleg. X.

(111) Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, cap. lxxi.

(112) Scalig. Animadv. in Euſeb. pag. m. 182. See Father Noris, Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 202.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of this emperor, and that with regard to Julia his grand-daughter, they are very far from being probable. I perſiſt in the opinion that Ovid's love-verſes were not ſo much the cauſe, as the pretence, of baniſhing him: and I can give a ſufficient proof of it, which is, that the Art of Love was the book principally complained of, and that this had been publiſhed ſeveral years when he was baniſhed. He compoſed it about the year of Rome 752 (e), and he was baniſhed in the year 761 (f): and indeed he has obſerved, that the puniſhment followed a long time after the offence [L], and that he ſuffered in his old age for the ſins of his youth. This is not altogether exact with regard to his Art of Love; for he compoſed that work at the age of forty-one. He was in the fifty-firſt year of his age (g), when he left Rome to go to Tomos the place of his relegation. This was the term made uſe of by Auguſtus in his decree of condemnation, and not that of exile; this favour was accompanied with another which was much more ſubſtantial ſince Ovid was permitted to enjoy his patrimony (b). Although he was not able to get himſelf recalled, or ſo much as removed to another place of confinement (i), yet he never was wanting in his reſpect to the emperor; but, on the contrary, continued invariably to praiſe him with ſuch extravagance as bordered upon idolatry, and he made an idol of him literally as ſoon as he heard of his death. He not only wrote his elogy, in a poem in the Getic tongue, but alſo invocated him, and conſecrated a chapel to him, where he went every morning to (e) He ſays, lib. 2. Art. Amat. ver. 171, that the ſhew of the naval engagement had been exhibited a little time before, and that the young Cæſar was preparing for an expedition into the Eaſt. This agrees with the year 752.

(f) See the remark [K], citation (108).

(g) See the ſame remark, citation (107).

(b) See the proof of all this in the ſame remark, citation (115).

(i) He contented himſelf at laſt with petitioning for this favour. See lib. i, de Ponto, Epiſt. II, pag. m. 220; and lib. ii, Triſt. at the end.

Inſuper accedunt, te non adimente, paternæ,
Tanquam vita parum muneris eſſet, opes.
Nec mea decreto damnaſti facta Senatus,
Nec mea ſelecto judice juſſa fuga eſt.
Triſtibus invectus verbis (ita principe dignum)
Ultus es offenſas, ut decet, ipſe tuas.
Adde quod edictum quamvis immite, minaxque,
Attamen in pœnæ nomine lene fuit.
Quippe relegatus, non exſul dicor in illo:
Parcaque fortunæ ſunt ibi verba meæ (115).

(115) Ovid. Triſt. lib. ii, ver. 225. See alſo Triſt. lib. v, Eleg. XI, & de Ponto, lib. i, Epiſt. vii.

Such mercy in my puniſhment appears,
That your reſentment falls below my fears.
Since to your clemency my life I owe,
O prince, you ſparingly your power ſhow.
And as if life were yet too ſmall a boon,
My fortune too you let me call my own.
Nor did my ſentence from the ſenate come:
Nor did the ſolemn judge pronounce my doom.
But as my prince I happ'ned to incenſe,
Your own harſh words beſt ſuit my dire offence.
Beſides, in the decree, tho' hard at beſt,
Yet is there ſomething tenderly expreſs'd.
While relegation ſtands in exile's place,
And ſpeaks in ſofteſt terms my ſad diſgrace.

(116) Read the verſes of Ovid wrote during his exile.

He ſent him away into a country which, to this unfortunate man, appeared as a ſort of Hell (116); what can be met with more deplorable than the condition Ovid was in upon leaving Rome (117)?

(117) See Ovid, Triſt. lib. i, Eleg. III.

Some may perhaps eſteem it more reaſonable to object againſt me, that ſince Auguſtus was not to be ſoftened by ſuch fawning and pathetic ſupplication as Ovid made to him, it muſt neceſſarily follow that his anger was founded upon the ſhame of having been catched in ſome very obſcene action. I anſwer, 1. That it is pretended that he was at laſt ſoftened, and that, if his death had not intervened, he would have recalled Ovid (118). 2. That as he had alledged for one cauſe of his baniſhment the ſcandalous verſes of this Poet, he found his account in not recalling him. He made a merit of this with the Senate, and with all perſons of gravity and zeal for the reformation of manners. He would have overlooked this conſideration, if Ovid had been neceſſary to him either in the cabinet, or at the head of his troops; but having no occaſion for him upon this account, he was very well pleaſed with ſhewing that he gave no encouragement to the corrupters of morality. I do not know whether Tiberius, who ſuffered Ovid to die in his exile, might not make uſe of the ſame policy. The Poet did not neglect making his court upon the deceaſe of Auguſtus, he invoked him as a new deity (119), and endeavoured to make the moſt of this worſhip with the new emperor.

(118) Cæperat Auguſtus decepte ignoſcere culpæ
Ipſem noſtram terras deſeruitque ſimul.
Auguſtus now my ſad miſtake forgave,
When lo my hopes were buried in his grave.
Ovid. de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. VI, ver. 15.

(119) See the remark [M], citation (125).

It might be difficult to ſatisfy thoſe who deſire to know the reaſon why Auguſtus was ſo incenſed againſt Ovid, as to ſeek for harſh words (120), in order to expreſs in the edict of baniſhment his indignation and reſentment of the offence he thought he had received: but it would not be difficult to think of incidents, which without including any diſcovery of inceſt, or even of ſome inſtance of ſimple galantry, might throw him into a violent rage againſt a witneſs unexpected. Suppoſe that upon his having diſcovered ſome mortifying intrigue in his own family, he had choſe a place of retirement to lament, and bewail it in ſecret, or to examine his grand-daughter, to reprove her, to threaten her, and even, if occaſion were, to beat her. Suppoſe that he was taking to taſk ſome confident, and endeavouring to force her, either by threats or blows, to tell him the truth. Suppoſe that one of his freed men or ſlaves had been under the ſame circumſtances, or even that the emperor had reſolved to put him to the torture privately; here you would have three or four caſes in which Ovid could not ſurprize the emperor without irritating him to the laſt degree. Was it poſſible for a prince who had ſo long beheld himſelf ſeated on the very higheſt pinnacle of human grandeur, to avoid being extremely nice and punctilious on the head of receiving an affront? If the leaſt want of reſpect could offend him on any occaſion, it muſt certainly be on that of prying into his family concerns, and making an actual diſcovery of ſomething there which he would be deſirous of keeping private. The anger this occaſioned did not then permit him to diſtinguiſh whether chance, or deſign, and a bold and ambitious curioſity (121), were the cauſe of this diſcovery. He was too much provoked at this unlucky juncture, not to eſteem it an offence highly deſerving puniſhment.

(120) Triſtibus invectus verbis, (ita Principe dignum)
Ultus es offenſas, ut decet ipſe tuas.
But as my prince I happ'ned to incenſe,
Your own harſh words beſt ſuit my dire offence.
Id. Triſt. lib. ii, ver. 153.

For the reſt, our modern authors are not the only ones who pretend that the ruin of Ovid's fortune was owing to his being witneſs to an inceſtuous commerce. Cœlius Rhodiginus has quoted ſome fragments of one Cæcilius Minutianus Apuleius wherein we meet with this very fact (122).

(121) Scire vetant ſecreta domus atque inde timeri.
They love the ſecrets of your houſe to gain,
That they may ride you with a ſtraiter rein.
Juven. Sat. III, ver. 113.

[L] He has obſerved that the puniſhment followed a long time after the offence.] See how he deſcribes the long continuance of his impunity, in addreſſing to Auguſtus himſelf, and after having given a long liſt of the authors of laſcivious works which had not been puniſhed.

Nos quoque jam pridem ſcripto peccavimus iſto;
Supplicium patitur non nova culpa novum.
Carminaque edideram, cum te delicta notantem
Præterii toties irrequietus eques.
Ergo quæ juveni mihi non nocitura putavi
Scripta parum prudens; nunc nocuere ſeni.
Sera redundavit veteris vindicta libelli,
Diſtat & à meriti tempore pœna ſui (123).

(122) Pulſum quoque in exilium (Ovidium) quod Auguſti inceſtum vidiſſet. - - - -
That Ovid was ſent into baniſhment for having diſcovered Auguſtus's inceſt.
Cel. Rhod. Antiq. Lect. lib. xiii, cap. i, pag. m. 659.

(123) Ovid. Triſt. lib. II, ver. 539.

I too have long ſince ſinn'd in amorous rhime,
Now is the puniſhment, but old the crime.
Oft have I, tho' my verſe has met your frown,
Yet ſpurr'd my Pegaſus, and ſtill writ on.
When young, my pen was grown ſo very bold,
I fear'd no hurt, which now I feel when old.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to offer him incenſe and worſhip [M]. Th (*) See the remark [M]. their ſhare in all this adoration, and were ir however Ovid could find no remedy for inexorable under Tiberius as before, and he

For an old work my torments now begin,
And I muſt ſmart for a forgotten ſin.

[M] He not only wrote Auguſtus's elogy in a Poem in the Getic tongue, but alſo invocated him, and conſecrated a chapel to him, where he went every morning to offer him incenſe and worſhip.] This is what he wrote to his friend Carus.

Nec te mirari, ſi ſunt vitioſa, decebit
Carmina, quæ faciam pœne poëta Getes.
Ah pudet, & Getico ſcripſi ſermone libellum,
Structaque ſunt noſtris barbara verba modis.
Et placui (gratare mihi) cœpique poëtæ
Inter inhumanos nomen habere Getas.
Materiam quæris? laudes de Cæſare dixi.
Adjuta eſt novitas numine noſtra Dei.
Nam patris Auguſti docui mortale fuiſſe
Corpus; in ætherias numen abiiſſe domos (124).

(124) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. IV, Epiſt. XIII, ver. 17.

Nor need you wonder if my verſe is lame,
Since Getic poetry is all my aim.
I bluſh to own a book in this rude tongue,
And that with barbarous notes my muſe has ſung.
Am I not happy in my ſearch for fame,
By gaining among brutes a Poet's name.
The ſubject, if you aſk, was Cæſar's praiſe,
Himſelf the god inſpiring my new lays.
I taught how Rome's great fire his clay reſign'd,
And now a god his heavenly kindred join'd.

He deſcribes in another letter his devotions to Auguſtus, and makes uſe of theſe words (125).

(125) Id. ib. Epiſt. IX, ad Græcinum, ver. 105.

Nec pietas ignota mea eſt: videt hoſpita terra
In noſtra ſacrum Cæſaris eſſe domo.
Stant pariter natuſque pius, conjuxque ſacerdos,
Numina jam facto non leviora Deo.
Neu deſit pars ulla domus; ſtat uterque nepotum;
Hic aviæ lateri proximus, ille patris.
His ego do toties cum thure precantia verba,
Eoo quoties ſurgit ab orbe dies.
Tota, licet quæras, hoc me non fingere dicet,
Officii teſtis Pontica terra mei.
Pontica me tellus quantis hac poſſumus ora,
Natalem ludis ſcit celebrare Dei.
Nec minus hoſpitibus pietas eſt cognita talis,
Miſit in has ſi quos longa Propontis aquas.
Is quoque, quo levior fuerat ſub Præſide Pontus,
Audierit frater (126) forſitan iſta tuus.
Fortuna eſt impar animo, talique libenter
Exiguas carpo munere pauper opes.
Nec veſtris damus hæc oculis, procul urbe remoti:
Contenti tacita ſed pietate ſumus.
Et tamen hæc tangent aliquando Cæſaris aures.
Nil illum toto quod fit in orbe latet.
Tu certe, ſcis hæc, ſuperis adſcite, videſque
Cæſar, & eſt oculis ſubdita terra tuis.
Tu noſtras audis inter convexa locatus
Sidera, ſollicito quas damus ore preces.
Pervenient iſtuc & carmina forſitan illa,
Quæ de te miſi cœlite facta novo.
Auguror his igitur flecti tua numina, nec tu
Immerito nomen mite parentis habes.

(126) That is, Lucius Pomponius Flaccus, who was conſul in the year of Rome 770. See Ovid. de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. IX, ver. 60.

Nor is my zeal unknown; ev'n this ſtrange land
Sees in my houſe the ſacred temple ſtand.
His pious ſon too, and his holy ſpouſe,
With him are the joint object of my vows.
I add his grandſons, to compleat the choir,
This next his grand-mother, and that his ſire.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

this emperor, or in the year of Rome 771, about ſixty years of age [N]. He had compoſed his Metamorphoſes before his diſgrace, but finding himſelf condemned to baniſhment, he threw them into the fire, either out of ſpite, or becauſe he had not put the finiſhing hand to them [O]. Some copies, which had before been taken of this beautiful work (l), were the cauſe of its not being loſt. He wiſhed, that in caſe he (l) Lactantius, Inſtit. Divin. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 13, it is called praclarum opus.

In vain, my deareſt Carus, is this ſaid,
For the ſixth winter chills my exil'd head.
Verſes avail not. - - - -

[N] He died . . . . the fourth year of Tiberius, ... about ſixty years of age.] We find his death placed under this year in Euſebius's Chronicon with the approbation of Scaliger (128). Since Ovid therefore was baniſhed when he was a little more than fifty years old, in the year of Rome 761 (129), he muſt neceſſarily have lived to about ſixty years, and his exile muſt have continued nine or ten years, if it be true that he lived till the fourth year of the emperor Tiberius: for this fourth year agrees with the year of Rome 771: and note that ſome ſay Ovid died the firſt of January (130). Aldus Manutius (131) ſuppoſes that he was baniſhed about the fifty-ſecond year of Auguſtus, and that he died in the fifth year of Tiberius, and conſequently that his exile laſted eight years and ſome months. This computation is not exact: Auguſtus was in the fifty-eighth year of his reign when he died: it muſt follow therefore that he lived above five years after Ovid's diſgrace, if that happened about the fifty-ſecond year of his reign. Since therefore according to Aldus Manutius, this Poet lived to the fifth year of Tiberius, it follows that his exile continued about ten years. Ciofanius (132) has another hypotheſis, he pretends that Ovid left Rome the tenth of December, aged fifty years, ſeven months, and twenty-one days. He died, adds he, on the firſt of January, aged fifty-ſeven years, nine months, and eleven days, having been baniſhed ſeven years and twenty-one days. If we would rectify the miſtakes in this account, we need only put eight months in the room of ſeven after the fifty years of Ovid. This was without doubt the meaning of Ciofanius, who ſuppoſed, with Manutius (133), that Ovid was born the nineteenth of March 711. He ought to have reckoned from this day to the tenth of December, eight months, and twenty-one days; but he ought to have reckoned from the nineteenth of December to the firſt of January thirteen days and not eleven. However this be, he believed that Ovid died the firſt of January 769, at which time Tiberius had reigned but a little above fourteen months. And this is an opinion very different from that I have embraced. Mr de Tillemont makes the exile of this Poet (134) to continue no longer than ſeven years, and he fixes them from the fifty-fourth year of Auguſtus to the fourth of Tiberius (135). According to this, Ovid muſt have been exiled at the age of fifty-three years, and not as he aſſures us himſelf (136), at the age of fifty, making uſe of round numbers, and omitting the redundant months. He would not thus have paſſed by two or three years, if he had ſo much exceeded fifty years. Scaliger, who charges him with this omiſſion (137), is more unreaſonable for ſo doing, than for making him die in the ninth year of his baniſhment. The computation of the Abbé de Villeloin (138) is very erroneous. He will have it, that Ovid, being baniſhed in the fifty-ſecond year of Auguſtus, and having lived in exile ſeven years and twenty-one days, and being dead in the fourth year of Tiberius, lived fifty-ſeven years, nine months, and eleven days. We muſt not forget Mr Moreri, who has ſaid that Ovid died the firſt of January in the hundred and ninety-ninth Olympiad, as if a period of four years had but one firſt of January. Calviſius ſpeaks of the death of this Poet, a little before his mentioning the hundred and ninety-ninth Olympiad. This is placing it about the latter end of the hundred and ninety-eighth Olympiad. He gives us to underſtand, that Ovid died in the beginning of the year of Rome 769, and under the conſulſhip of Cœlius Rufus, and of Pomponius Flaccus; but the reaſon he gives is of no weight at all. 'Ovidius 'circa hæc tempora mortuus eſt, meminit ENIM in 'penultima elegia de Ponto (139) hujus Flacci futuri 'conſulis in Calendis Januarii (140). - - - - Ovid died 'about this time, FOR he takes notice in the laſt elegy 'but one de Ponto, that this Flaccus was to become con-

(128) Scalig. in Euſeb. pag. 182, ad num. 2033.

(129) See the remark [K], citat. (108).

(130) Ciofan. in Vit. Ovid.

(131) In Vita Ovid.

(132) Ibid.

(133) Ald. Manut. in Vita Ovidii, pag. 16.

(134) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. i, pag. m. 111.

(135) Ib. pag. 66, & 111.

(136) See the remark [K], citation (107).

(137) Scaliger. in Euſeb. pag. 182, num. 2033.

(138) L'Abbé de Marolles, Vie d'Ovide.

(139) He ſhould have ſaid, in nona Elegia, lib. iv: it is not the laſt but one, becauſe that book contains XVI.

(140) Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. Mundi 3966, pag. m. 414.

ſul on the Calends of January.' How! becauſe Ovid obſerves that this Flaccus was to enter upon his conſulſhip on the firſt of January following, muſt it be concluded that he died in the beginning of that conſulſhip? What ſort of reaſoning is this! I believe that Calviſius had another meaning, he intended to ſay, in my opinion, that ſince Ovid's works contained nothing of a later date than this deſignation of the conſulſhip of Pomponius Flaccus, it ought to be concluded that his death happened a little time after. This reaſoning, tho' better than the former, is yet by no means accurate; for a long diſtemper, or the vexation in finding ſo many verſes ineffectual, might have obliged Ovid to ſilence his muſe.

It would be endleſs to enumerate all thoſe who affirm that he died on the ſame day with Livy, and that this was the firſt day of the year. I do not ſee where they find their authority; for it is true the Chronicle of Euſebius makes this famous Poet and Hiſtorian to die in the ſame year; but the day is not mentioned. The Cœcilius Minutianus Apuleius of Cœlius Rhodiginus, is in all probability, the original of this date we are ſpeaking of; for he ſays that Ovid died the firſt day of January, after he had been baniſhed ſeven years, and that Livy alſo died that day (141).

(141) See Cœlius Rhodigin. lib. xiii, Antiq. Lect. cap. i, pag. m. 659.

[O] He threw his Metamorphoſes into the fire, either out of ſpite, or becauſe he had not put the finiſhing hand to them.] He himſelf informs us of this particular; and the account he gives will not, I hope, be eſteemed diſagreeable in my commentary.

Carmina mutatas hominum dicentia formas:
Infelix domini quod fuga rupit opus.
Hæc ego diſcedens, ſicut bona multa meorum,
Ipſe mea poſui mœſtus in igne manu.
Utque cremaſſe ſuum fertur ſub ſtipite natum
Theſtias, & melior matre fuiſſe ſoror;
Sic ego non meritos mecum peritura libellos
Impoſui rapidis viſcera noſtra rogis.
Vel quod eram Muſas, ut crimina noſtra, peroſus:
Vel quod adhuc creſcens, & rude carmen erat.
Quæ quoniam non ſunt penitus ſublata, ſed exſtant;
(Pluribus exemplis ſcripta fuiſſe reor)
Nunc precor ut vivant, & non ignava legentem
Otia delectent, admoneantque mei.
Non tamen illa legi poterunt patienter ab ullo;
Neſciat his ſummam ſi quis abeſſe manum.
Ablatum mediis opus eſt incudibus illud:
Defuit & ſcriptis ultima lima meis.
Et veniam pro laude peto, laudatus abunde
Non faſtiditus ſi tibi lector ero.
Hos quoque ſex verſus, in prima fronte libelli
Si præponendos eſſe putabis, habe:
Orba parente ſuo quicunque volumina tangis,
His ſaltem veſtra detur in urbe locus.
Quoque magis faveas, non hæc ſunt edita ab illo,
Sed quaſi de domini funere rapta ſui.
Quicquid in his igitur vitii rude carmen habebit,
Emendaturus, ſi licuiſſet, erat (142).

(142) Ovid. Triſt. lib. i, Eleg. VI, ver. 33. See alſo ibid. lib. iii, Eleg. xiv, ver. 20.

My verſe which Metamorphoſes relate,
Share in their exil'd maſter's wretched fate.
Theſe and ſome others, which the world admire,
My ſad departing hand committed to the fire.
And as Althæa's block conſumed her ſon,
While her love was by her revenge outdone:
So tho' they merit not from me that doom,
My paper offspring I in flames conſume.
Either becauſe I hate my guilty muſe;
Or want the time her errors to peruſe.
But ſince not wholly loſt, they ſtill remain,
While copied they in private hands have lain;

May

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he died in the country of the Geta, his aſhes might be carried to Rome, and that the epitaph he compoſed for himſelf might be inſcribed on his tomb [P]. He not only met with humanity among thoſe Barbarians, but alſo a great deal of civility. They loved and honoured him in a ſingular manner, and teſtified their eſteem for him by public decrees. The diſmal deſcriptions he made of their country, were not at all pleaſing to them; they complained of it to him, for which he made his excuſes [Q]. He boaſts of one thing which will prove, that he renounced gallantry in his exile; for he pretends, that no perſon of whatſoever age, or ſex, could complain of him (m): it is a ſign he no longer amuſed himſelf in making love, and that even after he had learned the Getic tongue, he did not entertain the wives and daughters of the Tomians on that ſubject; for if he had, their huſbands and fathers would have clamoured againſt him. But as to his indifference, if that was a thing diſpleaſing to them, yet it was neceſſary, at leaſt, that they ſhould ſuppreſs their complaints. This part of his conduct was ſo much the more commendable, as it was difficult to be obſerved by a perſon of his amorous diſpoſition, and who had contracted a long habit in a quite different courſe of life (n). There are ſome Chriſtian Poets (o), who reſemble him in other reſpects, but yet tho' they are baniſhed for their religion, do not ceaſe their leud courſes. He wrote an infinite number of verſes during his exile: nor is

(m) See the beginning of the remark [Q].

(n) Molle cupidineis nec inexpugnabile telis
Cor mihi, quodque levis cauſſa moveret erat.
Cum tamen hoc eſſem: minimoque accenderer igni. Ovid. Triſt. lib. iv, Elg. X, ver. 65.

(o) Clement Marot, for example.

May they now live, and with the reader join,
To ſooth his leiſure, and account for mine.
Nor can they his attention yet command,
If once he knows they want the pruning hand.
Abrupt the work was from the anvil torn,
Nor had the file beſtow'd the finiſh'd form.
Excuſe is all the praiſe my lines require;
Enough commended if they do not tire.
Theſe ſix ſucceeding verſes, may have place,
If you approve, the title page to grace.
To whomſoe'er my orphan-work ſhall come,
To this your city may at leaſt give room.
Perhaps it may the greater favour gain,
Conſider'd as my poſthumous remain.
If therefore my unpoliſh'd verſe offend,
Excuſe theſe faults I wanted leave to mend.

(143) Id. lib. II, Triſt. ver. 555.

We may alſo conſult the paſſage (143) where he intreats the emperor to read ſome pieces of this work.

[P] He deſired . . . . that his aſhes might be carried to Rome, and that the epitaph he compoſed for himſelf, might be inſcribed on his tomb.] He dreaded the immortality of the ſoul, and wiſhed for its mortality; for he was not willing that his ſhade ſhould wander among thoſe of the Sarmatians: therefore at all events he was deſirous of having a tomb at Rome. We ſhall repeat what he wrote upon this ſubject to his dear wife.

Atque utinam pereant animæ cum corpore noſtræ,
Effugiatque avidos pars mea nulla rogos!
Nam ſi morte carens vacuas volat altus in auras
Spiritus, & Samii ſunt rata dicta ſenis;
Inter Sarmaticas Romana vagabitur umbras,
Perque feros Manes hoſpita ſemper erit.
Oſſa tamen facito parva referantur in urna.
Sic ego non etiam mortuus exſul ero.
Non vetat hoc quiſquam: fratrem Thebana peremptum
Suppoſuit tumulo rege vetante ſoror.
Atque ea cum foliis & amomi pulvere miſce:
Inque ſuburbano condita pone loco.
Quoſque legat verſus oculo properante viator,
Grandibus in tumuli marmore cæde notis:
Hic ego qui jaceo tenerorum luſor amorum,
Ingenio perii Naſo poëta meo.
At tibi qui tranſis, ne ſit grave, quiſquis amaſti,
Dicere, Naſonis molliter oſſa cubant (144).

(144) Id. lib. iii, Triſt. Eleg. III, ver. 59.

O that my ſoul might with my body die,
And not ſurvive death's ſad ſolemnity.
For if the Samian ſage has reaſon'd right,
Immortal ſhe muſt take her airy flight;
My Roman ghoſt muſt with Sarmatians rove,
And to fierce ſhades a ſtranger always prove.
But bring my aſhes back within their urn,
I may when dead from exile ſure return.
This none forbid; the Theban ſiſter gave,
Spite of the king, her brother's corps a grave.
Let herbs and ſpices mix their ſweet perfume,
And gently lay them in ſome ſuburb tomb.
Let this inſcription on the marble ſtay
Each curious reader who ſhall paſs that way.
Here lieš love's faithful ſlave beneath this ſtone,
Ovid, the Poet, by his wit undone.
Let every lover as he paſſes by,
Wiſh that his bones may unmoleſted lie.

He mentioned the opinion of Pythagoras very unſeaſonably: for it is contrary to the doctrine which ſuppoſes, that the ghoſts of the dead wander about their tombs.

[Q] The Barbarians . . . loved and honoured him in a ſingular manner . . . he excuſed to them the deſcriptions he gave of their country.] We ſhall cite a paſſage in one of his epiſtles.

Nec ſumus hic odio, nec ſcilicet eſſe meremur,
Nec cum fortuna mens quoque verſa mea eſt.
Illa quies animi eſt, quam tu laudare ſolebas,
Ille vetus ſolito perſtat in ore pudor.
Sic ego ſum longe, ſic hic, ubi barbarus hoſtis,
Ut fera plus valeant legibus arma, facit.
Rem queat ut nullam tot jam Græcine per annos
Fœmina de nobis virve puerve queri.
Hoc facit, ut miſero faveant adſintque Tomitæ,
Hæc quoniam tellus teſtificanda mihi eſt.
Illi me, qui velle vident, diſcedere malunt:
Reſpectu cupiunt hic tamen eſſe ſui.
Nec mihi credideris: exſtant decreta quibus nos
Laudat, & immunes publica cera facit.
Conveniens miſeris & quanquam gloria non eſt,
Proxima dant nobis oppida munus idem (145).

(145) Id. de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. ix, ver. 89.

Nor hatred do I here deſerve, or find,
Nor with my fortune have I chang'd my mind.
That peace you us'd to praiſe I ſtill enjoy,
And in chaſt words my modeſt tongue employ.
Thus, live I here, far off, where war's alarms
Compel the laws to yield to brutal arms.
Hence, O Græcinus, for ſo many years,
Not one complaint from either ſex appears.
Hence, I can boaſt the Tomians generous aid,
Since my appeal muſt to this place be made.
They wiſh me gone, becauſe 'tis my deſire;
While they themſelves rather my ſtay require.
You'd ſcarce believe it: they have paſs'd decrees
Much in my praiſe, with large immunities.
And tho' they ſuit not this ſad ſtate of mine,
The neighb'ring towns in all theſe honours join.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is this to be wondered at; for the muſes are naturally tatlers, but moſt of all ſo in adverſity: and beſides this, he wanted converſation, and took no delight either in drinking, or gaming [R]; ſo that they muſt needs be his whole entertainment. If he had

You ſee that they granted him exemptions, and here follows another paſſage which ſhows that this, was among them an extraordinary favour, and that they crowned him publickly.

Adde quod Illyrica ſi jam pice nigrior eſſem,
Non mordenda mihi turba fidelis erat.
Molliter à vobis mea ſors excepta, Tomitæ,
Tam mites Grajos indicat eſſe viros.
Gens mea Peligni, regioque domeſtica Sulmo,
Non potuit noſtris lenior eſſe malis.
Quem vix incolumi cuiquam ſalvoque daretis,
Is datus à vobis eſt mihi nuper honor.
Solus adhuc ego ſum veſtris immunis in oris;
Exceptis, ſi qui munera legis habent.
Tempora ſacrata mea ſunt velata corona,
Publicus invito quam favor impoſuit.
Quam grata eſt igitur Latonæ Delia tellus,
Erranti tutum quæ dedit una locum;
Tam mihi cura Tomus, patria quæ ſede fugatis,
Tempus ad hoc nobis hoſpita fide manet.
Dî modo feciſſent placidæ ſpem poſſet habere
Pacis, & à gelido longius axe foret (146).

(146) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. XIV, ver. 45.

The blackeſt pitch wou'd be leſs black than I,
Should this kind people meet my calumny.
So gently Tomians my ſad fate you cheer,
That from this mildneſs you true Greeks appear.
Not even Sulmo's ſelf, my native town,
Cou'd treat me friendlier than you have done.
Such honours to a wretch you kindly ſhow,
As your own happieſt people rarely know.
To me alone immunities you give,
Which others only from the laws receive.
My ſacred temples with a crown you bind;
An honour I wou'd rather have declin'd.
As Delos then is to Latona dear,
Where firſt her flying ſteps forgot their fear;
So Tomos is to me, who exil'd find
A treatment here as faithful and as kind.
O that the gods had placed this fav'rite race,
Far from the pole, and in perpetual peace.

Theſe laſt words deſcribe the greateſt inconveniences he met with in the place of his exile: he was expoſed to the rigours of cold, and in the neighbourhood of a people who were continually making irruptions (147). This was not at all agreeable to an Italian of a delicate and thin conſtitution (148), and who had led his whole life in the pleaſures of Repoſe (149).

We ſhall ſee alſo what he anſwers to the complaints of the inhabitants of Tomos: he aſſures them that he had never ſaid any thing ill of them (150), and that he had only exclaimed againſt their climate.

(147) See the third letter of the firſt book de Ponto, and elſewhere throughout.

(148) Sufficiant: graciles ſed non ſine viribus artus: Præterea non nervi, corpora noſtra carent. Ovid. Amor. lib. ii, Eleg. X, ver. 23. See, above, the paſſage in Epiſt. X, of the firſt book de Ponto, ver. 21.

(149) See Eleg. X, lib. iv, Triſt.

(150) This is hard to reconcile with, Eleg. VII, and X, lib. v, Triſt.

In medias Syrtes, mediam mea vela Charybdin
Mittite, præſenti dum careamus humo.
Styx quoque, ſi quid ea eſt, bene commutabitur Iſtro:
Si quid & inferius, quam Styga, mundus habet.
Gramina cultus ager, frigus minus odit hirundo;
Proxima Marticolis quam loca Naſo Getis.
Talia ſuccenſent propter mihi verba Tomitæ,
Itaque carminibus publica mota meis.
Ergo ego ceſſabo nunquam per carmina lædi?
Plectar & incauto ſemper ab ingenio?
- - - - - -
- - - - - -
Sed nihil admiſi: nulla eſt mea culpa, Tomitæ,
Quos ego, cum loca ſim veſtra peroſus, amo.
Quilibet excutiat noſtri monumenta laboris;
Littera de vobis eſt mea queſta nihil.
Frigus & incurſus omni de parte timendos,
Et quod pulſetur murus ab hoſte, queror.
In loca, non homines, veriſſima crimina dixi.
Culpatis veſtrum vos quoque ſæpe ſolum.
- - - - - -
- - - - - -
At malus interpres, populi mihi concitat iram,
Inque novum crimen carmina noſtra vocat.
Tam felix utinam, quam pectore candidus eſſem.
Exſtat adhuc nemo ſaucius ore meo (151).

(151) Ovid. Epiſt. xiv, lib. iv, de Ponto, ver. 9.

Charybdis gulph, or Lybia's opening ſand,
Wou'd leſs alarm me than this dreadful land.
With Styx, if real, I'd the Danube change,
Or to far lower regions gladly range.
Swallows hate cold, the plough-ſhare hates the graſs,
Much leſs than Ovid does this hoſtile place.
The Tomians take ſuch words as theſe unkind,
And my ſad lines their high diſpleaſure find.
What muſt my verſe for ever then offend?
Muſt my raſh wit ſtill in my torment end?
- - - - - -
- - - - - -
But I am clear: Tomians, my plea approve,
Your place I hate, but I your perſons love.
Thro' all my works, you ſtill may ſearch in vain,
There's not one tittle does of you complain.
But of your walls, I own I oft have told,
How much they're haraſs'd both with arms and cold.
My railing at your ſoil I frankly own;
This is no more than you yourſelves have done.
- - - - - -
- - - - - -
Some falſe conſtruction makes the people rage,
And charge new crimes upon my guiltleſs page.
O wou'd I were as happy, as I'm clear,
That no reflexions in my verſe appear.

[R] He wrote an infinite number of verſes during his exile (152); nor is it to be wondred at, . . . he wanted converſation, and took no delight either in drinking or gaming.] Here are ſome cauſes aſſigned for the fruitfulneſs of his Muſe; but the principal one is not taken notice of, which is, that Ovid's Muſe was uſed to bring forth without pain, and never troubled herſelf any farther about nurſing the child; for ſhe took very little care in correcting her productions (153): her caſe therefore muſt of courſe be like that of a mother who never ſuckles, ſhe breeds the more readily. The following paſſages ſhew that Ovid was obliged for every thing to the Muſes.

(152) Beſides the five books Triſtium, and the four books de Ponto, which we now have remaining, he wrote a great many verſes which he threw into the fire. See his XIIth Elogy of the fifth book Triſtium.

Hic ego, finitimis quamvis circumſoner armis,
Triſtia, quo poſſum, carmine fata levo.
Quod quamvis nemo eſt, cujus referatur ad aures;
Sic tamen abſumo decipioque diem.
Ergo quod vivo, duriſque laboribus obſto,
Nec me ſollicitæ tedia lucis habent;
Gratia Muſa tibi. Nam tu ſolatia præbes,
Tu curæ requies, tu medicina venis:
Tu dux & comes es: tu nos abducis ab Iſtro,
In medioque mihi das Helicone locum (154).

(153) See the end of this remark.

(154) Ovid. Triſt. lib. iv, Eleg. X, ver. 111. See alſo lib. v, Eleg. VII.

Tho' here ſurrounded with the noiſe of arms,
My wretched fate, verſe, in ſome meaſure, charms.
And tho' no liſtning ear my works attend,
Yet thus at leaſt the tedious hours I ſpend.
My life, my patience, and diverſions too,
To you, indulgent Muſe, I ſolely owe.
In you alone, I conſolation find;
You ſooth my cares, and heal my wounded mind.
You are my guide, you're my companion,
And ſhift rude Danube's ſcene to Helicon.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google had met with any perſons, to whom he could have repeated his verſes, he would have verſified with much more ſatisfaction: for he confeſſes, that walking in the dark, and

He complains of being without books and without hearers:

Non hic librorum, per quos inviter alarque,
Copia: pro libris arcus & arma ſonant.
Nullus in hac terra, recitem ſi carmina, cujus
Intellecturis auribus utar, adeſt (155).

(155) Id. ib. lib. iii, Eleg. XIV, ver. 37.

No books to entertain me here are found,
Books are ſupply'd by wars alarming ſound.
And ſhould I aim at ſome poëtic flight,
Here is not one to judge of what I write.

and he deſires this may ſerve for his excuſe, if his verſes, are not good: that his genius being diſcouraged by adverſity was not excited with the hopes of applauſe.

Contudit ingenium patientia longa laboris,
Et pars antiqui magna vigoris abeſt.
Sæpe tamen nobis, ut nunc quoque ſumta tabella eſt,
Inque ſuos volui cogere verba pedes:
Carmina ſcripta mihi ſunt nulla, aut qualia cernis,
Digna ſui domini tempore, digna loco.
Denique non parvas animo dat gloria vires,
Et fœcunda facit pectora laudis amor.
Nominis & famæ quondam fulgore trahebar,
Dum tulit antennas aura ſecunda meas.
Non adeo eſt bene nunc, ut ſit mihi gloria curæ:
Si liceat, nulli cognitus eſſe velim.
- - - - - -
- - - - - -
At puto, ſi demens ſtudium fatale retentem.
Hic mihi præbebit carminis arma locus.
Non liber hic ullus, non qui mihi commodet aurem,
Verbaque ſignificent quid mea norit, adeſt.
Omnia barbariæ loca ſunt, vociſque ferinæ:
Omnia ſunt Getici plena timore ſoni (156).

(156) Ovid. Triſt. lib. v, Eleg. XII, ver. 29.

The ills I've long endur'd, my genius tire,
And only ſerve to quench my former fire.
Yet oft, as now, my pen I take in hand,
And try to make each foot in order ſtand.
But all the verſe I write like theſe you ſee,
Too plainly with their author's ſtate agree.
Glory does beſt the flagging fancy raiſe,
And wit's incentive is the love of praiſe.
Theſe in full force did once with me prevail,
While fortune favour'd with a proſp'rous gale.
But now, alas! they are no more my lot;
My ſole ambition is to be forgot.
- - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - -
But ſhou'd I try this fatal gift once more,
What helps has ſuch a place as this in ſtore?
Here I can neither find a book nor friend
Whoſe learned ear may to my works attend,
Here nothing elſe but barbariſm is found,
And conſtant horror of a Getic ſound.

He repeats the ſame thought, and enlarges upon it in another place, where he ſays, that he is diſcouraged from making verſes, and that he would have quite given it over, if he had not been deprived of all other amuſements.

Da veniam faſſo, ſtudiis quoque frena remiſi,
Ducitur & digitis littera rara meis:
Impetus ille facer; qui vatum pectora nutrit,
Qui prius in nobis eſſe ſolebat, abeſt.
Vix venit ad partes, vix ſumptæ Muſa tabellæ
Imponit pigras pæne coacta manus:
Parvaque ne dicam, ſcribendi nulla voluptas,
Eſt mihi: nec numeris nectere verba juvat.
Sive quod hinc fructus adeo non cepimus ullos,
Principium noſtri res ſit ut iſta mali:
Sive quod in tenebris numeroſos ponere greſtus,
Quodque legas nulli, ſcribere carmen, idem eſt.
Excitat auditor ſtudium, laudataque virtus
Creſcit, & immenſum gloria calcar habet.
Hic mea cui recitem, niſi flavis ſcripta Corallis, Quaſque alias gentes barbarus Iſter habet?
Sed quid ſolus agam? quaque infelicia perdam
Otia materia, ſurripiamque diem?
Nam neque me vinum, nec me tenet alea fallax,
Per quæ clam tacitum tempus abire ſolet.
Nec me, quod cuperem, ſi per fera bella liceret
Oblectat cultu terra novata ſuo.
Quid, niſi Pierides, ſolatia frigida reſtant,
Non bene de nobis quæ merure, deæ (157)?

(157) Idem, de Ponto, lib. iv, Epiſt. II, ver. 23. See alſo lib. i, Epiſt. V ver. 10.

I frankly own, while I your pardon aſk,
I now grow lazy in the ſtudious taſk.
That ſacred warmth, which fires the Poet's thought,
And once was felt by me, is now forgot.
No more my Muſe with uſual freedom comes,
It ſeems a force when ſhe the pen reſumes.
No more the flowing numbers now delight,
Inſtead of pleaſure, 'tis a pain to write.
Whether becauſe ſuch ill ſucceſs I know,
That all my ills from this one fountain flow;
Or that to write what none can e'er remark,
Is juſt the ſame as ſcribbling in the dark.
An auditor gives life, and praiſe will ſtir
The Muſe, for glory is a noble ſpur.
Here only with ſuch auditors I meet,
As near the Danube find a ſavage ſeat.
But loneſome as I am, what can I do,
To make my wretched hours leſs tedious flow?
For neither wine, nor gaming ſuit my taſte,
Which others chuſe their vacant time to waſte.
Nor do I like, tho' wou'd fierce war allow,
I'd try the ruſtic pleaſures of the plough.
Your cold amuſements, therefore, O ye Nine,
Tho' ill you've have treated me, muſt ſtill be mine.

I ſhall cite one paſſage more, which is that, where he ſays, that his thinneſs did not proceed from any debauches, ſince his drink was chiefly water, and the circumſtances he was then in, did not expoſe him to the paſſion of love.

Is quoque, qui gracili cibus eſt in corpore, ſomnus,
Non alit officio corpus inane ſuo.
Sed vigilo, vigilantque mei ſine fine dolores,
Quorum materiam dat locus ipſe mihi.
Vix igitur poſſis viſos agnoſcere vultus,
Quoque ierit, quæras, qui fuit ante color.
Parvus in exiles ſuccus mihi pervenit artus,
Membraque ſunt cerâ pallidiora novâ.
Non hæc immodico contraxi damna Lyæo:
Scis, mihi quam ſolæ pene bibantur aquæ.
Non epulis oneror, quarum ſi tangar amore,
Eſt tamen in Geticis copia nulla locis.
Nec vires adimit Veneris damnoſa voluptas,
Non ſolet in mœſtos illa venire thoros.
Unda locuſque nocent, & cauſſa valentior iſtis
Anxietas animi, quæ mihi ſemper adeſt (158).

(158) Id. [illegible] de Ponto, [illegible] X, ver. 2[illegible]

Sleep too, by which thin bodies chiefly live,
To me no nouriſhment can ever give.
Sorrows keep watch upon my weary eyes,
Which without number this ſad place ſupplies.

Scarce

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and writing verſes which we can read to no body, is the very ſame thing (p). He had among other good qualities that of not being ſatirical, and yet he was very capable of compoſing ſatirical verſes, as he has ſhown in his Poem againſt Ibis [S]; for no piece ever

(p) See the remark [R], citation (151).

Scarce could my alter'd viſage now be known,
My wonted colour is ſo ſtrangely gone.
My ſhrivell'd limbs their uſual juices fail,
Not even virgin-wax appears ſo pale.
Nor do theſe ills from reeling Bacchus flow,
For water you my fav'rite liquor know.
Nor do I ſurfeit with exceſſive cheer,
There is no room for over-eating here:
Nor yet does Venus thus my health deſtroy,
The wretched-bed's a ſtranger to her joy.
Hurtful the water, and the place I find,
And what is worſe than theſe, a tortur'd mind.

We ſhall juſt take notice of the manner of his correcting his works. He confeſſes his negligence and idleneſs upon this head. He agrees that he was juſtly cenſured at Rome for eternally repeating the ſame things in the poems he wrote during his exile (159). This was a fault he was very ſenſible of, and endeavoured to mend; but the vivacity which animated him in his firſt compoſition, failing him when he came to reviſe what he had written, he found the correction too troubleſome, and quite gave it over. This is only one of his excuſes. It is certain that the caſe is the ſame with a great many authors. They compoſe with pleaſure and warmth, and thence it is that they diſplay their whole force; but they flag when they come to reviſe their work: the firſt fire returns no more; there ſucceeds in their imagination a certain calm which makes their pen proceed with a thouſand difficulties. It is like a boat that can make no way but by the force of oars. If you would know what Ovid ſays upon the correction of his writings, read the following verſes.

(159) Id. de Ponto, lib. iii, Epiſt. IX, ver. 39.

Judicium tamen hic noſtrum non decipit error,
Nec quicquid genui, protinus illud amo,
Cur igitur ſi me video delinquere, peccem;
Et patiar ſcripto crimen ineſſe, rogas?
Non eadem ratio eſt, ſentire, & demere morbos.
Senſus ineſt cunctis, tollitur arte malum.
Sæpe aliquod verbum cupiens mutare relinquo:
Judicium vires deſtituuntque meum.
Sæpe piget (quid enim dubitem tibi vera fateri?)
Corrigere, & longi ferre laboris onus:
Scribentem juvat ipſe favor, minuitque laborem,
Cumque ſuo creſcens pectore fervet opus:
Corrigere at res eſt tanto magis ardua, quanto
Magnus Ariſtarcho major Homerus erat.
Sic animum lento curarum frigore lædit,
Ut cupidi ſi quis fræna retentat equi (160).

(160) Id. ver. 9.

Nor does my judgment yet ſo partial prove,
As ev'ry thing I write, myſelf to love.
If therefore I with open eyes offend,
Why do I not, you'll ſay, thoſe errors mend?
It differs quite to ſee, and cure the ill;
That's plain to ſenſe, this muſt be done by ſkill.
Often when to correct ſome word I try,
My flagging judgment does it's aid deny.
Often, to ſay the truth, my thoughts recoil,
And dread to undergo ſo long a toil.
The itch of writing does itſelf repay;
Each ſtep it ſets, the more it ſmooths the way.
But to correct is a more arduous taſk,
And does the talents of a Homer aſk.
This dull employment gives the mind ſuch pain,
As the briſk ſteed feels from the checking rein.

[S] He had, among other good qualities, that of not being ſatirical . . . . . No piece ever diſcovered more gall than his Poem againſt Ibis.] He prides himſelf in having never once attacked any perſon in a ſatirical way, and he repreſents this to the emperor, to ſhew him, that if his verſes had offended in other reſpects, yet they deſerved encouragement on this account, that they were always exempt from the ſpirit of ill-nature.

Non ego mordaci diſtrinxi carmine quemquam,
Nec meus ullius crimina verſus habet,
Candidus à ſalibus ſuffuſis felle refugi:
Nulla venenato littera miſta joco eſt.
Inter tot populi, tot ſcripti millia noſtri,
Quem mea Calliope læſerit, unus ero (161).

(161) Ovid. Triſt. lib. ii, ver. 563.

None can with juſtice of my verſe complain,
Since they the faults of no one ſoul contain.
The wit they have is without gall expreſs'd,
No mixture of ill-nature points the jeſt.
Of all mankind, howe'er my works abound,
I am the only perſon they ſhall wound.

It is thus he expreſſes himſelf in a Poem, which he compoſed after his baniſhment: and yet I am of opinion, that his invective againſt Ibis was finiſhed before that time. For ſince he makes himſelf but fifty years old in the beginning of that work, he wrote it, without doubt, a very little time after his arrival at Tomos, and upon the firſt news he received that a certain perſon had declared himſelf his enemy.

Tempus ad hoc, luſtris mihi jam bis quinque peractis,
Omne fuit Muſæ carmen inerme meæ:
Nullaque, quæ poſſit, ſcriptis tot millibus, exſtat,
Littera Naſonis ſanguinolenta legi.
Nec quemquam noſtri, niſi me, læſere libelli:
Artificis periit cum caput arte ſua.
Unus (& hoc ipſum eſt injuria magna,) perennem
Candoris titulum non ſinit eſſe mei.
Quiſquis is eſt (nam nomen adhuc utcunque tacebo)
Cogit inaſſuetas ſumere tela manus.
Ille relegatum gelidos Aquilonis ad ortus,
Non ſinit exſilio delituiſſe meo:
Vulneraque immitis requiem quærentia vexat:
Jactat & in toto nomina noſtra foro:
Perpetuoque mihi ſociatam fœdere lecti
Non patitur miſeri funera flere viri (162).

(162) Ovid. in Ibin, init.

Full fifty ſuns have run their annual round,
And hitherto unarm'd my muſe have found.
Among ſo many thouſand verſe of mine,
There is not to be ſeen one cutting line.
Except myſelf, my works do hurt to none,
By my own art I only am undone.
But now, one wretch ſo much ill-nature ſhews,
I muſt, at laſt, this boaſted candor loſe.
This wretch, for ſtill his name ſhall be concealed,
Forces me now unuſual arms to wield.
His malice reaches to the northern Pole,
And even there diſturbs my baniſh'd ſoul.
Cruel he tears the wounds that want to cloſe,
And makes a public jeſt of all my woes.
My wretched conſort too muſt ſhare his hate,
Nor will he give her leave to weep my fate.

If he had been then fifty-two years of age, or more, he would certainly have told us ſo, in order to magnify his merit in not having written any thing ſatirical in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ever discovered more gall than this, nor more severe maledictions or anathemas. He wrote it a little after his banishment.

in all that time. This one Essay proved a master-piece of the kind: Ovid there (163) makes a collection of all the punishments to be met with in history or fable, in order to wish them by way of curse to his perfidious adversary, which he takes from two hundred and thirty-nine examples. A learned professor in the university of Paris, who lived about a hundred years ago (164), has digested them into forty-two kinds, upon which he intended to have composed so many chapters (165); his name was Stephanus Richardus Nivernensis. The best commentary extant upon this satire, is that of Mr Boissieu (166): it was printed at Lyons, sumptibus Antonii Pillehotte, in the year 1633, in 4to (167). The Abbé de Marolles, who is the first translator of this Poem into French, has accompanied it with very large notes, the best of which are borrowed from the Commentary of Mr Boissieu. This translation was printed at Paris in the year 1661, in 8vo.

(163) The Abbé de Marolles, in the argument of his French translation of the poem against Ibis.

(164) This Abbé said this in the year 1661.

(165) This Abbé gives the title of these chapters.

(166) Dionysius Salvaginus Boessius.

(167) The Abbé de Marolles did not know this, for he says, pag. 67, that this work of Meffire Denys de Salvaing, Seigneur de Boissieu, was printed at Lyons in 1638.

PACARD

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

P

PACARD (GEORGE) calls himſelf a Seguſian in the title of his books, which makes me believe that he was born in the Lionnois, or in the neighbouring country. He lived in the XVIth century. I think he was miniſter at la Rochefoucaut in the year 1574, when he dedicated his Natural Theology to the count of la Rochefoucaut. We find in the Bibliotheque of Du Verdier Vau-Privas, that this book, which contains ſeveral arguments taken from the conſideration of nature againſt the Epicureans and Atheiſts, was printed at Rochelle in the year 1579 in 8vo. There is a ſecond edition of it reviſed and enlarged by the author [A]. It was printed at Niort in the year 1606 in 8vo. The manuſcript of this treatiſe did very great ſervice to George Pacard [B].

[A] A ſecond edition reviſed and enlarged by the author.] The author left out of it the chapter concerning Antichriſt, which was in the firſt. He had publiſhed a particular treatiſe on that ſubject at Niort two years before (1).

(1) See the advertiſement to the reader, in the beginning of the fourth book.

[B] The manuſcript of that treatiſe did great ſervice to the author.] This is what he ſays of it in the Epiſtle Dedicatory: Being releaſed out of priſon, where I had been detained at Grenoble for about a year, I was informed by Mr de Bompar, who had procured my deliverance, that I had been exempted from death (which eight of our company had ſuffered) on account of a copy of that book, found upon me when I was taken priſoner, and which had fallen into the hands of the parliament of the ſaid place.

PACHECO (ALVAREZ) a Spaniſh colonel and kinſman of the duke of Alba (a) ſerved under him in the Low-Countries, and was ſent to Fluſhing, to be commander of the place, and alſo to haſten the building of a citadel there in 1572: but before he landed, there had been an inſurrection in the city, and the Spaniſh garriſon was driven from thence. He was then in amaze, and found himſelf in the power of the enemy, who cauſed him to be hanged, without any regard to his alledging, that he ſhould be beheaded upon the account of his nobility, ſince they were not willing to ſave his life for the price he offered for it. Treſlon being incenſed againſt the duke of Alba (b), would abate nothing of the ſentence, but Pacheco muſt take his turn at the gallows with two other Spaniards. Meurſius relates this matter at large; but he has confounded this Pacheco with a famous Engineer (c) whom the duke of Alba had brought from Italy, who was called Paciotti; he ſuppoſes that he who was hanged was called Paciottus. Mr du Maurier obſerves ſome other miſtakes concerning our Spaniard [A], who probably was of the family of the cardinals Pacheco, mentioned by Moreri.

(a) Strada, Dec. i, lib. vii, ad ann. 1572.

(b) Becauſe the duke had put this Treſlon's brother to death in 1568.

(c) Se maxime Albanum lædere exiſtimabat, ſi munitionum artificem tam inſignem, belli egregium miniſtrum & propinquo ſanguinis nexu, tempore tam alieno eriperet. Meurſius, Guill. Auriac. lib. vi.

[A] Mr du Maurier obſerves ſome other miſtakes concerning our Spaniard.] Thus he expreſſes himſelf (1): 'As to this Pacheco, I cannot ſufficiently admire the 'diverſity of opinions which I have obſerved among 'the moſt famous Hiſtorians, who have written of 'the affairs of the Low-Countries; for Grotius ſays, 'that he was a Savoyard, altho' Bentivoglio, Strada, 'Meurſius, and Emanuel Meteren, agree that he was 'a Spaniard. Cardinal Bentivoglio ſays, that he was 'beheaded; and others write, that he was hanged. 'Again, Meurſius calls this executed kinſman of the 'duke of Alba, Paciotti, altho' all the others call 'him Pacheco, confounding this Pacheco and Francis 'Paciotti of Urbino, count of Montefabro, who was 'ſo ſkillful in fortifications and warlike engines (2), 'that having built the citadel of Antwerp, his name 'was given to one of the five baſtions of the fortreſs, 'by the order of the duke of Alba, that the name of 'ſo great a man might be perpetuated to poſterity. 'The four other baſtions were called the Duke, Ferdi-'dinand, Toledo, and Alba, being the ſeveral names of 'of this duke, without calling any of them by the 'name of king Philip, his maſter. In fine, to return 'to this Pacheco, Emanuel Meteren, although he be a 'very exact Hiſtorian, calls him Peter Pacheco, whom 'Famianus Strada, being better informed, calls Alvarez.' Properly ſpeaking, Grotius cannot be ranked among the Hiſtorians who ſay that Pacheco was hanged. Secuti Hollandiæ oppidum, ſays he (3), Fliſſingani quos ſurgentis arcis aſpectus & præſidium adventans commoverat; Bacieco Allobroge, operum Albanicorum peritiſſimo curatore ad ſupplicium rapto, in cauſam deſcendunt. Perhaps he called him Savoyard, becauſe he had read, that the duke of Alba had obtained him of the duke of Savoy. Impetraverat à Duce Sabaudiæ Franciſcum Paciottum Urbinatem, Montiſabri Comitem, arcium bellicarumque machinarum peritiſſimum (4). Thuanus furniſhes us with a new variation, for he ſays, that Peter Paciotus was killed in a popular commotion, and that his head was firſt fixed on the top of a ſpear, and afterwards upon the walls of the city (5). Who knows but he thought that it was the ſame Engineer, whom he had named Paciottus Allobrox (6), ſpeaking of the citadel of Antwerp? He informs us, that this Paciottus had, a little before, built the citadel of Turin, by order of duke Emanuel Philibert. From hence, perhaps, Grotius took the word Allobrox, which no ways ſuits this famous Engineer, for he was of Urbino. Another Hiſtorian gives the name of Iſidorus Paciottus to him who built the citadel of Antwerp (7); and obſerves, that he left two ſons behind him, who were excellent Engineers; one, named Vido Ubaldus, was killed at the taking of Calais in 1596; the other named Frederic, was in Amiens the next year, when the French retook that town (8).

(1) Du Maurier's Memoirs, pag. 48.

(2) Du Maurier took this from Strada, Decad. i, lib. vii.

(3) Annal. lib. v, pag. 50, Edit. in 12*mo, ann.* 1638.

(4) Strada, Dec. i, lib. vi.

(5) Petro Pacioto quem Albanus arci exſtruendæ præfecerat, in tumultu occiſo, cujus caput conto præfixum & promœnibus ſtatutum eſt. Thuan. lib. live.

(6) Thuan. l. xli.

(7) Angelus Gallucius, de Bello Belg. Part i, lib. viii. Thuanus, lib. cxvi, pag. 747, calls him alſo Iſidorus. (8) Gallue. ibid. lib. ix.

PADILLA (MARY DE) miſtreſs to Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile, was educated at the houſe of Alfonſus d'Albuquerque, when that monarch fell in love with her, during the expedition of Aſturia. One of the king's brothers took up arms in that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google country; and this rebellion being ſupported by ſ been of a miſchievous conſequence; wherefore ſtop to it very quickly, and the king marched (a). The wife of Don Alfonſo d'Albuquerque dilla, one of the maids ſhe had in her ſervice, wh monarch. She did not make him ſigh long fo journey (b). John de Hiniſtroſa, uncle, by the as a procurer and confident (c): this was done i dy contracted to Blanche of Bourbon the daug of Bourbon (d), and ſiſter to the daughter-in-law perſon, to whom he was contracted, was as be nitely more illuſtrious [A], yet he made no gr neither did he take it well of Albuquerque tha Albuquerque, I ſay, who was afraid leſt the kin higheſt degree of favour. At laſt, the marria
